Herodotus likewise tells us, the Scythians did thus, in the Funerals of their Kings. It was not because they thought an Orbicular Figure more acceptable to their Gods, than another, but because they would withhold nothing from them, that grew upon their Heads.¹⁰³ Electra was therefore Angry with Helena, in Sophocles, because in the Funeral of Clytemnestra, shee dealt πανουργίᾳς, Deceitfully, in sparing her more Curious Locks.¹⁰⁴ Whence Artemidorus tells, that for a Person

100 The Dutch traveler Johannes Cotovicus, aka. Jan van Kootwick, aka. Cootwijk (d. 1629), in his Itinerarium Hierosolymitanum et Syriacum (1619), lib. 1, cap. 13, p. 84, describes the funeral rites of the Cretans as follows: “Hæc omnes in luctu suos quosque defunctos veteri Ethnicorum more plangunt, & maioris doloris declarandi causa uxores in primis, matres, sorores, ac proximæ quæque capillum sibi manum discindunt, comam evellunt, eamque cadaveribus injiciunt; fletu oculos corumpunt, frontem genasque lacerant, deturpantque.” For our purposes, “according to the old custom of the pagans, all these women beat their breasts in grief for each of their own dead; and by displaying great grief, wives in the first rank, mothers, sisters, and females next of kin, each rend their hair with their own hands, pull out their hair, and throw it on the corpses; they spoil their eyes with weeping, they tear and disfigure their forehead and cheeks.”

101 The Greek epic poet Cointus Smyrnaeus, aka. Quintus Smyrnaeus (fl. 4th c. CE), embellished Homer's epic on the Trojan War. In his Posthomerica (3.685–86), Quintus has it that Ἀμφὶ δὲ χαίτας / Μυρμιδόνες κείραντο “the Myrmidons shore all their hair” as they covered the corpse of Achilles with their tresses.

102 Statius Papinius (Thebaid 6.194–96) has the Nemean Archemorus (son of Lycurgus and Eurydice) grieve over the funeral pyre of his infant son. Pain-stricken, Archemorus “with the sword cuts short [his own] hair that fell o’er back and breast” and spreads his shorn tresses over the child’s features.

103 Not to be outdone by Statius’s Archemorus, the Scythians wail over their dead king by cutting off “a piece of ear, shave their hair, cut their forearms, tear forehead and nose, and drive arrows through their left hand” (Herodotus 4.71).

104 Mather may have Aeschylus’s Oresteia in mind (rather than any tragedy by the Greek playwright Sophocles), for it is in Aeschylus’s The Libation Bearers (1.42 ff) where Electra to Dream of his thus Polling himself, is a Sign of Mourning & Mischief at hand; for, sais hee, Persons in such Cases, ἐαυτοὺς ἀνάγκη περικεῖρουν, Do necessarily poll themselves.¹⁰⁵

Thirdly, The Design of the Pagans, in thus Disposing of their Hair, was, to make a Sacrifice, either to, or for, the Dead, and provide the Ghosts of the Departed with a Peace-Offering. Paganinus Gaudentius, thinks it was, Ut Heroi, tanquam Deo, res digna Deo, et solita Dijs offerri consecratur absumenda.¹⁰⁶ Hence, the Greek Poets, do mention this Hair as, χοας, Inferias; and so does Heliodorus in his Ethiopic History. Tis a Passage, which they all have in Seneca, –

Laceraque frontis accipe abscissam comam.}¹⁰⁷

[46v] | Briefly, the Scholiast upon Sophocles expressly tells us, That they thus cast their Hair upon Sepulchres, that by this Expression of their Grief, they might render the Dead, Benevolent & Propitious unto them.¹⁰⁸

Now, if you'll examine the Context here, you'll see Cause to think, that the Clause, For the Dead, is to bee applied unto this Rite, as well as unto that, whereto it is more immediately annexed. Compare also, Deut. 14.1. and Lev. 21.1, 5.

Castalio therefore ventures to render this Text so, Ne vobis In funere verticem deraditote.¹⁰⁹

Sometimes, indeed they did not manage this Funeral Solemnity, with a Total Desolation of their Hair, but, only pared off the Extremities of it. So Helena, (Orestes's sister) short-shrifts the obligatory ritual by placing only a single lock of her hair on Agamemnon's tomb.

¹⁰⁶ In his book on the ancient funeral rites in the Roman Empire De Evulgatis Romanis Imperii Arcanis (1640), pars 2, De Funere Heroum, cap. 6, p. 82, the Italian poet-historian Paganinus Gaudentius of Pisa (c. 1595–1649) relates that at a funeral “to a hero as to a god, a thing worthy of a god, and a thing usually offered to the gods to be consecrated, must be destroyed.”

*Crinium summitates detruncavit.*¹¹⁰

And the Hebrew Word, /תֵּנֶפֶס/ here, signifies, Ends, rather than Corners; for who ever counts it proper, to say, Corners, of Hair?¹¹¹

Indeed, they used several Kinds, and Wayes of Tonsure. Sometimes, with their Nails, or, Scissors, they fetch'd off their Hair; sometimes they took the Razor to do it; and then off went the Hair of the Ey-browes too. Compare, Deut. 14.1. and Lev. 21.5.¹¹²

But then never called in the Help of Barbers for it; it was to bee done by their own Hands; The Impatience of Grief, would admitt no other.

[Consider, Job. 1.20. where, a, Vulsura Comæ, seems to bee meant, as used by Job, on the Death of his Children.]¹¹³

It was the Doing of this, as a Sacrifice for the Dead, that was forbidden, in the Law now before us. Theodoret thus expounds the Law, in Deuteronomy, – because, ταύτας προσέφερον τοῖς νεκροῖς; And so, among the Moderns, does Fagius, & out of him, Scultetus, – *Nonnullæ gentes, Capillos Capitis secare solebant, et Defunctis offerre.*¹¹⁴

For otherwise, the Ancient Hebrewes, did count it lawful, to celebrate Funerals, with cutting off their Hair. Compare Isa. 15.2. Jer. 16.6. Isa. 7.20. Jer. 48.37. And Jerom tells us, they did so in his Dayes, when their Zeal for the Law, had for some Ages conquered, their Inclinations to follow Pagan Usages. Yea, the Prophets foretelling many Deaths, did it, by calling for Baldnesses: [Jer. 7.29. Mic. 1.16. Ezek. 7.18.] but would the Lord seem to exhort them, unto a breach of His Law?¹¹⁵

110 In Euripides's Orestes (128), Electra complains about Helen's careless observation of the funeral rites for the dead Agamemnon: ἀρκας [ὥς] ἀπέθρισεν τρίχας; she "cut off her hair only at the ends."

111 Lev. 19:9. From תֵּנֶפֶס [pe'ah], suggesting "corner, edge, side, quarter, extremity" (Strong's # 6285 and B7792).

112 Spencer (346, 347).

113 Job 1:20 (KJV) relates that Job "shaved his head." Mather prefers a more drastic rendition: "Pluck out [his] hair."

114 Spencer (348); Theodoretus Cyrrhensis, in Question 13 on Deuteronomy (Quaestiones in Octateuchum, p. 242, line 5), explains that the funeral rituals of the pagans were outlawed because they cropped the hair of their head, beard, or eyebrows and "sacrificed [it] to the dead." In his Targum, Hoc est Paraphrasis Onkeli Chaldaica in Sacra Biblia (1545), fol. sign. O¹, the German Hebraist Paulus Fagius comments on Deut. 14:1, "Some people were accustomed to cut the hair of the head and to offer it to the dead." Spencer (348) quotes a slightly adapted version of Fagius's gloss, which appears in Exercitationes Evangelicae (1624), lib. 2, cap. IV, p. 157, by the German Reformed theologian Abraham Scultetus (1566–1625), professor of OT at Heidelberg, representative at the Synod of Dort (1618), and court preacher of the erstwhile "winter" king of Bohemia, Frederick V (1619–20).

Q. God forbad His People, to print any Marks upon them. I pray, Ransack the Treasures of Dr. Spencer, as well as your own, to find mee some Remarkable Curiosities, about the Marks here forbidden? v. 28.¹¹⁶

A. Lett us begin with some Account, concerning the various Kinds of Marks, or Brands, mentioned in the Scriptures, as used among the Ancient Nations. A great Number of Scriptures, will thus in a few Words bee Illustrated.

First, There were Marks of Honour, as I may call them; even such as Mercer, on the Word /קעע/ tells us, were worn by the Noblemen & Gentlemen, & the Honourables, among the old Babylonians.¹¹⁷ Thus in Ezek. 23.23. the /קוע/ /Koa, which is by Jerom rendred, A Leader, properly signifies, a Man that had certain Characters instamp'd upon him.¹¹⁸ Accordingly, Herodotus tells us, that among the Thracians, τὸ ἐπίστικται εὐγενὲς κέκριται, It was counted a Peece of Good Breeding to bee Branded, in the Forehead.¹¹⁹ And, Claudian mentions a Gelonian, as valuing himself upon this,

Membraque qui ferro gaudet pinxisse Gelonus.¹²⁰

Tertullian also mentions it, as an Usage among the Britains, Insignia eorum fuisse Stigmata.¹²¹

Secondly; There were Marks of Service, or the Servorum Stigmata; the Brands which Masters putt upon their Slaves, as notes of Distinction & Propriety. Caelius Rhodiginus, Turnebus, Lipsius, Ursin, and abundance more, have handled the Stigmata Servilia.¹²² They were mostly imprinted on the Foreheads of the Servants. Whence Ausonius took Occasion to Jeer a fugitive Scribler,

*Ergò notas Scripto tolerasti; Pergame, Vultu;
Et quas neglexit Dextera, Frons Patitur*.¹²³

Hereto may allude that Passage, in Rev. 14.1. where, the Servants of God, have the Name of God written on their Foreheads. That it was not unusual among the Jewes, thus to Brand their Servants, is intimated in Zech. 13.6. One shall say unto him, what are these Wounds [or, Brands] in thine Hands? Then hee shall answer, Those with which I was Branded in the House of my Friends. That is, As Grotius paraphraseth it; These Brands don't refer to any Idol, but they are the Marks of my Relation to some certain Man of Power, to whose Patronage I have committed myself.¹²⁴

Thirdly; There were Marks of Souldiery. For, as Ambrose expresses it, Characterē Domini inscribuntur Servuli, et Nomine Imperatores Signantur Milites.¹²⁵ It was common, for Souldiers to have the Marks, or perhaps the Names, of their Commanders, Branded upon them. Vegetius is an unquæstionable Author for it, Victuris in cute punctis, milites scripti, et matriculis, inscripti, Jurare Sudent; and ¹²¹ An adapted passage from the early Christian writer Tertullian comes in whose De Virginitibus Velandis (cap. 10) describes the ancient Britons, whose “ensigns of dignity are marks imprinted” on their bodies [PL 002. 0903B].

¹²² Spencer (359). The Renaissance philologist and classicist Lodovico Caelius Rhodiginus, aka. Ludovico Ricchieri (1469–1525), professor of Greek and Latin at several Italian universities, comments on the branding of slaves, in his oft-reprinted Lectionum Antiquarum Libri XXX (1542), lib. 7, cap. 31, pp. 274–76, and lib. 25, cap. 24, p. 978. The French classical scholar Adrianus Turnebus, aka. Adrien Turnèbe, Tourneboeuf (1512–65), professor of Greek at the Collège Royale in Paris, does much the same by alluding to Ausonius, in Adversariorum Libri XXX. (1604), lib. 14, cap. 12, p. 261. The Flemish humanist and classical scholar Justus Lipsius (1547–1606) follows suit in his De Militia Romana Libri Quinque (lib. 1, dialog. IX, p. 52), in Opera Omnia, Tomus Tertius (1675) 3:52. Perhaps the most detailed account on the use of tattoos and branding for religious and military reasons appears in Analectorum Sacrorum Libri Sex (1668), lib. 1, secs. 60–61, pp. 95–99), by Johannes Henricus Ursinus, aka. Johann Heinrich Ursin (1608–67), German humanist, Lutheran theologian, superintendent at Regensburg. The latter work appears to be Spencer’s primary source.

¹²⁵ The archbishop of Milan, St. Aurelius Ambrosius Mediolanensis (c. 340–397 CE), furnishes the Latin passage from De Obitu Valentiniani iunioris consolatio (58) [PL 016. 1376–77], which Mather translates himself.

so is Ætius, Stigmata vocant, quæ in Facie, vel in aliâ Corporis Parte inscribuntur, qualia, sunt Militum in Manibus.¹²⁶ And Ælian tells us, that these Brands, did use to bee, ἐν ταῖς χερσίν, In their Hands. Hereby they were hindred from turning, Deserters.¹²⁷ With an Eye to this Usage, is that Passage, in Rev. 13.16. The Beast causeth all to Receive a Mark in their Right Hand. In Lipsius and in Aloysius Novarinus, you may find enough about these, Militum Stigmatismi.¹²⁸

Fourthly, There were those, which Dr. Spencer calls by the Title of, Stigmata Zelotarum. There were Persons, who were so inflamed with Zeal for the Service of the True God, that they consecrated themselves thereunto, by stamping upon their Skin, some Intimations of it.¹²⁹ So, what wee translate in Isa. 44.5. Hee shall subscribe with his Hand unto the Lord, the LXX render, ἐπιγράφει τῇ χειρὶ αὐτοῦ, τοῦ Θεοῦ εἰμι. Hee shall Inscribe on his Hand, I am Gods. Even as the Souldiers of old, had in their Hand, the Name of their General. Nor is it unlikely, that as the Vassals of Satan, did brand their Bodies, in Token of their being so, thus, the Servants of God, might zealously practise the like Rites, in Token of their contrary Devotion unto Him. Accordingly, among the Primitive Christians, t'was not unusual, for the Name, or the Cross, of JESUS, to bee, by some Artifice Imprinted on the Bodies of the Faithful. Tertullian speaks of the Signum Christi, contrary to the Signum Diaboli; and so does Austin after him.¹³⁰

126 The obscure Roman historian Publius Flavius Vegetius Renatus (fl. 5th c. CE), in his popular De Re Militari Libri (1607), lib. 2, cap. 5, p. 33, explains that “Soldiers tattooed with prickings on their skin and inscribed on public registers are accustomed to swear”; thus Ætius Amidenus confirms that “they call these tattoos marks, which are inscribed on their face or in another part of their body; [they are] the kind [of tattoos] that are on the hands of soldiers.” Vegetius’s popular work was printed in numerous Latin editions in the 16th and 17th centuries. The Latin translation is adapted from the Greek original in latricorum libri VIII (8.12, lines 75–77), by the Byzantian medical writer Ætius Amidenus (fl. 5th–6th c. CE).

127 The Greek passage, which appears in Spencer’s margin (359 note b), is from Aetius, latricorum (8.12, line 77), rather than from the Roman historian Claudius Aelianus. Although a similar passage appears in Aelianus’s original Greek De natura animalium (8.7, line 11), Aelianus does not speak of the brand marks on the hands of deserters, but of the blisters raised in the hands of anyone who comes in contact with a certain poisonous marine animal.

128 The Veronese Aloysius Novarinus, aka. Luigi Novarini (1594–1650), RC theologian and member of the Theatine Order, spends a whole chapter on the “brand marks of deserting soldiers,” in his popular Electa Sacra (1629), lib. 3, cap. 14, pp. 425–27. And so does the previously mentioned Justus Lipsius, in his De Militia Romana Libri Quinque (lib. 1, dialog. IX, p. 52), in Opera Omnia, Tomus Tertius (1675), 3:52.

129 Spencer (359) discusses the bodily “marks of a zealot.”

130 Tertullian, De Idololatria (19) [PL 001. 0767B], speaks of the “standard of Christ,” of the Prince of Peace, who took away the sword from those enlisted under His standard: “There is no agreement between the divine and the human sacrament [sacramentum here signifies ‘a military oath’], the standard of Christ and the standard of the devil, the camp of light and the camp of darkness. One soul cannot be due to two masters – God and Caesar” (“On Idolatry,” ch. 19), in ANF (3:73). In like manner, St. Augustine, in In Johannis Evangelium Tractatus CXXIV (Tract. VII, cap. 7) [PL 035. 1441], reminds his hearers that they cannot serve two masters, for Christ does not want to share with his enemy: “Behold, if one dies to whom one of these remedies [grace] has been given ... with what confidence does the spirit go forth to God? He

And Procopius upon the Prophecy of Isaiah, newly cited, reports this very Custom, as an Explication of it; διὰ τὸ στίλβειν ἴσως πολλοὺς, ἐπὶ χαρπῶν, ἢ βραχιόνων, ἢ τοῦ σταυροῦ τὸ σημεῖον, ἢ τὴν Χριστοῦ προσηγορίαν, *They branded themselves, on the Wrist, or on the Arm, either with the Sign of the Cross, or with the Letters of the Name of CHRIST.*¹³¹ Compare, Rev. 13.16. and 14.1.

Lastly, There were the Marks of Idolatry. Those, by which Idolaters dedicated themselves, unto the Service of some Dæmon. Grotius, upon the Text aforesaid, in Zech. 13.6. saies, *Plagæ, sunt Stigmata manibus inusta, per quæ solebant Dijs Gentium se mancipare, inscripto eorum Signo, Nomine, aut Numero.*¹³² Prudentius calls them Sp[h]ragitidas. The Prophet here foretells, That False-Prophets, and Idolaters would cease, & hee adds, That the People would suspect every Man that should look that Way, & presently examine him about the Brands upon his Hands; whether those Brands were not the Symbols of his Dedication to some Idol? Consider again, that in Rev. 13.16. Grotius tells us, That the Magicians procured of Trajan, to forbid all Heteriæ, or, Sodalities, or Societies, but such as were undertaken under the Name of some Pagan Deity. After which, whoever was made free of any Company in the Empire, did receive In corpore suo χάραγμα aliquod, i. e., *Dei alicujus Signum, aut literis expressunt, aut Numeris Dissimulatum.*¹³³ has lost the sign of Christ, and has received the sign of the devil. Perhaps he may say that he has not lost the sign of Christ. Thou canst have then, the sign of Christ along with the sign of the devil. Christ does not desire community of ownership, but he desires to possess alone what He has purchased. He has bought at so great a price that He may possess alone: thou makest Him the partner of that devil to whom thou didst sell thyself by the sin. 'Woe to the double-hearted,' to those who in their hearts give part to God and part to the devil" (On the Gospel of St. John, tract. 7, sec. 7), in NPNFi (7:50–51). Or, as the Dean of St. Paul's, the poet John Donne (1572–1633), put it in his Holy Sonnet X, "I, like an usurt town, to another due / Labour to admit you ... / But am betroth'd unto your enemy," in Poems, By J. D. with Elegies on the Authors Death (1633), p. 38.

132 Hugo Grotius, Annotationes ad Zachariam (13:6), in Opera Omnia (1.1:563), explains, "the wounds are marks burnt on the hands, by which they [idolaters] are accustomed to deliver themselves to the gods of the heathens, with their sign inscribed as a name or number." Grotius (in the same annotation) is also the source for Mather's second-hand reference to the Christian poet Aurelius Prudentius Clemens (348–c. 405) of Roman Spain, whose Peristephanon Liber (10.1076) mentions how the "sphragitidas" or "aspirant to holiness" (novices) are marked with red-hot needles.

133 Hugo Grotius's annotations on Rev. 13:16, in Annotationes ad Apocalypsin (Opera Omnia 2.1:1205), are the source for the Latin citation, whose wording Spencer (360) and Mather here adapt for their own purposes. In Roman Emperor Trajan's time (98–117 CE), Grotius relates, the pagan magicians achieved a proscription against membership in any religious brotherhood or society ("hetaerae"), but those related to pagan deities. An aspirant therefore received "on his body, they imprint some inscription, i. e., the mark of some god, either with letters or disguised with numbers."

[48v] | It is now time to observe unto you; That they were none but the Idoltrous Brands, which were, in his Law forbidden unto the People of God. Those Idoltrous Marks were of two Sorts.

First, There were the ordinary Stigms of Idolatry, by branding of their Bodies wherewithal, the ordinary Servants, or at least, Prophets, of these and those Idols, expressed their Devotion thereunto. Of these Lucian speaks, when he saies, about the Ministers of the Syrian Goddess; στιζονται δὲ πάντες κλ. *They are all Branded; some in the Hand, some in the Neck.*¹³⁴ And Primasius, expounding those Words of the Apostle, Rom. 1.24. They Dishonour their own Bodies; mentions this among the rest, *Sibi characteres et ustiones infligunt, in consecrationibus Idolorum.*¹³⁵ Thus do some take that Passage, about wicked Jehojakim, in 2. Chron. 36.8. The Abominations which hee did, & that which was found on him, behold, they are written in the Book of the Kings. The Words of Jerom upon it are, – *Etiam hoc fecit in corpore suo, quod Dominus prohibuit, dum diceret, Non facietis Stigmatam Corporibus Vestris, quæ postquam Mortuus est, in corpore ejus Inventa sunt.*¹³⁶ These Marks were found on the Body of that Idolater, as Laertius tells us, the like were upon the Dead Body of Epimenides. The old Norwegian Chronicles, report of their Odin, that when hee drew near his End, hee caused his Body to bee all over mark'd with New Scars, which they called Geirs Odde, in former Times.¹³⁷ And Gabriel Sionita, relates that the Arabians mark'd their ¹³⁴ Lucianus, De Syria dei (59, line 1), relates that “they [Assyrians] all tattoo themselves.”

Forheads, Cheeks, Lips, & Arms, Cærules Coloris Notis, acu tenui factis.¹³⁸ That the making of these Brands, in Honour to some Idol, is the Thing here prohibited, wee have no less a Testimony than that of Theodore; The Grecians did with Needles prick certain Parts of their Bodies, and poured Ink into the Wounds, εἰς θεραπείαν τῶν δαιμόνων, For the Reverence of Demons; and This, hee saies, the Divine Law prohibits.¹³⁹ And Oleaster ha's things to the like Purpose. It is therefore here joined with other Customes, belonging to the Worship of Demons;¹⁴⁰ and in the parallel Text, of Deut. 14.1. there is this Reason assigned for the Prohibition, Yee are the Children of the Lord your God: For this reason, they must not wear the Brands of Salves to Divels.

Secondly, There were the Extraordinary Stigms, which the Idolaters branded upon their Bodies, in way of Parentation to their Dead Friends; Tho' no Author, Greek or Latin, do mention this Branding, as a Funeral-Rite, yett there is an Hebrew one, Aben-Ezra by Name, who saies, est aliquis, qui signat Corpus suum, figurâ aliquâ certâ, per Ignem, et quidem ob Mortuum.¹⁴¹ They made these Brands, to testify their Affection to the Deceased, or as Præservatives against the Mischiefs of Departed Spirits, or, to Atonement the Ghosts, by the Pains whereto they putt themselves; or finally, to keep alive the Memory of the Dead. Now tis observable, that in our Context here, that Clause, For the Dead, may seem referrible to diverse Clauses, both Afore & After; and this among the rest: and probably in the Repetition of the Law, Deut. 14.1. only Cuttings for the Dead, are mentioned; as probably comprising of these Brandings in them. So that wee may reasonably conclude, with Bonfrerius, Nusquam apud Autores Legi, qui sibi Stigmata inusserint Causâ Funeris, etsi de his malim hanc legem intelligi.¹⁴² Unto these things, people are descended from the Getae (Goths) who, in turn, had sprung from Noah's son Shem rather than Japhet (ODNB).

¹⁴² Via Spencer, Mather adapts the gloss of Jacobus Bonfrerius, on Lev. 19:28, in his Pentateuchus Mosis Commentario Illustratus (1705), p. 674: "Nowhere have I read [this] among the ancestors, although I should prefer that this law about these things be understood."

Lett mee annex the notable Words of Novarinus, which will also illustrate a Text in the Canticles, very considerably. *Scriptum reperi in Libro quodum M. S. Chaldaeos in Carne suâ Sculptere Solitos Imaginem suorum Majorum. Huc itaque flectere hæc Verba possumus, ut inhibeat Deus, super Mortuo Carnem incidere, et figuras in eo impressas deferrent. Hunc ritum abolere Sponsus voluit, ac Sanctori commutare, cum Sponsam alloquens, dixit, Pone me ut Signaculum super Cor tuum, ut Signaculum super Brachium [Cant. 8.6]. Ac si apertius diceret: Noli majorum Imagines deferre: Potius eorum obliviscere, et illorum Loco me Cordi adprime, adprime Brachio, ut mei Imaginem circumferas in Amoris Signum et Argumentum.*¹⁴³

If you would now bee more particularly informed, concerning the Form, of the Marks thus imprinted upon the Bodies of the old Idolaters, Maimonides reports, that they made Incisions into their Flesh, and then with Ink, or Paint, infected those Incisions.¹⁴⁴ But these τῆς κακίας χαρακτῆρες, as they are called by Synesius, wee may rather Beleeve, were made by Hott Needles, or, other Irons;¹⁴⁵ they made Inustions, as Philo expresses it, σιδήρῳ πεπυρωμένῳ.¹⁴⁶ They Branded themselves, as Muhammed Ben Isaac tells us, the ancient Zabians did, Ignem notam

143 The Latin passage (via Spencer 362) is adapted from Electa Sacra (1629), lib. 3, cap. 16, p. 436, by the Italian Theatine theologian of Verona, Aloysius Novarini, aka. Luigi Novarini (1594–1650). Novarini admits that “I have found it written in a certain manuscript book that the Chaldeans have been accustomed to carve on their own flesh the image of their ancestors. And so we can turn these words in this direction, so that God prevents to carve the flesh on a dead person, and to carry forms inscribed to the dead. The betrothed man wanted to abolish this rite and change it entirely to a more holy rite, when he said, addressing the betrothed woman, ‘Place me as a seal over your heart, as a seal on your arm’ [Songs of Songs 8:6]. Now as if He were saying more plainly, ‘Do not carry images of ancestors; better to forget them and in their place press me close to your heart, press me to your arm, so that you may carry around my image as seal and evidence of love.’”

144 Spencer (363); Maimonides, De Idololatria (1641), cap. 12, §§ 10–11, pp. 168–69. Or, Hilchot Avodat Kochavim V’Chukkoteihem (12.11): “The Tattooing which the Torah forbids involves making a cut in one’s flesh and filling the slit with eye-color, ink, or with any other dye that leaves an imprint. This was the custom of the idolaters, who would make marks on their bodies for the sake of their idols, as if to say that they are like servants sold to the idol and designated for its service.” Lashes are the punishment for those breaking the law (Lev. 19:28), Maimonides adds, and punishment is meted out regardless of the transgressor’s gender (Mishneh Torah 3:226–28).

145 The Greek bishop of Ptolemais (Pentapolis), Synesius (c. 373–c. 414) explains in his letter to his friend Herculian (Epistulae 143, line 40) that “these pictures of evil” (Synesius’s criticism of those sophistical teacher who pretend to a knowledge of philosophy) should not be shown to his associates, lest they feel personally criticized. Mather’s second-hand quotation from Synesius describes tattoos as evil pictures or hieroglyphic characters in honor of certain demons.

146 Philo Judaeus (De specialibus legibus 1.58, line 5) reprimands those idolaters who use a “burning iron” to tattoo themselves with symbols of their devotion to their idols, for these images “remain ineffaceably” permanent and “are not dimmed or weakened by time” (Special Laws 1.10.58), in Works (539).

sibi inurere.¹⁴⁷ Thus among the Egyptians, we find Ptolomæus Philopater, commanding the Votaries of Bacchus, χαράττεσθαι διὰ πυρὸς, To bee marked with Fire.¹⁴⁸ And Prudentius, describes the Consecration of the Priests of, Cybele, to bee Notâ Fervente.¹⁴⁹ And Lucas de Linda, saies, the old English Tenellis infantibus, notas certasque figuras Animalium ardenti ferro imprimebant.¹⁵⁰ It is also likely that sometimes, they tinged the Places thus Branded, with such Colours, as they thought agreeable. But of what Figure were the Marks thus instamped?

Consider, that Place, in Rev. 13.17. And, now take an account.

First, Sometimes they Branded themselves with the Mark of their Idol, as a Token of their Ascription into the Service of that Idol. Their Gods, had their several Marks, their χαράγματα, their παράσημα.¹⁵¹ A Thunderbolt was the Mark of Jupiter; and Helmet, of Mars; a Trident, of Neptune; a Caduceus, for Mercury; and an Ivy, of Bacchus. Wee read in the Book of the Maccabees, that the Apostate Jewes were commanded by Ptolomy Philopater, to bee mark'd with the Brand of Bacchus, which was an Ivy-Leaf.¹⁵² And the Etymologist, relates, that there was the like Brand on the Skin of Ptolomy himself; that hee, was called, Gallus, for his Imitation of the Galli in this Matter. Persons thus Branded for Bacchus, were usually called, Thyrsigeri, and Ναρθηκόφοροι.¹⁵³

| Secondly, Sometimes they Branded themselves, with the Name of the Idol, whereto they would bee Devoted: It may bee, Ζεὺς, Ἀρες, Διόνυσος; or, [49r]

147 Spencer (364); the third-hand quotation is from the as yet unidentified Arab historian Muhammed ben Isaac, as quoted in Heinrich Hottinger's Historia Orientalis (1651), lib. 1, cap. 8: De Religione Sabaeorum, Nabataeorum, &c. veterum Arabum (pp. 197–98), who provides a translated extract from Muhammed ben Isaac, Historia de Charranaeis (lib. 1, p. 20), on Lev. 21:5. The historian explains that the idolatrous Zabians (Sabians) “brand tattoo-marks on themselves with a hot iron.”

148 An apparent reference to 3 Macc. 2:29 (line 1), which reads χαράσσεσθαι διὰ πυρὸς, or “be marked [with fire]” on their bodies for Dionysus (Bacchus). As the story goes, the Egyptian King Ptolemaeus IV, Philopater (221–203 BCE), unsuccessfully tried to force the Jews of Egypt to adore Dionysus (Bacchus). See Edwyn R. Bevan (House of Ptolemy 229–30).

149 The Christian poet Aurelius Prudentius Clemens, in his Peristephanon Liber (10.1079–80), mentions that “quamcumque partem corporis ‘fervens nota / stigmatit,’ hanc sic consecratam praedicant” or “and whatever part of their body is ‘branded with the mark of the hot iron’ they claim to be thus consecrated” (Prudentius 2:299).

150 The Italian traveler Lucas de Linda (1625–60), in his chapter on the “Morals of the Anglo-Saxons,” in his oft reprinted Descriptio Orbis et Omnium Rerumpublicarum (1665), lib. 5, p. 379, knowingly relates that the old Anglo-Saxons “were pressing certain notable animal figures on delicate little infants with a burning iron.”

151 Both words suggest “insignia” and “tattoo-marks”

152 3 Macc. 2:29 (line 1). See note above.

153 The “Galli” were the eunuch priests of Cybele, the mother goddess of the Phrygians (EB). The “Thyrsigeri” are the bearers of Bacchus’s “thyrsus” or “staff,” and their Greek counterparts are the “Narthekephoroi,” or “rod-bearers” (thyrsus) of Dionysus. See Suda (Lexicon, alphab. letter πi, entry 843, line 3), Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 1.19.92.3, line 4; 5.3.17.4, line 2), and (OEAGR).

/ בעל / בעלת / עזיז / מרנס / Bel, Beltis, Azizus, Marnas.¹⁵⁴ The Jewes tell us, that on the Body of Dead Jehojakim, was found, Codonazer, the Name of his Dæmon.¹⁵⁵ Abulensis, gives us a Jewish Tradition, That the Idolaters did use to take a Golden Plate, carrying the Name of their Idol upon it, & apply it so burning hott unto their Flesh, that the Name would thereby bee deeply Branded there.¹⁵⁶ Now you know, that the High-Priest, of Israel, was to have upon his Forhead, a Plate of Gold, with, HOLINESS TO THE LORD, upon it: in Opposition doubtless, to the Usage of Idolatry, wherein the Name of the Idol, was enstamped on the Things consecrated thereunto.

Thirdly, Sometimes, they Branded themselves, with the Number of the Name of the Idol. The Idols among the Gentiles, had their Mystical Names, which were known only unto such as were Admitted into a more Intimate Communion with them. These Names, they expressed by Numbers, containing the Summ, which was comprehended in the Letters of the Names by which they were vulgarly distinguished.¹⁵⁷ Thus Martianus Capella, tells us, that the Mystical Name of the Sun, Ad Numerum octo et sexcentorum perveniebat: It was thus characterized, XH.¹⁵⁸ Hence, in the Sibylline Writings, the Name of our Lord CHRIST, is expressed, by Mystical Numbers; tho' learned Men are not agreed, what Name it is.¹⁵⁹

But on what Part of the Body, were these Marks usually imprinted? Antiquity ha's left us much in the Dark about it. But the Poet Prudentius, mentions, 154 The Greek deities read Zeus, Ares, Dionysus. Mather provides the Latin transcription of their Hebrew equivalents. According to DDD, "Azizus" (Azizos) is a Syrian deity, the equivalent of the Greek Ares and the Roman Mars (god of war); "Bel" (i.e., "Lord") is associated with the Babylonian Marduk (ruler of the universe); "Beltis" is associated with the Egyptian Osiris (god of the afterlife); and "Marnas" remains unidentified.

155 This story about the idolatrous markings "Codonazer" on the corpse of King Jehojakim is mentioned in Historia Scholastica, on 4 Regum 39 (Questio XXXIX) [PL 198. 1421BC], by Petrus Comestor (d. c. 1178), a Parisian theologian, whose Historia Scholastica is a historical narrative of certain OT and NT books designed for students.

156 The Spanish exegete Alphonsus Tostatus Abulensis, bishop of Avila, offers this story in his Commentaria in Levitici et Deuteronomi. Operum Tomi III (1613), Quaest. 27, p. 347 (on Lev. 19).

157 This type of numerology is also called Gematria: each letter of the Hebrew or Greek alphabet is associated with a numerical value.

158 Believed to be a Latin prose writer and jurist in Carthage (N. Africa), Martianus Capella (5th c. CE) is credited with having established the Seven Liberal Arts. The Latin passage, which is a paraphrase rather than a direct quote, appears in Martianus Capella (lib. 2:192.5, p. 49), and explains that the mystical name of the sun "was reaching the number six hundred and eight." The Greek numeral XH signifies 1,100 and would have likely served to identify a date, year, or period of time, in which a certain event was to occur.

159 Spencer (365); Mather refers to the annotations in Johannes Opsopaeo Brettano's bilingual Greek/Latin edition of ΣΙΒΥΛΛΙΚΟΙ ΧΡΗΣΜΟΙ. Hoc est Sibyllina Oracula (1599), pp. 11–12 (2nd. ser. of pag.). For Mather's use of and views on the Sibylline Oracles, see his "Trip Paradise," in Threefold Paradise (194–98).

Quamcunque Partem Corporis, as thus Idolatrously Brandeable.¹⁶⁰ And Lucian and many others do mention diverse Parts of the Body, the Handwrist; and Forehead especially, as having these Brands upon them.¹⁶¹ Epiphanius tells us, that the Carpocratian Hereticks, in Conformity to the Gentiles, did Brand, ἐπὶ τὸν δεξιὸν λοβὸν τοῦ ὠτός, the Bottom of the Right Ear.¹⁶² Delrio tells us, that Witches usually have upon their Pudenda, the Brand of Dæmons.¹⁶³ But after all, the Scriptures mention chiefly the Handwrists, and Foreheads of Men, as being often Idolatrously Stigmatized. [See Rev. 13.16. with the Remark of Grotius.]¹⁶⁴

And, finally, for what Reasons, were these Marks forbidden? Truly, these Brands, were evil in themselves, & not received without such miserable Smarts, as it is not pleasing unto the Father of Mercies, to see us torment ourselves withal. Prudentius elegantly saith,

Has pœnas ferre cogitur Gentilitas:
Hac Dî coercent lege cultures suos:
Sic Dæmon ludit nos quos ceperit:
Docet execrandas ferre contumelias:
*Tormenta inuri mandat infelicibus.*¹⁶⁵

¹⁶⁰ The passage from Aurelius Prudentius Clemens's Peristephanon Liber (10.1079) reads, "and whatever part of their body."

¹⁶¹ Lucianus, De Syria dei (59, lines 1–2) mentions such a custom among the ancient Assyrians.

¹⁶³ The Flemish Jesuit Martin Anton Del Rio, aka. Delrio (1551–1608) of Antwerp, successively professor of philosophy and theology at Douai, Louvain, and Salamanca, is famous for publishing his Disquisitionum Magicarum Libri Sex (1599–1600), a three-volume handbook on witchcraft and magic. This popular work went through very many reprints and editions, and became a vademecum for witchcraft inquisitors of all stripes and religious persuasions – even at the Salem debacle of 1691–93 (CE). The 1611 Venice edition of this work was available at Harvard (Catalogus Librorum [1723], p. 44). Mather here alludes to the popular belief that the body of a witch exhibits the devil's mark on her external genital organs. (To be sure, Mather rejected such marks as culpable evidence.) See Del Rio's Disquisitionum (1608), lib. 2, Questio IV, p. 57.1C; Questio XXI, p. 103.1D; Questio XXII, p. 105.1E; and lib. 3, P I, Questio IV, p. 200.1C. Perhaps inspired by Del Rio and Spencer, the British anthropologist M. A. Murray argued in her influential The Witch-Cult in Western Europe (1921), ch. 3, sec. 6, that such markings on the witch's pudenda were actually tattoo marks and insignia of membership in pagan cults.

¹⁶⁵ Spencer (366); Prudentius, Peristephanon Liber (10.1086–90): "Such are the sufferings pagans are compelled to bear, such the law their gods impose on their worshippers; this is how the devil himself makes sport of those whom he has taken captive, teaching them to suffer accursed indignities and ordaining that marks of torture be branded on his luckless victims" (Prudentius 2:300).

Moreover, These Brands carried with them, Consecrations to Dæmons; which could not bee allowed by the Holy One of Israel.

So saies the Poet,

*Quamcunque, partem corporis fervens Nota.
Stigmatit, hanc sic consecratam prædicant.*¹⁶⁶

There are at this Day, Exemples of such a Signification, among us in America, as well as in the other Hæmisphære.¹⁶⁷

Once more, The peculiar Glory of Circumcision had been lost, if God had permitted His People, to have annexed any Diabolical Brands thereunto.

Furthermore, Those Brands were mightily Subservient unto the Divels Kingdome in the World. For, they left no Place unto Repentance; as Philo saies of them, that had them, Ne Receptum quidem ad penitentiam sibi Reliquum faciunt.¹⁶⁸ They were Everlasting and Indelible Obligations to Idolatry. And yett also, some could endure themselves, to bee secretly marked, who yett had not the face openly to Worship Divels.

These Brands, were singularly odious therefore, to the true-hearted Israelites. But the Heathen made wonderfully much of them, as very considerable Sacraments. And the Parts, which they branded, were, after their Death, covered with Golden Plates, as being more sacred than the rest.

*Insignis auri Lamina insignivit cutem,
Tegitur Metallo quod perustum est Ingibus.*¹⁶⁹

Q. What were the Cuttings in the Flesh for the Dead, forbidden to the Living, and, why forbidden? v. 28.¹⁷⁰

A. When you read Herodotus, reporting of the Scythians, that at the Funerals of their Kings, they would cutt their Arms, pull off their Ears & wound their ¹⁶⁶ Spencer (367); In his poem Peristephanon Liber (10.1079–80), Prudentius explains, “and whatever part of the body is branded with the mark of the hot iron, they claim to be thus consecrated” (Prudentius 2:300).

*Forheads & Noses, & pierce their Left Hands with Arrowes;*¹⁷¹ And when you read Ovids, Parce tamen lacerare genas, or, Tibullus's Teneris parce genis: you'll see a little, the Manner of the old Idolaters.¹⁷² The Lamentations of the old Pagans over their Dead Friends, were managed with so much Fury, that when they grew a little more Civil, among the Græcians, wee find Solon making a Law, against these Inhumane Self-Lacerations at the Funerals; and among the Romans, after his Exemple, this Detestabile Lugendi Genus, (as Tully calls it) Laceratio Genarum, was forbidden by that Law, in the Twelve Tables, Mulieres Genas ne Radunto.¹⁷³ Well may wee then read a Prohibition of it, in the Diviner Law of Moses. This Rite, was performed, for the most Part for the Dead; whereof, Bonfrerius upon this Text, will give you Exemples enough.¹⁷⁴ The Heathen, imagined by these Bloody Doings, either to give some Consolation unto the Departed Ghosts, or by some Expiation to render these Ghosts propitious unto the Surviving.¹⁷⁵ The Cuttings here condemned, are by the LXX styled, ἐντομίδες,¹⁷⁶ which, as Hesychius expounds them, are, Scissuræ in Vultu, aliisque Corporis partibus factæ; nam τοιαῦτα ἐιώθασι ποιεῖν ἐν τοῖς νεκροῖς αὐτῶν οἱ ἄπιστοι, the Infidels used such Things for the Dead.¹⁷⁷ Yea, as Plutarch tells us, they proceeded so far as Amputations of their Members on those Occasions, δοκοῦντές τι χαρίζεσθαι τοῖς τετελευτηκόσιν, Beleeving that they gratified the Dead, by their doing so.¹⁷⁸

171 Herodotus (4.71)

172 Ovid mourns his exile from Rome in his elegiac poem Tristia, and in his letter to his wife he expresses hope to be buried in his native soil: Won't you be heart-broken when I am dead, he asks, "yet mar not your cheeks" in anguish? (Tristia 3.3.51). Likewise, the Roman elegiac poet Albius Tibullus (c. 55–c. 19 BCE) has Delia's lover beseech her "to spare her cheeks" when she bewails her dead paramour (Elegies 1.68).

173 Spencer (354). According to Plutarch's Parallel Lives: Solon (21.4), the Greek lawgiver forbade "Lacerations of the flesh by mourners, and the use of set lamentations." Likewise Tully Cicero (Tusculan Disputations 3.26.62) decries the "odious forms of mourning" especially of female mourners' "rending of the cheeks." Cicero (De Legibus Libri Tres 2.23.59.1–2, 2.25.64.11–12) quotes from the ancient Roman law (5th c. BCE) Duodecim Tabularum Leges (Tabula X): "mulieres genas ne radunto neve lessum funeris ergo habento," or "women shall not lacerate their faces nor wail during a funeral." See Duodecim Tabularum Fragmenta (Tabula X, Fragm. 3.4), in P. Cumin's Manual of Civil Law (1865), p. 26.

174 In his Pentateuchus Moysis (1625), pp. 673–74 (Lev. 19:28), Jacobus Bonfrerius provides numerous references to like sources, including Herodotus (4.71), Plutarch's Consolatio ad Apollonium (113b, line 10–12), Tertullian's De Spectaculis, Homer's Iliad, Servius on Virgil, and Macrobius's Saturnalia (1.8). But here's enough!

175 The source for this passage appears to be Maimonides, De Idololatria (1641), cap. 12, sec. 13, p. 271. Or, Hilchot Avodat Kochavim V'Chukkoteihem (12.13), in Mishneh Torah (3:230).

176 Spencer (355) and Lev. 19:28, 21:5; Jer. 16:6 (LXX) have ἐντομίδας, i. e., "incision," "cuttings," or "gashes."

177 The Latin translation of the Greek passage from Hesychius's Lexicon (A–O), alphabetic letter epsilon, entry 379, lines 2–3, reads, "cuts made on the countenance and on other parts of the body; for the unbelievers were accustomed to do such things on the bodies of their dead."

178 Mather provides his own translation of Plutarch's Consolatio ad Apollonium (113b, lines 11–12).

Such Usages were Interdicted unto the People of God, for this Reason [Deut. 14.1, 2.] because they were His People. Hee would have them to avoid all Conformitie unto the Idolatries of the Gentiles. You know what Butcherly Practices, the Priests of Baal used upon themselves. [1. King. 18.28.] The Worshipers of Isis, used the same, according to the Report of Herodotus; τὰ μέτωπα κόπτονται μαχαίρησι.¹⁷⁹ And Menochius, and Vossius, and Saubertus, and Ouzelius, will tell you how many other Gentiles used the like.¹⁸⁰ By such horrid Spectacles, they proposed unto themselves, to invite the Compassions of their Deities. Hence these Usages, forbidden unto all the Jewes, were forbidden unto the Priests among the Jewes in a Peculiar Manner.¹⁸¹

— flavos Lavinia crines et Roseas Laniata Genas, —¹⁸²

And what Varro saith hereupon, Mulieres in exequijs et luctu, ideo Solitas ora lacerare, ut ostenso Sanguine Inferis Satisfacerent. And what Servius elsewhere saies, Laniantes Genas suum effundebant cruorem, ut Rogis horum Imago restitueretur.¹⁸³

Such præposterous Mournings for the Dead, were not allowed unto the People of God; as well as that they might not, like others, mourn without Hope, as that they might avoid all Communion with the Worship of Idolaters: who indeed, thus wounded themselves, in the Dæmonolatry of their Funerals, but not Then only; they did it on some other Occasions. Wee read of them, in Hos. 7.14. They Howled upon their Beds, they Assemble themselves for Corn & Wine: Rather, as the LXX, κατετέμνοντο, They cutt themselves.¹⁸⁴ Theodoret upon the Place, interprets it, of the ἐντόμιδες,¹⁸⁵ Cuttings, which the Idolaters made upon their Bodies, in the Temples of their Idols. You may be confirmed in this Exposition, from

179 Spencer (356); Herodotus (Historiae 2.61, line 7) tells us that the Carians, whom he believes to be foreigners in Egypt, “cut their foreheads with knives.”

Jacques Oisel, or Oesel (1631–86), was born in Danzig (Prussia) and became professor of law at Groningen University. Mather refers to Ouzelius's annotations, in M. Minucii Felicis Octavius cum integris omnium Notis ac Commentariis novaque Recensione Jacobi Ouzeli. Cujus & accedunt Animadversiones (1652, 1672), p. m. 141.

182 Virgil has the grief-stricken “Lavinia tear her golden tresses and roseate cheeks” (Aeneid 12:605–06).

183 The Roman grammarian and commentator on Virgil, Maurus Honoratius Servius (In Vergilii carmina commentarii 1:349, on Virgil's Aeneid 3:67) cites his famous predecessor, the Roman scholar Marcus Terentius Varro, in affirmation that “during funeral processions and grieving, women habitually lacerated their faces as a means to satisfy the dead by a show of blood.” Likewise, In Vergilii carmina commentarii (2:627), Servius glosses on Aeneid (12:606) that “cutting their cheeks they were pouring out their blood, so that in the funeral pyres the image of these might be restored.”

185 Both Spencer (357) and Theodoret (Interpretatio in xii prophetas minores [Hos. 7:14]) [PL 081. 1592, line 37] read ἐντομιδας (“incision,” “cuttings,” “gashes”).

a Passage in Minutius Felix, who sais, *Qui Sanguine suo libat, et Vulneribus suis supplicat, non profanus melius esset quàm sic Religiosus?*¹⁸⁶ Moreover, Tis an odd Passage in Maimonides, *Qui Carnem lacerat, propter Ruinam Domus, aut propter Navim Mari submersam, liber est. Neque enim vapulat quis, nisi se Defuncti, vel Idoli ergò, carpserit.*¹⁸⁷

What Apology will bee now found, for the Jewes, of whose usual Practices, you read in Jer. 41.5. and Jer. 47.5. and Jer. 48.37. and Isa. 15. and Jer. 16.6. On which last Place, Jerom saies, *Mos fuit apud Veteres, et in quibusdam permanet Judæorum usque hodiè, ut in luctibus incidant lacertos, et Calvitium faciunt.*¹⁸⁸ I shall not concern myself to enquire. Perhaps, they thought, that they might employ Self-Lacerations for their Dead Friends, provided they had in them, no such Idolatrours Intention, as that with respect whereto they were first of all forbidden.

Q. Give us a Jewish Strain, upon that Passage, Do not prostitute thy Daughter, to cause her to be a Whore? v. 29.

A. That I will, and a very Hard one too. R. Elieser and R. Akiba, say; A Man prostitutes his Daughter, who did not gett her an Husband, when shee was marriageable, or, who married her unto an old Man.¹⁸⁹

¹⁸⁶ Minucius Felix shakes his head at the ancients' blood-letting rites during their mourning ceremonies. Think about the futile self-mutilations of mourners, "Or take the man who pours libations of his own blood, and from his own wounds draws supplication – would he not be better without religion than religious in his fashion?" (Octavius 22.9). Tertullian certainly thought so in his Apologia (23), where he upbraids those engaged in obscene rites to curry favor from demons or angels: "You make a distinction of places, I suppose, regarding as gods in their temple those whose divinity you do not recognize elsewhere; counting the madness which leads one man to leap from the sacred houses, to be something different from that which leads another to leap from an adjoining house; looking on one who cuts his arms and secret parts as under a different furor from another who cuts his throat. The result of the frenzy is the same, and the manner of instigation is one" (ANF 3:37).

Q. What is meant by, Having Familiar Spirits? v. 31.

A. The Word, Ob, signifying a Bottle, or hollow Vessel, [Job. 32.19.] the Jewes think, that Oboth here, may signify such as are by the Greeks called, ἑγγαστριμῦθοι,¹⁹⁰ who had a Spirit or a Dæmon, speaking out of the Belly, or Chest, with an hollow Voice, as if it came out of a Bottel. The Witch whom Saul consulted, is called, Baalath Ob, a Mistress of such a Spirit. It is plain, Ob signifies the Spirit, or Dæmon; and he or she that had Familiarity with it, was called, Baal, or Baalath, a Master or Mistress, who possessed it, & gave answers by it, with a Voice that seemed as if it came from the lower Parts of the Belly.¹⁹¹ The LXX once translates it, οἱ ἐκ τῆς γῆς φωνοῦντο [Isa. 19.3.] They speak out of the Earth; because, as Mr. Selden explains it, the Voice coming from the lower Parts of the Person owning that Spirit, seemed for to come out of the Earth.¹⁹²

Some think, such Persons had the Name of Oboth, because they were swelled with the Spirit, as a Bladder when it is blown. However it was, we find in the Dayes of the Gospel, [Act. 16.16.] one who had the Spirit of Python; which was the same with an ἑγγαστριμῦθος, as Plutarch informs us.¹⁹³ The famous Pythia, who delivered the Oracles of Apollo, satt over an Hole, and by her Secret Parts, received the Spirit that swelled her, and made her utter Oracles; as tis remark'd particularly by Origen against Celsus, & by Chrysostom in his Homilies on the first Epistle to the Corinthians.¹⁹⁴ her to be a whore; R. Eliezer said: This refers to marrying one's [young] daughter to an old man. R. Akiba said: This refers to the delay in marrying off a daughter who is already a bogereth" [i. e., one who has attained puberty], in Soncino Talmud, tractate Sanhedrin (76a). In his "Note Book of Authors" (Lev. 19:30), Mather refers to "J. Prideau [sic] vii Lectiones"; i. e., "Oratio Septima. Inauguralis in Promotione Doctorum," on "De Sabbato." This augural lecture on Lev. 19:30, in honor of conferring the degree of D. D. on three of Prideaux's doctoral candidates, was delivered in Oxford, in 1622, and published in Orationes Novem Inaugurales (1626), pp. 129–51. Given that Mather refers to a work appearing in "J. Prideau vii Lectiones," Mather appears to have drawn on the "Oratio VII," as reprinted in Prideaux's Viginti duæ Lectiones de totidem Religionis Capitibus ... Quibus accesserunt Tredecim Orationes Inaugurales (1648), pars 2, Oratio, VII, pp. 60–69 (sep. pag.).

190 ἑγγαστριμῦθοι suggests "ventriloquism" (LSJ). Hence Lev. 19:31 (LXX) speaks of the ἑγγαστριμῦθοι "those who have in them divining spirits" or 1 Kings 28:8 (LXX) "familiar spirit." See also Hippocrates et Corpus Hippocraticum: De morbis popularibus (= Epidemiae) 5.1.63, line 6.

There are those, who will have no Credit given unto these old Stories; But Aug. Eugubinus, affirms, That he himself had seen these Ventriloquæ.¹⁹⁵ And Cælius Rhodiginus affirms, That not only he himself had seen such Women, but innumerable other People; not only at Rhodigium, but in a Manner thro' all Italy; who had with all the Strictness imaginable, examined the Matter, & found that it was no Counterfeit.¹⁹⁶ Oleaster, also [on Isa. 24.4.] saies, He saw such an one at Lisbon, which readily answered unto whatever was asked.¹⁹⁷

An Energumen whom out of compassion to her Afflicted Parents I took home unto my own Family, would, when we went unto Prayer, be, by the Dæmons laid for Dead, wholly Senseless, and (unto appearance) Breathless, with her Belly Swell'd like a Drum. And there would be Crooking Noises in her; Yea, there would come a Big and a Low Voice from her, wherein the Spectators could not see her Mouth to move, but yett the Dæmons would utter astonishing things.¹⁹⁸

Q. And, Wizards? v. 31.

A. Those whom we call, Cunning-Men; or, Fortune-tellers. These mostly were Men, as the former were Women.

Jedeonim, are as much as Joadim, which is as much as Futurorum Conscij, as tis observed by Mr. Selden. Maimonides will have them, obtain their Knowledge, by putting the Bone of a certain Bird; called, Jadua, into their Mouthes, with certain Fumes and Adjurations: which made them fall into an Ecstasie, & foretel things to come.¹⁹⁹

195 The Italian humanist, OT scholar, and Vatican librarian Augustinus Steuchus Eugubinus, aka. Agostino Steuco (1497–1548), in his Veteris Testamenti ad veritatem Hebraicam Recognitio (1531), pp. 511–12 (on Lev. cap. 19), affirms having witnessed such ἐγγαστριμύθους, i. e., “Ventriloquæ mulieres,” or “female diviners,” although Steuco does not mention when and where he witnessed the event. On Eugubinus, see also BA 1:1035.

196 Mather (via Patrick 385) refers to the previously mentioned Caelius Ludovicus Rhodiginus, whose Lectioinum Antiquarum Libri XXX (1542), lib. 8, cap. 10, pp. 295–96, comments on the divining women he had seen in Italy. The ancient Roman city Rhodigium (modern Rovigo) is in NE Italy, near Venice.

197 Patrick (Leviticus 385) also enlists Hieronymus Oleaster, aka. Jeronimo da Azambuja (d. 1563), Commentari in Leviticum (1557), p. 44; Lev. (cap. XIX), annotatio ad literam, and In Isaiam Prophetam Commentarii (1622), pp. 473–76.

198 See for Mather's own eyewitness account in his Memorable Providences (1689), sec. XXIX, p. 36 (first ser. of pag.). Mather here describes the contortions of Martha Goodwin (age 13), eldest daughter of John Goodwin of Charlestown, who manifested psychosomatic fits after an altercation with Ann Glover, an Irish laundress and housekeeper, in 1688. Mather took the girl into his home for observation, and through a regimen of fasting, communal prayer, and reassurance succeeded to restore her.

199 Patrick (Leviticus 386). The Hebrew noun יָדְעֹנִי [yidde'oniy] signifies “a knower, one who has a familiar spirit,” but also “a familiar spirit, soothsayer, [and] necromancer,” hence “wizard” (Strong's # 3049). A Futurorum Conscij is “one who has knowledge of the future.” Selden's De Diis Syris (1617), Synt. 1, cap. 2, pp. 40–41 is Patrick's source. Rashi explains that “an יָדְעֹנִי [is] one who put the bone of an animal whose name is Yadu'a יָדוּעַ into his mouth, and the bone

Q. What were the Thoughts and Wayes of old, about, Rising up before the Hoary Head? v. 32.

A. The Usage was to Rise up unto them, when they were at the Distance of Four Cubits; and assoon as they were gone by to Sitt down again; that it might appear, they Rose up purely in respect unto them. Nature itself directed civilized People unto this; who, as Juvenal writes,

*Credebant hoc grande nefas, et morte piandum,
Si Juvenis vetulo non assurrexerat.*²⁰⁰

And such a Law was established among the Lacedæmonians, τοὺς γέροντας αἰσχυνέσθωσαν οὐδὲν ἥττον ἢ πατέρας;²⁰¹ That Aged Persons should be revered, no less than if they were their Fathers. And thus Plato, orders; Let every one Reverence him that is elder than himself, in Deed & in Word. And he ha's this memorable Saying, *That Youth should glory more in Obeying well, than in Ruling well; And first of all, in Obeying the Lawes; for, this is all one with Serving of God: And next, in giving Honour to old Men; and to those especially, who have passed their Dayes Honourably, & with Glory.*²⁰²

There was also in the Jewish Nation a Special Reason, for much Reverence to be shown unto old Men; for there was little else, but Age & Experience to distinguish them; Their Quality, their Profession, their Education, & their Wealth, being much upon a Level.²⁰³

Q. Well, but who is the old Man, whose Face is to be Honoured?

A. Why should it not be rendred, The Elder; and refer to them, who were skilful in the Law, as the Jewes interpret it? For the Law speaks of meerly Aged Persons before. Selden prosecutes this more at large. And the Words of Maimonides are observable. If such as taught the Law, had not been honoured before Men, no

'talks'" [ventriloquism] (Metsudah Chumash/Rashi Vayikro 3:270–71). Likewise, Maimonides, Sefer Hamitzvot II (9), in Mishneh Torah (21:8) clarifies that according to the Talmud, tractate Sanhedrin (65a), a "'Yidoni' . . . is one who places in his mouth the bone of a yidoo, which speaks of itself." Anyone guilty of violating this negative commandment (Lev. 19:31) is "liable to stoning or kareth for willful transgression."

²⁰³ Mather's source is Patrick (Leviticus 387–88). See also Maimonides (Guide 3.36.539).

body would have minded their Words, nor have received what they propounded, about things to be known or done. And R. Levi Barcelonita shows, The Law made no Difference of what Age he was, in this Case; for it appears by Daniel, that some Elders were not Aged.²⁰⁴

3623.

Q. Why is that Clause added; And fear thy God?

A. God ha's imprinted a venerable Character of His Aged & Useful Servants; & the Fear of God, is to be the Fountain of all our Good Carriage.

But some of the Hebrewes think, That in this Verse, there are Three Degrees of Honour enjoined unto Three Orders of Men. One to the Aged; Another to the Learned; and a third unto the Judges; who may be here meant by Elohim.²⁰⁵

Q. What is the Judgment, in which there might not be done any Unrighteousness? v. 35.

A. The Hebrewes refer it unto all the following Particulars. Whoever Measures, or Weighs, ha's therein the Office of a Judge; and if he commit any Fraud in his Measures & Weights, he is (as R. Levi Barcelonita notes,) A Corrupter of Judgment; & is called, Wicked, Abominable, Execrable. He adds, That such Men bring Five Mischiefs upon the Places where they live; They Defile the Law; They Profane the Name of God; They Remove the Presence of the Divine Majesty; They Bring a Sword upon the People; And at last, They Cause them to be carried Captive out of their own Countrey. These are the Mischiefs, which they Impute unto Unjust Judges. The Emperour Justinian ordered such Offendors, to be beaten ισχυρῶς ὡς ἀσεβεῖς, very Sorely, as being very Impious.²⁰⁶

²⁰⁵ Rashi (Lev. 19:32) glosses that both an older person is considered an “elder” (“even an ignorant old man”) – hence deserves respect – and “one who has acquired wisdom is [called] an elder (Metsudah Chumash/Rashi Vayikro 3:271). Maimonides (Guide 3.36.538) includes the “bearers of the Law.” See also Selden's De Synedriis (1650), lib. 1, cap. 14, p. 549, which includes judges (“Judices”).

²⁰⁶ Patrick (Leviticus 391); R. Levi Barcelonita's סֵפֶר הַחֲנוּכָּה Sefer Ha-Chinnuk (1523), in Hottinger's Juris Hebraeorum (1655), sec. XVI, praecept. CCLX, pp. 395–97; the Institutes of Justinian (4.18.11) directs that the Lex Julia repetundarum (dating back to the time of Julius Caesar), Q. These Constitutions of Moses, what Remembrance of them in Antiquity?

A. The Name of Moses was famous among other Nations, on the account of them. Very particularly, we find that one Lucius Ampelius (a rude kind of Writer, but one who had collected much out of better Authors,) tells us, That Mochus was the Inventer of Scales and Weights; and that his Memory is preserved in the Constellation called, Libra. For Mochus, if we read Moschos, it is the very Name of Moses, in the Hebrew [Moscheh,] and as Huetius observes, He is called so by other Authors.²⁰⁷

²⁰⁷ Patrick, on Lev. 19:36 (Leviticus 363); Pierre-Daniel Huet’s Demonstratio Evangelica (1690), prop. IV, cap. 8, sec. 16, p. 123, is Patrick’s (and Mather’s) source for “Mochus,” the alleged pagan name for the Hebrew Lawgiver Moses. Huet points to the obscure Roman historian Lucius Ampelius, of uncertain date (c. 3rd or 4th c. CE), whose Liber Memorialis (2.7) identifies “Mochos” with the constellation Libra. One of the earliest authoritative editions of this work is that appended to Claudius Salmasius’s edition L. Annaeus. Florus. CL. Salmasius, addidit Lucium Ampelium (1638), p. 305. Associating Moses with the ancient Sidonian Mochos, Moxos, Mochus, Moshus, etc., was wishful thinking not only in Mather’s time. See also John Selden’s De Jure Naturali (1640), lib. 1, cap. 2, pp. 22–23; Ralph Cudworth’s True Intellectual System of the Universe (1678), bk. 1, ch. 1, sec. 9–10, pp. 12–13; and Mather’s BA (1:359–61, 383, 527, 531).

Q. After what Manner was the Punishment of Stoning inflicted? v. 2.

A. J. Wagenseil thus describes the Manner of it, out of an Hebrew Manuscript.

The Malefactor was to be stript Naked, having only a Covering before; (A Woman was only stript unto her Shift,) and sett upon an High Place, having his Hands bound, and attended with the Witnesses against him. One of the Witnesses then giving him a strong push, threw him down Headlong from thence. If this Fall kill'd him, there was an End; But if Life remained in him, the Witnesses took up a Stone, which was laid there on Purpose, as big as two Men could lift, and threw it upon him; and before he quite expired, all the People that stood by, threw Stones at him, according to the Law.¹

Q. Give us a Jewish Account of the, Cutting off, so often threatned? v. 3.

A. R. Bechai, and others, observe in the Law, a Threefold Cutting off. One is, The Excision of the Body; that is, the Shortning of the Life; which is threatned unto Six Sins, in the Scripture. The Second is, The Excision of the Soul only; which is threatned by Moses Twenty Six Times; & particularly to Incestuous Marriages. The Third is, The Excision both of Soul and Body; which is threatned unto Fifteen Sins; & particulary to that of giving Children to Molech.²

Q. It is here said, For every one that curseth his Father, or his Mother shall surely be putt to Death. The Particle, For, is Rational. It brings on a Reason of what went before. And yett here we see no Shadow of a Reason for, or any Relation to what went before. All the Divine Ætiologies have a Weight in them? v. 9.

² Patrick (Leviticus 398) leans on John Selden, who in his De Jure Naturali (1640), lib. 7, cap. 9, pp. 828–29, identifies as his source R. Bechai, i. e., R. Bachya ben Asher, and evidently refers to R. Bechai, sive Bachie ben Ascer Biur al Hatorah. Elucidatio in Legem Moysis (1544), fol. 149, col. 1. In Midrash Rabbeinu Bachya Torah Commentary (Lev. 18:29), R. Bachya ben Asher glosses, "The karet penalty appears in the Torah in three different guises. There is a karet penalty which is applicable only to the body of the guilty party. There is also a karet penalty which applies only to the soul; finally, there is a karet penalty which applies both to the body and the soul of he sinner in question" (5:1720). The venerable rabbi elaborates on each of the three constituencies in his subsequent paragraphs (5:1720–28).

A. It is mistranslated. The Particle /כִּי/ is not only Rational; [1. Chron. XIII.11.] but also Discretive. [Gen. XLV.8.] And more than so, Tis Conditional. [2. Sam. VII.1.] It is accordingly here to be translated, When, or, If.³

Q. How was the Sentence of Death understood & executed, according to the several Phrases used for it? v. 10.

A. When wee meet with this Phrase; They shall surely Dy, and the Law add no more, the Jewes tell us, the Death was then by Strangling. If these Words be added, Their Blood shall be upon them, then, they say, the Death was to be by Stoning.

The Strangling, as they describe it, was not such a Punishment, as our Hanging by the Neck; but the Criminal, being stuck up to the Knees in Dung, they tied a Napkin about his Neck, & so, drawing it at both Ends, they choaked him. There was then such a thing, as Hanging Men on a Gallows, but it was after they were Dead, and only of such as had been Stoned, for Blasphemy, or Adultery.⁴

It seems, That the Punishment of Adultery, according to the Jewes, was only Strangling, [but the Daughter of a Priest playing the Adulteress, was to be burnt:] but if a Man lay with a Virgin espoused unto another Man, & not yett married, Stoning was the Punishment expressly provided for them. How shall we reconcile this, with the Words, of the Jewes, about that Woman in the Gospel, Joh. 8.5. Moses, in the Law, commanded us, that such should be stoned. It may be answered, That this Woman was espoused only, and not married; and so fell under the Penalty in Deuteronomy. [Ch. 22.23, 24.]⁵

If it seem absurd, That the Adultery of one espoused, should be counted a greater Crime, than of one married, it may be considered, That the Love of those, who were newly espoused was commonly more fervent, than theirs who were married; especially among the Jewes, who for light Causes would be divorced from their Wives.⁶

Q. Was not the Intention of the Blessed God, in præscribing a Difference of Meats, unto the Jewish Nation, very glorious? v. 25.

3 Mather's vademecum is Robert Gell's discussion on Lev. 20:9, in Essay toward the Amendment (1659), p. 300.

4 Patrick (Leviticus 403).

5 Patrick (Leviticus 403); John Selden's Uxor Ebraica, Seu De Nuptiis & Divortiis (1646), lib. 3, cap. 2, pp. 326–30, is the authoritative source on this issue.

6 Patrick (Leviticus 404).

A. Yes; This Nation, from whom the MESSIAH was to spring, was (as Dr. Patrick well notes,) hereby kept pure, & free from all Mixture with any other Nation or People. Nothing more contributed hereunto, than the Difference of Meats imposed upon them; which made it not easy for them to contract an Acquaintance with other Nations. And indeed, unless the People from whom the Messiah was to come, had been kept separate from other Nations, either all Hope of Him would have been lost, or many in every Countrey, to the Destruction of Mankind, would have pretended for to have been the Person. Whereas, by keeping them a People Distinct by themselves, it came to pass, that all the Countreyes thereabouts, were filled with a Report, That the Lord of the World shall come out of Judea.⁷

Q. In the Law for Stoning them that had a Familiar Spirit; there is express mention of the Woman, as well as the Man, that shall become obnoxious to the Law. Why so? v. 27.

A. Take the Account given by Maimonides. “The greater Part of such Evil Arts, being practised by Women, towards whom Men are naturally pitiful, Moses therefore saies in this Place, A Man also, or a Woman, that hath a Familiar Spirit; like to which, we find not in any Præcept, no, not about the Profanation of the Sabbath. But in this Case, it was necessary expressly to mention Women as well as Men; because of Mens natural Tenderness & Clemency towards Women.” Thus he, in, More Nevochim.⁸

Q. Did Pagan Antiquity at all imitate the Mosaic Institution, which prohibited the Mourning of a Priest? v. 1.

A. Yes. The Romans, as Bochart observes out of Seneca, would not have their Pontifex to look upon a Funeral; And the Flamen Dialis might not go into the Place where the Coffin was. For this Reason, as we are told by Servius upon Virgil, they ordered a Bough of a Cypress-Tree to be stuck at the Door of the House, where a Dead Body lay, that the High Priest might not ignorantly go into it. It appears also by Plato, that it was thus likewise among the Greeks.¹

Q. Must every Daughter of a Priest playing the Whore, have been Burnt with Fire? v. 9.

A. The Hebrew Doctors understand it, only of one married, or, at least, espoused. Aben-Ezra and Solomon Jarchi, (for which consult Selden in his Uxor Hebraica) expressly say, our Rabbins confess with one Mouth, that one not espoused, is not concerned in this Law.²

¹ Patrick (Leviticus 414) extracts his material from Samuel Bochart's encyclopedic Hierozaicon (1663), pars 1, lib. 3, cap. 4, cols. 757, 758. In turn, Bochart supplies Patrick with the material from Roman philosopher Lucius Annaeus Seneca. Seneca's De Consolatione ad Marciam (15.3) relates that when Tiberius Caesar presided over the funeral of one of his sons, he had a curtain drawn on one side of the bier to shield the eyes of the high priest (whom Bochart polemically associates with "Pontifex," the bishop of Rome) from looking at the corpse. Bochart also is Patrick's vademecum for the reference to the Roman grammarian and historian Aulus Gellius's Noctes Atticae (10.15.24–25). In this commonplace book, Gellius reminds us that the ancient "Flamen Dialis" ("high priest of Jupiter") must not enter a cemetery or touch a corpse, but he may attend a funeral ceremony. Bochart is likewise the source for the reference to Maurus Servius's annotation in his In Vergilii carmina commentarii (3.64), which mentions the Cypress-tree branch at the doorpost as a sign of mourning. Finally, Plato, in his Leges (12.947d, lines 3–7) instructs that at the funeral of the "Scrutineer" (magistrate), "the Priests and Priestesses will bring up the rear [of a funeral procession]; they are of course banned from other funerals, but provided the oracle at Delphi approves, they shall attend this one, as it will not defile them."

Q. If the Priest were in the Sanctuary when he heard of the Death of his Father or Mother, he might not stir out from thence, until he had Finished his Ministry. Where was he to stay? v. 12.

A. He had a little House, (after the Temple was built) within the Præincts of it, where he commonly remained all the Day-time; which was called, Lischath Cohen gadol, or, The Parlour of the High-Priest; as Cunæus observes. At night he went unto his own Dwelling-House, which was in Jerusalem, & no where else. There he might perform all the Offices of a Mourner, except those which are here forbidden; And the People came to comfort him, (as Maimonides relates) and sitting on the Ground, while he sat in his Chair at the Funeral Feast, they said, Lett us be thy Expiation; that is, Lett all the Grief that is on thee fall on us; To which he answered, Blessed be yee from Heaven.³

Q. Why might no Priest, that had any Natural Blemish on him, do the Service of the Sanctuary? v. 17.

A. Doubtless, for the same General Reason, that the Marriage and the Mourning of a Priest, might not bee like That of other Men; and that God Cloth'd them, and Fed them, in such a peculiar Manner as hee did.

Briefly, The Honour of their Sacred Office in the Eyes of the People, was thus to bee præserted. For, tho' Bodily Deformities are oftentimes most richly compensated with Mental Perfections, yett the Vulgar do commonly Judge κατ' ὄψιν, and are prone to despise, even the Office, as well as the Person, of the Defective.⁴ For which Cause, it ha's been usual with other Oriental Nations, as well as the Persians, to lett their Imperial Crown, bee worn by None that were notable for any Natural Infirmity. And among the Romans, wee know that Horatius Cocles and Mutius Scaevola, were for certain Mutilations judg'd incapable of the Magistracy.⁵ It is truly noted by Curtius, Plerisque gentibus ingens in corpore

3 Patrick (Leviticus 422); Petrus Cunaeus, De Republica Hebraeorum (1617), lib. 2, cap. 3, pp. 195–96, mentions the לשכת כהן גדול “conclave Pontificis,” or “Chamber of the High Priest.” Maimonides, Hilchot K'lei HaMikdash ViHaOvdim Bo (5.7), in Mishneh Torah (29:170, note 17). In Hilchot Beit HaBechirah (5:17), it is called “The Chamber of Wood,” as well as “the Chamber of Parhedrin” (i. e., “officer of the king”), Mishneh Torah (29:88–89, note 109).

4 In this context, the Greek passage can be rendered “by sight” or “appearances” (LSJ).

5 According to Livy's Ab urbe condita (2.9–13), Publius Horatius Cocles (aka. one-eyed Horatius) heroically defended the Sublician Bridge across the Tiber against a surprise attack by the Etruscan king (c. 509 BCE) in the war between Rome and Clusium. Dionysius Halicarnassus adds in his Roman Antiquities (5.25.3) that the Romans honored their great hero with a gift of land, consulship, and military command, but Horatius's debilitating physical injuries rendered him unsuitable for such offices. Likewise, according to Livy (2.12–13), Mutius Scaevola (Gaius Mucius Scaevola) demonstrated his bravery in the Clusian War and his defiance of *veneratio est, magnorumque operum non Alios capaces putant, quàm quos specie egregià et eximià Natura donavit.*⁶

But, I beleeve, a more Special Reason, of this Levitical Order, was, To repræsent the complete Sufficiency and Amiability of the Lord Jesus Christ unto the World. The Priests were Types of our Eternal Priest, in whom Nothing is Wanting, Nothing is Amiss.⁷

Q. The Blemishes that rendred a Priest incapable for Services, in the Reckoning of he Jewes, how many were they? v. 17.

A. They were all Exteriour: And yett the Jewes reckon up One hundred and Forty of them. And particularly, –

In the Head,	8.
In the Neck,	2.
In the Ears,	12.
In the Eylids & Eybrowes,	15.
In the Eyes,	19.
In the Nose,	6.
In the Lips & Mouth,	9.
In the Belly,	3.
In the Back,	3.
In the Genitals,	17.
In the Hands & Feet,	12.
In the Legs,	15.
In the whole Body,	4.

It were a Tedious and an Useless Work, to explain all these Blemishes. And indeed in some of them, they were very curious and critical; as, when they reckoned an Hawk Nose one of them, or, a Nose a little too big; or one Eye a little Bigger than another; or, a Watry Eye; or a little Eye; or, a Swarthy Skin; or, a Skin having some Wrinkles in it.⁸

physical pain by plunging his arm into the altar fire of the Etruscan enemy. Though rewarded and honored for his bravery and act of defiance, Mucius lost the use of his right arm (hence the moniker “Scaevola”), which rendered him useless in military combat. See also Dionysius Halicarnassus (5. 27–31, 35).

⁸ See Rashi, Nachmanides, Rashbam, Iban Ezra, Chizkuni, Gersonides, and Abarbanel on Lev. 21:17–21, in JPS Miqra’ot Gedolot (3:170–71). John Selden has much to say on these physical disqualifications in his De Successione in Pontificatum Ebraeorum (1636), lib. 2, cap. 5,

But Munster makes a Good Conclusion upon the whole: *Colligimus ex his, quàm Integros et Immaculatos Dominus voluit habere Ministros.*⁹

Q. Upon the Sacerdotal Blemishes? v. 17.

A. Such Inferiour Priests as had any Blemish in their Birth, contrary to the Statutes of the Law, had a Black Suit given them, & were turned out of the Court. But those whose Birth was unblemished, & yett had some Corporal Defects, were appointed for to pile up the Wood, & examine it, whether it were fitt for their Service or not.¹⁰ Lastly, They that were without any Blemish, were dressed in White Vestments, & had this Thanksgiving pronounced over them; *Blessed be GOD, Because the Seed of Aaron, ha's been found without Blemish, and because he has chosen Aaron & his Sons, to appear in His Presence, & to perform the Service before Him.*¹¹

Q. The Priest with a Blemish might not come nigh the Altar; no, not go to the Altar of Burnt-Offering, which was in the Court of the House of the Lord. What was he to do? v. 23.

A. He was to sitt in the Wood-room, where he was employ'd in picking out all the Wood, which had any Worms in it, that it might be laid aside, & not carried unto the Altar; as Maimonides and others relate.¹²

pp. 226–37. Perhaps the definitive discussion of what physical blemishes disqualify anyone from serving as priest in the Temple is Maimonides, Hilchot Bi'at HaMikdash (chs. 6–8), in Mishneh Torah (29:262–80).

9 Sebastian Münster's detailed enumeration of the various disqualifications appears in his annotation on Lev. 21, in his Hebraica Biblia (1546), fols. 241–42. Mather slightly modifies his quote of Münster's concluding sentence on the topic: "We gather from these [laws] how pure and spotless the Lord wanted to have his ministers be" (fol. 242).

Q. The Offerings of Beeves were to have no Blemish in them; what then, were any Oxen ever offered in Sacrifice unto God? v. 21.

A. No, Sure; What wee Translate, The Ox, throughout the whole Old Testament, should bee Translated, The Bull. God had forbidden a Sacrifice of any Creature, that had any Blemish; yett how many times dos our Version make mention of such Defective and Mutilous Things, as Oxen, sacrificed unto the Lord?¹

Q. A Creature to bee sacrificed, was to bee Seven Dayes, under its Dam; And from the Eighth Day, & thence forward, it might bee accepted for an Offering. Why this Eighth Day so much considered? v. 27.

A. The Ancient Jewes have a Saying, That the Sabbath gives a Firmitude and Strength to all the Affayrs of this World. Tho' the later Jewes do abuse that Saying, yett there is a Truth in it, for it may bee understood concerning the Blessing of God, on the due Observation of His Worship, on that Day. Hence it was, they say, That any young Beast, that was to bee offered in Sacrifice, must continue Seven Dayes with the Dam, not offerible til the Eighth: and hence also a Child, might not bee circumcised until the Eighth Day: It was, that there might bee the Interposition of a Sabbath, for their Benediction. And it was not unlikely, that the Eighth Day was also signalized hereby, as that which was to succeed in the room of the Seventh, for the Christian Sabbath.

¹ Mather's point is an excellent one – one that appears to have escaped the attention of some of our modern translators. Since the castration of a bull constitutes a blemish, defect, maiming, or injury (Lev. 22:21, 24), “an ox” (per definition) is disqualified from being an acceptable offering. Significantly, whereas the NJPS renders the Hebrew masculine, singular noun בָּקָר [baqar] as “ox,” the OJPS uses the term “bullock.” The KJV's collective, gender-neutral noun “beeves” appears to reflect the choice of the LXX, which has βουκολίων (“herd of cattle”), even though collective nouns per definition are singular in number. See Strong's ## 1241 and B1429, and Lev. 22:21, 23, 27, in JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot (3:175, 176, 177). None of the post-Reformation commentators excerpted in Poole's Synopsis Criticorum (1:598) and Works (6:413–14) seem to have made the connection even though they have much to say on the issue of what constitutes animal castration (Lev. 22:24). See also Samuel Bochart's Hierozoicon: Animalium (1663), pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 46, cols. 522–23.

Q. That Word, The Feasts of the Lord, may it not be otherwise translated? v. 1.

A. The Word, Moed, which we translate, A Feast, properly signifies, An Assembly. So Thorndyke urges (and that not without Reason) to have it Translated. For the Name, Feasts, is proper to the Solemnities, which are to be celebrated with Joy and Cheerfulness. Whereas, Moed, is a Name here applied unto the Day of Atonement also, which was to be observed, with the greatest Affliction that was possible.¹

Q. What was the Difference, between the Inhibition of Work on the weekly Sabbath, & on the other Solemnities? v. 3.

A. The Jewes have a Saying, (mentioned by Aben-Ezra.) That whosoever does any Work on the Sabbath-day, denies the Work of Creation. Accordingly, about the weekly Sabbath, and the Day of Atonement, it is said, Thou shalt do no Work upon it; but of the other Solemnities, it is, only said, Thou shalt do no Servile Work therein; only such Work, as they did use to putt their Slaves unto, was prohibited. Aben-Ezra ha's this Observation; *Of none of the solemn Assemblies, besides the Sabbath, & the Day of Atonement, is it said, No Manner of Work; only of the Passeeover He saith it, and addeth an Exception of, The Meat of the Soul; That is, what was requisite for the Sustenance of Nature.*²

1 Patrick, on Lev. 23:2 (Leviticus 452). Via Patrick, Mather paraphrases Herbert Thorndike's Of Religious Assemblies, and the Publick Service of God (1642), ch. 2, p. 8. An Anglican theologian, biblical scholar, Hebrew lecturer at Trinity College (Cambridge), and friend of the metaphysical poet George Herbert, Herbert Thorndike (c. 1597–1672), advocating Episcopacy and noninterference of the state, rendered himself obnoxious to the leading Puritan members of parliament in the years before and during the English Civil War. Nonetheless, his knowledge of Semitic languages was of considerable value to Brian Walton and the team of editors who compiled the London Polyglot toward the end of the Interregnum (ODNB). The Hebrew noun מוֹעֵד [mow'ed] (Lev. 23:2) is variously translated as “sacred place, appointed time, meeting,” as well as “set feast” and “appointed season” (Strong's # 4150). See also The Mishnah (second division), Moed.

Q. The Law, about Offering the First Fruits unto the Lord; please to Illustrate it unto mee, with Passages of Antiquity? v. 10.³

A. The First Fruits, were of Three sorts; and not I, but old Augustin, shall give you the Distinction, with a Description of them. Hæc autem Tria (saies hee, Quæst. 18. in Num.) itâ discernuntur, πρωτότοκα sunt primitivi Animalium Fœtus, etiam Hominum; πρωτογενήματα verò, primi Fructus de Terrâ sumpti, vel de Arbore, vel de Viti; ἀπαρχαὶ *autem, de Fructibus quidem, sed redactis ab Agro, sicut de Massâ, de Dolio, de Lacu, de Cupâ, quæ primitus sumebantur.*⁴

The Offering of these First Fruits unto God, seems to have been one of the First Rites, practised with Good Men in the World; The Eldest Sons of Adam; wee find, made Conscience of it. Their Offering hereof, was in their Opinion, as Philo expresses it, τῷ πρὸς ἀλήθειαν αἰτίῳ τῆς εὐκαρπίας ἀμοιβῇ δικαιοσύνη. *A most Just Retribution, to the True Author of all Fruitfulness.*⁵ Now, this Law, the Lord Revives unto Israel, with several Ceremonies, whereof wee find notable Resemblances and Remembrances in Pagan Antiquity. And indeed, the Lord seems to have had a most Special Regard unto it; For Hee not only Inculcates frequently, His Desire of the First-Ripe Fruits, but whereas Hee Instituted Three Anniversary Festivals among His People, the Oblation of the First-Fruits was a principal Rite, in each of those Festivals; The Barley, at the Passeover; the Wheat, at the Pentecost; the Vine and other Trees, at the Feast of Tabernacles. Nor was there a smaller Stress laid upon this Matter among the Pagans; when Porphyrus particularly, makes the τίνες οὐδεμίαν ἀπαρχὴν τῶν ὑπαρχόντων ποιοῦμενοι τοῖς θεοῖς. Those who did not Religiously offer their First-Fruits, the profanest of Men; and adds, a Tragical Story, of the Atheistical People, called, Thoës, in the Confines of Thracia, who neglecting this Piety, were suddenly snatch'd away from the Midst of Mankind, by some unaccountable Judgment of Heaven, so that, nec Incolas, nec urbem, nec ædium fundamenta, quispiam invenire poterat.⁶

³ John Spencer, De Legibus (1685), lib. 3, diss. 1, cap. 9, fol. 607ff is Mather's muse here and in the following paragraphs.

That the Gentiles of old, consecrated their First-Fruits, the Proofs are too many to be recited. But particularly, Diodorus Siculus reports of it of the Egyptians, that they offered their First-Fruits unto Isis; which the Greeks also did unto Δημήτηρ, or, Ceres, who was the same with Isis.⁷ And Meursius tells us, the Name, of, Θαύσια, therefore, was putt upon their Festival, wherein they did it; as was the Name of Ὠραία too, according to Hesychius.⁸ They had likewise, a Feast unto Apollo, and Diana, called, Θαργήλια, wherein, Suidas tells us, they presented their First-Fruits unto the God Θαργήλιος, [thus called, ἀπὸ τοῦ θέρειν τὴν γῆν, from his Warming of the Earth,] that is to say, The Sun,⁹ That this was the Usage of the Romans, is evident from the Words of the Poet;

– ut primas Cereri dare cultor aristas

Posset, et Intacto Bromium [i. e. Bacchum] perfundere vino.¹⁰

6 Spencer (612–13); Mather provides his own translation of the Greek passage from Porphyrius, De Abstinencia (2.7.20–21). The Latin rendition from the same text De Abstinencia (2.8) relates that all traces of the Thoës of Thracia have been wiped out by the angry gods, and “neither the inhabitants, nor the city, nor the foundations of the houses, could by any one be found” (On Abstinence 50). When the sacrifice of the first-fruits of the field was no longer esteemed by the Athenians, Porphyrius opines, profane men cruelly slaughtered sacrificial animals, and thus defiled the altars. Animal sacrifice was introduced when man began to taste blood when reduced by famine and war. If anyone knows more about the disappearance of the ancient Thoës of Thracia, then Hesiod, in his Opera et Die (133–43), believes that “they could not restrain themselves from wicked outrage against each other, nor were they willing to honor the immortals or to sacrifice upon the holy altars of the blessed ones, as is the established right for human beings in each community. Then Zeus, Cronus’s son, concealed [i. e., wiped out] these in anger, because they did not give honor to the blessed gods who dwell on Olympus” (Works and Days 133–43). Much like the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, the Thracian city of Thoës was wiped out without a trace; in the aetiologies of the ancients in which there is no room for pure accidents, historians – sacred or secular – are rarely at a loss to imagine the causes why the gods were offended.

7 Well at home in ancient Egyptian and Greek history, Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica (1.14.2–4), explains that wheat and barley stalks were offered at the “Festival of Isis,” the goddess who had discovered these cereals for mankind’s use. Like her Egyptian counterpart, the Greek Demeter (Δημήτηρ), goddess of harvests and cereals, gave laws to her people and is therefore called “Thesmophorus” or lawgiver. See also J. Tait. “The Wisdom of Egypt: Classical Views.”

8 Mather’s mediate source is Joannes Meursius, Graecia Feriata (1619), lib. 4, cap. Θαύσια, pp. 142–43. Meursius cites as his sources Περὶ ἐπιδεικτικῶν, cap. Περὶ λαλιᾶς (391, lines 16–18), by the Greek rhetorician Menander Laodicensis (3rd c. CE). The Greek lexicographer Hesychius (Lexicon Π–Ω, alphab. letter omega, entry 284, line 1) speaks of Ὠραία (Oraia) or any of the four “seasons.”

9 According to Suda (Lexicon, alphab. letter theta, entry 49, lines 1, 4), Θαργήλια (Thargelia) was an Athenian festival held in honor of Artemis and Apollo in the month of Thargelion, thus named “from the warming of the earth.”

10 The Roman pastoral poet Titus Calpurnius Siculus (fl. mid-1st c. CE) sings in his Bucolica (Eclogue 4.122–23) that the farmer “can give to Ceres his first corn-ears and to Bromius [Bacchus] pour libation of wine.”

And with how much Religion, it was observed, Pliny tells us, Ne gustabant quidem novas Fruges aut Vina, antequam Sacerdotes primitias Libassent. Isis was thus acknowledged among the Egyptians; as Diodorus tells us for a μαρτύριον τῆς εὐρέσεως, τῶν καρπῶν a Testimony of her being the first Finder of those Blessings.¹¹ And there is a Passage in the seventh Idyls of Theocritus, which is of the same Importance, with an Invitation unto the Thalysia, on that Consideration.¹² The Heathen also hoped, by this Homage, towards this and other Gods, to procure the Blessings of much Fertility, unto them. Eustathius therefore tells us concerning the Thalysia, That they were ὑπὲρ τοῦ καὶ εἰς ἔπειτα θάλλειν τὰς ἀρούρας, That their Fields might flourish for the Time to come. And Celsus tells us, That these Respects were paid unto Demons, ὡς ἂν φιλανθρώπων αὐτῶν τυγχάνοιμεν, ut ipsos habeamus praesentes ac propitios.¹³ Diodorus acquaints us, That this Usage was, τὸ τηρούμενον παρ' αὐτοῖς ἐξ ἀρχαίων νόμιμον Institutum a Sæculis ami quioribus observatum; and Porphyrus acquaints us, That it was, Ἄπ' ἀρχῆς. And Aristotle acquaints us, That these were Αἱ ἀρχαῖα θυσίαι.¹⁴

Now, for the Rites used in this Action, It was the Usage of the Gentiles as well as of the Jewes, therein to carry about (θάλλους, they call'd 'em, that is,) Branches encompassed with Wool, on which were Hanged Fruits of all Sorts in abundance; and they had their Dance with those Branches in their Hands. Like the Jewes, they had likewise a Feast, on this Occasion; which Hierom tells us, was among the Gentiles, In cunctis urbibus Idololatriæ Vetus consuetudo. And Plutarch reports the Jewes to have been Worshippers of Bacchus, for what they thus 11 Pliny, in his Naturalis Historia (18.2.8), comments on the fervor of the ancient Romans in Romulus's time, that "people used not even to taste the produce of a new harvest or vintage before the priests had offered a libation of the first-fruits." So, too, the adapted line from Diodorus Siculus's Bibliotheca historica (1.14.2, lines 1–2) reports of the devotions of the Egyptians to the goddess Isis for discovering grains for man's use.

12 The Greek father of pastoral poetry Theocritus Syracusanus (c. 310–c. 250 BCE) invites Lycidas to join their revelries: "This our journey is to a harvest-home; some friends of ours make holiday to the fair-robed Demeter with first-fruits of their increase, because the goddess hath filled their threshing-floor in measure so full and fat" (Idyllia 7.31–34).

13 In his Commentarii ad Homerum Iliadem (2.791, lines 5–6), the Byzantine Metropolitan Eustathius Thessalonicensis (d. 1194), Greek humanist and chronicler, glosses on the Homeric bard that the revelers in the Greek harvest festival Thalysia honored Demeter so that (in Mather's translation) "their Fields might flourish for the Time to come." (EB). Likewise, the Greek Platonist Celsus (fl. late 2nd c. CE), remembered for his opposition to Christianity, reminds his opponents in his Ἀληθῆς λόγος (8.33.4) – as extant in Origen Against Celsus (8.33) – that we must offer thanks, first-fruits, and prayers to demons who are the guardians of this world that "they may prove good and kind" (ANF 4:651).

14 The preceding paragraph is based on Spencer (lib. 3, diss. 1, cap. 9, fols. 607, 608, 609). Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca historica 1.14.2, lines 2–3) explains that this harvest offering of the first-fruits was an "ancient custom which the people [Egyptians] still observe." The previously cited Porphyrus adds in his De Abstinencia (2.27, line 1) that it was so "from the beginning." Finally, Aristotle offers the last word on this issue in his Ethica Nicomachea (8.9.1160a, line 26), that these were "the ancient sacrifices."

did, at the Feast of Tabernacles.¹⁵ The Pomp of the Festivities, among the Gentiles, bringing their First-fruits, did, with many Imitations Resemble theirs; their Iseia, were ἐν τῇ πομπῇ saith an old Writer of them.¹⁶ After their Sacrifices were over, they took a great Liberty for Drinking; and perhaps, their Entertainments were called, Σάβιοι, from /אָבִי/ Ebrius fuit.¹⁷ Altho' till then, they were very abstemious. Thus, Peter proved, that hee and his Friends, could not bee Drunk, (Act. 2.15.) because t'was yett but the Third Hour of the Day; the Hour of Sacrifice was not over yett.¹⁸

[57v] The Jewes, in this Action, presented an Handful of Ears of Corn before the Lord. And the Gentiles then also presented their δράγμα which is the very Word used, both by the LXX, for the Jewes, and by Callimachus for the Gentiles. And among the Jewes, there was a Basket of much Importance, herein employ'd; Maimonides | talks much of it. Thus not only the Egyptians had their πυθμένας, but the Græcians also had their Baskets of Grain and Fruit, which they did now pompously κانهφορεῖν. And the Virgins who did it, were called, κانهφόροι.¹⁹ Some Ears of Corn, were now, by the Jewes also roasted in the Fire: the Corn was stripp'd off the Husk [* torn]. The Law, is thus to bee translated, Lev. 2.14. Ejectionem spica viridis, offeres Mincham primitiarum tuarum. The Gentiles did so too; and the Name of Ceres, accidentally Geres, may bee from /אָרֵר/ ejicere,

15 In a passage adapted from St. Jerome, Commentarii in Isaiam 65.10 [PL 024. 0639B], Mather tells us that among the Egyptians “idol worship was an ancient practice in the whole city [of Alexandria].” And Plutarch conjectures in his Quaestiones Conviviales (4.6.671d, lines 8–10 to 671e, line 3), “it is very probable that they [Jews] perform the rites of Bacchus. First they have little trumpets, such as the Grecians used to have at their Bacchanalia to call upon their Gods withal. Others go before them playing upon harps, which they call Levites, whether so named from Lusius or Evius, – either word agrees with Bacchus. And I suppose that their Sabbaths have some relation to Bacchus; for even at this day many call the Bacchi by the name of Sabbi, and they make use of that word at the celebration of Bacchus’s orgies. . . . Nor would it be absurd, were any one to say that the name Sabbath was imposed upon this feast from the agitation and excitement (σάβησις) which the priests of Bacchus indulged in. The Jews themselves testify no less; for when they keep the Sabbath, they invite one another to drink till they are drunk; or if they chance to be hindered by some more weighty business, it is the fashion at least to taste the wine” (Quaestiones Conviviales 4.6).

16 The old writer is Diodorus Siculus, who confirms that the Egyptians honor Isis by carrying wheat and barley offerings “in the procession” (1.14.3, line 1–2).

17 “Bacchanals” (Plutarch, Quaestiones Conviviales 4.6.671f) and riotous “drinking bouts.”

18 The preceding paragraphs are synopsized from Spencer (609, 610).

19 The gentiles presented their “stalks [sheaf] of first-fruits”; Lev. 23:12 (LXX); Callimachus, In Delum (hymn 4.283) and In Cererem (hymn 6.19). Maimonides, Hilchot Bikkurim (3.7–9), in Mishneh Torah (28:620), and Guide (3.39.551–52). Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca historica 1.14.3, line 1–3) speaks of the Egyptians who offered “sheaves of first-fruits” (wheat and barley). The Greeks were “carrying” their baskets pompously, and the virgins who did so were called “basket-bearers” (Aristophanes, Lysistrata 646).

Q. Seven Sabbaths shall be compleat; So the Feast of Pentecost arrived. How were the Dayes counted of old? And how are they at this Day? v. 15.

A. They reckoned Seven whole Weeks; reckoning that Day from which the Account begun, for the First Day of the First of those Weeks; which made Forty Nine Dayes in all.²¹

Maimonides thinks, it was for the Honour of this Great Day of Pentecost, that they were to count the Dayes till it came; just like a Man, saith he, who expects his best Friend; he is wont to tell the Dayes and Hours till he arrive.²²

Wherefore the Modern Jewes, begin the Supputation, with a Prayer, saying, Blessed art thou, O LORD our God, the Lord of the World, who hast sanctified us with thy Præcepts, & commanded us to number the Dayes of Harvest; And this is the First Day. And thus they go on to pray, till the Seventh Day; when they add, Now there is One Week; and so they proceed in those Prayers, to the Evening of Pentecost. Which Feast, they not being able now to keep, as the Law appoints, they pray to God every Day, after they have done counting, that He would Restore Jerusalem and the Temple; and then they promise to do all that is here præscribed. And this Counting sometimes is performed publickly in their Synagogues; yett so that every Master of a Family is bound every night for to do it at home.²³

Q. At the Arrival of the Fiftieth Day, they were to offer a New Meat-Offering unto the Lord: of New Corn made into Loaves, which was the First-fruits of Wheat-Harvest. But by what Remarkable ha's this Day been signalized? v. 16.

²⁰ Spencer (611–12). Mather's forceful retranslation of Lev. 2:14 reads, "You will offer the casting out of the green ear of grain, the Minchah (grain-offering) of your first-fruits." Mather's mediate source is De Oggi Christiano, Libri Tres (1640), Lib. 1, cap. 20, p. 86; Lib. 2, cap. 5, p. 108, and cap. 6, p. 114, by the French Capuchin theologian Jacobus Bolducus, Jacob Bolduc, aka. Balduc (d. 1646). The Hebrew word גֶּרֶשׁ [geres] signifies "a crushing," "that which is crushed" (Strong's # 1643, B1958) which (according to Vatablus) is derived from גָּרַס [geres] "to crush, to pound, to expel." See also Poole's Synopsis Criticorum (1:515) and Works (7:45).

A. Our Blessed Lord, being slain at the Feast of the Passeover, the whole Sabbath following, (which was the First Day of Unleavened Bread) He rested in His Grave. The next Day after that Sabbath, the Sheaf or Omer of the First-fruits of the Barley-Harvest, was offered unto the Lord; when our Lord Rose from the Dead, & became the First-fruits of them that slept. From this Day was taken the Account of the Seven Sabbaths, or Weeks; and upon the Morrow after the Seventh, (that is, upon our LORDS DAY,) was celebrated, The Feast of Weeks; which is called, The Day of the First-fruits, [Num. 28.26.] because then were offered the First-fruits of their Second, or Wheat-Harvest; and therefore called, The Feast of Harvest; [Exod. 23.16.] because then was the Principal, and the Conclusion of the whole Harvest of the Year. Upon which, the Apostles, having themselves received the First-fruits of the Spirit, begat Three Thousand Souls thro' the Word of Truth; and presented them as the First-fruits of the Christian Church unto God, & unto the Lamb.²⁴

Q. The Memorial of Blowing of Trumpets; Of what was it a Memorial? v. 24.

A. As Maimonides will have it instituted, for the Awakening of People out of Sinful Sleep, and calling of them unto Repentance: Being to putt them in Mind of the Great Day of Expiation, which follow'd Nine Days after.²⁵

It seems more probable, That as all Nations made great Rejoicings in the Beginning of the Year, at the First New-Moon, in hopes that the rest of the Year would prove, the more prosperous; GOD ordained this Festival among His People, or in Honour of Himself, upon the Day of the First New Moon; that Hee might præserve them from the Worship of the Moon, and make themselves sensible, that He alone gave good New Years unto them.

²⁴ Patrick (Leviticus 463–64). Mather's Christological reading is in stark contrast to the literalism of Rabbeinu Bachya ben Asher's explication of Shavuot, the Feast of Weeks, which not only celebrates the wheat harvest but also commemorates the anniversary of Moses' receiving the Torah on Mt. Sinai: "The most important aspect of the commandment to count in our verse [Lev. 23:15] is that one must begin the count on the 16th of the month of Nissan. This is the first day of the reaping of the barley harvest. The first cut barley (of good grade) is offered as a communal offering as a gift to the Lord as described in verses 12–13. The number 50 (of counting) comes to an end with the harvesting of the first wheat from which again an offering is brought in the form of two loaves of bread which are baked as leavened loaves (as spelled out in verses 18–20). The principal part of the whole commandment is the ritual of the offering of these two loaves. The accompanying animal sacrifices were precisely that, they did not constitute the principal part of the combined offering. If, for some reason, no new wheat was available on that date the accompanying animal sacrifices mentioned here would not be offered" (Torah Commentary 5:1791–92).

Some have Remark'd, That GOD putt peculiar Honour on this Month, because it was, The Seventh. As every Seventh Day was a Sabbath: and every Seventh Year, was a Rest for the Land; So every Seventh Month should be a Sabbatical Month, and have more Solemn Days observed in it, than all the Year besides. The Blowing of Trumpetts might be to awaken the People unto the Observing of them, with the proper Cæremonies.

But after all, as Lewis notes, The Thing whereof this Blowing of Trumpetts was designed as a Memorial, was most probably, The Creation of the World; which was at this Time of the Year. Thus they confessed the Divine Goodness also in Blessing the Past Year & bringing them to the Beginning of a New Year; which they pray'd that GOD would make Happy to them.²⁶

Q. What Remarkable about the Eighth Day of the Feast of Tabernacles? v. 39.

A. On this Day, they sojourned not in Tabernacles; as they did on the Seven præceding. The Seven Dayes for their Lodging in Booths, (wherein they were excused, if the Rains or Colds proved excessive,) being ended, they returned unto their Houses, & kept a very great Solemnity there, unto another Purpose, than that for which those Dayes (which carried a Commemoration of their Condition in the Wilderness) had been appointed. Then they not only made great Feasts in their Houses, but also sang the Praises of God at the Temple, with Trumpets & Instruments of Musick. In that Service, tis said, they sang those Three Psalms, which have the Title of Al-hagittith, [namely, The Eighth, the Eighty first, and the Eighty fifth.] For Gath signifies, A Wine-Press; & therefore they think the Psalms to be sung, in the Time of the Vintage. That they use to Sing and Shout at their Vintage, is intimated, in sundry Scriptures. [Judg. 9.27. Isa. 16.9, 10. Jer. 48.32. Hos. 2.15.] The Gentiles, imitated it; who when they pressed their Grapes, sung a Song to Bacchus, which was thence called Ἐπιλήνιος, The Song of the Winepress. This being a Time of such great Rejoicing in both Respects, it led Plutarch into a Fancy, [Sympos. ²⁷ Patrick (Leviticus 480) has “Symposiacs, Lib. IV, Probl. 3.” Mather mistakenly transcribes “IV” as “14.” In Plutarch's Symposiacs (4.6.2), Symmachus, one of the three speakers, links the Greco-Roman adoration of Bacchus, with the Hebrew thanksgiving: “When all the company requested and earnestly begged it of him; first of all (says he), the time and manner of the greatest and most holy solemnity of the Jews is exactly agreeable to the holy rites of Bacchus; for that which they call the Fast they celebrate in the midst of the vintage, furnishing their tables with all sorts of fruits, while they sit under tabernacles made of vines and ivy; and the day which immediately goes before this they call the day of Tabernacles. Within a few days after they celebrate another feast, not darkly but openly, dedicated to Bacchus, for they have a feast amongst them called Kradephoria, from carrying palm-trees, and Thyrsophoria, when they enter into

Q. What Remarkable Action of the Jewes, at the Feast of Tabernacles, have you mett withal, besides those that are more commonly observed, countenancing of Christianity? v. 40.

A. They celebrated the Festival with Singing Hosanna's. And we find in their Minhagim (or, Books of Rituals,) that they then often repeated these Acclamations.

For thy Sake, O our Creator, Hosanna.

For thy Sake, O our Redeemer, Hosanna.

For thy Sake, O our Seeker, Hosanna.

the temple carrying thyrsi. What they do within I know not; but it is very probable that they perform the rites of Bacchus. First they have little trumpets, such as the Grecians used to have at their Bacchanalia to call upon their Gods withal. Others go before them playing upon harps, which they call Levites, whether so named from Lusius or Evius, – either word agrees with Bacchus. And I suppose that their Sabbaths have some relation to Bacchus; for even at this day many call the Bacchi by the name of Sabbi, and they make use of that word at the celebration of Bacchus's orgies. And this may be made appears out of Demosthenes and Menander. Nor would it be absurd, were any one to say that the name Sabbath was imposed upon this feast from the agitation and excitement (σάβησις) which the priests of Bacchus indulged in. The Jews themselves testify no less; for when they keep the Sabbath, they invite one another to drink till they are drunk; or if they chance to be hindered by some more weighty business, it is the fashion at least to taste the wine. Some perhaps may surmise that these are mere conjectures. But there are other arguments which will clearly evince the truth of what I assert. The first may be drawn from their High-priest, who on holidays enters their temple with his mitre on, arrayed in a skin of a hind embroidered with gold, wearing buskins, and a coat hanging down to his ankles; besides, he has a great many little bells hanging at his garment which make a noise as he walks the streets. So in the nightly ceremonies of Bacchus (as the fashion is amongst us), they make use of musical instruments, and call the God's nurses χαλκοδυσταί. High up on the wall of their temple is a representation of the thyrsus and timbrels, which surely can belong to no other God than Bacchus. Moreover they are forbidden the use of honey in their sacrifices, because they suppose that a mixture of honey corrupts and deadens the wine. And honey was used for sacrificing in former days, and with it the ancients were wont to make themselves drunk, before the vine was known. And at this day barbarous people who want wine drink metheglin, allaying the sweetness of the honey by bitter roots, much of the taste of our wine. The Greeks offered to their Gods these sober offerings or honey-offerings, as they called them, because that honey was of a nature quite contrary to wine. But this is no inconsiderable argument that Bacchus was worshipped by the Jews, in that, amongst other kinds of punishment, that was most remarkably odious by which malefactors were forbid the use of wine for so long a time as the judge was pleased to prescribe." Q. Can we come at any knowledge of those Plants, which are mentioned in the Scripture, without any Names assign'd unto them? As here we read; In the Feast of Tabernacles, the Law was, Thou shalt take unto thee Boughs of Goodly Trees, Branches of the Palm, & Boughs of Thick Trees, and Willows of the Brook. Now what might they understand, by, Goodly Trees, and, Thick Trees? v. 40.

A. Fortunatus Scacchus endeavours to make out, That the Oil, to make it more Pure, & free from Dregs, passed thro' two Strainers, into the Lamps.¹

Q. There were Twelve Cakes of the Shew-bread? But was not this Number diminished, after the Apostasy of the Ten Tribes? v. 5.

A. No. Because there was a Remnant of true Israelites, yett among the Jewes. And this was a standing Testimony against the Apostates; Inviting them to Return unto the Right Worship of God in that Place; where they were assured, their Sacrifices would be Acceptable, and no where else.

It was for this Cause, that Abijah, mentioned this unto Jeroboam, and the Ten Tribes, as what should induce them to Repent of their Forsaking the Lord, & His Dwelling Place. [2. Chron. 13.9, 10, 11.] The Priests, the Sons of Aaron minister, and the Levites wait on their business: – the Shew-bread also they sett in Order upon the pure Table.²

Q. On the Top of each Row, of Cakes, (of the Shew-bread,) there was a Golden Dish, with an Handful of Frankincense in it. What for? v. 7.

A. It was to be, On the Bread, or, you may read it, For the Bread. It was offered unto God, instead of the Bread; which was to be given unto the Priests, who waited on Him, at His Table, for their Portion. The Frankincense being sett on the Bread, they seem to be considered as one thing; Part of which was to be offered unto God, & the rest, was to be given unto His Ministers. The Frankincense was burnt every Week; when the Bread was eaten, It is evident, the Bread is called, One of the Offerings of the Lord made by Fire; because this Frankincense, that stood upon it, was burnt as an Oblation to Him.³

The Shew-bread was præpared on the Evening before; and then, on the Sabbath, four Priests went in, to fetch away the Old Loaves and Frankincense,

The straining process of the oil is emblematically depicted in Scacchus's superbly illustrated book, on cols. 54–55, 60–61, 62–63.

that had stood there all the Week before. And other Four followed after them, to carry New ones, and Frankincense, in their Stead. There were two, who carried the Two Rows of Bread, and there were Two, who carried the Two Golden Dishes with the Frankincense.⁴

Q. What might be the Occasion of the Controversy between the Egyptian and the Israelite? v. 10.

A. It seems to have happened, while the Lord was delivering the foregoing Lawes unto Moses. The Jewes tell us, the Controversy was this. The Egyptian looking upon himself, as having a good Right unto it, by his Israelitish Mother, endeavoured for to sett up a Tent among the Children of Dan, where the Tents of that Tribe were pitched. This was opposed by one of that Tribe, who told him, the Right of his Mother would not serve him, unless his Father had been an Israelite; for the Law was, [Num. 2.2.] That every Man of the Children of Israel, should pitch by his own Standard, with the Ensign of their Fathers House. This Law, tho' given afterwards, yett was the Rule before, by which this Man was condemned, by those that heard the Cause, to be in the Wrong. Sentence being thus given against him, he uttered Blasphemous Words against the Lord JEHOVAH Himself, and cursed his Judges also.⁵

Q. Whom do some others among the Jewes imagine this Blasphemer to have been?

A. They imagine him to have been the Son of the Man killed by Moses in Egypt; and they Imagine, that when he Blasphemed God, he also Reviled Moses, in Revenge of his Fathers Death; and they Imagine, that some Words in the Text intimates the Lords, concern more to have the Reviling of Moses punished, than the Blaspheming of Himself; for the Lord saies, Bring forth him that hath Reviled; not, – him that hath Blasphemed.⁶

It has been the Remark of some, that a Son of Egypt, was here taught Inclinations towards a Crime, which was too common in Egypt.⁷ Porphyrie tells ⁴ Patrick, on Lev. 24:8 (Leviticus 491).

⁵ Patrick (Leviticus 493). For much the same see Rashi, Ibn Ezra, Nachmanides, Abarbanel, Bekhor Shor, Gersonides, and Chizkuni – all in JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot: Vayikra (3:196–97).

⁶ This is the position of Rashi and Chizkuni, in JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot (3:197). See also Rashi's annotation on Exod. 2:11–12, that this man was the son of the Egyptian taskmaster who had raped Shelomith, the daughter of Dibri, while her husband had been forced to work at night (JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot 2:12).

⁷ According to the French tosfist R. Joseph ben Isaac Bekhor Shor of Orleans (12th c. CE), "It was his Egyptian ancestry that caused him to blaspheme, for the Egyptians are scornful of us, The Egyptians were great Blasphemers.⁸ They demanded Favours of their GODS, with Menaces to punish them; if they did not grant what they ask'd. This was indeed the Vice of the Heathen in general; especially of their Hero's. Homer has diverse of them.⁹ A modern Poet thus express'd the Spirit of Blasphemy, in the Death of Pompey, – et de[s]daigne de voir le Ciel qui le trahit, or, He scorned to look up to the Gods that betray'd him.¹⁰ Wherein consisted the Blasphemy of This unhappy Man, Moses has not related. The same Scruple which always hinders a Man from committing a Crime, (as Monsr. Saurin observes) often hinders him from Relating the Circumstances, of what is committed by others.¹¹

Q. Why was the God of Heaven so particularly consulted about this affair? v. 12.

A. Mr. Selden observes it, as noted by a famous Commentator among the Jewes; That God was consulted about this Matter, because they did not know, whether he was to Die for this Crime, or, whether his Judgment was to be expected from the Hand of Heaven or otherwise.¹² heaven,” in JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot (3:197). See John Selden's De Synedriis (1653), lib. 2, cap. I, sec. 2, pp. 5–11.

⁹ Homer, Iliad (3.365–66). Menelaus, the son of Atreus, invoked Zeus's help to take revenge on Alexander, son of Priam, but when Menelaus's spear and sword proved ineffective, Menelaus cursed the Greek god: “Father Zeus, [there is] no other god more baneful than you.”

¹¹ The preceding paragraph is based on Jacques Saurin's Dissertations, Historical, Critical, Theological and Moral (1723), diss. LVII, pp. 536–37. Mather comment on the nature of the man's blasphemy seems confusing, for Lev. 24:11 explicitly states that the son of the Israelite woman, dismayed that he was not considered a true Israelite, uttered “the Name [of God] and blasphemed [אֶת־הַשֵּׁם וַיִּקְלַל HaShem]” (OJPS), or as Rashi puts it, he pronounced “the Explicit Name” of God: שֵׁם הַיְהוָה [Shem YHVH], the ineffable Tetragrammaton (Metsudah Chumash! Rashi: Vayikro (3:346, note 381, 382).

Dr. Patrick thinks, They only doubted, what Kind of Death he was to Dy; about which Moses consulted the Divine Majesty.¹³

Q. Why must the Witnesses, lay their Hands upon the Head of the Malefactor? v. 14.

A. The Rite was peculiar to this Case. Hands were not laid upon the Head of any Man condemned by the Sanhedrim, except only a Blasphemer. By that Ceremony, they solemnly declared, that they had given a true Testimony against him, & thought him worthy of the Death, to which he was condemned. Perhaps they also prayed unto God, that the Punishment of the Sin, might fall upon the Man himself, & not upon them, nor the rest of the People. The Jewes tell us, their Manner was to say, *Lett thy Blood be upon thy own Head, which thou hast brought on thyself by thy own Guilt.*¹⁴

Q. Unto the Law, and Act, of Stoning the Blasphemer, why is this Edict added, with such a Repetition; He that killeth any Man, shall surely be putt to Death? v. 17.

A. Procopius Gazæus thinks, a Murderer is joined with a Blasphemer, because they have the same Mind and Intention; The one desiring to Destroy God, if it were possible, as the other doth his Neighbour. *Therefore the Law putteth them together; just as on the Contrary, when it commands the Love of God, it couples with it the Love of our Neighbour.*¹⁵

Q. What Remarkable Intention might there be, in the Institution of the Sabbatical Year, according to the Jewish Apprehensions of it? v. 4.

A. The Jewes have a Good Hint, of one Reason for the Sabbatical Year.

Namely, That Rich Men may look up to Heaven, and consider the Necessities of the Poor; That when they were in the Seventh Year, at a Loss what they should Eat or Drink, and how they should be provided for; they might consider the Poor who are every Year in the same Anxiety, & neither Sowe nor Reap; & so might be the more liberal to the Poor, for the other Six Years.¹

There was a further Consideration, whereof the Words in the Book Sanhedrin are very memorable. Sex Millibus Annorum durabit mundus; et uno millenario desolatus erit. Duobus millibus durabit Devastatio ejus (i. e. inculta hominum Vita,) et duobus millibus Lex, atque duobus millibus Dies Messiæ. This is a most wonderful Passage, to occur in the Jewish Writings! They add, In Septimo millenario suscitabuntur mortui, et gaudebunt cum Messiâ suo.²

Q. When did the Sabbatical Year begin? In Tisri, or Nisan? v. 7.

A. Doubtless, in Tisri, or September; when all their Harvest, which began in March, was over. If it begun in March, they could not have reaped the Harvest of the Sixth Year.

Whatever grew of its own, or without their Labour, in the Sabbatical Year, they might not look as peculiarly Theirs, for growing in their Ground, but all was to be in common. The Owner and his Family were not Forbidden to take their Share; but they might not lay up any thing of it separately for themselves.

Yea, the Increase of the Sabbatical Year, was to be in common for the Beasts also; that is to say, The Tame Ones: For Wild-beasts might be driven out of their Field, for they made such Waste, as would have been a Damage for the Future.

¹ Nachmanides (Ramban) has much to say on this issue (Lev. 25:5–7) in his Commentary on the Torah (3:414–34).

² Probably adapted from the explications of R. Kattina and Tanna debe Eliyyahu, in Soncino Talmud, tractate Sanhedrin (97a). Talmud Babylonicum. 10 vols. Amstelodami (1644–47). The Latin citation reads, “Six thousand years shall the world exist, and one thousand it shall be desolate. Two thousand years it shall also endure desolation (i. e., uncultivated and avoided by man), and two thousand years the Law [shall flourish], together with two thousand years of the Messianic era.” The addition translates, “In the seventh thousand year the dead will awaken and rejoice with their Messiah.”

The Law said nothing of Gardens. The Discharge of Debts this Year, was not for Debts contracted by Sale of Lands or Goods, to such as were able to pay: but of Money lent unto a Neighbour, meerly to releve his Poverty; – not for to make a Purchase, or carry on a Trade.

Q. Behold, an Invitation to consider the Sabbatical Year a little further, and the mystical Intentions of it?

A. There are several observed by Reizius.

I. The Church is to pass thro' Six Periods, and then comes, The Great Sabbatism; the Acceptable Year of the Lord. [See, Isa. 63.4. and, Luk. 4.19.]

II. Then the Messiah, of whom it is foretold, Butter and Honey He shall eat, will bring thy People to enjoy a wondrous Plenty of all things.³

III. The Bruitish Gentiles, [ponder, Act. 10.12, 35.] shall then partake with the People of God, in the Fruits of their Fields; the Cattel and the Beasts, shall eat of the Increase thereof.

IV. And those poor Cattel shall not then draw under the Yoke of the Mosaic Law.

V. The Jewes that were the Servants of the Law, and the Gentiles that have been the Servants of the Divel, shall then be sett at Liberty, by our Great Redeemer. Nor shall there be Exactors of our Debts to the Law, then to demand upon us.⁴

Moreover, as Cocceius observes, The Lord would afford His People a Sabbatic Year of

Liesure, that so they might have a precious Opportunity, to Read, and Search, and Study the Lawes of God; & have nothing else to mind but the Devotions of Religion.⁵

3 Isa. 7:15. After Mather abandoned his belief in the restoration of National Israel at or before the Second Coming, he revised this annotation and interlined “thy People” above the cancelled phrase “ye Israelitish Nation.” On his eschatological revisionism, see his Threefold Paradise (295–318).

4 The German Lutheran theologian Johann Heinrich Reizius, aka. Reitz (1655–1720) furnishes Mather with the “mystical Intentions” of the Sabbatical Year, in Reitz’s Latin translation and annotations of Thomas Goodwin’s Moses et Aaron seu Civiles & Ecclesiastici Ritus ... Nunc autem cum versione Latina accesserunt perpetuae notae (1679), lib. 3, cap. 9, pp. 303–04, note (2). Reizius’s Latin translation went through several reprints in the 17th and 18th centuries.

5 Mather refers to the famous Dutch Reformed theologian Johannes Cocceius (1603–69), successively professor of theology at Bremen, of Hebrew and theology at Franeker, and subsequently of theology at Leiden University. Among his major works are Lexicon et Commentaries Sermonis Hebraici et Chaldaici (1669) and his great work on Federal Theology, Summa Doctrinae de Foedere et Testamento Dei (1648). Mather’s paraphrase of Cocceius is based on Reizius’s above-mentioned annotation on Goodwin’s Moses et Aaron, p. 304 (note 2), which in turn relies on Cocceius’s gloss on Lev. 25, in Opera Omnia Theologica (1675), tom. 1, pp. 52–53.

Q. Was there not some Spiritual Mystery, in the Year of Jubilee? v. 10.

A. The Jewes themselves are not so stupid, as to be wholly insensible of it. Abarbanel discovers a little Sense of it, on this very Verse. For those Words, Yee shall return every Man to his Possession, he saies, belong to the Body. But those Words, And every Man to his Family, he saies, belong to the Soul, and its return to God.⁶

If Dr. Lightfoot hath made a right Computation, the last Year of our Saviours Life, who by His Death wrought an Eternal Redemption for us, & restored us to the Heavenly Inheritance fell in the Year of Jubilee; and the very last that ever was kept. If we count from the End of the Wars of Canaan, which held Seven Years, after they came into it; there were just Fourteen Hundred Years, to the Thirty Third of our Lord Jesus Christ; That is, just XXVIII. Jubilees. And it is the Confession of the old Book, Zohar; That the Divine Glory should be Freedome and Redemption in a Year of Jubilee.⁷

Q. A Jubilee shall that Fiftieth Year be unto you. It is a quæstion, whether the Year of Jubilee, was the Year following the Forty-ninth Year, or, whether the Forty-ninth year was the Jubilee; which, reckoning the foregoing Jubilee for one, was the Fiftieth Year? v. 11.⁸

A. Joseph Scaliger, in his Fifth Book, De Emend. Temp. and several other great Men, are of the last Opinion; to avoid a great Inconvenience, which would otherwise ensue; Namely, That the Forty-ninth Year, being the Sabbatical Year, in which the Land was to rest, if the next Year to that, had been the Jubilee, two Sabbatical Years would have come immediately one after another; for the Land was to rest also in the Year of Jubilee. One would have expected therefore, that in the Forty-Eighth Year there should have been a Special Promise, that the Land should bring forth Fruit for Four Years, and not for Three only; as the Blessing is promised every Sixth Year. Thus Jacobus Capellus reasons.⁹

⁶ See R. Abarbanel on Lev. 25:10, 13, in Selected Commentaries Vayikra/Leviticus (3:245–46, 260–61). See also Miqra'ot Gedolot: Leviticus (206).

⁸ This question was hotly debated among Reformation and Post-Reformation divines, as can be seen in Matthew Poole's Synopsis Criticorum (1:607–08) and Works (6:458–63).

⁹ Patrick, on Lev. 25:11 (Leviticus 509–10); See also Maimonides, Hilchot Shemitah V'Yovel (10.7), in Mishneh Torah (28:810). Mather (via Patrick) enlists Joseph Justus Scaliger's authority to address the issue to his satisfaction. In his De Emendatione Temporum (Joseph Scaliger, De Emendatione Temporum (1629), lib. 5, cap. “De Primo Anno Sabbatico,” pp. 374–76, the

As for the Letter of the Law, Yee shall hallow the Fiftieth Year, P. Cunæus thinks, It is of no great Moment either Way; for it is usual in common Speech, Septimanam Octiduum appellare. And so Hospinian saies; Because we reckon in, Utramque Dominicam. And the greatest Writers anciently called an Olympiad, which contained the Space of but Four compleat Years, by the Name of Quinquennium.¹⁰

On the other side, we have the general Consent of the Jewes; who accurately distinguish between the Schemitta, or the Year of Remission, and, Jobel, or the Year of Jubilee. The Jewes are full of the Opinion, that the Year of Jubilee differed from the Sabbatical Year.¹¹

It is Remarkable, what the Jewes observe; That the mention of the Deliverance from the Bondage in Egypt, is mentioned in the Book of the Law, just Fifty Times over.

The Israelites began their First Account of the Jubilees, from the Fourteenth Year after their Entrance into Canaan; For they were seven Years in Conquering great Dutch classical scholar Joseph Justus Scaliger presents his chronology of the first Sabbatical Year; it differs from that of his colleague Jacobus Cap(p)ellus, in Historia Sacra et Exotica ab Adamo usque ad Augustum (1613), cap. XVI–V, Jubileorum, pp. 91–94, who dates this Sabbatical Year at Anno Mundi 2549 (Anno Domini 1451); or rather 1396 BCE, if James Ussher's popular Annals of the World (1658), p. 28, be preferred. Chronologers, whether R Catholic or Protestant, frequently arrived at vastly different calculations depending on whether they relied on the chronology of the LXX, Masora, Samaritan Version, Vulgate, or on Ptolemy's astronomical calendar. See also A. Grafton's "Scaliger's Chronology" (104–44) and "Isaac La Peyrère" (204–13). On the textual and chronological differences between the Masora, the LXX, the Samaritan Pentateuch, and the Dead Sea Scrolls, see B. Tsedaka's The Israelite Samaritan Version of the Torah (2013), pp. xxi–xxvi, and Appendix A and B, pp. 491–503.

¹⁰ Patrick (Leviticus 510); Petrus Cunæus, De Republica Hebraeorum (1617), lib. 1, cap. 6, p. 42, argues that it is quite common "to call the seventh 'eighth'" (as in 'eight days of a week') and thus the forty-ninth year to be called the fiftieth; hence the ancient practice of calling the Olympic year, which occurred every four years, "quinquennium," or "a fifth-year festival" (Hebrew Republic 26). And in his De Origine, Progressu, Ceremoniis et Ritibus Festorum Dierum Iudaeorum (1592), lib. 1, cap. 9: "De anno Iubilaco," pp. 25–26, the Swiss Reformed theologian, pastor, and teacher Rudolph Hospinian, aka. Rudolf Wirth (1547–1626), says, "we call a week octiduum (eight days) because we reckon utramque Dominicam both the LORD's days," in Patrick (510).

¹¹ Patrick (Leviticus 510). See also Petrus Cunæus, Hebrew Republic (25–26). The sages of the Talmud, tractate Rosh HaShana (8b, 9a) are indeed divided on this issue of when the Jubilee year begins and ends. R. Baraitha insisted [Lev. 25:2], "It is the Jubilee. What is the point of these words? – Since it says, And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year [Lev. 25:8–13], I might think that, just as it is sanctified from its inception onwards, so it remains sanctified [for a time] after its termination. And there would be nothing to wonder at in this, seeing that we [regularly] add from the profane on to the holy. Therefore it says, it is a Jubilee to you, the fiftieth year, [to show that] you are to sanctify the fiftieth year, but not the fifty-first year. [9a] And the Rabbis [– what do they make of these words]? – [They say]: You are to count the fiftieth year, but you are not to count the fifty-first, to exclude the view of R. Judah, who said that the fiftieth year is reckoned both ways [i.e., the fiftieth year is counted as the end of the last and as the beginning of the new jubilee cycle]." See also tractate Nedarim (61a) and Arachin (12b, 33a).

the Land, and Seven Years in Dividing it. The First Sabbatical Year, was in the one & twentieth; and the First Jubilee in the Sixty fourth Year after they came into the Land of Promise. They numbred Seventeen Jubilees, from thence to their Captivity in Babylon, which fell out in the End of a Sabbatical Year, and the Thirty-Sixth of the Jubilee.¹²

Q. In the Year of Jubilee, every Man Return'd unto his Possession. What Remark on it? what Reason for it? v. 13.¹³

A. So famous a thing this was, that the Heathen themselves took notice of it. Thus Diodorus Siculus tells us, (L. ii.) It was not lawful for the Jewes, τοὺς ἰδίους κλήρους πωλεῖν. To sell their own Inheritances. Meaning, as Mr. Selden expounds it, To sell them quite, so as to alienate them from their Families.¹⁴

The most obvious Account that can be given of this Law, is, That hereby God fixed the Jewes to the Land of Canaan, since all their Possessions were so entailed, that the right Heir of any of them could never be wholly excluded from his Estate, but it would entirely return to him, after a certain Number of Years. By this Means also they preserved a distinct Knowledge of their several Tribes and Families, to which they belonged: for which End, their Genealogies were of Necessity to be carefully kept, that they might be able to prove their Right unto the Inheritance of their Ancestors. And thus, as Menochius notes, it would be certainly known, of what Tribe and Family the Messiah was, when He came into the World. M. Alix also take notice, that God so ordered things, that they should have the Means of preserving their Genealogies, by not suffering them to continue in Captivity out of their own Land, for the Space of Two whole Jubilees. They were but LXX Years in Babylon, in which time their Genealogies could not easily be confounded.¹⁵

Q. The Land shall not be sold forever. What Criticism had the Jewes upon it? v. 23.

A. That Clause in this Lex Agraria, which we render, Forever, may be rendred; For cutting off, or as the LXX. εἰς βεβαίωσιν. By an Alienation that might not be rescinded.¹⁶

Yett, say they, this is to be understood only of Absolute Alienations, without any mention of Time. For, if a Man sold without Fraud an Estate unto a Neighbour for Sixty Years, it returned not unto him or his Heirs, at the Jubilee, which arrived before the Expiration of the Sixty Years. In the Jubilee, only that returned, which was sold forever.¹⁷

Q. Upon that Clause, One of his Brethren shall Redeem him. What notable Stroke have the Jewes given us? v. 48.

A. Saies R. Bechai, This Redeemer is the MESSIAH the Son of David, of the Tribe of Judah. It is plain, the Jewes have thought some Divine Sense to lye under the Law of the Jubilee.

The same R. Bechai, speaking about the Section of the Law, now before us, ha's these Words; *It contains a Sign & an Hope to Israel, of Redemption from the Captivity of the Four Monarchies.*¹⁸

¹⁶ Lev. 25:23 (LXX).

¹⁸ Patrick (Leviticus 532); R. Bechai, aka. Bachya ben Asher, Midrash Rabbeinu Bachya: Leviticus (5:1839). However, Rabbeinu Bachya does not speak of the "Four Monarchies" (Dan. 2:36–45), but "the four exiles and the redemptions to follow" (5:1838).

Q. It may be a considerable Service unto the Christian Religion, to take some Notice of one thing in the Style of the Chaldee Paraphrasts. You know, That we Christians do call our Messiah, The Word of God, and the ancient Jewes were they who taught us to call Him so. Now if we find the Chaldee Paraphrasts attributing to the Word of God, the same things that we attribute unto our Messiah, and that the Old Testament attributes unto God Himself, it will afford no little Satisfaction unto us, & a very great Confutation unto our Messiahs Adversaries? v. 1.¹

A. Tis very True. The Chaldee Paraphrasts are of great Esteem among the Jewes. Onkelos is greatly & justly commended by Maimonides. He is very ancient, & his Biblical Style speaks him to be so.² Now, Gen. 9.12. *The Covenant which I make between me and you.*³

Onkelos renders it, Between my Word and you. So Gen. 17.2, & 7.⁴

Gen. 15.1. God saies, I am thy Shield.

Onkelos renders it, *My Word is thy Strength.*⁵

v. 6. He beleaved in the Lord.

Onkelos renders it, *He beleaved in the Word of the Lord.*⁶

¹ The following paragraphs are extracted from Richard Kidder's Demonstration of the Messias (1700), part 3, ch. 5, pp. 235–43.

² In Hilchot Tefilah (12.10), Mishneh Torah (1:142–44), Maimonides explains that when the returning Israelites from Babylon had lost their ability to understand their ancient Hebrew language, the following procedure was adopted: “From the time of Ezra, it was customary that a translator would translate to the people the [passages] read by the reader from the Torah, so that they would understand the subject matter. The reader should read one [Hebrew] verse alone and remain silent while the translator translates it [into Aramaic]. Afterwards, he should read a second verse. The reader is not permitted to read to the translator more than one verse [at a time]” (Mishneh Torah 1.2:142–44). In his Guide for the Perplexed, Maimonides cites Onkelos at least twenty-two times. To the rabbis cited in the Babylonian Talmud, the Targum Onkelos was authoritative. On Maimonides's views on the Chaldee Paraphrast Onkelos, see S. M. Wagner's “Translation,” and Israel Drazin, Maimonides (ch. 14).

³ Kidder's subsequent illustrations from Targum Onkelos, Targum Jonathan ben Uzziel, and Targum Hierosolymitanum originate in ספר יצירה id est Liber Iezirah Qui Abrahamo Patriarchae adscribitur (1613), by Johannes Stephanus Rittangelius, aka. Johann Stephan Rittangel (1606–052), a German Lutheran Orientalist and professor at Regiomontium in the East-Prussian capital Königsberg. Defending the Trinity against Socinian and Arian attacks, Rittangel uses parallel texts from the Chaldean Targums to substantiate that the Aramaic translations (Onkelos, Jonathan, and Jerusalem) of a large number of Hebrew verses denote a Trinitarian interpretation.

Lev. 26.9. God saies, I will have Respect unto you.

Onkelos renders it, *I will look upon you in my Word.*⁷

The other Paraphrasts are agreeable to Onkelos.⁸

Gen. 19.24. The Lord rained. Both Jonathan and the Jerusalem Targum render it, *The Word of the Lord sent Rain.*⁹

Thus in the Chapter now before us; Lev. 26.12. I will be your God.

Jonathan paraphrases it, And my Word shall be unto you God the Redeemer.

Thus, v. 11. I will sett my Tabernacle among you, and my Soul shall not abhor you.

My Soul, is by Onkelos turned, My Word.¹⁰ This is very observable. And it must needs be understood of the Essential, and θειος λογος, or, Divine Word. And then, these Words, I will sett my Tabernacle among you, are wonderfully agreeable to those, Joh. 1.14. The Word was made Flesh, & He Tabernacled among us; and we beheld His Glory. אֶשְׁכְּנֶנּוּ, the Word used here, ha's a great affinity with /שכן/ Behold, the Shechinah pointed out!¹¹

Again; Isa. 48.15. I, even I, have spoken.

The Chaldee Paraphrast hath it, *I, by my Word, have made a Covenant with Abraham your Father.*¹²

Thus, v. 13. Mine Hand hath laid the Foundation of the Earth.

The Chaldee hath it, I have founded the Earth by my Word.

And v. 16. Come yee near unto me,

The Chaldee hath it, *Come near unto my Word.*¹³

Onkelos does in many Places turn the Word /יהוה/ by, /מימרא די/ *The Word of the Lord.*¹⁴

Thus he renders it,

Gen. 28.21. The Word of the Lord shall be my God.

Gen. 31.49. The Word of the Lord watch between me & thee.

Exod. 16.8. Your Murmurings are not against us, but against the Word of the Lord.

Gen. 3.9. The Word of the Lord called.

Gen. 30.22. The Word of the Lord remembred.

But here are Places enough quoted for our present Purpose.¹⁷

It is most certain, That these Paraphrasts could not mean a meer Speech of God, in this Expression. The Antitrinitarians have no Shadow of Proof to Justify what they say, That /מימרא/ the Word used by the Targumists, does answer to the Hebrew /דבר/ which means a Speech; a Command, a Decree. Yea, Rittangelius in his Jetzira, ha's proved, That what they say is absolutely False.¹⁸ We are sure, The Chaldees have another Word, by which /דבר/ is rendred; and this is the Word /פתגם/ or /פתגמא/ as is demonstrated by Elias Levita, who very well understood the Matter.¹⁹

There is a Remarkable Place; Deut. 5.5. I stood between the Lord and you, at that time, to shew you the Word of the Lord. The Chaldee thus reads it; *I stood between the Word of the Lord and you, at that time, to shew you the Word of the Lord.*²⁰ In this Version, Word, occurs twice, but in different Senses. In the former Part of the Verse, it is putt for, The Lord, and means the Essential Word; and accordingly it is expressed by /מימרא/ In the latter Part of the Verse, it signifies Commandment, or the Reveled Will of God, which /דבר/ signifies; and this is in the Paraphrase express'd by /פתגמא/ as answering unto it.²¹

Rittangelius urged this Argument so closely upon his Anti-Trinitarian (who had Skill in this Kind of Learning,) That after all his Evasions, he was forced

Q. Upon those Passages; If yee walk contrary unto me, then I will walk contrary unto you, in fury? v. 24.²⁵

A. The Word קרי/ does not signify, Contrariety, but Contingency. Nor does עמי/ signify, To me, but, With me. Accordingly, our marginal Reading is, At all Adventures with me.²⁶

The learned Jews explain it, In the Way of Chance.²⁷

People are guilty of this Evil, in many Instances.

They are so, when they do not by Choice take the Way of Piety. If they do any thing in Piety, tis meerly by Chance. They are by some Accident led into it. They cannot say; I have chosen the Way of Truth.²⁸

And what other are they, whose whole Reason for the Religion they embrace, is, because it was their Chance to be born & bred in it? They can give no Rational Account, why they choose the Religion they make Profession of.

But then, there is another thing wherein this Guilt is contracted; and it may call to have more Notice taken of it. They walk in the Way of Chance, who

Furthermore, on Lev. 26:25, he recommends "Case's Quarrel of ye Covenant –"; i.e., The Quarrell of the Covenant, with the Pacification of the Quarrell (1643), by Thomas Case (1598–1682), preacher in Milk Street (London), at his death in 1682, "the last surviving dissenting member of the Westminster assembly," in Michael Mullett, "Case, Thomas (bap. 1598, d. 1682)," (ODNB).

don't look above Chance; in the Events which in their Walk they meet withal; They who don't consider and Acknowledge the Providence of God in all Events; they who don't see a Wise, Just, Holy Providence dispensing every Article of their Prosperity or Adversity; they who do not refer themselves to the Direction of the Divine Providence in all their Ways.

It is the rare thing for People to ascribe the Good or Evil that befalls them, to Fortune, a Blind Fortune, rather than to the Glorious GOD.

Indeed some tell us, τύχη, Fortune, was never esteemed a Deity, till Homer made it one. Hesiod mentions no such Deity in all his Θεογονία.²⁹

Chance, tis true, had long before, some Notice taken of it. [1. Sam. VI.9.] But not as a Deity. Homer having so dignified it, Lett the following Poets alone to add unto the Invention, & give unto Fortune, a Sovereignty over all Humane Affairs. Yea, the Orators came into the Fiction. Demosthenes comes to this, το ολον η τυχη εστι προς απαντα τα των ανθρωπων πραγματα· Fortune is all in all, as to all the affaires of Men. Yea, Tully saith as much; Magnam Vim esse in Fortunâ.³⁰

But what the Apostle saies of every Idol, is very particularly true of this; It is nothing in the World.³¹

And yett the People of God fell into this Crime of Walking in the Way of Chance. We read, Isa. LXV.11. They prepared a Table for Gad; that is, | for Fortune. [62v] So the Vulgar Latin well renders it. And as the French Bible, and Vatablus and Castalio, have it in the Margin, that Spanish Bible & our old English Coverdale, have it in the Text. Sic Te, Nos facimus Fortuna, Deum.³²

³⁰ The Greek orator and statesman Demosthenes Atheniensis (384–322 BCE) characterizes her capriciousness in his In Epistulam Philippi (15.4) as follows: τὸ ὅλον ἡ τύχη ἐστὶ πρὸς ἅπαντα τὰ τῶν ἀνθρώπων πράγματα·. Although supplied in Gell's An Essay (336*b–d*) along with the English translation, Mather omits the Greek diacritics. Tully Cicero knowingly relates in his De Officiis (2.6.19), “Magnam vim esse in fortuna in utramque partem, vel secundas ad res vel adversas, quis ignorat?” or, “Who fails to comprehend the enormous, two-fold power of Fortune for weal and for woe?”

Now a People thus criminal, will find the Lord walk with them also in the Way of Chance. That is to say, He will not proceed with them on the Terms of His Gracious Covenant. And He will take no more Notice of their Prayers, than if there were nothing but a Chance to govern their Affaires.³³ worth citing here. It illustrates the wrangling of the translators to come up with a satisfactory solution: “But yee are they that forsake the LORD, that forget my holy mountaine, that prepare a table for that troope, and that furnish the drinke offering unto that number.” (“Gad” appears in the margin as an alternative for “troope,” and “Meni” [i. e., Mercury] for “number”). Given the KJV’s euphemistic circumlocution of “troope” for “Gad” and “number” for “Meni,” Mather turns to several other contemporary translations to find a more accurate (if not satisfactory) rendition. Jerome’s Vulgate renders the Hebrew “Gad” as “fortuna” and “Meni” as “eam” (i. e., “them”) in the text – without explications in the margin. The French Orientalist Francisus Vatablus (d. 1547) follows Jerome’s precedent and offers “fortuna” and “eam” in his Latin Biblia Sacra cum Duplici Translatione (1584), vol. 2, p. 91v; neither his marginalia nor scholia address the issue. The French Reformed theologian Sebastian Castalio, aka. Castellio, Chataillon (1515–63), published his Latin and French translation of the Bible in 1551 and 1554, respectively. An outspoken critic of religious persecution and defender of separation of church and state, he ran into conflict with John Calvin in Geneva and died in poverty in Basel in 1563. Castellio’s Latin translation of Isa. 65:11, in his Biblia Sacra Latina Ex Sebastiani Castalionis (1551, 1573), p. 991, offers “Gad” and “Meni” in the text, but “fortuna” and “Mercurius” in the margins. Castellio’s French translation, La Bible: Nouvellement Translatée (1555), p. MDXLV, follows suit with “Gad” and “Meni” in the text and “fortune” and “Mercure” in the margins. It is unclear which Spanish translation of the Bible Mather refers to. The popular “Biblia del Oso” (“Bible of the Bear”), so named after the frontispiece of a bear eating honey from a hive, was translated into Spanish by Casiodoro de Reina, aka Reyna (1520–94), a Spanish theologian and convert to Lutheranism who died in exile in Frankfurt (Germany). In his La Biblia que es, los sacros libros del Vieio y Nuevo Testamento (1569), the same passage reads, “Mas vosotros que dexays à Iehova, q̄ oluidays el Monte de mi sanctidad, q̄ poneys mesa à la Fortuna y cumplis el numero de la derramadura.” (“Gad” is listed in the margin as an alternative for “la Fortuna,” and “Meni” for “numero”). Finally, the first printed English Bible translated by Miles Coverdale (c. 1488–1569), an English friar, chaplain to Edward VI, bishop of Exeter, and finally rector of St. Magnus, London, provides the following rendition in his The Byble, that is the holy Scripture of the Olde and New Testament (1535): “But as for you, ye are they, yt haue forsaken the LORDE, and forgotten my holy hill. Ye haue set vp an aulter vnto fortune, & geue rich drink offerings vnto treasure.” Coverdale’s 1535 renders the Hebrew “Gad” as “fortune” and “Meni” as “treasure” in the text – without any marginal annotation on this issue. Mather’s commentary then illustrates his quest for a more accurate translation of the King James Bible – and the vanity of human wishes: How appropriate then his Latin quotation from Juvenal’s Satyra (10.365–66): “So you, Fortuna, we make a goddess of thee.” See also Mather’s annotation on Isa. 65:11 (BA 5:848–49).

Dr. Gell enlarges on such Thoughts as these.³⁴

Q. What may bee the Meaning of that Passage, I will cutt down your Images? v. 30.

A. What if you should read it, I will cutt off your Fire-Places? The original Word used here, will Invite you to that Opinion. The Idolaters, had Places wherein they kept Sacred Fires; called, πυραθεία, by Strabo, and, πυρεία, by others.³⁵ The Name and Thing, some derive from Ammon, who is the same with חם/ Cham, which is the Root of the Word used in the Text before us. R. Bechai tells us, That those Fires were not at first, altogether of such an Idolatrous Character and Intention; but were intended as Expressions of Thanksgiving to God for the Benefits of the Sun.³⁶ You have in Procopius, a Description of a πυρεῖον (Lib. 1. Persicor.) Chasroes "went from the Assyrians, to the Land of the Ardabiganians, which lies to the Northward. Here is a great πυρεῖον, or Fire-House, which the Persians worship above all other Gods; where the Magicians, keeping a perpetual Fire, perform their Chief Rites, with greatest Exactness, and on the greatest Occasions make Use of it as an Oracle."³⁷ You have another Description of such a πυρεῖον, in Benjamin, when he comes to Chenaraga; and he saies, That the Fire there, is called, אלוהותא/ A Divinity.³⁸ Others do speak of them. Teixera saies, That even to his Time, they were 35 Strabo (Geographica 15.3.15, line 5) calls them πυραθεία or "temples of fire-worshippers" among the Parthians. The fire is kept in πυρεία or "fire-pans" and "pans for coals," as mentioned in Flavius Josephus, Antiquitates (5.238, line 1), Numb. 4:14 (LXX), in Joannes Chrysostom (Adversus Judaeos [PG. 048. 0913, lines 3 and 6), and elsewhere.

36 R. Bachya ben Asher (Lev. 26:31) in insists, "the fact that the Torah still refers to these buildings [of the fire-worshippers] as 'sanctuaries,' is to teach us that even when they have been destroyed their sites retain their original sanctity" (Rabbeinu Bachya 5:1857).

37 In his eminent History of the Wars of Emperor Justinian I, the Byzantine historian Procopius Caesariensis (c. 500–c. 565 CE) describes his first-hand experience with General Flavius Belisarius (d. 565 CE) in the battles of Justinian I (c. 462–565 CE) against the Persians, Goths, and Vandals. Mather's second-hand reference is to Procopius's De bellis Persicorum (2.24.1–2, lines 1–4), which here relates how Sassanid Emperor Chosroes I, aka. Khosrau, Kasra (501–79 CE), in his invasion of the Roman domains (543 CE), came through the territories of the Adarbiganians (N.B. Mather's alternate spelling is borrowed from Grotius's citation) to "the great sanctuary of fire" revered by the Persians. In this temple, Procopius explains, "the fire is guarded unquenched by the Magi, and they perform carefully a great number of sacred rites, and in particular they consult the oracle in those matters which are of the greatest importance. This is the fire which the Romans worshipped under the name of Hestia [Vesta] in ancient times" (History of the Wars 2.24.1:473).

38 In his מסעות של רבי בנימין [Massa'ot shel Rabbi Binyamin] Itinerarium D. Beniaminis (1633), pp. 108–09, the medieval Sephardic traveler R. Benjamin of Tudela (fl. 1150–1200) describes the practice of fire-worship among the people of Khulam, aka. Cholan (Quilon), an ancient Indian city S of Bombay, on the coast of Malabar. Descendants of Cush, Benjamin believes, "they worship the sun, and they have high places everywhere outside the city about half a mile. And every morning they run forth to greet the sun, for on every high place a solar disc is made of cunning workmanship, and as the sun rises the disc rotates with thundering noise, and all, both men and women, offer incense to the sun in censers in their hands. ... In front of the high place of their temple there is a deep trench, where they keep a great fire alight all the year, and they call it Elahutha" (Itinerary 64–65). The Hebrew noun אלוהותא [Elahutha] (Itinerarium 108), which Mather miscopies from Grotius, as אלוהותא (Opera 1.1.71), signifies "divinity."

continued among the Persians. They were huge Furnaces kept with superstitious Rites, in Honour of the Sun.³⁹

Q. It is Threatned, The Land shall rest, because it did not rest in your Sabbaths, when yee dwelt upon it. v. 35.

A. It should have Rested, every Seventh Year.

It is a remarkable Passage, in Procopius Gazæaus, “In those Four-hundred & ninety Years, when they were under the Government of Kings, there were Seventy Years to be kept as Sabbaths; which, that the Land might enjoy its Sabbaths, were spent in the Captivity of Babylon.”⁴⁰

Indeed we don’t expressly read of this profane and horrid Neglect, while they dwelt in their Land. But the Prophet Jeremiah complains, That they did not in his Time give their Servants Liberty at the Seventh Year. [Jer. 34.17.] And he gives this as one Reason, why God gave them up to Slavery. So we may understand those Words, Lam. 1.3. Judah is gone into Captivity, because of Affliction, & because of great Servitude. From hence we may conclude, the same Distrustful and Covetous Humour, would not suffer the Land to rest that Year. [Consider 2. Chron. 34.21.]

Some think, both the Kingdome of Samaria, & the Kingdome of Judah, were destroy’d in the Sabbatical Year.⁴¹

Q. It is threatened unto the sinful Jewes, I will send a Faintness into your Hearts, in the Land of your Enemies; and the Sound of a shaken Leaf shall chase them. What Remarkable Accomplishment ha’s been given unto it? v. 36.

A. The Timorousness and Cowardise of the Jewes, renders them very despicable. They are noted at this Day, to be very mean-spirited & faint-hearted. It was hardly ever heard, that a Jew listed himself a Souldier, or engaged in the Defence of the Countrey where he lived.⁴²

⁴¹ Patrick (Leviticus 555–56) supplies Mather with the material in the three preceding paragraphs.

⁴² Patrick (Leviticus 556–57).

Q. Why are, Seven Times assigned so often, for the Punishment of the Rebellious Israelites? v. 39.

A. We had a sad Period assign'd by Two Prophets, Ezekiel and Daniel. First, you have a Period of 390 Years, and then 40 Years more, in the Visions of Ezekiel.⁴³ The Commencement of these 430 Years, is from the Time, when the Ten Tribes made their Schism, & fell into an Idolatry, that soon hurried them into their long Captivity.

Just on the Expiration of this Term, there followes in the Visions of Daniel another Period of 2300 Years; which brings us to the Last End of the Indignation.⁴⁴ When they have thus long born their Iniquity, God will then Remember His Covenant.

These two Summs together, make up, 2730. Years.⁴⁵

Now, tis Remarkable, If you multiply 390 by 7, it makes that very sum of, 2730.⁴⁶

Q. The Lord will bee favourable to the Jewish Nation, when their Uncircumcised Hearts bee Humbled, & they then Accept the Punishment of their Iniquity. What may bee meant by their Accepting the Punishment of their Iniquity? v. 41.

A. Why mayn't it mean, their Accepting of the Messiah, whom the God of Heaven has provided for them, and whom they have hitherto rejected?

Wee know, that of the Messiah tis said, in 2. Cor. 5.21. God made Him to bee Sin for us. Yea, that wee may keep close to the Word in the Text before us, tis said in Isa. 53.6. The Lord laid on Him the Iniquity of us all. The Sacrifice, upon whom the Punishment of our Iniquity does fall, is that of the Messiah; and the Name therefore is very agreeable to Him. When the Jewes come to leave off their Thoughts & Hopes of any other Sacrifice, or their Dreams of making Satisfaction by bearing the Punishment of their own Iniquity, but Accept the Messiah, as

⁴⁵ The holograph ms. reads “3730. Years” (here silently correct), a clear mistake given his next paragraph.

⁴⁶ Mather's annotation on Lev. 26:39 appears to be misplaced, for it would be more appropriately listed under Lev. 26:18, where God threatens to punish the Israelites for disobedience: “I will punish you seven times more for your sins.” The same sevenfold punishment is threatened repeatedly in Lev. 25:8, 26:18, 26:21, 24, 28, as well as numerous times in other OT books. Be that as it may, Mather's commentary reveals his life-long preoccupation with prophetic calculations. His book-length manuscript “Triparadisus,” esp. part 3, chs. 11–12, in Threefold Paradise (1995), pp. 295–347, and the table of “Cotton Mather's Chronometry of the Prophecies” (Threefold Paradise, p. 73), best illustrate his evolving eschatological conjectures as they stood in the last decade of his life.

 [62r–62v inserted into 61r]

3658.

Q. How come the Lawes about Vowes to be inserted in this Place, rather than any other? v. 1.

A. It might be supposed, That some Religious People, touched with a Sense of the Promises and Threatenings in the foregoing Chapter, would think of giving themselves wholly unto God, or vowing some of their Goods unto Him. Directions about such Things are therefore very properly inserted here.¹

Q. What is here meant by a Singular Vow? v. 2.

A. An Extraordinary Vow; called by Philo, εὐχὴ μεγάλη, The Great Vow; Namely, when a Man vowed himself, or his Children, wholly to the Service of God in the Tabernacle. Such was the Devotion of some, that they were willing to help the Priests of God, in the meanest Ministry; such as, bringing in Wood, carrying out Ashes, sweeping away the Dust, and the like.

By the Provision here made, we see, that God would not Accept the Persons themselves, as they desired; but the Value of them for His Service; because there was a sufficient Number of Persons peculiarly designed for all the Work of the Tabernacle; which He would not have encumbered by more Attendants there, than were needful.²

Q. Why was a Woman valued at but Thirty Shekels, when a Man was valued at Fifty? v. 4.

A. Women could not be so serviceable as Men; & therefore were valued at a less rate. All that they could do, was to spin, or weave, or make Garments, or wash for the Priests and Levites.³

1 Patrick (Leviticus 563).

2 Patrick (Leviticus 563–64). Philo Judaeus's εὐχὴ μεγάλη (De specialibus legibus 1.248, line 1) suggests “a great vow,” “prayer,” or even “curse.” Rashi confirms that such a vow is as much as to “give the Lord the value of a person's life” (JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot 3:232). The topic also garnered diverse responses from the principal Reformation and post-Reformation commentators, as is apparent in Poole's Synopsis Criticorum (1:617–18) and Works (6:508–12).

3 Patrick (Leviticus 564). Abarbanel is much more forthcoming by insisting that “one would expect it [a woman's value] to be half, 25 shekels, but a female in this category may produce children, so her equivalent is boosted by five shekels” (JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot 3:233). If this mercenary valuation bespeaks the patriarchal misogyny pervasive among the ancients, then Cotton Mather's enlightened view of women is a shining example of how much he was ahead of his time. See especially his popular Ornaments for the Daughters of Zion (1691, 1694, 1741),

Q. Tis observable, (the Hebrewes at least think so,) That in their Youth, Males were valued near double to Females; but in old Age, they were almost of æqual Value? v. 7.

A. Old Women continue very serviceable in many things, when old Men are not. Whence they have a Saying, *An old Woman in an House, is a Treasure in an House.*⁴

Q. It is said, If a Man shall sanctify unto the Lord, some Part of a Field. Why only some Part? v. 16.

A. It seems to signify, That it was not lawful for a Man to Vow his whole Field; that is, All his Estate: Because God would have no Mans Family undone & made Beggars, to enrich His Sanctuary.⁵

3663.

Q. We read of, Men Devoted, which were not to be Redeemed. Some learned Men have, you know, from these Words asserted, That Parents and Masters among the Jewes, had such a Power over their Children and Servants, that they might even Devote them to Death, and Kill them according to their Vow; only the Sentence of the Priest was to concur, to whom every Devoted Thing fell, as his Portion? v. 29.⁶

A. This is maintained indeed by, Ludovicus Capellus; But it is confuted by Selden, who observes, That such a Power would have too much entrenched on the Sixth Commandment.⁷

pp. 1–9, 35–41, 46–49 (my page references are to the 1741, or third, edition), Anna Maria Schurman's The Learned Maid (1659) and, of course, François Fénelon's Traité d'Éducation des Filles (1687). The status of women in early America has been assessed by many scholars, including C. H. Dayton's Women before the Bar (1995), H. K. Gelinas's "Regaining Paradise" (463–94), I. Klaiber's "Women's Roles" (303–30), A. Porterfield's Female Piety (1992), W. J. Scheick's Authority and Female Authorship (1998), P. A. Treckel's To Comfort the Heart (1996), and L. T. Ulrich's Good Wives (1982) and her "Vertuous Women Found" (20–40).

4 Patrick (Leviticus 565) probably paraphrases Rashi and Bekhor Shor, who say much the same, in JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot (3:233).

5 Patrick (Leviticus 570–71) draws on Johannes Stephanus Menochius's De Republica Hebraeorum (1648), lib. 2, cap. 19, quest. 7, pp. 237–39.

6 Mather's primary source is Patrick (Leviticus 576–77, 578).

7 Ludovicus Cappellus (1585–1658), French Reformed theologian and professor of Hebrew at Saumur, refers to the tragic case of Jephthah's daughter (Judg. 11:29–40), which affirms the power of masters and parents over their children and slaves, in Capellus's extensive annotations on Judg. 11:41(!), in Commentarii et Notae Criticae in Vetus Testamentum (1689 ed.), fols. 422–25. Selden's repudiation of Ludovicus Cappellus appears in De Jure Naturali & Gentium (1640),

But then, there might be a Cherem of Men as well as of Beasts.⁸ For, besides a Sacred Gift, which was devoted unto Sacred Uses, there might be Men devoted unto Destruction and Perdition, by the Right of War, or upon the Account of Capital Enmities. We have an Exemple of it in Jericho. [Josh. 6.17.] Thus, the Great Sanhedrim, called in the Scripture, The whole Congregation, might make a Cherem of those, who going to the Wars, did not obey the Orders, & perform the Charges laid upon them. We have an Exemple of it. [Judg. 21.5. and 1. Sam. 14.24.]⁹

And this is the Cherem here mentioned by Moses.

The Slaves (which alwayes were Gentiles;) in the Possession of the Hebrewes were in their Power, as much as their Beasts, to give or to sell. But to take away their Life, or give them to be slain, was not in their Power; All the Effect of the Cherem upon them, was, that the whole Right, which they had unto the Service of such Slaves, was transferred by him, who devoted them, unto the Service of the Priests; & Sacred Uses. However, tho' they might not devote their Slaves to Death, they might their Enemies, before they went out to War with them; and such of their own People also as did not observe the military Lawes. [Consider, Num. 21.2. and Judg. 21.9, 10.]¹⁰

Q. How did the Tithe of the Cattel, pass under the Rod? v. 32.¹¹

A. Maimonides tells us, They were all brought into a Sheep-Cote, in which there was but one Gate, or Door, and that so narrow, as to suffer no more than one to come out at once. The Dams being placed without, and the Gate opened, the young ones were invited by their Bleatings, to press to gett out unto them; and as they passed by, one by one, a Man who stood at the Gate with a Rod, coloured with Oker, told them in Order, and when the Tenth came out, whether

lib. 4, cap. 6, pp. 500–01. On Selden's De Jure Naturali, see J. P. Rosenblatt's Renaissance England's Chief Rabbi (158–81).

8 A Cherem, or חֶרֶם is “a thing devoted, thing dedicated,” even “(appointed to) utter destruction” (Strong's # 2764).

9 Nachmanides (Commentary 3:480–81) appears to be the original source here.

10 The mitigation of this cherem here proposed by Mather (via Patrick 578) does not agree with Rashi's explication, which asserts that “If a person is going to be executed [(cherem, i. e., something or someone “consigned to be put to death” or “destruction”)] and [some] one [, on seeing him,] said: ‘His worth is on me’ [(“i. e., I obligate myself to donate his worth to the Temple treasury”)] – he has said nothing [(“i. e., his vow has no effect.”)] [B]ehold, he is going to die, [and] therefore he cannot be redeemed; he has no worth, and no [vowable] value” (Met-sudah Chumash/Rashi Vayikro 3:441–42). Nachmanides, though acknowledging Rashi's draconian interpretation, points to the vast disagreement among the sages on this narrow reading, citing several palliating circumstances (Commentary 3:479–83). See also Selden's De Jure Naturali & Gentium, lib. 2, caps. 7–10, pp. 502–30.

it were Male or Female, sound or scabbed, he mark't it with his Rod, and said, *Lett this be Holy in the Name of the Tenth.*¹²

This Account R. Solomon and others give of this Matter; of which notion they are so fond, that R. Bechai makes Jacob, who vowed the Tithe of all that God should give him, to have decimated his Children, on this Manner, beginning with Benjamin, & so Levi fell to be the Tenth; on which they are a little fanciful.¹³

But Bochart thinks, that Moses does not speak here, about the Rod of the Tithes, but of the Shepherds Crook; and so doth Aben-Ezra, and the Syriac, & the Vulgar. The Flock passed under the Rod, as oft as he numbred them; which was every Morning and Evening, if he were a Good Shepherd.¹⁴

Compare Jer. 33.13.

It is a Passage in Ezekiel, alluding hereunto; ch. 20.37. I will cause you to pass under the Rod. Kimchi notes, tis the same Phrase with this in Leviticus; and as much as to say, *As he that telleth his Sheep, holdeth a Rod in his Hand, & telleth them one by one, and brings out the Tenth for the Tythe, so will I number you, and the Sinners shall perish.*¹⁵

Q. That Law, The Tenth shall bee Holy unto the Lord, what Illustrations of it, can you fetch from the Pagan Antiquities? v. 32.¹⁶

A. Tis very certain, that the Ancient Pagans did use to Decimate, both of their Fruits, & of their Spoils, for Sacred Uses. Pliny tells us, That among the Arabians, they made no Merchandise of their Frankincense, until the Priests had still siezed the Tenths, for their God Sabin. And Xenophon tells us, That among the Græcians, there stood a Pillar near the Temple of Diana, on which was an Inscription, requiring, την μεν δεκατην καταθυειν εκαστου ετους. To Sacrifice the Tenths of every Years Production.¹⁷ Pausanias tells us of these Nations,

Τὴν δεκατην νικας εινεκα τω πολεμω;

¹⁶ The following paragraphs are mined from John Spencer's De Legibus Hebraeorum (1685), lib. 3, diss. 1, cap. 10, secs. 1–2, fols. 615–25.

¹⁷ Spencer (De Legibus 615). Pliny (Naturalis Historia 12.32.63) adds that “this tithe is drawn on to defray what is a public expenditure,” when their god “graciously entertains guests at a

The Tenth of their Prey, they dedicated unto Jupiter, as a Monument of their Victory.¹⁸ Diodorus Siculus, reports, of their Making a Golden Tripod, of a Tenth Part, of what they took in War from the Persians, & presenting it unto Apollo.¹⁹ Yea; Cedwalla, the King of our West-Saxons, consecrated a Tenth Part of his Prey, to an Unknown God. But a whole Army of Authors, besides Doughty, have related this Matter unto us.²⁰

In these Decimations, the Pagans, did not concern themselves, with any one God alone. Festus affirms, that several of their Gods were thus acknowledged; and Scaliger (like himself) proudly, and basely, abuses Festus, for thus affirming; and hee adds, Uni tantum Herculi hoc fiebat.²¹ Scaliger was mistaken; or else Herodotus, when hee asserts the Consecration of Tithes, to Pallas; and Lucian, when hee asserts them, to Mars; Tho' Tis True, among the Romans, they did most of all, Pollucere, i. e. offer Tithes to Hercules; and they were therefore called, Herculanea.²² banquet" several times per year. And Xenophon, the biographer of Alexander the Great, similarly reports the practice of tithing in his Anabasis (5.3.13, lines 4–5). On this ancient practice, see John Selden's Historie of Tithes (1618).

18 Pausanias adds in his Graeciae descriptio (5.10.4, line 11), τὰν δεκάταν νίκας εἵνεκα τῷ πολέμῳ, "the tithe offered for victory of war." More often than not, Mather omits the Greek (and Hebrew) diacritics – even if they are given in his sources.

19 Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca historica 11.33.2, lines 1–3) complements Pausanias's explanation, οἱ δ' Ἕλληνες ἐκ τῶν λαφύρων δεκάτην ἐξελόμενοι κατεσκευάσαν χρυσοῦν τρίποδα, καὶ ἀνέθηκαν εἰς Δελφοὺς χαριστήριον τῷ θεῷ, or "The Greeks, taking a tenth part of the spoils, made a gold tripod and set it up in Delphi as a thank-offering to the God."

20 Among Spencer's sources are John Selden's Analecton Anglo Britannicon Libri Duo (1615), lib. 2, cap. 3, p. 71, and John Doughty's Analecta Sacra (1658), Excursus 8 and 123, pp. 24–27 and 322–24. According to the Venerable Bede's Historiam Ecclesiasticam Gentis Anglorum (4.12, 15–16; 5.7), Cedwalla (c. 659–689) – variously spelled Ceadwalla and Cædwalla – was king of the Gewisse and through conquest united under his rulership the territories of the East-, West-, and South-Saxons. After his conversion to Christianity in 688, he travelled to Rome but died on the day of his baptism (April 10, 689), by Pope Sergius I (687–701). See B. Yorke, "Cædwalla (c. 659–689)."

21 Sextus Pompeius Festus, De Verborum Significatione Lib. XX (1699), lib. 4, p. 114, line 8. In his annotation on Festus, De Verborum (1699), p. 114, notae "Decima quaeque," Joseph Justus Scaliger's castigates Festus: "Vide quantum juris Barbarus ille sibi sumserit in hoc loco mutilando. Uni enim tantum Herculi hoc fiebat"; i. e., "See how much that barbarian took for himself in mutilating this place. For this was done only for Hercules alone." On Scaliger's view of Festus, see A. Grafton's "Scaliger's Festus," in Joseph Scaliger (1983), 1:134–60.

22 Spencer (De Legibus 616); according to Herodotus (5.77), the Athenians took many prisoners in their campaigns against the Chalcidians and Boeotians, and extracted from them a rich ransom of "two minas apiece." Consecrating "a tenth of the ransoms" to Pallas Athena, the victors "built a four-horse chariot of bronze" which in Herodotus's time still stood "on your left as you first enter[ed] the Propylaea on the Acropolis" in Athens. Lucian of Samosata (c. 125–post 180 CE), to whom Περὶ Ὀρχήσεως: De Saltatione has been attributed (KP), relates that the Roman Salii, "a priesthood drawn from the noblest families," perform a dance "of a particularly solemn and sacred character" in honor of Mars, god of war (Of Pantomime 21). For the reference to Lucian, the "pollucere" or "lesser offering" of Plautus, and the gifts to Hercules by the old Romans, Spencer (616) draws on Petri Fabri Liber Tres Semestrium (1616), lib. 2,

Yea, the Tithes of the Flock and of the Field, were sometimes paid as a Tribute also unto Magistrates. [Compare, 1. Sam. 8.13, 15, 16. and, 1. Macc. 11.35.] Aristotle mentions this as a Babylonian Law. And Strabo finds a Practise among the Indians, as well as Diodorus among the Arabians. Aristophanes finds it among the Athenians, and Cicero among the Romans. Hence, among the Greeks, δηκατευν, was the same with τελωνειν.²³ And among the Romans, Decumanus, was the Name for a Collector.²⁴

That this Custome, among the Pagans, was very Ancient, is evident from the Advice, which Cræsus, gives to Cyrus, in Herodotus, about the safest Way; for his Officers to gather the Tenths.²⁵ Very True, is that Saying of old Festus, Decima quæque veteres Dijs suis offerebant.²⁶ And it ha's been observed, That tho' there were some among the Pagans, that were αθυτοι, & made no Conscience of Sacrificing, wee can find none that were ἀδεκατευτοι, or made no Conscience of Decimating.²⁷

Among the Israelites, the Tithes of all were demanded, for the Great JEHOVAH, both as Hee was Their God, and as Hee was their King. Yea, and long before Moses, wee find Jacob, and Abraham himself, paying the Homage of Tithes unto the Lord.²⁸

It was no doubt, the Spirit of the Almighty, that first Instructed the Faithful, thus to acknowledge Him; and no Wonder, that the Evil Spirit, laid Claim unto the same Rights, when once hee came to bee, The God of this World, and, The Prince of this World.

There are some, who go to discover singular & curious Reasons, why the Number Ten, hath been in this Matter pitch'd upon.

cap. 3, p. 43, by the French jurist Petrus Fabri, aka. Pierre Du Faur de Saint-Jory (1530–1600), president of the parliament of Toulouse.

²⁴ A Roman Decumanus was a tax collector who bought the right to tithe citizens.

²⁶ Sextus Pompeius Festus’s bon mot appears in the previously cited De Verborum Significatione Lib. XX (1699), lib. 4, p. 114, line 8, and reads, “they offered the tenth to each of their old gods.”

²⁷ And yet, Mather seemingly shakes his head, there were some who were αθυτοι, who offered no sacrifices, but none that were ἀδεκατευτοι, who did not offer tithes.

²⁸ Of the spoils of war, Abram paid his tithes to Melchizedek, “King of Salem” and “Priest of the most high God” (Gen. 14:18, 20).

They say, with Grotius, Numerus Denarius Gentibus fermè cunctis, numerandi finis est.²⁹ And perhaps, the Way of Men to Number by their Fingers, might first Introduce the Rule, of making Ten the last Number. It is the Philosophers Problem, Δια τι παντες ανθρωποι κλ. Why all Men, in all Nations, do Number still until Ten, και ουκ εις αλλον αριθμον.³⁰ But Philo, speaking of the Ten Commandments, tells us, Decas verò ultrà omnes habenda, quæ omnes Numeros diversæ virtutis ac perfectionis intrà se habet. Hee also tells, τον δε περι δεκαδος λογον επιμελως μεν ηκριβωσαν μουσικων παιδες. Musicians have accurately considered the Reason of the Number, Ten, which hath been so consecrated in the Rites of Moses.³¹

Tis very sure, Ten, beginning the greater Numbers, & concluding the smaller, is a Number, not Improper, for the Great Lord, who is the First Cause, and the Last End, of all. A Decad, saies Philo, προς θεον οικειοτις εστιν. Aliquid cum Deo cognati habet. With a Seventh Day, they acknowledged God, as the Creator, and with a Tenth Part, they acknowledged Him, as the Possessor, of all Things. For their neglects of this God, His People were in Captivity Ten Sevens, or, Seven Tens of Years; and when they returned unto God, their Sabbaths and their Tithes, were the most Religious Instances, as the Book of Nehemiah informs us, of their doing so.³²

Wee may add, That the Number Ten, is Even, whereas an odd Number, ha's been usually more agreeable, to Superstition and Idolatry. The Numbers in Homer, usually countenance this Notion; and Plutarch tells us, Αει τω περισσω αριθμω χρηται, ως κρεισσονι. Hee uses the odd | Number, as the Better. The Number Ten, which is Even, was much used by the Lord, in His Holy Matters; as, The Tabernacle, must have Ten Curtains, Ten Pillars, the Temple must have Ten Lavers, Ten Tables, Ten Candlesticks; and there are Ten Times Ten other Instances.³³

These Things, may perhaps, give more Satisfaction, than the Conjecture of Peter Bungus; *Attende, quòd Creatura Decima, inter Intellectuales, Creaturas, est Homo; quia Angeli in Novem ordinibus consistunt; Decimus autem ordo est Hominum, et Hominis est Decimam soluere, ut Ruinam Angelorum valeat supplere, et Decimum ordinem adimplere. Ad quod, respiciens Legislator, et Animalium et Omnium Terræ Fructuum Decimas, Domino Consecrat.*³⁴

But after all, the most satisfactory Way, will bee to Resolve it, into the Direction of our Sovereign Lawgiver.

Q. Lett us a little more particularly enquire into the Tithes, that were paid among the Ancient Israelites?³⁵

A. Many Christians have thought, That Four several Sorts of Tithes are mentioned in the Scriptures.³⁶

First, The Annual Tithes; To maintain the Levites. [Lev. 27.30. Num. 18.21. Deut. 14.22. and, 16.12. 2. Chron. 31.5. Neh. 10.37. Heb. 7.8, 9.] This Tithe was paid by the Husbandman, leaving a Gleaning of a Sixtieth Part in the Fields, and paying also the Therumah Gedolah. This was called, Decima Prima.³⁷

Secondly, The Tithes of the Tithes, which the Levites paid unto the Priests at Jerusalem; tho' they received theirs in their several Cities. [Num. 18.26. Neh. 10.38.]

Thirdly. The further Annual Tithes which the Husbandman carried, either in Specie, or in Money, to Jerusalem; there to be spent with the Levites, before the Lord. This was called, Decima Secunda; and was paid at the Sanctuary; whereas the former was paid at home. [Deut. 14.22, 26. Lev. 27.30, 33.]³⁸

Fourthly. The Tithes of the Poor, or the Tithes of the Third Year; which the Husbandman did not carry to Jerusalem, but distributed, besides the Former Tithes, at home, to the Orphan, and the Stranger, and the Poor, as well as to the Levite. This was called, Decima Tertia. [Deut. 14.28, 29.]³⁹

But after all, the learned Burman ha's most learnedly demonstrated, That there was but One Tithe, which is in all the several Texts of Scripture still referr'd unto; Tho' we seem to find Three Sorts of Tithes, all these Three are but One. All the Difference is, That the Tithe which was given wholly to the Levites, in the First and Second, and the Fourth and Fifth Year, was in the Third; and the Sixth Year, given to the Orphan and the Stranger, and the Poor, as well as the Levites; For the Levites had enough without it, and might well enough spare it unto those other Objects.⁴⁰ As to what the Talmuds write about the Second Tithes; tis prov'd by Cocceius, That they were some of the Δυσβάστακτα φαρισαίων φορτία. And not required in the Scripture.⁴¹

The Demand of the Clergy to receive all the Tithes, from the Dues of the Levites, is much enfeebled by their Observation. Reizius notes well upon it, That a Liberal Maintenance for the Ministry, may from the Dues of the Levites be well argued for; but adds, *Ità tamen ne nimio stipendio distendantur, et tota Ecclesie Gazophylacia in ipsos effundantur, ut sit in pontificatu Romano, ubi episcopi nimio pastu Saginati torpent ac vitulantur; neque pauperes omni Alimento fraudentur.*⁴²

38 "Decima Secunda" or "Second tithe" (tenth). See also the Mishnah, tractate Pesahim 2.5 (The Mishnah 138) and tractate Maaser Sheni, chs. 1–4 (The Mishnah 73–80).

39 "Decima Tertia" or "Third tithe" (tenth), which is for the poor. See the Talmud, tractate Rosh HaShana (12b, 14b).

40 Mather's mediate source (via Reitzius's annotations on Godwyn's Moses et Aaron) is Synopsis Theologiae, & speciatim Oeconomiae Foederum Dei. Tomus Primus (1671), lib. 4, cap. 12, pp. 646–49, sec. XII–XII, by the Dutch theologian Franciscus Burmannus, aka. Frans Burman (1628–79), professor of theology and church history at Utrecht.

41 Via Reizius's annotations on Godwin's Moses & Aaron (1690), lib. 6 cap. 3, p. 470, annot. (3), Mather refers to Johannes Cocceius's commentary on Amos 4:4, in Opera Omnia Theologica (1689), tom 3, p. 497 § 10. Cocceius paraphrases Matth. 23:4 (Luke 11:46) that these second tithes were some of the "Pharisaical burdens grievous to be borne."

42 Mather quotes from Johann Heinrich Reitzius's Latin translation and annotation of Thomas Goodwin's Moses & Aaron, seu Civiles & Ecclesiastici Ritus (1679), lib. 6, cap. 3: "De Decimis," p. 478, annot. (2). Reitzius (via Goodwin) cautions, "do not let them [priests] be filled with an immoderate contribution, and the whole offering boxes of the Church be poured into them, as it is in the Roman high priesthood, where bishops are idle, fattened by excessive feeding, and rejoice with glee; neither let the poor be cheated of all their nourishment."

The same Reizius, takes notice, That our Saviour often taxed the Covetousness of the Priests and Levites (the Pharisees were often such,) which arose from the Wealth flowing in upon them; Yea, he brings diverse probable Arguments, that the Rich Man, [Luk. XVI.] was a Priest; and the Rich Fool, [Luk. XII.] was a Levite. The Habit as well as the Diet, of the Wretches intimate it. And the Debtors which the Unjust Steward in the adjacent Parable deals withal, seem to bee, The Poor, who ought to have received the Tithe of the Oyl and the Wheat.⁴³

Q. There ha's been an Opinion, very plausibly maintained, and with a vast Variety of Learning laboriously defended, by such learned Men as Marshall, and Kircher, and Spencer; That the Egyptians were they who had the first Rules and Rites of Religion among them; and that not only the Religious Rites of other Nations, but even of the Israelites themselves, were derived from the Egyptians.⁴⁴ And that in the Reformation whereto the Great God brought the Israelites, He wisely considered, how strongly they were tinctured with the Egyptian Superstitions; And He therefore Allowed the Continuance of many of them; only He Corrected them, He Improved them, He Applied them unto better Purposes.⁴⁵

⁴⁴ Mather lists the most prominent critics who each in their own way asserted that the Israelites, a small, obscure, and weak people, adopted much of their religion and temple rites from their pagan neighbors, especially from the Egyptians, the most advanced civilization at the time. The first item in Mather's list of authors is Chronicus Canon Ægyptiacus Ebraicus Graecus & disquisitiones (1672), a study of ancient chronologies, which aims to reconcile Egyptian, Hebrew, and Greek chronologies, by Sir John Marshall (1602–85), a learned English antiquarian and chronologer. Next are Cedipus Ægyptiacus. Hoc est Universalis Hieroglyphicae Veterum Doctrinae temporum iniuria abolitae instauration (1652–54) and Sphinx Mystagoga, sive Diatribe Hieroglyphica De Mumiis (1676), two massive, multi-volume tomes on the ancient Egyptian religious cults, deities, and their significations, by “the last man who knew everything,” Athanasius Kircher (1601–80), a German Jesuit polymath at the prestigious Jesuit Collegio Romano. Finally, Dissertatio De Urim & Thummim (1669) and De Legibus Hebraeorum Ritualibus Et Earum Rationibus (1685), by John Spencer (1630–93), a learned English Hebraist and master of Corpus Christi, Cambridge. It is Spencer's De Legibus (1685), which generated a huge outpouring of criticism (see esp. Christoph Matthäus Pfaff's “Dissertatio Praeiminaris”) and Herman Witsius's book-length attack, which Mather excerpts below. On John Marshall, see S. B. Black's “Sir John Marshall” (ODNB); on Athanasius Kircher, see D. Stolzenberg's Egyptian Oedipus (2013), J. Glassie's A Man of Misconceptions (2012), and P. Findlen, ed. Athanasius Kircher (2004); on John Spencer, see D. Stolzenberg's “John Spencer” (129–63), and D. Levin's Ancient Wisdom (2017) and his article “John Spencer's De Legibus” (49–92).

Tis a prodigious Ostentation of Literature, which our Hero's have made, in the Asserting of this Opinion. But yett we have often lett fall our Indisposition to entertain an Opinion so Contrary to the Holy Word of God, so Derogatory to His Infinite Holiness. Now, inasmuch as that excellent Man of God, the admirable Dr. Witsius, ha's in his Egyptiaca, cultivated this noble Subject, and sett the dark Matter in a true Light, it will be worth our while, to extract from that Work, such Things as may have a Tendency to Illustrate the Heavenly Oracles? v. 34.

A. It shall be done. And we will produce the Witsian Assertions, in the Order, wherein the Incomparable Author ha's offered them.⁴⁶

I. The First Assertion.

It must be owned, That the Israelites did imbibe very much of the Egyptian Idolatry, while they were in their Egyptian Captivity. [Consider, Josh. 24.14. and Ezek. 20.7, 8. & 23.3, 19.] There was an Instance of this, in the Calf-Worship, first countenanced by Aaron, and afterwards Introduced by Jeroboam. Of Aarons Action tis truly observed by Philo, Ζηλωται των Αιγυπτιακων γενονται πλασματων· Æmulatores facti sunt Figentorum Ægyptiacorum.⁴⁷ Of the Ancients, we have Lactantius and Jerom and Austin, and Basilius Seleuciensis, & of the Moderns, without Number; who make this Observation, That which the Author of the Mirabilia Scripture ha's about the Commemoration of Joseph, in that Idol, is founded on very uncertain Conjectures;⁴⁸ & yett Witsius thinks, this as likely,

Through this divine ruse it came about that the memory of idolatry was effaced and that the grandest and true foundation of our belief – namely, the existence and oneness of the deity – was firmly established, while at the same time the souls had no feeling of repugnance and were not repelled because of the abolition of modes of worship to which they were accustomed" (Guide 3.32.526, 527).

as that of Moncaeus, That Aaron intended the Imitation of the Cherub, which the Elders of Israel had seen, (tho' there's no mention of it,) in their Vision of the God of Israel: [Tho' I confess, for my own Part, I greatly incline to Moncaeus's Opinion;]⁴⁹ Why should we not rather think, of what Strabo tells us, of Apis worshipped by the Memphites, and Mnevis, by the Heliopolites, under the Figure of Oxen. Tully, and Pliny, and Mela, all tell us, of this Apis, A Beef worshipped by the Egyptians as a God.⁵⁰ And what can look more agreeably, than the Sense which Pererius has expressed of it? Viderat superstitiosa Gens Hebræa, Ægyptiorum in Bovis Cultu Solemnitates, dum in Ægypto commorans ijs commisceretur; vidit et causam tantè Cultus, nimirum Bonorum terrenorum indè redundantiam: Quarè dum duriora in Deserto subirent, eos sibi subito Deos, qui inopie remediari possent, quales ipsi cum Ægyptijs Apides existimabant, adscivere.⁵¹ It is clear, That the Augustine (City of God 18.4–5; in NPNFi (2:363–64), Basilius Seleuciensis, Sermones XLI (In Noe Oratio vi) [PG 085. 0092, line 35 to 0093, line 9]; and Augustinus Hibernicus, De Mirabilibus Sacrae Scripturae (lib. 1, cap. 15) [PL 035. 2163–2164], the Irish monk, not the one of Hippo. Among the representatives of “the moderns” is the French scholar and bishop of Soissons Pierre-Daniel Huet (1630–1721), who relates in his prized Demonstratio Evangelica ad Serenissimum Delphinum (1690), prop. IV, cap. 7, sec. 3, pp. 101–02, that the Egyptians conflated their sacred bovine images with that of Joseph, whom they honored for saving Egypt from a great famine by properly interpreting Pharaoh's dream of the seven fat and lean cows (Gen. 41:1–57). Much the same appears in Hugo Grotius's annotation on Exod. 25:18 (Annotatio-nes 1:55), and in Poole's valuable summaries of criticism on Exod. 32:4, in Synopsis Criticorum (1:481–85) and Works (5:354–61). See also Pierre Jurieu's Critical History (1:327–33, 339–40). Of course, Spencer discusses this issue at length in his De Legibus, lib. 3, diss. 5, cap. 8, sec. 2, pp. 805–07. On Aaron's golden calf, see also Mather's annotations on Exod. 32:4, 9 ff (above) and his BA (1:315, 440).

49 Witsius, Ægyptiaca (1696), lib. 2, cap. 2, sec. 3, p. 61, refers to the learned French author from Arras Franciscus Moncaeus, aka. François de Monceaux (fl. late 16th c.). His Aaron Purgatus sive De Vitulo Aureo, Libri duo (1606) was placed on the RC Index Librorum Prohibitorum in 1607, because Moncaeus argued that the Mosaic cherubim (like Aaron's molten calf) were of the same polymorphous shape – man, lion, ox, and eagle – as those in Ezekiel's vision (Ezek. 1:6–10; 10:1, 14–22) and were also present in Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 6:21–35; 7:25). The applicable passages to which Mather refers (via Witsius 61) appear in Aaron Purgatus (1606), lib. 1, caps. 4–7 and 16, pp. 46–71 and 199–209. See also BA 1:1045 note (147).

50 Strabo (Geographica 17.1.22, lines 7–9), Tully Cicero (De Natura Deorum (1.29.82), Pliny (De Naturalis Historia 8.71.184), and Pomponius Mela – the latter in Isaac Vossius's edition Observationes ad Pomponium Melam De Situ Orbis (1658), lib. 1, cap. 9, p. 13, lines 66–70, of the Roman geographer Pomponius Mela (fl. 1st c. CE). Mela reports that “Apis – a black bull, marked by particular spots and different from other bulls in his tail and tongue – is the divinity of all the Aegyptian peoples. He is born only rarely, conceived not from mating cattle, as they say, but miraculously in a celestial fire. The day of his birth is particularly festive to the whole people” (Description of the World 1.58.51).

51 Witsius (lib. 2, cap. 2, sec. 5, p. 62). Witsius's Latin excerpt is most likely from his paraphrase of “Disputatio IX et Disputatio IX,” in Selectarum Disputationum Exodi (1607), pp. 54–59, by Benedictus Pererius (Valentin Benito Pereira, Pereyra), a Spanish Jesuit philosopher and theologian at the prestigious Collegio Romano. Pererius maintains that “the superstitious Hebrew race had seen the solemn rites of the Egyptians in the worship of the ox. While residing in Egypt, it was intermixed for them [with their own belief]; they saw also a reason for such great worship, of course, the abundance thence of earthly goods: For this reason, while they were

Worship of Bruites, and particularly of Beeves, among the Egyptians, was more ancient, th{an} the Going of the Israelites out of Egypt. [Consider Exod. 8.25, 26. with Exod. 24.5.] These are called, The Abominations of the Egyptians, because they were their Idols; and it would have been Abominable unto them, to have seen their Gods made a Sacrifice; which is the Chaldee Paraphrase upon the Place; and according to the Joke of Anaxandrides,

*Tu Bovem adoras; Ego eum Dijs Sacrifico.*⁵²

It is also clear, That they used the Images of the Creatures in their Worship, as well as the Creatures themselves. For this, we have a greater Authority, than that of Strabo, and of Mela, who saies, Colunt Effigies multorum Animalium, atque ipsa magis Animalia:⁵³ Even that of Moses, who, [Deut. 4.16, 17, 18.] forbad unto the Israelites, the Likeness of any Beast; inasmuch as He had brought them out of Egypt; and particularly, The Likeness of Male or Female; which may refer to the Two Sexes of Beeves; whereof, the Males were dedicated unto Osiris, the Females unto Isis. There is no need of thinking, That the whole Fable of Osiris, and Isis, and Typhon, told by Plutarch, was older than Moses; it might afterwards be interpolated with many Things from the very History of Moses.⁵⁴ Tis enough, That a Golden (or gilded) Image of a Beef, was then worshipped. Compare, Act. 7.39, undergoing rather hard times in the wilderness, they selected suddenly for themselves those gods who could remedy their want, like the oxen, they had esteemed along with the Egyptians.”

52 The Chaldee Paraphrase of Onkelos (Exod. 8:25–26, 24:5), in Walton’s Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (1:259, 329) relates the following: “But Moshe said [to Pharaoh], It will not be right to do so; because we shall take sheep, which are the abomination of the Mizraee [Egyptians], and offer them before the Lord our God. Behold, if we offer the abomination of the Mizraee before them, they would stone us with stones as an act of justice.” And Onkelos (on Exod. 24:5) reads, “they offered burnt offerings and consecrated oblations of oxen before the Lord” (Etheridge, Targums Onkelos 1:465, 524). In a fragment of Anaxandrides (fl. 4th c. BCE) – extant in Athenaeus Naucratis’s Deipnosophistae (bk. 7, Kaibel paragr. 55, line 16) – the Athenian comic poet pokes fun at the Egyptians: βούν προσκυνεῖς, ἐγὼ δὲ θύω τοῖς θεοῖς. (Fragmenta 39, line 4). Witsius (63) presents the Latin translation only: Tu Bovem adoras; Ego eum Dijs Sacrifico, or, “You worship the bull, and I sacrifice your gods.” For a variant, see John Spencer’s De Legibus Hebraeorum (1732), lib. 1, cap. 7, sec. 2, fol. 124.

53 Witsius (Aegyptiaca, lib. 2, cap. 2, sec. 8, p. 63) quotes from Isaac Vossius’s edition, Observationes ad Pomponius Mela (1658), lib. 1, cap. 9, p. 13, line 63. The Latin passage translates, “They pay cult to the images of many animals and even more to the animals themselves” (Description of the World 1.58.51). Strabo (Geographica 16.2.35) identifies Moses as “one of the Aegyptian priests” in “Lower Egypt” who “taught, that the Aegyptians were mistaken in representing the Divine Being by the images of beasts and cattle.”

54 Mather alludes to the etiological story of Isis and her husband Osiris, who was killed by his brother Set (Typhon). According to Plutarch (De Iside et Osiride 365b.38–367c.40), the marriage of Isis (mother earth) and Osiris (river Nile) represents the fecundity of the soil when the annual floodwaters of the Nile replenish the earth. Typhon (drought) shutting Osiris (water, moisture) in a coffin and thus killing him, Plutarch’s naturalistic explication signifies the cessation of the annual floodwaters of the Nile leading to a dangerous drought. Mather dismisses this ancient myth as an allegory younger than Moses because it is a distortion of the Exodus saga.

40, 41. The Education of Jeroboam in Egypt, inclined him to the like Imitation. [Compare 1. King. 12.28. with Exod. 32.4. And consider, Ezek. 23.8.]⁵⁵

There was another Instance of this in the Worship of Tammuz. The Author of the Chronicon Alexandrinum observes well, Thammuz to bee the same with Adonis.⁵⁶ And Jerom concurs to the Observation; adding, That according to the Fable of the Pagans, in the Month of Junæ, a fine young Gentleman with whom | Venus was in Love, was killed by a Boar; and again brought unto Life; Hence the Month of June was called by his Name; & Women in this Month, first wept for the Death of the Spark, and then sung for his Resurrection. Adonis was a Phœnician Deity; the Name Adon signifies a Lord, in the Language of the Phœnicians.⁵⁷ They had it from the Egyptians; among whom it was Osiris; and the whole Scene of the Worship of Thammuz, was laid in the Mourning upon the, Ἀφανισμος Osiridis.⁵⁸ On the same Day that the Byblienses in Phœnicia, celebrated their Ἀδωνιασμος, the Alexandrians in Egypt, annually including an Epistle in some little Paper-Vessel, which Lucian calls, Βυβλινην κεφαλην, with certain Ceremonies, they sent it out to Sea, and of its own Accord, it perpetually arrived at Byblus in Seven Dayes Time; where upon, the Women that had satt mourning for Adonis, were transported into a more than ordinary Acclamation, for the finding of their Adonis.⁵⁹ [65v] [Procopius understands this Usage, as intended, 55 According to Moncaeus (Aaron Purgatus, lib. 1, caps. 7–9, pp. 66–96), King Jeroboam, educated in Egypt, set up the worship of a golden calf at Dan and Bethel in imitation of Aaron's bovine statue in the wilderness (1 Kings 11:40, 12:28–29; Exod. 32:4; Ezek. 23:8). Mather's entire paragraph is a synopsis of Witsius's Ægyptiaca (lib. 2, cap. 2, sec. 8–13, pp. 63–65).

56 The anonymous Chronicon Alexandrinum (Chronicon Paschale) is a 7th-c. Greek chronology of the world from the creation of Adam to the reign of the Greek emperor Heraclius (610–41 CE). Mather follows well-established precedent and identifies the Sumerian shepherd god Thammuz with the Greek Adonis, associated with rebirth (Chronicon Alexandrinum 1:244, line 2). Much the same is reported in Theodoretus Cyrrensis on Ezek. 8:14 (Interpretatio Ezechielem 8.14) [PG 081. 0885, lines 23] and in Cyrillus Alexandrinus, Commentarius in Isaiam prophetam [PG 070. 441, line 27].

57 St. Jerome, Commentariorum in Ezechielem Prophetam Libri Quatuordecim (lib. 3, cap. 8, vers. 13, 14) [PL 025. 082–083].

58 Plutarch (De Iside et Osiride 371b.49, line 6) mentions the ἀφανισμός “disappearance” or “destruction” of Osiris. As the old story goes, Set (Typhon) and seventy-two co-conspirators tricked Osiris (ruler of Egypt) to lie down in a wooden box which, when sealed with lead and cast into the Nile, drifted to Byblus on the Phœnician shore, where it became lodged in a tree trunk (De Iside et Osiride 356A.13–357D.16). Plutarch's interpretation of the ancient myth as a representation of the Nile's seasonal floods illustrates his fusion of Euhemerism and the deification of nature: The story of Osiris's imprisonment in the wooden chest signifies the seasonal cycle of the low water level of the Nile “in the month of Athyr [November], at the time, when owing to the complete cessation of the Etesian winds, the Nile recedes to its low level and the land becomes denuded” (De Iside et Osiride 366d.39). See also T. S. Brown's “Euhemerus and the Historians.”

59 The Greek satirist Lucianus of Samosata ridicules human credulity in his De Syria dea (sec. 7), where he pokes fun at the Ἀδωνιασμος, the corybantic wailing of women over the death of Adonis. The Adonia (the feast of Adonis) involved elaborate rites of lamentation observed in Isa. 18.1.] The Mystery of it was; The Sun had been after a sort murdered, by a rough Winter; but was now gott back again to the Summer Solstice.⁶⁰

There were other Instances, wherein the Israelites were Apes of the Egyptians. But what shall we say? So they were of all their other Idolatrous Neighbours. [Consider, Jer. 3.2. and Ezek. 16.15, 25, 28, 29.]⁶¹

As an Appendix therefore to this Assertion, we must add, That the Egyptians were not the First Inventors, of all the Idolatries & Superstitions followed by the Israelites. The Original of the Teraphim, is particularly by Kircher amiss ascribed unto them.⁶²

The Teraphim were a Sort of Domestic Idols. The Use of them was most certainly displeasing to God. [Consider 1. Sam. 15.23. and 2. King. 23.24. and Zech. 10.2.] It is plain, that Laban the Syrian, in the Dayes of Jacob, counted them his Gods. But it is not so, that he learnt the Use of them from Abraham, or his Family, returning with them out of Egypt. Tho' Kircher saies, Abraham returned into Mesopotamia, Paul saies, he did not.⁶³ [See Heb. 11.15. and compare, Gen. 24.5, 6, 7.] Or, suppose he did, yett it is not likely, that his Family, would so take up the Idolatries of the Egyptians, as to become even the Teachers thereof unto the Chaldeans themselves. [Consider, Gen. 18.19.] Kirchers Author Abenephius, is too modern, to have his Credit in this Matter, of any Significancy.⁶⁴ His Countreyman Maimonides is of more Authority than he: And by women when the waters of the Phoenician Adonis River turned red in the spring or early summer. Lucian judges, however, that this mournful feast does not commemorate the death of Adonis, but that of the Egyptian Osiris, who (the good people of Byblus believed) lay buried in their city. Thus Lucian reports the story of a human head, Βυβλίνην κεφαλὴν (7, line 12), i. e., "the head of Byblus," which miraculously floats from Alexandria (Egypt) to Byblus (modern Lebanon) during a seven-day journey. Mather believes the Septuagint alludes to this ancient myth of the ἐπιστολὰς βυβλίνας, the "letters to Byblus," in its punning reference to ἐπιστολὰς βιβλίνας ἐπάνω τοῦ ὕδατος (LXX Isa. 18:2), the "paper letters sent on the water." For other references to the Adonis River, see also BA (1:444–45).

60 Procopius of Gaza (Commentarii in Isaiam 18:2) [PG 87.2.2131, lines 14, 32]. Mather appears to prefer Plutarch's naturalistic interpretation of the ancient Adonis/Osiris myths. Witsius (Aegyptiaca, lib. 2, cap. 2, sec. 14–15, pp. 65–67).

61 Witsius, Aegyptiaca (lib. 2, cap. 2, sec. 20, pp. 68–69).

62 Witsius (Aegyptiaca, lib. 2, cap. 3, secs. 1–2, pp. 69–70) takes issue with Athanasius Kircher's Cedipus Aegyptiacus (1652), tomus 1, syntagma IV, cap. 3, p. 258, who argues that the Teraphim, or statues of family gods – like those which Rachel stole from her father Laban (Gen. 31:30–35) – were of Egyptian origin. See also Pierre Jurieu's Critical History (2:77–109) and, of course, Jacques Gaffarel's Unheard-of Curiosities (1650), part 2, chs. 6, pp. 146–98. Mather also discusses the nature and function of the Teraphim in his annotation on Gen. 31:19 (BA 1:1040–47). Modern scholars, however, disagree on the origin, shape, and function of the Teraphim תרפים, a plural noun, which occurs 15 times in the OT (DDD).

63 Witsius (lib. 2, cap. 3, sec. 3, pp. 70–71); Kircher (tom. 1, synt. IV, cap. 3, pp. 258–59).

64 Kircher (259) cites at length a passage from an Arabic manuscript of Abenephius, aka. Rabbi Barachias Nephi of Babylon, who had translated into Arabic a series of Egyptian hieroglyphs engraved on an obelisk. According to Abenephius, the Teraphim was an image of a boy, he makes these Talkative Teraphim, to be of a Zabian Original. *Zabij erexerunt Stellis Imagines; Soli quidem aureas, Lunæ verò argenteas. Deindè Sacella ædificaverunt, Imaginesque in illis collocarunt, in quas vires stellarum influere arbitrabantur, easque intelligendi Virtutem habere, hominibusque donum, Prophetiæ largiri, ac, denique, quæ [ipsis] utilia sunt ac salutaria indicare.*⁶⁵ He saies, That Abraham was brought up in this Religion of the Zabians; but after this Pillar of the World, (as he calls him,) had learn't the true Knowledge of God, he not only Rejected their Vanities, but also publickly opposed them. The Opinion of Kircher, is well censured by our Witsius; *Tam immane dictu est, ut ipso propemodum sono horrorem audienti incuria.*⁶⁶ And with that Censure, I will supersede, all the Labour of otherwise confuting it. These Penates, were doubtless first used among the Chaldeans. And their Name of Teraphim is probably derived by L. De Dieu, from the Arabic תרף / Uberem et affluentem reddidit. Hinc forte תרפים / *Dij qui rem familiarem abundare faciunt.*⁶⁷

II. The Second Assertion.

In Principles and Practices, approved by God, wherein the Egyptians had some Agreement with the Israelites, the Agreement was not so great as learned Men pretend it was.

No Christian can think, but that Apollo lyed, when he referred unto the old Egyptians, for the Knowledge of True Happiness, and the Way leading to it. We are sure, the Way which God præscribed unto the Israelites, was opposed unto the Way of the Egyptians. [Lev. 18.3. and Ezek. 20.7. & 23.27.] Marsham cannot be allow'd, That the ἡ τῶν μακαρῶν ὁδός, which Apollo commends the Egyptians who was called "the Egyptian Serapis" and employed in divinations (Kircher 259). With this key in hand, the venerable Jesuit set out to crack the code of the ancient Egyptian pictographs (hieroglyphs), in his Obeliscus Pamphilius (1650), lib. 1, caps. 2, 4, pp. 13, 45; lib. 2, caps. 6, 10, pp. 124, 130–34, 163–64; lib. 4, pp. 260, 272, 299, 306, etc.; and in Kircher's Lingua Aegyptiaca Restituta (1643). On the intricate history of translating this manuscript, a prized possession in the library of the learned French antiquarian Nicolas Claude Fabri de Peiresc (Lettres de Peiresc, vol. 12, pars 2, p. 488, [note I]), see D. Stolzenberg's Egyptian Oedipus (71–103) and J. Glassie's Man of Misconceptions (64–67, 81–86).

⁶⁷ Witsius (sec. 12, pp. 75–76) quotes from Ludovicus De Dieu's annotation on Gen. 31:19, in Animadversiones in Veteris Testamentum (1648), pp. 41–42; rpt. De Dieu's Critica Sacra (1693), p. 18. De Dieu derives from the Arabic תרף / [teraph] 'it rendered rich and plentiful.' Hence, perhaps, teraphim signifies "gods who bring about an abundance of family fortune."

for finding out, was, The Way of the Lord, whereof we read so often in His Holy Oracles.⁶⁸ The Verses which are thus assigned unto Apollo, have upon them the Symptoms of being rather the Fiction of some Knavish Græcian. They agree well enough with the Verses of Diphilus, which mention the Two Wayes to Hades;

Μιαν δικαίων, χατέραν ἀσεβῶν οδόν.⁶⁹

They seem to be an Imitation of the Ascrean Stroke,

Μακρός δὲ καὶ ὀρθίος οἶμος κλ’

Silius in a Manner translates the Lines of Hesiod, when he tells us how,

*Ardua saxoso perducit semita clivo.*⁷⁰

And thus in Cicero’s Academical Quæstions, we read of a, Via Vitæ. So that others, as well as the Egyptians, had the Term; and about the Thing, there were none that err’d more bruitishly than the Egyptians. Austin, in his Book, De Civitate Dei, saies very justly of that Nation, *Solet falsò et inaniter de suarum Doctrinarum Antiquitate gloriam.*⁷¹ | But, he very truly shoves, That our Patriarchs are of 68 John Marsham, Chronicus Canon Ægyptiacus (1672), lib. 2, seculum IX, pp. 149–50, adapts a fragment of Porphyrius’s De philosophia ex oraculis (140, lines 1 and 6), extant in Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio evangelica 9.10.2, line 12). Here, Apollo’s oracle sings of the knowledge of ἡ τῶν μακάρων ὁδὸς, “the heavenward paths,” which the Phoenicians learned from the Egyptians.

69 Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio evangelica 13.13.47, lines 7–8) attributes the following lines to the comic poet Diphilus: καὶ γὰρ καθ’ Ἀιδην δύο τρίβους νομίζομεν, / μίαν δικαίων, ἑτέραν δ[ὲ] ἀσεβῶν εἶναι ὁδόν, “For two ways, as we deem, to Hades lead – / One for the good, the other for the bad.” This oft-quoted variant, which also appears in Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 5.14.121, subsec. 1, lines 7–8) is now attributed to the Greek comic poet Philemon Syracusanus (c. 360–c. 264). Mather’s second citation from Witsius (lib. 2, cap. 4, sec. 3, p. 77) agrees with Philemon’s version, which reads, μίαν δικαίων χατέραν ἀσεβῶν ὁδόν (Fragmenta [Kock], fragm. 246, lines 7), or “one for the just, but the other for the ungodly.”

70 The “Ascrean strokes” of Hesiod (born in the Boeotian hamlet of Ascrea) appear in his Opera et dies (290–91), where this old adage reads, μακρὸς δὲ καὶ ὀρθίος οἶμος ἐς αὐτὴν καὶ τρηχὺς τὸ πρῶτον. This second-hand citation from Witsius (78), rehearses the truism that “the path to [Excellence] is long and steep, and rough at first.” It also charmed Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 4.2.5, subsec. 2, lines 4–5) and others, and in Mather’s day was generally accessed in Johannes Stobæus’s Anthologium (3.1.205b, lines 23–24). The Roman consul, orator, and epic poet Silius Italicus (c. 26–102 CE) says much the same in his epic Punica (15.102), where personified Virtue reminds her companion that Rome was brought low by its pursuit of luxury and pleasure. To attain honor, glory, and victory, however, one has to follow “a steep track [which] leads by a rocky ascent.” Says Milton’s wily serpent, “Hard are the ways of truth, rough to walk, / Smooth on the tongue discourst, pleasing to th’ ear / ... / most men admire / Vertue, who follow not her lore” (Paradise Regained 1.478–79, 482–83).

71 Witsius (78) loosely refers to the “Via Vitæ” or “journey through life,” a mode of striving for virtue, discussed, for instance, in Cicero’s Academica and De Finibus Bonorum et Malorum (bk. 3). The proof-text from St. Augustine’s De Civitate Dei (18.39) [PL 041. 0599] is to affirm that the Israelites possess the oldest form of wisdom, the Prisca theologia, which God bestowed upon Adam and from him passed down in a direct line of succession via Noah, Shem, and Heber to Abraham and Moses. That is why not even Egypt will “falsely and vainly glory in the antiquity of her doctrines.” And as far as philosophy is concerned, “which professes to teach men something which shall make them happy,” Mather claims, it already prospered in the days of the thrice-great Mercury Trismegistus (Hermes Trismegistus), long before Greece received its greater Antiquity, even than Isis, before whose Time the Egyptians do not pretend unto any thing of Letters. And as to that Philosophy, which professes to teach, Undè fiant homines Beati, he saies, it was introduced about the Time of Mercurius Trismegistus; and this, he showes, was after the Dayes of Moses, who lived before the Time of this Mercurius's Grandfathers Father.⁷²

There are great Pains taken, to prove that the Egyptians worshipped but One Supreme God; and that the rest were but Mediators, to bring them unto that One God. It seems not so proper to call these, by the Name of, Medioxumi; For the, Dij Medioxumi, were so called, from their Middle State of Dignity, between Superi and Inferi, rather than from any Mediatorial Character & Employment.⁷³ Thus Plautus divides them into, Superi atque Inferi et Medioxumi.⁷⁴ Gyraldus tell us, Latini Medioximos vocitarunt, qui quidem omnes minus lucide splendideque naturæ, quàm illi cælestes, sunt; nec tamen ità corpulenti sunt, ut hominum capiantur obtutu.⁷⁵ Servius observes therefore, that Hercules was on this Account called, Communis Deus, and Medius fidius. But, we lett this pass, and say, That if the Egyptians may be defended, by this Notion, there is no Abomination in philosophy, but certainly after the time of Moses (City of God 18.39), in NPNFi (2:383–84). Mather and his peers also speculated whether Mercurius Trismegistus was no one else but the Hebrew lawgiver Moses (BA 1:308, 314, and esp. 1065). On the line of descent of ancient theology from Adam to Moses, see H. C. Maddux's "Euhemerism and Ancient Theology."

Paganism incapable of Defence.⁷⁶ However, the Idolatry of the Egyptians, particularly as described by Diodorus, had no Manner of Agreement with the Theology of the Israelites.⁷⁷ The Zeal of the Egyptians for the Traditions of their Fathers, which they tell us, was resembled by that of the Israelites against עבודה זרה / A Foreign Worship, was as remarkably found in almost all other Nations.⁷⁸ It is remarked by Servius, what a Caution there was both among the Athenians and the Romans, Ne quis novas Religiones introduceret.⁷⁹ Among the Athenian Lawes, Petit gives us this as the Second, & of Eternal Authority, That the Gods were to be worshipped, νομοις πατριοις, Secundum patrias consuetudines.⁸⁰ The Roman Lawes were very severe against New Gods, as Tully notes. And Posthumius in Livy, makes an Oration, wherein he argues how much the introducing of New and Strange Rites had a Tendency to the Dissolution of all Religion.⁸¹ Dionysius Halicarnassæus tells us, how careful the City was about this Matter. And Mæcenas thus (in Dion Cassius) advised Augustus, about the Worship of God; Αυτός τε σεβου κατὰ [τὰ] πατρία, και τους άλλους τιμᾶν ἀνάγκαζε. Ipse cole juxta Leges Patrias, et ut alij colant effice. And Suetonius tells us, how Augustus followed the Advice.⁸² But indeed what Nation was ever otherwise disposed? Memorable is the Saying 76 In his Servii Grammatici in Vergilii Aeneidos Commentarius (1532), p. 508 (g–h), the Roman grammarian Maurus Servius Honoratius glosses in his commentary on Virgil's Aeneid (8.268–79) that Hercules became revered as “God of the community” and “loyal mediator” (see also Georg Thilo's Teubner 1883 edition of Servius, 2:235, # 275).

77 Diodorus Siculus (1.12. secs. 9–13) speaks of the celestial and eternal deities of the Egyptians, who “visit all the inhabited world, revealing themselves to men in the form of sacred animals, and at times even appearing in the guise of men or in other shapes.”

78 The Hebrew phrase עבודה זרה / [Avodah Zarah], or “foreign worship” (idolatry), is also the title of the Talmud, tractate in Seder Nezikin (Order of Damages). See also Dionysius Vossius's Latin translation of and annotations on Maimonides, De Idololatria Liber (1641).

79 In his commentary on the Aeneid (8.187), In Vergilii carmina commentarii (1883), p. 226, # 187, Servius glosses that the ancient Greeks and Romans were vigilant, “lest anyone introduce a new religion.”

80 Via Witsius (81), Mather provides a shortened quotation from Samuel Petit's Leges Atticae (1635), lib. 1, tit. 1, p. 2, who in his turn cites from the ancient law of the proverbial Draco, as extant in Porphyrius, De Abstinencia (4.22, lines 33–34). At any rate, Draco (7th c. BCE), first lawgiver of Athens, decreed that the eternal gods are to be worshiped according to the “law of the patriarchs” and “attended by the customs of the fathers.” Both Witsius (81) and Petit (2) read “sanctiones” (laws, ordinances) instead of Mather's “consuetudines” (customs, traditions).

81 Tully Cicero (De Legibus 2.19) has Marcus invoke the vengeance of heaven against anyone who dishonors the deities, temples, or groves of the state or introduces new gods. Likewise, Livy (Ab urbe condita 39.16) reminds his audience that their fathers outlawed the performance of any foreign religion, expelled prophets and jugglers from the city, burned their books of divination, and stopped sacrifices contrary to Roman law.

82 In his Antiquitates Romanae (2.19.2–4), the Greco-Roman rhetorician Dionysius Halicarnassus marvels that the Roman Republic neither neglected the ancient gods of Rome nor ever countenanced in public those of the foreign peoples under her dominion. Thus Cassius Dio's Historiae Romanae (52.36.1, lines 3–4) has Maecenas counsel Augustus Caesar, αὐτός τε σεβου κατὰ τὰ πάτρια και τους άλλους τιμᾶν ἀνάγκαζε. “Do you not only yourself worship the Divine Power everywhere and in every way in accordance with the traditions of our father, but compel all others to honour it.” And Suetonius (Vita Divi Augusti 93, line 1) approvingly reports of Aristotle, τα πατρια εθη παρα πασι παραβαινειν αδικον εστι· Patrios Ritus violare ubique gentium nefarium habetur.⁸³

Plutarch mightily cries up the Doctrines of the Egyptians, as not having in them any thing, Unreasonable, or Superstitious, or Fabulous. And yett in another Place, he reproaches Herodotus, for corrupting the Gravity and Purity of the Greek Rites, των Αιγυπτίων ἀλαζονείαις και μυθολογίαις, Superbijs et Fabulis Ægyptiorum.⁸⁴ And the whole World is against Plutarch, as being sensible that there could be nothing so foolish & sottish as the Egyptians. The Poets derided them; as Antiphanes does in a Satyr upon them, for making a God of an Eel. In Philostratus we have Apollonius laughing at the ridiculous Images and Animals wherein they sought their Deities. And tho' Kircher in our Dayes ha's found profound Mysteries in their Madnesses, Philostratus declares that in his Dayes, the Egyptians could give no Manner of Reason for what they did.⁸⁵ And how does Juvenal satyryze them?

Cicero writing, De Naturâ Deorum, explodes, Ægyptiorum Dementiam. It was very late before the Romans, would permit the Sacra Ægyptiaca, to be brought into their City. They are called, Monstra, by Virgil. Varro could not bear, that at Rome any Respect should be shown them.⁸⁷ Augustus in his Travels thro' that the Roman emperor dismissed the religious ceremonies of foreign peoples but strictly observed the ancient customs of Rome.

And Suetonius tells us, How Tiberius restrained all Devotions to them, and condemned unto the Fire all the Instruments of those Devotions.⁹¹ Yea, Plutarch himself confesses, That the Egyptian Gods and Rites, exposed all Religion to Derision; & begatt a Superstition indeed in weaker People, but in the δριμύτεροι and θρασύτεροι, People of more Spirit and Boldness, a Bruitish Denial of a God, and a Total Irreligion.⁹² | Indeed so horrid and stupid, were the Idolatries of Egypt, that they not only placed the Heads of Dogs, and Catts, and Asses and Serpents, upon the Shoulders of their Gods; but (besides what Origen, & Jerom, and Casarius, and Clemens, and others lay to their Charge,) Minutius Felix reproaches them; *Quod non Isidem magis, quàm ceparum Acrimonias metuant; Nec Serapidem magis, quàm strepitus per pudenda corporis expressos contremiscant?*⁹³ Yea, the Mendesians worshipped a Living Goat, & prostituted their most beautiful Gentlewomen, to an infandous Conjunction with their God.⁹⁴ Herodotus, and Pindar, and Strabo, and Ælian, and Aristides Rhetor, are Vouchers for this horrible Story; And Asclepiades writes in the

(84) here relies for his references to Virgil's Aeneid (8.698) on Terrence Varro's De Lingua Latina (5.10.57–58) in Servius's annotation in In Vergilii carmina commentarii (Georgius Thilo's edition 2:302). Be that as it may, Virgil (Aeneid 8.698) dismisses the "monstrous gods" of the Egyptians, and Varro (De Lingua Latina 5.10.57–60) scorns their sky-gods whose origin he traces to natural phenomena.

88 In his Vita Divi Augusti (93), Suetonius commends Augustus Caesar for disregarding the Egyptian Apis, and Caesar's grandson Gaius for doing the same in Jerusalem.

89 Sextus Aurelius Propertius (Elegiarum 2.33a) has Persius poke fun at the cow-headed goddess Io (Isis, Hathor), asking her, "Isn't Egypt with its dark foundlings enough for you? Why have you chosen the long journey to Rome?" (Complete Elegies 219). And biting Suetonius (Vita Domitiani 1.2) speaks of the "fickle superstitions" of the priests of Isis (Lives 2:345).

90 The Roman Aelius Lampridius, in his Life of Commodus (1.9.4), snickers that the son of Marcus Aurelius, Roman Emperor Marcus Aurelius Commodus Antoninus Augustus (161–192 CE), "practiced the worship of Isis and even went so far as to shave his head and carry a statue of Anubis," the jackal-headed deity (Historia Augusta 1:288).

91 Tertullian (Apologeticus Adversus Gentes, cap. 6.8 [PL 001.0355–356], Apology (6), in ANF (3:23). Suetonius (Vita Tiberi 36), in Lives (1:345).

92 Witsius (84–85). Plutarch, De Iside et Osiride (379e, line 4) fears the δριμύτεροις and θρασύτεροις, the "cynical" and "bold" who will fall prey to rationalism and atheism.

93 An early Latin apologist for Christianity, Marcus Minutius Felix reproaches the Egyptians "who are not more afraid of Isis than they are of the pungency of onions, not of Serapis more than they tremble at their bodies" (The Octavius 28), in ANF (4:191).

94 Herodotus (2.46) relates that the Mendesians (Egyptians who worship their hircine god Mendes, aka. Pan), submitted women to coupling with he-goats as a public spectacle.

Defence of it.⁹⁵ Now, τοιαυτη η Αιγυπτίων ασχημων αθεοτης μαλλον η θεολογια, as Eusebius well expresses it; This, Divinitatis omnis ejectio potius quàm Theologia, why should any learned Christians, go to compare it with the Divinity of the Israelites?⁹⁶

It will be pleaded, That the Egyptian Divinity, was all Symbolical and Ænigmatical.⁹⁷ Certainly, It was not all so. The Mendesian Part at least, was not. But in reality, It was an hotch potch of such Confusion, that Posterity growing perfectly Ashamed of it, began to stretch their Witts, that they might find Mysteries in it: An Argument well prosecuted by Eusebius.⁹⁸ And their odd Gods, many of them were but Gentlemen who had once merited well of the Commonwealth; A Thing observed by Philo Biblius, and Plutarch, and others. Their θεοποια, was a Celebration of their Dead Hero's; the Mysteries found in it, were the Invention of later Ages. Or, If they had any Mysteries, they rose no Higher, than what concerned Nature and Body; the Highest Flights whereof, you will find in the Authors quoted by Eusebius.⁹⁹ And herein also the Egyptian Subtilty, fell very short of the Græcian. Vossius ha's ingeniously detected the Fraud of Plutarch, in dressing up the Egyptian Religion, with a Græcian Subtilty. When we have read the Hieroglyphicks of Horus, what are we the Wiser?¹⁰⁰ All the vast Endeavours of 95 Witsius's primary source (86) for Herodotus (2.46); the Boeotian Pindar (Fragment incertorum 201); Strabo (Geographica 17.19); Claudius Aelianus (De natura animalium 3.23; Historia 7.19); the Greek orator Aelius Aristides Rhetor (117–81), in his fragment Agyptios (361) – is Samuel Bochart's Hierozoicon (pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 53, cols. 640–42). Furthermore, Asclepiades of Mendes is to have defended some such incidents in his Θεολογουμένων; i. e., if we take Suetonius's words for it in his Life of Augustus (94.4). On this topic, see J. E. Salisbury, The Beast Within (2011), pp. 66–80.

96 Lastly, Eusebius Pamphilus, in his Praeparatio evangelica (2.1.51, line 1), shakes his head: τοιαυτη [καί] ἡ Αἰγυπτίων ἀσχήμων ἀθεότης μᾶλλον ἢ θεολογία, adding “Divinitatis omnis ejectio potius quàm Theologia”: “such is the unseemly theology, or rather atheism, of the Egyptians,” adding, this “whole system of divinity is degrading even to oppose” (Preparation 2.1.51d).

97 Witsius (lib. 2, cap. 4, sec. 18, pp. 86–87) draws on John Marsham, Chronicus Canon Aegyptiacus (1672), lib. 2, secul. 4, § III, p. 57), who speaks of the arcane theology of the Egyptians.

98 Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio evangelica 2.1.52a).

99 Mather here invokes the ancient Euhemerist claim (fl. 4th c. BCE) that the deities of the Greeks, Egyptians, and Chaldeans were nothing but deified kings and lawgivers who in aftertimes were revered as gods. See also H. C. Maddux's “Euhemerism and Ancient Theology.” Both (H)eren(n)ius Philo, aka. Philo Byblius, Philon Byblos (c. 64–141 CE), a Hellenic historian mostly remembered for his extracts from Sanchuniathon's lost Phoenician history, in Fragmenta (Jacoby-F 3c, 790F, fragm. 1, lines 69–83); and Plutarch, in De Iside et Osiride (359e, lines 2–5) assert that according to tradition the ancient gods such as Hermes, Typhon, and Osiris were “but mortal men” (line 5). Thus, Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio evangelica 3.3.21, lines 1–3) passes judgment: “their whole manufacture of gods consists of dead men; and their physical explanations are fictitious. For what need was there to model figures of men and women, when without them they could worship the sun and moon and the other elements of the cosmos?” (Preparation 3.3.91bc)

100 Witsius (89); Johannes Gerardus Vossius, De Theologia Gentili: De Idololatriae (1641), lib. 1, cap. 5, pp. 35–36, cites Plutarch's De Iside et Osiride (363d, lines 5–12), who reveals that

Kircher in his Oedipus, have this just Censure bestowed by Witsius upon them; *Ea prudentiores inania plerumque commenta esse hominis ingenio atque otio suo abutentis, vident et rident.*¹⁰¹

Well, But the Doctrine of the Trinity in the Unity of the Godhead, was of old known to the Egyptians.¹⁰² And one Mercurius, (a Contemporary with Abraham,) called by the Name of Trismegistus; if you will believe Suidas, from his Illuminations in the Mystery of the Trinity, wrote Books about the Contemplation of Divine Things, afterwards translated into the Greek Tongue, wherein we have Traditions, about, The Coming of Christ, the Universal Judgment, The Resurrection of the Dead, The Glory of the Blessed, and particularly, The Mystery of the Trinity.¹⁰³ Mightily does Franciscus Flussus Candalla, magnify one of these Books, (namely, Poimander,) which he published in Greek and Latin, A. C. 1574. In his Dedication to Maximilian the Emperour, he prefers his Mercury before Moses himself.¹⁰⁴ Hannibal Rosselus wrote long Volumns of Commenatries on skeptics doubt the existence of the deities because they appear to be allegories of nature: Chronos symbolizes Time; Hera Air, Hephaestus the metamorphosis of Air into Fire; the Egyptian Osiris represents the Nile (water), Isis the Earth, and Typhon the sea, which swallows up the Nile River. Well, there it is.

101 Witsius (90) censures Athanasius Kircher's Oedipus Aegyptiacus (1652–54): “The more prudent see that those things are commonly empty inventions of clever and idle man who takes advantage of the [ignorant], and the prudent see [the scheme] and laugh.”

102 Witsius (lib. 1, cap. 3, sec. 2, p. 9; lib. 2, cap. 5, secs. 1–2, pp. 91–92) acknowledges Kircher's interpretation of the Tabula Bembinae (Bembin Table) as a representation of the Trinity, in Sphinx Mystagoga (1676), pars 2, cap. 3, pp. 24–29, and in Oedipus Aegyptiacus (1652–54), vol. 3, pp. 78–79. A predecessor of Kircher, Lorenzo Pignoria (1571–1631), an Italian antiquarian of Padua, published Vetustissimae Tabulae Aeneae Sacris Aegyptiorum (1605), better known by the title of the Amsterdam edition Mensa Isiaca (1669), an attempt to interpret the hieroglyphics of the Bembin Table, named after its owner Cardinal Pietro Bembo. See Y. Bonnefoy's Greek and Egyptian Mythologies (262–64) and D. Stolzenberg, Egyptian Oedipus (143–50).

103 Witsius (91–92) enlists the famous Corpus Hermeticum, a collection of 42 books on Egyptian divinity, attributed to Mercurius Trismegistus, aka. Hermes Trismegistus, allegedly a contemporary of Abraham, Zoroaster, or Moses. Hermes or Mercurius Trismegistus (the thrice great) is associated with the Egyptian Thoth (Thought), the purported lawgiver of the Egyptians (Cicero, De natura deorum 3.22; Eusebius Pamphilus, Praeparatio evangelica 1.9.31d–32a). According to the 10th–c. CE Greek lexicon Suda (alphab. letters iota, entry 77, and epsilon, entries 3038–3039), the thrice-great Hermes authored many books, which such early Church Fathers as Lactantius and St. Augustine, as well as such Renaissance authors as Pico della Mirandola and Marsilio Ficino, believed contained pagan mysteries and versions of the teachings of Moses, and those foreshadowing Christ. Mather has much to say on this topic in BA (1:308–16). Composed in Roman Egypt, the Corpus Hermeticum was attributed to the Egyptian Hermes Trismegistus and his follower Asclepius. On the history of this document, see G. Fowden's Egyptian Hermes (1993) and Brian Copenhaver's edition Corpus Hermeticum (1992).

104 Franciscus Flussus Candalla, aka. François de Foix-Candale (1512–94), a French alchemist, humanist, and Renaissance mathematician, translated and published his bilingual Greek-Latin edition as Mercurij Trismegisti Pimandras utraque lingua restitutus (1574), which he dedicated to the Holy Roman Emperor Maximilian II (1527–76) of the Habsburg dynasty.

this Poimander, into which he crouded all the Speculations of the Schoolmen about the Trinity.¹⁰⁵ But it is all Sham; and it is a Wonder, that learned Men will suffer themselves to be Shamm'd with such Peeces of pretended Antiquity.¹⁰⁶ The old Mercury, whom the Egyptians call'd, Thout, and the Græcians, Ερμης, wrote no Books at all; but only left certain Engraved Pillars, which as Pausanias tells us, are lodg'd in Subterraneous Places about Thebes, which they call, The Syringes; whereas Ammianus Marcellinus tells us, the Gentlemen that had Skill in the Ancient Rites, having Apprehensions of a Flood, which might endanger the Loss of them, have with Engraved Hieroglyphicks preserved the Memory of them.¹⁰⁷ The Second Mercury, who rose after the Dayes of Moses, they say, composed his Books, from these Hieroglyphicks. And in the Books of the Second Mercury, (the Son of Agathodemon) we have, it seems, what Sanchoniathon turned into the Phœnician Tongue, and what Manethos into the Græcian. But the Books of the Second Mercury, are indeed as little in our Hands, as of the First.¹⁰⁸ The Forty two

An earlier translation was that of the Italian Renaissance humanist Marsilio Ficino (1433–99), whose Latin translation appeared under the title of Pimander (1469–71). See B. P. Copenhaver's Hermetica, "Introduction" (xl–lv).

105 Mather refers to the Capuchin monk and hermeticist Hannibal Rosselus (fl. 16th c.), professor of philosophy and theology at Crakow (Poland), whose Pymander Hermetis Mercurii Trismegisti, cum commento (1584–90) was published in six massive folios. The applicable volume is Pymander Mercurii Trismegisti. Liber primus de SS. Trinitate (1585), republished in Cologne as Divinus Pymander Hermetis Mercurii Trismegisti, cum commentariis fratris Hannibalis Rosseli Calabri (1630). It is this latter edition to which Witsius (92) refers.

106 Although the Corpus Hermeticum was long believed to be trustworthy, the Swiss-English philologist extraordinaire Isaac Casaubon (1559–1614), in his De Rebus Sacris et Ecclesiasticis Exercitationes XVI (1614), esp. Exerc. 1, sec. 10, pp. 70–87, demonstrated on philological grounds that the Corpus Hermeticum was an early Christian fraud. See A. T. Grafton and J. Weinberg, 'I have always loved the Holy Tongue' (30–42).

107 The Ibis-headed Thoth (Thouth), god of knowledge, whose wisdom was hidden in hieroglyphs, is frequently associated with the Greek Hermes or Mercury. In his Graeciae descriptio (1.42.3, line 4), Pausanias speaks of τὰς Σύριγγας καλουμένας or "the so called Pipes," or colossal stelae of the Ethiopian Memnon, whom the Thebans believed to be "Phamenoph" and others to be Pharaoh Sesostris. Whichever the true original of the statue, the stelae were inscribed with hieroglyphs. Broken into two pieces by Medo-Persian Cambyases, Pausanias reports, the statue "at the rising of the sun ... makes a noise" (Description 1.42.3). The Roman historian Ammianus Marcellinus (Rerum Gestarum 22.15.30) mentions "subterranean fissures and winding passages called 'syringes,'" which the Egyptians (fearing a flood might destroy the memory of their ancient ceremonies and rites) had dug into the ground and decorated the cavernous walls with "many kinds of birds and beasts, and those countless forms of animals which they called hieroglyphic writing."

108 Witsius (93) here draws on a spurious fragment of Manetho's Epistle to Ptolemy II Philadelphus (309–246 BCE), king of Egypt. According to this fragment, extant in Georgius Syncellus, Ecloga chorographica (41, lines 10 ff), Manetho (3rd-c. BCE), an Egyptian historian and priest of Sebennyos (Heliopolis in Lower Egypt), gathered his history from the hieroglyphic inscriptions of Egypt's temples, "traced ... in sacred language and holy characters by Thoth, the first Hermes, and translated after the Flood." These inscriptions had been compiled into a history (the "Book of Sôthis"), by "Agathodaemôn, son of the second Hermès," and by Manetho translated into Greek and dedicated to King Ptolemy II Philadelphus (Pseudo-Manetho).

Ιερατικά βιβλία, Sacerdotales Libri, ascribed unto Mercury, in the Time of Clemens Alexandrinus, were Collections of a very uncertain Original.¹⁰⁹ Be sure they are very unworthy of the Character, that Kircher would sett them off withal. Be sure, to seek for Divine Wisdome of the highest Character, in the Midst of such Dung, is the most Præposterous & Impertinent thing that can be imagined. No Mercury was the Author, of what Kircher ha's given us, as from him, about the Trinity.¹¹⁰ If ever Mercury wrote any thing, tis lost. His Name | was of great Account among the Egyptians; & therefore every Scribbler that would have his Writings of any Account, gott his Name to be some Way or other concerned in them. As the Books of a Medical Importance carried about, under the Name of Mercury, in the Dayes of Galen, have this just Censure of a learned Man upon them, Εὐδῆλον ὅτι λῆρος εἰσι καὶ πλάσματα τοῦ συνθέντος, Manifestum est Nugas esse, et Figmenta ejus qui Librum composuit.¹¹¹ So Poimander ha's evident Marks upon it, of its being Spurious. Casaubon ha's demonstrated, that the Doctrine therein contained, is not Egyptian, but partly Græcian, & partly Christian.¹¹² That old Mercury was Ignorant of the Evangelical Matters contained in it, must be own'd by all that will not betray the grossest Ignorance in themselves. [And forgett, 1. Cor. 2.7, 8, 9; and Rom. 16.25. and Eph. 3.4, 5.]

Tis true, There was in the Egyptian Theology, a mention of a Trinity; but, what an one, lett Plutarch inform you; and how unworthy to be compared with the great Mystery of Christianity.¹¹³

Sanchoniathon (Sanchuniathon, Σαγχουνιάθων) is an ancient Phoenician priest, whose history records the teachings of the priest Hierombalos. According to Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio evangelica 1.9.30d–31d), Sanchoniathon lived before the Trojan War (13th c. BCE), taught in Tyre, and published his Phoenician History, which Philo Byblos (Herennius Philo) translated into Greek.

109 Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 6.4.37.2, lines 1–2) explains that the governor of an Egyptian temple has to “τὰ ἱερατικά καλούμενα δέκα βιβλία ἐκμανθάνει,” i. e., “memorize the ten books called ‘Hieratic,’” i. e., the Books of the Priests, which include the divine laws and the training rituals of the priests (ANF 2:488).

110 Witsius (94); Athanasius Kircher, Obeliscus Pamphilus (1650), lib. 3, cap. 9, p. 213, and lib. 5, cap. 3, pp. 409–44.

111 Claudius Galen's censure in his De simplicium medicamentorum temperamentis ac facultatibus libri xi (vol. 11, p. 798, lines 6–7) reads with diacritics restored, εὐδῆλον ὅτι πᾶσαι λῆρος εἰσι καὶ πλάσματα τοῦ συνθέντος, “It is obvious that they are nonsense and inventions of the composer.” And Mather's Latin version reads, “It is clear that they are trifles and figments of him who wrote the book.”

112 In De Rebus Sacris & Ecclesiasticis Exercitationes XVI (1614), Exercit. I, sec. 10, Apparatus. Num. XVIII, esp. pp. 77–82, Isaac Casaubon dismisses the Poimander and the Corpus Hermenticum at large as a pious forgery by early Christians. An English translation of parts of the Corpus Hermenticum appeared as The Divine Pymander of Hermes Trismegistus, in XVII Books (1650).

113 Witsius (95); Plutarch's trinitarianism, in De Iside et Osiride (373ef), appears to be too close for Mather's comfort: “The better and more divine nature consists of three parts: the conceptual, the material, and that which is formed from these, which the Greeks call the world. Plato (Timaeus 50cd) is wont to give to the conceptual the name of idea, example, or father,

For the other Points of Moral Discipline, which Diodorus pretends to find among the Egyptians, it is well observed by J. Capellus, that the Story is like the Cyropædia of Xenophon, & relates, not what was, but what the Author thought it should have been; and he concludes, Memineris tam Fallaces esse Ægyptios, quàm veraces sunt Sacri Scriptores.¹¹⁴

Marshall himself grants; that the Hebrew Lawes, De illicito concubitu, were very contrary to the Egyptian Customes. Particularly, when the Egyptians allowed a Man to marry his own Sister; which as Diodorus himself grants, was, παρά το κοινόν εθος των άλλων ανθρωπων, Prater communem aliorum hominum Morem.¹¹⁵ Philo does justly Reproach this Usage of the Egyptians, and observes how Abominable it was to our Moses.¹¹⁶ Tho' in the first Family of the World, the Marriage of Brothers to Sisters was necessary, yett as Austin expresses it, Quantò est Antiquius compellente Necessitate, tantò postea factum est Damnabilius, Religione prohibente. And Epiphanius well observes, The Prohibition was more and to the material the name of mother or nurse, or seat and place of generation, and to that which results from both the name of offspring or generation. One might conjecture that the Egyptians hold in high honour the most beautiful of the triangles, since they liken the nature of the Universe most closely to it as Plato in the Republic (546bc) seems to have made use of it in formulating his figure of marriage. This triangle has its upright of three units, its base of four, and its hypotenuse of five, whose power is equal to that of the other two sides. The upright, therefore, may be likened to the male, the base to the female, and the hypotenuse to the child of both, and so Osiris may be regarded as the origin, Isis as the recipient, and Horus as perfected result."

114 Witsius (lib. 2, cap. 6, sec. 1, p. 97, and lib. 1, cap. 5, pp. 19, 20, 21, 22) cites Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca 1.69.6–72.6, 80.3), who speaks admiringly of Egypt as "the most prosperous [land] of the whole inhabited world." Under the rulership of well-educated and benign kings, the Egyptians enjoyed "most excellent customs and laws and . . . institutions which promote culture of every kind" (1.69.6–7). To Mather and his French Reformed colleague Jacobus Capellus (Historia Sacra et Exotica [1613], Anno Mundi 1931, p. 47), such praise for Egypt's long line of enlightened rulers is of a kind with that in Xenophon's Cyropædia (a didactic biography of the Persian Cyrus the Great), which does not present facts as they are but as they ought to be. Thus Capellus concludes, "Remember that the Egyptians were as deceitful as the holy writers are truthful" (p. 48).

115 Witsius (lib. 2, cap. 6, sec. 2, pp. 97–98; lib. 1, cap. 5, sec. 7, p. 20) refers to Marshall's discussion of "De revelatione Turpitudinum, sive Concubitu illicito" (Chronicus Canon [1672], lib. 2, secul. IX, sec. 4, pp. 164–70), "Of the revelation of Shame, or unlawful Sexual Intercourse," which Witsius contrasts with the Hebrew laws against incest. Even Diodorus Siculus, who praises the wholesome laws of Egypt, admits that on the basis of Isis marrying her brother Osiris, the Egyptians made laws παρά τὸ κοινὸν ἔθος τῶν [ἄλλων] ἀνθρώπων (Bibliotheca 1.27.1) "contrary to the general custom of mankind."

116 Witsius (98–99); Marshall (164). In his De specialibus legibus (3.22–24), Philo Judæus explains that the Egyptians laughed at "the cautious timidity of others" like that of Solon, the Athenian lawgiver, who "permitted men to marry their sisters by the same father, [yet] he forbade them to marry those by the same mother"; or like that of the Lacedæmonians who allowed "marriages between brother and sisters by the same mother, but forbade those between brothers and sisters of the same father." Moses, however, rejected "all those ordinances with detestation" (Works 596).

ancient than the Dayes of Moses.¹¹⁷ The Relation of Sarah to Abraham, before their Marriage, is among the Learned, not yett agreed upon. And, if she were the Sister of Abraham, yett it is not safe, In uno facto jus commune fundare. The Clemency of God suffered also in some of the Ancients, many things which His Holiness never approved. Plato damned these Marriages, as μηδαμῶς οσια καὶ θεομιση. Nequaquam Sancta, Sed Deo Invisa. And Seneca calls them Impious.¹¹⁸

Marsham adds, The Allowance given to Fornication, as a notable Resemblance between the Egyptians & the Israelites. But we can more easily grant it, for the former, than for the latter.¹¹⁹ Tis a vile Inference of Maimonides, from the Story of Judah; Quod coitus cum scorto, antè Legem datam fuerit sicut coitus hominis cum Uxore sua.¹²⁰ God at first united One to One. [Consider, Mal. 2.15.] The Institution of God is violated, if the Persons in this Conjunction bee not considered as, One Flesh; which is not intended by Fornicators. And the Apostle decries Fornication, as an Alienation of the Body, from the Service of the Lord, unto the Service of Satan. [1. Cor. 6.13, 15, 16, 18.] Chrysostom notes, That the Pagans themselves never came from such a Business, without washing themselves all over. And the Apostle fetches his Arguments against Fornication, not from any Positive Præcept against it, but from the Natural Turpitude of the Sin, and its Deviation from the Primitive Institution. Tis also to produce an Offspring, which the Parents most unnaturally make the Objects, not of their Love & their Care, but of their Shame. The Confusion which it brings upon Families, is by Maimonides himself acknowledged.¹²¹ We may add, That long before the Law, the Sons of Jacob, look'd on the Name of, Harlot as a Term of Reproach. [Gen. 34.31.] Thamar herself, satt covered, when she betray'd Judah; from whence 117 St. Augustine, De Civitate Dei (15.16. [PL 041.0457–0458]) explains that among the children of Adam and Eve, marriage between brothers and sisters was “as much dictated by necessity in these ancient days as afterwards it was condemned by the prohibitions of religion” (City of God 15.16, in NPNFi 2:297); Epiphanius (Panarion 2:77, lines 9–11).

118 Witsius (101) quotes from Plato's De legibus (8.838b, line 10), who insists that incest is μηδαμῶς οσια [καὶ] θεομιση “absolutely unholy [and] an abomination in the sight of the gods” (Complete Works 1500); and from an extant fragment of Lucius Annaeus Seneca's Senecae Philosophi Scripta quae extant: Hac Postrema Editione Doctissimorum Virorum (1599), fragmenta, p. xxviii. The passage from Seneca (the Elder), which rejects incestuous marriages as “unnatural,” survives in a citation of St. Augustine's City of God (6.10.120), in NPNFi (2:120). Witsius's second-hand quotations originate in Hugo Grotius's famous De Iure Belli ac Pacis (1670), lib. 2, cap. 5, § 13, sec. 6, p. 155.

119 Marsham, Chronicus Canon (lib. 2, secul. IX, sec. 4, pp. 166–67).

120 Witsius (101–02); Maimonides (Liber מורה נבוכים Doctor Perplexorum [1629], pars 3, cap. 49, p. 500) justifies Judah's intercourse with Thamar (whom Judah mistakes for a prostitute) by insisting that “before the giving of the Torah sexual intercourse with a harlot was regarded in the same way as sexual intercourse with one's wife” (Guide 3.49.603). Wait a minute!

121 Maimonides (pars 3, cap. 49, p. 498) and Guide (3.49.602) condemns relations with harlots, “because through them lines of ancestry are destroyed,” when a child is born out of wedlock. “No one knows to what family group he belongs, and no one in his family knows him; and this is the worst of conditions for him and for his father.”

Vatablus gathers, *Non fuisse tunc tam effrænem scortandi licentiam, qualis nunc obtinet.*¹²² And Judah himself, was afraid of Contempt. The Permission, which the Gentiles gave to Fornication, was a Sin against Reason. The Roman Lawyer saies, of the Harlots, *Meretrices turpiter facere quòd meretrices essent.*¹²³ And Tacitus, adds, *Pœnam esse in ipsâ professione Flagitij.*¹²⁴ The Permission of them, was a Judgment of God, whereof we have an Account, in the First Chapter to the Romans. Grotius (on Mat. 5.27.) reckons up Instances, of Gentiles condemning every thing venereal, | except what attends a Lawful Marriage.¹²⁵

In the Matter of Theft likewise, the Ægyptians and the Israelites, are to be opposed, rather than compared. The Ægyptians did not punish, but rather commend, some sorts of Theft, as you will find in A. Gellius, and in Diodorus Siculus. But the Israelites inflicted a Severe Punishment upon it.¹²⁶

The Measuring of Time, with Years and Months, is from Herodotus, & from Diodorus, by Marshall falsely ascribed unto the Ægyptians, as the Inventors of it.¹²⁷

122 Witsius (105) adapts Franciscus Vatablus's annotation on Gen 38:15, which appears in John Pearson's Critici Sacri (1660), 1:342. Whichever original Witsius relied upon, Vatablus's comment on Tamar's betrayal of Judah bespeaks his effort to interpret the action according to the mores of ancient Israel: "that the liberty to associate with harlots was not then so unchecked as it is now."

123 Although Witsius (106) attributes the Latin passage to Prudentius, the quotation is based on Ulpian's summary of Roman Law, in Digesta Iustiniani Augusti 12.5.4.3 (Editio Theodorus Mommsen), 1:378. The passage translates, "Prostitutes shamefully did what prostitutes were."

124 Tacitus (Annales 2.85) thinks that for immoral women "it is a sufficient punishment to acknowledge their shame."

125 Mather alludes to Rom. 1:24, 26–27, and enlists Hugo Grotius's Annotationes (Matth. 5:27), in Opera Omnia (2.1.47–48) for the last word on the subject.

126 Witsius (108); Aulus Gellius (Noctes Atticae 11.18.16) mentions that he read somewhere in the jurist Aristo that among the ancient Egyptians, "thefts of all kinds were lawful and went unpunished." Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca 1.80.1–2) is much more specific and relates a peculiar custom among the Egyptians, in which a thief was not punished, but was required to register his "profession" with "the Chief of the Thieves" and deliver his loot to him, where the rightful owner could redeem it for a fourth of its value. Wall Street ought to put the Sicilian on its payroll.

127 Witsius (lib. 2, cap. 7, sec. 1, p. 109; lib. 1, cap. 6, secs. 2–5, pp. 23–34) rejects John Marshall's widely held claim (Chronicus Canon [1672], lib. 2, secul. X, pp. 236–37) that the Egyptians measured time according to years, months, and days. Herodotus (2.4) deemed the Egyptian system of measuring time far superior to that of the Greeks. "The Egyptians," Herodotus insisted, "were the first of mankind to invent the year and to make twelve divisions of the seasons for it." This division "was based on the stars" and named after "twelve gods." "By allotting thirty days apiece to each of the twelve months (and adding five days outside of the number in each year)," the Egyptians made "the cycle of the seasons come out to the same point as the calendar." Likewise, Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca 1.50.2) agrees and adds that the Egyptians "do not reckon the days by the moon, but by the sun, making their months of thirty days, and they add five and a quarter days to the twelve months and in this way fill out the cycle of the year." Much the same is reported by Strabo (17.1.29, lines 20–23), Plutarch (De Iside et Osiride 12.355de), and others of the ancients. For the different chronologies and measurements of time among ancient civilizations, see P. Rossi's Dark Abyss of Time (chs. 19–20, 22–24).

For in the Mosaic History, we find it an Antediluvian Matter.¹²⁸ And if it were worth our while, we might from Eusebius, bring a whole Army of ancient Authors, who make Abraham the Instructor of the Egyptians in it.¹²⁹ Be it, as it will; great was the Dissimilitude between the Egyptians and the Israelites, in ordering of it; very particularly, in the Business of Intercalation, of which the Egyptians were great Enemies, but the Israelites greatly studious. The Civil and the Sacred Year of the Egyptians, does not correspond at all, with that of the Israelites. Among the Egyptians they were the same. Among the Israelites, the Sacred Year, began at the Vernal Equinox by the Appointment of God; & the Festivals all turned upon it; as upon the Civil Year turned the Account of the Age of the World, the Sabbatical Years, and the Years of Jubilee. God by thus ordering the Year, at the Coming of Israel out of Egypt, proclaimed His Government over them. In Imitation whereof, Julius in the Commonwealth, & Pope Gregory in the Church, of Rome, changed Times.¹³⁰ And God would have Israel to look upon the Month Nisan, as being after a Sort, the Month of their Nativity; & lead a New Life, upon their being thus asserted into a New State, by their Deliverance. The Month was called Abib, among the Hebrewes; which signifies, A New Ear of Corn; as the Greeks called it, μηνα των νεων, [supply, καρπων] The Month of New Fruits. Among the Chaldees, tis called, Nisan; from נִסָּן warly Ensigns; as the Romans called it, Martius, [à Marte.]¹³¹ The Israelites were taught, by this 129 Witsius (110) enlists for his counterargument numerous authors extant in Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio evangelica 9.16.417b–9.18.420c): Josephus Flavius, Berossus, Hecataeus of Abdera, Nicolaus Damascenus, Alexander Polyhistor, Eupolemus, and Artapanus – all asserting that a Chaldean, whom some identify as Abraham, taught the Egyptians their knowledge of astrology. On the apologists' endeavor to credit the Patriarch Abraham or Moses as purveyor of science and culture to Egypt, see A. J. Droge's Homer or Moses? (1–48).

128 Mather alludes to Gen. 7:2, 24; 8:3–5, 13.

130 Roman Emperor Gaius Julius Caesar (100–44 BCE) instituted a reform calendar in 45 BCE, which remained in effect throughout the Roman Empire and in much of the Western hemisphere until Pope Gregory XIII (1502–85) abolished the Julian Calendar in 1582. Because this ancient Roman calendar consisted of 365 days yet without intercalation of an extra day every four years, the Julian Calendar was about 6 hours short per annum in its alignment with the solar year. This annual difference of 6 hours amounted to 10 full days by 1582, when Pope Gregory instituted his Gregorian Calendar, which sought to realign the celebration of Easter with the vernal equinox (c. 21 March) as established by the Council of Nicea (325 CE). March 11, 1582 therefore became March 21, 1582. Of all the Protestant kingdoms and principalities in Europe and America, Great Britain and its American colonies resisted this innovation until 1752, when it adopted the Gregorian Calendar on September 2, 1752, by dropping eleven full days. Thus September 3 (“Old Style”) became September 14, 1752 (“New Style”). Furthermore, the beginning of the New Year, which in the ancient Julian Calendar began on March 15 (“Ides of March”), henceforth officially began on January 1. The first edition of the King James Version of 1611 (Authorized Version) includes in its front matter two tables which establish a combined Soli-Lunar calendar for the entire year along with the applicable biblical passages to be read during morning and evening prayers. More significant, it also provides a perpetual calendar “To finde Easter for ever.”

131 For μηνα των νεων (“the month of new corn”), and καρπων (“fruits” [of the earth]), see for instance Deut. 16:1, Gen. 4:3 (LXX), and Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio evangelica 1.3.20,

Emblem; That from the Time of our belonging unto God, we must bring forth New Fruits, for His Honour & Service; and lift ourselves under the warly Ensigs of our Saviour, against the Enemies of our Salvation. A Blind Jew, quoted by Cartwright, in his Mellificium, yett saw so far, as to Declare, That in this Month, Israel was to be Redeemed by the Messiah.¹³²

There are some other Matters, in which the Reverence we owe to Religion should forbid our making any Comparison between the Egyptians and the Israelites.

The Brasen Serpent is one of those Matters. It is to be confess'd, That of old, the Egyptians, the Marsians, and the Psyllians, and other People of the Orient, had their Talismanical Figures, to save them from Serpents. Arnobius mentions them; & the Nubian Geographer tells of a whole City, namely Emesa, so Talismanised, that no Serpent or Scorpion could enter it, but he presently died upon the Spott. But the Brasen Serpent in the Wilderness, had about it no magical Ceremonies, (which indeed the Lord had strictly forbid unto His People;) It was erected by the Special Command of God, upon the Prayer of Moses for His Distressed People; and a Type of our Blessed Saviour. Hell is not more Distant from Heaven, than the Magic of Egypt, from this wondrous Work of God. Aben-Ezra did well to say, Absit, Absit ut hoc dicamus.¹³³ line 3). The first month in the Canaanite calendar was Abib (March/April) which was renamed ניסן Nisan in the religious calendar of the Hebrews to signify the month of the Israelites' exodus and the observation of the first Passover (Exod. 13:4, 23:15; Deut. 16:1) (HBD). The Roman month Martius is named in honor of Mars, god of war. In the holograph manuscript, Mather misspells /ניסן/ Nisan as /ניסן/ – here silently corrected.

132 Witsius (111–12) quotes from Christopher Cartwright (1602–58), an Anglican clergyman and controversialist, whose Mellificium Hebraicum (1660) (ODNB) can be described as a “rabbinical gloss” on the NT and OT. Published posthumously, Cartwright's Mellificium Hebraicum appeared in Pearson's Critici Sacri (1660) 9:2943–3128. Mather here alludes to an excerpt from Shemoth Rabba (sec. 15, folio 130, col. 3), as quoted in Witsius (111–12). On Cartwright, see G. F. Moore's “Christian Writers on Judaism” (216–17).

133 Witsius's muse on the sacred serpents of the ancients (in Ægyptiaca, lib. 2, cap. 8, secs. 1–2, 4, pp. 112–13, 114; lib. 1, cap. 9, sec. 6, pp. 48–49) is Marsham's Chronicus Canon (1672), lib. 2, secul. IX, pp. 142–43; and Samuel Bochart's magnificent Hierozoicon Animalibus (1663), pars 2, lib. 3, cap. 6, cols. 387–88). If Pliny's extract from Agatharchides can be trusted (Pliny, Historia Naturalis 7.2.14–15), the Psyllians of Libya (N. Africa) were snake-charmers who had developed in their own bodies “a poison deadly to snakes.” They rendered their children immune to the deadliest snakebites by “exposing their children as soon as they were born to the most savage snakes and of using that species to test the fidelity of their wives, as snakes do not avoid persons born with adulterous blood in them.” Likewise, the Marsians (descendants of Ulysses's father Agrius and of Circe, living in Italy) are also immune to snake bites. In fact, the saliva of the Marsians is deadly to snakes. Arnobius (Against the Heathen 2.32) mentions that instead of turning to God, the pagans buy from the Psyllians or Marsians certain “laminæ” (thin plates) or amulets to protect themselves against snakebites (ANF 6:446). The “Nubian Geographer” – so called because the Arab geographer Abu Abdullah Mohammed Ibn al-Sharif al-Idrisi was famous for his Geographia Nubiensis (1619) – describes Emesa, or rather “Hems,” as a city in Palestine, in which the people used charms to protect themselves against the venomous bite of snakes and the sting of scorpions (Climatis Tertii, Quinta Pars, pp. 118–19). The

The Red Heifer is another of these Matters. It must be Red, they say,¹³⁴ because in the Rites of Typhon, who was of that Colour, the Egyptians allowed Beeves of no other Colour. But is no earlier a Testimony than Plutarchs, of Antiquity enough, to satisfy us, that the Red Heifer whereto the Israelites were directed, was of this Original?¹³⁵ How much more does it become a Christian, to have recourse unto the Higher, the Divine Mysteries of the Gospel, in this Institution. Rather than find the Rites of the Red Heifer first in Egypt, one would as easily find them among the Gaurians, the Reliques of some old superstitious Persians, mention'd by Tavernier, as persecuted unto this Day by the Mahometans; but frequent in Carmania, & India; among whom the Urine of an Heifer is continually employ'd as the greatest of all their Lustrations.¹³⁶

The Goat for Azazel, is another.¹³⁷ God had expressly forbidden Sacrifices to Divels; and therefore we may be sure He would not now command the Israelites to sacrifice a Goat unto a Divel, or like the Egyptians, & we know not who, unto some Numen Avertuncum. Tho' Azazel may signify the Divel; yett

Brazen Serpent of Moses (Numb. 21:4–9; 2 Kings 18:4) saved anyone from the bite of a venomous snake if the victim looked upon the statue of the Brazen Serpent with faith. Aben Ezra (Ibn Ezra), in his Commentary on the Pentateuch: Numbers (169), is shocked that many believe the brazen image of the fiery serpent, which Moses set upon a pole, was a talisman that received divine powers from God. “Far be it, far be it” (i. e., God forbid, God forbid) “that one should say so,” because God commanded Moses to make this effigy.

134 Mather here takes aim at John Spencer's De Legibus Hebraeorum (1685), lib. 2, cap. 15, sec. 2, fols. 376–77, and lib. 3, diss. 3, pp. 677–714, in which the master of Corpus Christi (Cambridge) argues that Moses adapted the rite of lustration (ashes of the red heifer) from the Egyptians who revered Typhon as a red bovine.

135 Plutarch (De Iside et Osiride 31.363b) reports that the Egyptians believe that Typhon (Set) was red-complexioned and therefore sacrifice to this gruesome deity the best of their red cattle. See also Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca 1.88.4).

136 Witsius (116) employs Les Six Voyages de Jean Baptiste Tavernier (1676), pars 1, lib. 4, cap. 8. This famous itinerary by the French traveler (1605–89) was translated into many European languages. My reference is to the first English translation, entitled Six Voyages of John Baptista Tavernier (1678), bk. 4, cap. 8, pp. 16–68. Tavernier mentions the “Book of the Gaur,” composed by the Persian prophet “Ebrahim-zer-Ateuchi,” of whose fourteen books received from heaven only seven are extant. The last king of the Gaur, Sha-Iesherd, Tavernier reports, was driven out by Mahomed's successor Omar II. On Tavernier, see also BA (1:463).

137 In his De Legibus Hebraeorum (lib. 3, diss. 8, caps. 1–12, fols. 989–1045, Spencer argues that the Hebrews adapted the concept of the sacrificial scapegoat Azazel (Lev. 16:8–10) from the rite of the Sabians and Copts, who sacrificed a he-goat to the devil to ward off evil. The phrase “to send it [scapegoat] off into the wilderness for Azazel” is one of those biblical conundrums upon which scholars part company. See also Babylonian Talmud (Yoma 39a); the Mishnah, tractate Yoma (4.1–6.8), in The Mishnah (166–70); Tractatus de Die Expiationis (4.1–6.8), in Surenhusius, סדר מועד [Seder Moed] sive Legum Mischnicarum Liber qui inscribitur Ordo Festorum (1699), fols. 226–44. See also ABD. Mather also links Azazel with the devil in his discussion of Thaummatographia Pneumatica, in Magnalia Christ Americana (1702), bk. 6, ch. 7, fols. 66–67.

the Divel was not now considered as Genius aliquis malorum Avertuncator.¹³⁸ In a Word, I beleieve, my Witsius has well compounded the Matter, by saying upon it; Non fuit caper emissarius Diabolo oblatas, sed voluntati Dei expositus vexandus Diabolo.¹³⁹ But the Rites about it, must not be fetch'd from Typhonic or from Rabbinic Fooleries; no, but Ex intimis Christianismi penetralibus.¹⁴⁰ The Throwing of the Goat over a Præcipice, as the Coptites did their Ass, in hatred of Typhon, Marsham himself durst not affirm to be True, but Bochart positively does affirm to be False.¹⁴¹ An Imprecation | upon the Head of the Victim, was indeed, as we learn from Herodotus, an Egyptian Rite; but other Nations as well as they, used it upon their Ἀντιψυχα; and Bochart makes no Doubt, that they learnt it of Moses.¹⁴² The Græcians used it, not only upon Beasts, but also upon Men, who fell under a piacular Character & Intention among them. The Scholiast upon Aristophanes, describes these καθάρματα, and Suidas gives us the Form of the Imprecation used upon them; περιψηματα ἡμῶν γενου, ἥτοι σωτηρία καὶ ἀπολύτρωσις.¹⁴³ And so they threw the Man into the Sea, as an Offering to Neptune. And Servius upon Virgil, relates what was done this Way among the Massilians.¹⁴⁴ [68r]

But it was a great Shame for Samuel Petit, to derive the Frontlets appointed for the Israelites, from the Shameful Amulets of the Egyptians. We find

138 Witsius (120) speaks of the “Numen Avertuncum” or “deity averting harms” and that at that time the devil was not yet considered as “some tutelary deity, a spirit warding off evil.”

139 Witsius (lib. 2, cap. 9, sec. 3, p. 120) argues that “the scapegoat was not offered to the devil, but exposed to the will of God to be vexed by the devil.”

140 According to Witsius (sec. 4, p. 120) the sacrifice of the scapegoat must be read Christologically derived “from the deepest recesses of Christianity.”

141 Witsius (lib. 1, cap. 7, sec. 14–15, pp. 35–36); Marsham, Chronicus Canon (1672), lib. 2, secul. IX, pp. 197–201; Bochart, Hieroicozon Animalibus (1663), pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 64, cols. 650–61, esp. col. 651.

142 Herodotus (2.39) has the Egyptians place a curse on the head of the sacrificial animal, intoning their anathema as follows: “Whatsoever evil there is to be for us who are sacrificing or for all the land of Egypt, let it fall upon this head.” See also Bochart (cols. 657–58). Eusebius Pamphilius (Demonstratio Evangelica 1.10, secs. 7, 11, and 14) speaks of the ἀντίψυχα or substitutionary sacrifice, of one life (animal sacrifice) for another (human). Lucian (Lexiphanes 10, line 20) says it best by identifying the sacrifice with χρήματα ἀντίψυχα “blood-money” (ransom).

143 Witsius (121); the commentators in Scholia in Aristophanem, Scholia in equites (scholia vetera et recentiora Triclinii), (1136c) [2Tr], lines 1–7, describe the καθάρματα or “outcast” (piacular sacrifice) upon whom the sins of the community are laid. The imprecation upon the victim, as recorded in Suda, Lexicon (alphab. letter πi, entry 1355, lines 2–3), reads with Greek diacritics restored, περίψημα ἡμῶν γενού[.] ἥτοι σωτηρία καὶ ἀπολύτρωσις, and suggests that the scapegoat was the “offscourings of our race, the true deliverance and redemption.”

144 Finally, Servius Grammaticus comments In Vergilii Carmina Commentarii (Aeneid 3.57) that the Massilians, whenever they labored under a pestilence, singled out from amongst themselves an impoverished but honest man, supplied him with food from the public rations for an entire year, and afterwards consecrated him with sacred garments, laid upon him the execrations of the entire community, and – like a scapegoat – threw him into the sea (Thilo edition 1:346).

the Totaphot, but thrice mentioned; [Exod. 13.16. and, Deut. 6.8. and Deut. 11.18.] But from the Chaldee Application of the Name elsewhere, we find them to have been Ornaments, both of the Forehead, & of the Hands; Ornaments, and not Amulets, much less things of a Phallous Turpitude.¹⁴⁵ And the Lord seems not so much to say, That He would have the Israelites to make & use their Totaphot, as to say, That the great Works by Him done for them should be instead of their Totaphot; That is to say, That they should always have their Eyes and their Thoughts upon them. It is a Proverbial Expression. [Compare Prov. 1.8, 9. and, 3.3. and, 6.21.] Witsius also approves the Opinion of Pfeiffer, as not improbable; That the Phylacteries used among the Jewes, were not of so ancient Use, as the Dayes of Moses, but came into Use first after the Babylonish Captivity; when their Doctors, began to grow more superstitious in their Expositions.¹⁴⁶ However, he is in the Right on't, That it were better that there had not been left unto Posterity, the least Memory of the Egyptian Amulets, & Phallous & foolish and filthy Images, than that any Man should go to make a Comparison, between the most Holy Appointments of God, and those Wretched & Beastly Trifles. Kircher himself, when he comes to handle them, thus begins; *Restat ut aliquid de Phallophorijs &c quamvis non nisi valde Sobire & Jejune, dicamus. Præstat enim enormia illa, non Sacra, sed Scelera; non Cæremonias, sed Iniquitates; Sacra, inquam, ignominiosissima, veras Diaboli ad animas in omne genus vitiorum præcipitandas adinventiones, æternis tenebris damnare, quam illis recitandis, castis Auribus officere.*¹⁴⁷

Well; But must we not assert the Urim, to be Images of the same Office and Figure, with the Teraphim?¹⁴⁸ No; By no Means. 'Tis confessed by all, That the Teraphim of the Gentiles were an Abomination unto the Lord.

¹⁴⁵ Witsius (lib. 1, cap. 9, sec. 2, pp. 46–47; and lib. 2, cap. 9, secs. 7–11, pp. 122–25) refers to Samuel Petir's Variorum Lectionum IV (1633), lib. 2, cap. 3, pp. 111–12, who points out that the Egyptians employed such amulets as a protection against sexual infertility. The use of amulets for the same purpose, Petit acknowledges, are also mentioned by the Syrian Paraphrast and Hesychius (Lexicon, alphab. letter kappa entry 3521, line 1) where this totaphot (phylactery) is considered an aphrodisiac and symbol of Priapus.

¹⁴⁶ Witsius (124) draws on Dubia Vexata Scripturae Sacrae. Editio Quarta (1699), Centuria Prima, Locus XCII: De Totaphot sive Phylacteriis, pp. 227–29, by August Pfeiffer (1640–98), Lutheran professor of oriental languages, theology, and Hebrew, successively at Wittenberg and Leipzig.

¹⁴⁷ In his chapter on the ceremonies and sacred rites among the Egyptians, Athanasius Kircher (Cedipus Aegyptiacus, tomus I [1652], syntagma III, cap. IX, p. 227), cautions, "There remains, however, something that we should say about Phallus-bearers etc. [but] not unless extremely temperately and abstinently. For it is better that to condemn those irregularities not as sacred rites, but crimes; not ceremonies, but injustices; to condemn to eternal darkness these most disgraceful rites, I say, inventions for hurling true souls of the Devil into every type of vice; to obstruct with chaste ears those repeating them."

A Divination by an Impure Spirit was thereby maintained. [Consider, Ezek. 21.21. and, Zech. 10.2. and, 2. King. 23.24.] That the Teraphim were a sort of Penates, or Household Gods, is evident from the Story of Laban. And from the Syrian Philosophy, we are instructed by Kircher, How they placed them upon Pillars; offered unto them Sacrifices, and Incense; and the Divel at certain times from them, gave Responses unto such as consulted them, Revealing unto them Secret and Future Matters; Atque sic quam plurimas decipiebant Animas, quas rerum Novitate in Servitio suo miserè detinebant.¹⁴⁹ The Rabbins tell us of the Magical Arts used in composing them, & consulting them. Yea, in the Capitula of R. Eliesar, tis affirm'd, That they were made of the Head, of a First-born Son, who was kill'd; which Head was pickled in Salt and Oyl; and had in its Mouth a Golden Plate, on which was the Name of a Dæmon; and placing this against the Wall, they lighted Lamps before it, & fell down, & requested & received Answers.¹⁵⁰ The Author of the Jerusalem-Paraphrase affirms the same; and Kircher does not oppose it.¹⁵¹ Whether all this were done or no, We are sure, That the Speaking Faculty of these Images, was owing to a Magical Original. Even the Pseudo-Mercurius, quoted by Austin, in his, De Civitate Dei, very truly grants it; That the Souls of Dæmons or Angels were by certain Rites, called and Spencer's earlier Dissertatio de Urim & Thummim (1669) subsequently incorporated in his De Legibus.

149 Condemning the ancient use of Teraphim as oracles, Witsius (126) and Kircher, Edipus Aegyptiacus (1652), tom. 1, syntag. 4, cap. 3, p. 258, warn that they could not be trusted: "and thus they were deceiving as many souls as possible, which they were grimly keeping back in his servitude with the novelty of things [fortune telling]."

150 Mather alludes to Solomon Jarchi's commentary on 2 Kings 23:24, where Rashi explains that these teraphim are "images that speak through sorcery; likewise, in Lev. 19:31, Rashi glosses that "one [who] turns to a 'familiar spirit' (yid'oni) ...[places] the bone of a yado'a (a kind of animal) inside one's mouth, from which location the bone speaks" (Mikraoth Gedoloth: 2 Kings, 422; and JPS Miqr'ot Gedolot 3:156). See also the Talmud, tractate Sanhedrin (65b). In פרקי רבי אליעזר [Pirkê de Rabbi Elieser]. Capitula R. Elieser (1644), cap. 36, p. 91, the venerable rabbi explains those who make a Teraphim kill a firstborn son, "pinch off his head, and salt it with salt, and they write upon a golden plate the name of an unclean (spirit), and place it under his tongue, and they put it in the wall, and they kindle lamps before it, and bow down to it, and it speaks unto them" (Pirkê de Rabbi Eliezer, The Chapters, ch. 36, pp. 273–74). See also Mather's annotations on Gen. ch. 31 (BA 1:1040–47).

151 Although Kircher (257) identifies the Targum Hierosolymitanum as the source of his Hebrew citation, the passage appears, instead, in Targum Jonathan ben Uzziel (Gen. 31:19–20), in Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (1653–57) 4:60: "And Laban had gone to shear his flock; and Rahel stole the images [Tsalamania]. For they had slain a man, a first-born, and had cut off his head; they salted it with salt and balsams, and wrote incantations on a plate of gold, and put it under his tongue, and set it up in the wall, and it spake with them; and unto such their father [Laban] bowed himself" (The Targums 1:265). Tellingly, this intriguing passage is absent from the Masoretic texts (Gen. 31:19–20) and makes the origin and function of Laban's Teraphim a dark secret. Kircher most likely did not use Brian Walton's London Polyglot – too late for Kircher's use here – but the Antwerp Polyglot (1569–72) or Le Jay's Paris Polyglot (1645). For Kircher's depiction of the Hebrew Teraphim, see below.

in to possess these Images.¹⁵² And Marsilius Ficinus alluding to that Passage of Trismegistus, tells us, That these Images were made, Arte magicâ.¹⁵³ Indeed Jamblichus talks of them as, Θειας μετουσιας αναπλεα, Simulacra communicatæ Divinæ Essentiæ plena; But our Apostle Paul tells us, The Gods were Divels.¹⁵⁴ And Cyprian speaks but the Truth, when he saies, Hi Impuri Spiritus sub Statuis et Imaginibus consecrates delitescunt, hi afflatu suo vatum pectora aspirant.¹⁵⁵ They that worshipped the True God therefore treated them with the greatest Contempt Imaginable. The Hebrewes, even with a Mistake of the Etymology, will have the Name of Teraphim given them as a Note of Turpitude. Is it at all probable, That the Holy God would adopt these Instruments of detestable Idolatry, and apply them to His own Worship among His People, unto whom [68v] He forbade every thing that might carry in it any Temptation to the | Idolatry of their Neighbours. The Lord had another Way, to sett His People in Point of Oracles, above the Nations round about them, without an Imitation so full of Scandal & of Danger. The bare Change of the Name of Teraphim, into Urim, if the Thing were left, would have been a poor Defence of the Israelites, against their falling into the Use of the Teraphim, so frequently & severely Damned in the Word of God. Yea, The Second Commandment clearly forbids the Making of any such Images. Of all, there were none more strictly avoided according to the Understanding which the Israelites had of that Commandment, as Mr. Selden observes, than those of an Humane Shape.¹⁵⁶ Whoever made such an one, tho' it were only for Ornament, underwent a sharp Scourging among them, & was beaten with many Stripes. 'Tis true, They had their Cherubim; Nevertheless as R. Isaac Mosaiques remarks upon it, In the Form of the Cherubim, there was not 152 Mather, via Witsius (127), refers to the Pseudo-Mercurius (Corpus Hermeticum) as extant in St. Augustine's City of God (8.26), in NPNFi (2:164).

153 Marsilio Ficino (1433–99), the renowned Italian Renaissance humanist and translator of Plato's discourses on the immortality of the soul (Theologia Platonica), compiled a bilingual Greek-Latin edition of the Corpus Hermeticum, Mercurii Trismegisti Liber de Potestate et Sapientia Dei (1493). A copy of the Paris 1554 edition of Mercurii Trismegisti Poemander was accessible at Harvard (Catalogus Librorum [1723], p. 51). Mather's Latin paraphrase signifies that the images were made by "magical arts."

154 The Greco-Latin passage is probably adapted from Iamblichus, De Mysteriis (5.21). Iamblichus talks about them as "images full of the shared divine essence." But the Apostle Paul (1 Cor. 10:20) rejects such pagan tripe: "the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils."

156 Witsius (130); John Selden, De Juri Naturali & Gentium (1640), lib. 2, cap. 6, pp. 185, 187–88, 191–92, 196–200.

the Form of any Thing in the Upper or Lower World; There was no Creature of such a Form. And God, the Law-giver, expressly directed the Making of the Cherubim; we find no such Direction for the Making of Teraphim.¹⁵⁷ Handsomely does Tertullian express himself on this Occasion. *Si eundem Deum observes, habes legem ejus; Ne feceris similitudinem. Si et præceptum postea factæ similitudinis respicis, scilicet ænei Serpentis, et tu imitare Mosem, ne facias adversus legem simulachrum aliquod, nisi et tibi Deus jusserit.*¹⁵⁸

Athanasius Kircher, "Teraphim of the Hebrews," Œdipus Ægyptiacus (Rome, 1652), 1:261.

The Instances that Spencer brings of a Respect paid by the Ancients unto the Teraphim, will not help his Opinion. Who can tell, what was the true Reason, why Rachel stole her Fathers Teraphim?¹⁵⁹ Some think, she did it with a pious Intention, to Recover her Father from his Idolatry. Others think, she did it, so that she might prevent her Fathers Discovering of their present

¹⁵⁸ Tertullian's handsome response in De Idololatria (cap. 5) [PL 001. 0743–0744] warns, "If you reverence the same God, you have, His law, 'Thou shalt make no similitude' [Exod. 20:4]. If you look back, too, to the precept enjoining the subsequently made similitude, do you, too, imitate Moses: make not any likeness in opposition to the law, unless to you, too, God have bidden it" (On Idolatry, ch. 5), in ANF (3:64).

Undertaking.¹⁶⁰ Pererius imagines, That she took the Teraphim, for the Sake of the precious Metal whereof they were composed, that so she might compensate the Injustice that she had suffered from her Father. But, suppose that Rachel had a Religious Respect for them. Her Education in a Family where Superstition had been so long practised, was enough to betray her into it. Jacob was better taught; & would have taught the Family better, but the Women, who are naturally superstitious, were not easily brought from the Vanities received by Tradition from their Fathers.¹⁶¹

To surmise that Jacob had any Veneration for these Tools, is to Reproach the Good Man, without any Shadow of Reason. He expresses an Anger at any of his Family, that should go to steal things of so little Use to his Family; and his Contempt of Gods that would suffer themselves to be stolen. When he found them (as Josephus tells us,) he buried them, with the rest of such Implements, under the Oak at Shechem.¹⁶²

As for the Story of Micah, every thing in it, is of an Idolatrous and an Unlaudable Aspect.¹⁶³ The Hasty Passions of a furious Woman, were the original Occasion of Micah's Action. It was done in a Time Remarkably licentious; and what he did was directly against the Law of God, in the express Terms of it. [Exod. 20.4. Deut. 4.15, 16. Deut. 27.15.] His Teraphim therefore he called, His Gods; and his pretending the Honour of Jehovah in them, was no more an Excuse for them, than for the Golden Calf in the Wilderness. The Fancy, that Micha would have his House to be sanctified with Two Cherubim, is a very Arbitrary one. And if it were so, yett he did sinfully; to bring into his own private Habitation, what peculiarly belonged unto the Tabernacle of God. [Lev. 17.1, 9. Deut. 12.14, 26, 27. & 15.20.] He added unto the Sin, by making his own Son a Priest; when the Priesthood was confined unto the Aaronic Family. [Num. 3.10.] The Effect was Agreeable, and very Lamentable. The Danites carried on the Idolatry, which Micah had thus begun; and it continued until the Captivity of the Land; That is to say, until the Time, when the Ark was taken by the Philistines; in which Calamity, there was a Transmigration of the Inhabitants of the Land: [so the Word imports;] either captivated by, or escaping from, those Troublesome Invaders. Kimchi very Judiciously refers hither the Words of the Psalmist; Psal. 78.58 – They moved Him to Jealousy with their GRAVEN IMAGES; [These of Micah:] – so that He forsook the Tabernacle of Shiloh, – and delivered His Strength into Captivity. It is true, when the Danites enquired about the Success of their Expedition, there was an Answer, which had the Name of Jehovah in it; but the Answer came not from the Glorious Jehovah; it came from a Knavish Levite, who was willing to humour the Wretches, in what they were adoin. Or, the Lord might permitt a lying Demon, to possess the Teraphim, & from thence to utter some true Prædictions.¹⁶⁴

Well, but in the Family of David we find a Teraphim! Yes; but Rivet brands Genebrard with the blame of Intolerable Boldness, for saying, | *Statuam hanc fuisse Sacram, et tales in sua Domo, quasi Lares et Penates, Davidem habuisse.*¹⁶⁵ [69r] Much more in the right is Ribera, who observes, That the Image used by Michal, was not any Idol; (neque enim Idola erant in Domo Davidis;) Nor was it one of the Astronomical Images which the Rabbins talk of. But it was a Statue, of an Humane Shape; Quales Tauris objici solent in circo, aut in hortis poni ad Aves terrendas; The Cloaths of a Man were stuff'd, and the Hair of David was imitated.¹⁶⁶

And ha's there not been enough said now to satisfy us, That the Teraphim were not the same with the Urim, the most Sacred Part of the Pontifical Habili-ments among the Israelites? Indeed Spencer makes a mighty Argument, of what we read threatned about the Israelites in their long Exile; Hos. 3.4. They shall be without an Ephod & Teraphim. But, why may not the Teraphim here, be Instruments of Idolatry?¹⁶⁷ The Lord in the Context saies, concerning the State of Widowhood, wherein the Israelites are to remain many Dayes; Thou shalt not play the Harlot. Cast off by the Lord, they should not fall into the Communion of any other God; but so remain, till God should see His Time to marry Himself

166 The third-hand citation from In Librum Duodecim Prophetarum Commentarij (1593), in Hoseam Prophetam Commentarii (cap. 3, p. 74, # 21), by the Spanish Jesuit theologian Franciscus Ribera (1537–91), reads, "neque enim Idola erunt in Domo Davidis," but is by Witsius (141–42) taken at second hand from Rivet's Exercitationes (p. 651). At any rate, Ribera argues that Michal's image in King David's bed was neither an idol (Teraphim), "nor, in fact, did an Idol exist in David's house." To be sure, Mather insists, this statue was in the shape of a human being, such an one "that were accustomed to being thrown to the bulls in the circus, or to be placed in gardens in order to frighten birds [i. e., scarecrow]." Witsius (141–42) quotes Ribera (p. 74, # 21) at second hand from Rivet (p. 651). 1 Sam. 19:13–16. See also Mather's commentary on 1 Sam. 19:13 (BA 3:307).

again unto them. Hence, the Instruments both of True Worship, and False, were to be withheld from them, for these many Dayes.¹⁶⁸

It is added in the Prophecy, They shall be without an Image, or Statue. The Word may signify, A monumental Stone; like that erected by Jacob. Jacob's Action was Pious, and Approv'd of God. [Gen. 31.13.] And yett it seems to have been a Stone of Stumbling unto the Canaanites in the Neighbourhood. The Jewes tell us, That the Stone became hateful to God, because the Canaanites at length paid an Idolatrous Respect unto it. And the Phœnicians did in Imitation of that, sett up other Stones, which were called Betylia, and Betyli, in Conformity to the Name of Bethel. We find them in Antiquity called, λίθους ἐμψυχους, Animated Stones, and perhaps Prastigious Demons might give the People Occasion to count them really so.¹⁶⁹ Damascius a superstitious Pagan, in the Dayes of Justinian writes, That he himself saw, τον Βαιτυλον δια του αερος κινουμενον· A Betylian Stone moving in the Air. And Isidore the Philosopher, saies, It was moved by a Demon.¹⁷⁰ The Lord, that He might save His People, from such Superstitions of the Gentiles, commanded, them to overthrow all such Monuments. [Exod. 23.24. and 34.13. and Deut. 12.3.] And forbad their Erecting of any such themselves. [Lev. 26.1. and Deut. 16.22. and 1. King. 14.24.] We need not enquire, If these Monuments were Criminal Things, how & why, it should be a Threatning unto the Israelites, That they should be without them? The Carrying away of the Calf at Bethel, by Salmanassar is putt into a Threatning. [Hos. 10.5, 6.] If a Thing be Good in the Opinion of a People, tho' it be not in Reality so, the Taking of it away may be Matter for a Threatning. For a Nation to have their False Gods Triumphed over, is more than (what Spencer calls it,) A phantastical Punishment.¹⁷¹ [Compare, Isa. 46.1, 2. Jer. 48.7. and 49.3. and Amos. 1.15.] Besides, There is no need of our Looking on it as a Commination, That Israel should be without an Image & without a Teraphim. Tis but an Explication of that Clause, Thou shalt not play the Harlot.¹⁷²

168 Mather takes exception to Spencer's audacious argument (De Legibus [1685], lib. 3, diss. VII, cap. 3, secs. 2–3, 7–8, fols. 866–73, 888–900) that the Urim and Thummim (Exod. 28:30), objects in the breastplate of the High Priest, were not only used for divination, but were similar to, if not identical with, the Teraphim that were employed for many of the same purposes.

169 The Palestinian grammarian and historian Herennius Philo of Byblius (Fragmenta, vol.-Jacoby # F 3c, 790, F, fragm. 2, line 132) mentions the βαϊτύλια, i.e., "Baetylus" or "sacred stone" (Gen. 28:11–19) among the ancient Phoenicians, who believed (says Sanchoniathon) the λίθους ἐμψυχους was an "animated stone" made by the god Uranus. The last master of the Athenian Academy, the Greek Neoplatonist philosopher Damascius (fl. early 6th c. CE) describes the βαϊτύλον διὰ τοῦ αἰέρος κινούμενον as "a stone flying in the air" (probably a meteorite), in his Vita Isidori (fragment 203, line 1). KP (1:1371).

170 And Damascius says (Vita Isidori, fragm. 203, line 28) that according to the Neoplatonist philosopher Isidore of Alexandria (c. 450–520 CE), a student of Photius in Athens, this sacred stone or εἶναι γὰρ τινα δαίμονα τὸν κινούμενον "was moved about by a demon."

The Cherubim or Figure of the Great Ones. ^{Heavenly Writings Perfect}

and the Origin of all Such among the Heathens.*

John Hutchinson, The Covenant in the Cherubim (London, 1749), frontispiece.

From Teraphim let us pass to Cherubim.¹⁷³ The Egyptians had their God Hempta; and he had certain Genius's Attending him; One had the Face of a Boy; Another, the Face of a Dog; A Third, the Face of an Hawk; A Fourth, the Face of a Lion. Well; And now, was not Hempta, the same with the God /אֵמֶת/ Emet, of the Israelites? And were not the Cherubim, an Imitation of Hempta's Attendants? God forbid, we should imagine so. We have no Proof of Hempta's Antiquity; And neither the Number nor the Figure of his Attendants, was the same with the Cherubim in the Tabernacle. But the Cherubim now falling under our Consideration, Let us be more particular about them.¹⁷⁴

The First Mention we find of the Cherubim, is upon the Expulsion of our First Parents out of Paradise. [Gen. 3.24.] Angels were doubtless intended; but in what Form they appeared, is not mentioned. [Only compare, Num. 22.22, 23. and Josh. 5.13. and 1. Chron. 21.16.] Tis not improbable, That Moses might 173 In his annotation on Gen. 31:19, Mather waxes prickly: "The Opinion of Moncaeus, and Gaffarel, and Spencer, is by no means to be allow'd; That the Cherubim and the Teraphim, were the same. The Cherubim were a Mixed Figure, of no less than Four Animals; as they are described by Ezekiel: whereas the Teraphim were purely of an Humane Shape. And yett we may say, That the Teraphim were among the Idolaters, what the Cherubim were unto the Israelites" (BA 1:1045).

174 Witsius (lib. 1, cap. 9, p. 46; lib. 2, cap. 13, p. 154) leans on Athanasius Kircher's Sphinx Mystagoga, sive Diatribe Hieroglyphica de Mumiis (1676), pars 2, caps. 2, 4, pp. 21–22, 29–35; pars 3, caps. 3, 4, pp. 56–57, 66, 68–69; and on Spencer's Disertatione de Urim & Thummim (1669), cap. 4, sec. 13, pp. 222–23. It is intriguing that Mather excerpts this paragraph from Witsius (p. 46) without mentioning Kircher, who explicates the mystical numen Hempta (Emet), as the ram-headed Khnum (Kneph), the supreme creator god of the Egyptians, whom the Greeks called Jupiter Ammon (Kircher, Sphinx, 21, 22–23, 29, 52, 57, 66). He is attended by certain guardian spirits (genii): the boy-faced Horus (son of Isis and Osiris), god of the sentient world (Kircher 21, 23, 29, 31–32); the jackal-headed Anubis (the Egyptian Mercurius), custodian of the souls of the dead before their judgment (Kircher 49, 56, 61, 69); hawk-headed Thauustus, associated with the heat of the sun and the source of the earth's fertility (Kircher 23, 29, 51, 68); and finally, the lion-faced Momphta (Mophta), guardian of the sacred Nile, who presides over the watery world (Kircher 33, 35, 68–69, 71). Mather here wrestles with the astonishing similarities between divine and pagan emblems outlined by Kircher (but here borrowed from Witsius), for the four attending genii of the Egyptian Hempta seem akin to the attending cherubim in Ezekiel's Merkabah vision (Ezek. 1:10–11; 10:14): "As for the likeness of their faces, they [sic] four had the face of a man, and the face of a lion, on the right side; and they four had the face of an ox on the left side, they four also had the face of an eagle. Thus were their faces: and their wings were stretched upward; two wings of every one were joined one to another, and two covered their bodies" (Ezek. 1:10–11). Mather's gloss on Ezek. 10:14 reads, "The first Face, was the Face of a Cherub: That is to say, of an Oxe, or, a Calf: A Representation of great Account among the Jewes, for the sake of their Joseph. It is here intimated, That the Upper Part of the Cherubims Head, was distinguished, & remarkable, for Circumstances, that had something Bovine in them. The Second Face, was the Face of a Man; That is to say, The whole Countenance was Humane. The Third, the Face of a Lion; That is to say, The Neck, & the Main, was Leonine. The Fourth, the Face of an Eagle; This was in the Wings added unto their shoulders" [BA 6: Ezek. 10:14]. See also Mather's commentary on Acts [BA 8: Acts 7:2] and my introduction, section 2.

write his Book of Genesis, in the Wilderness, after the Tabernacle was erected, with all its Furniture. Cherubim, were Part of that Furniture, & the Name refers not so much to the Shape of the Emblem, as to the Thing signified under it; the Ministry of the Holy Angels. [Compare, Psal. 18.11.] The Shape, of the Cherubim ha's diverse things remarked by Moses concerning it; [Exod. 25.18, 19, 20.] from whence we learn, That they were Flying Animals; but of what Sort they were, how many Wings they had, & how many Faces, & what was the Form of the rest of their Body, Moses is wholly silent. However, tis plain, That Moses took not his Pattern from the Idols of Egypt, ut from what he saw on the Holy Mountain. We perceive also, That the Cherubim in Solomons Temple, differed somewhat from those in Moses's Tabernacle. [1. King. 6.27.] | Their Looks and their Wings, were another Way. And all that we can hitherto learn, is, That they were Statues, with Wings, Large and Spread. But when we come to Ezekiels Temple, the Description proceeds a little further. Two Faces are seen upon the Cherubim; And Humane and a Leonine. [Ezek. 41.20, 21.] Nevertheless they are here but as exhibited on a plain Wall; & so but Half of their Faces are in the Exhibition. In Ezekiels Vision, we see them with Two more Faces; a Bovine, and an Aquiline; and now, their Wings were neither stretch'd Forward, as were those of the Mosaic Cherubim; nor stretch'd Sideways, as were those of the Solomonic Cherubim; But, they lifted upwards Two of their Wings, & with Two they covered their Bodies. [Ezek. 1.5.] From Ezekiels Particularity, in giving an Account of his Cherubim, one would think, they should not be just the same, with those in the Tabernacle and the Temple; the Form whereof was well known to all the People of Israel. Nevertheless, the Form of those Cherubim, is to be gathered from something in these; especially from one Clause, [Ezek. 10.14.] where, The Bovine Face, is by way of Peculiarity called, The Face of a Cherub. And the Name comes from כְּרֻב / כֶּרֶב which signifies, To plough. A Cherub is, Βούς Ἀρωτήρ.¹⁷⁵

Upon the whole, Dr. Witsius thus defines the Cherubim; They were, *Animantia insolita, Bovini corporis speciem quoad maximam sui partem representantia, instructa grandibus Alis, incertum quot, et binis ad minimum Faciebus, Leoninâ atque Humanâ; Creatures of a strange Composition;*¹⁷⁶ in their Bodies for 175 The Hebrew term כְּרֻב or כֶּרֶב [keruwb] suggests "cherub, cherubim, an angelic being, as guardians of Eden" (Strong # 3742). Although of uncertain derivation, "cherub" is here associated with the infinitive "to plough." Hence a cherub is a βούς ἁρωτήρ or "plowing oxen," and the cherubs on the Mosaic Ark of the Covenant (Exod. 25:19) as creatures of bovine shape. See also Jacques Saurin, Dissertations (486, 487), Spencer's De Legibus (lib. 3, diss. 5, cap. 3, sec. 1, fol. 764), and Mather's annotation on Exod. 25:18 (above). In Mather's day, Samuel Bochart's Hieroicoicon (pars 1, lib. 2, caps. 28–42, cols. 274–416) is the standard source for all discussions relating to the significance of calves, bulls, and other assorted bovine figures revered among the ancients.

176 Witsius explains these cherubim were "unusual animals, manifesting the shape of a bovine body in respect to the largest part of them, equipped with full-grown wings; it is unclear how many, and along with at least two faces, leonine and human." Mather subsequently paraphrases Witsius's description.

the most Part repræsenting an Oxe; but furnished with great Wings; and having at least those Two Faces; the one, of a Man, the other, of a Lion. This is all we know of them; The Traditions and Additions of the modern Masters, are Vain and False, or, at best, uncertain, and perhaps the wretched Fancies of a Jewish Brain. Josephus the Jew, is more modest than any of them; who thus defines the Cherubim, ζῶα πετεινα κλ. *Flying Animals, like nothing seen among Men, but like what Moses did see under the Throne of God.*¹⁷⁷

Akin to these, Cherubim of Ezekiel were the Animals in the Visions of John. The Notion (brought by Mede.) of an Allusion therein, unto the Ensigns, in the Banners, of the Israelites in the Wilderness, is confuted by Launæus, by Bochart, by Heidegger; as a Figment of a very late Invention. But now, what Ezekiel saw compacted into one Animal, John saw distinguished into Four. Grotius gives an elegant Reason for it; Quarè id? Quia omnia in Novo Testamento distinctius quam in vetere noscuntur. And Cornelius à Lapide has the same Gloss upon it. But Launæus will have the Form of each Animal beheld by John, to be just the same, with what was beheld by Ezekiel.¹⁷⁸ Only John described the Face, of each, that was looking towards him, as they were Standing about the Throne: But Ezekiel saw them in Motion to & fro, upon the Execution of the Divine Commands; & so had Opportunity to see every Face, that was upon each of them. Ezekiels Cherubim had but Four Wings; Johns had Six, and so had Isaiahs. Johns and Isaiahs were About the Throne; and so they needed a Pair of Wings for the Covering of their Faces; (yett not so, but that they might bee seen:) But Ezekiels were Below the Throne; where they had not the same Occasion.¹⁷⁹

177 Witsius (lib. 2, cap. 13, sec. 15, p. 159). Josephus Flavius (Antiquitates 3.117, line 2) describes the cherubim as ζῶα πετεινὰ “flying creatures.” See also Antiquities (3.6.5 and 8.3.3).

178 Witsius (160–61, 162–63); Joseph Mede, Works (1664), bk. 5, cap. 12, pp. 1121–22, argues that the polymorphous shape of the cherubim – lion, ox, eagle, and man – represents the ensigns of “three Tribes to a Standard” of the twelve tribes of Israel. The French Reformed theologian Pierre Launæus, aka. de Launay, Sieur de la Motte et Vauferian (1573–1661), pseudonym Jonas le Buy, associates the cherubim with God’s glory, in Paraphrase et Exposition sur les Epistres. Seconde Partie (1650), pp. 559, 567; see also his annotations on Rev. 4:6–9, in Paraphrase et Exposition sur L’Apocalypse (1651), pp. 121–32. Samuel Bochart (Hieroicoicon, pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 41, col. 412, lines 26–46; lib. 3, cap. 6, col. 770); and Johann Heinrich Heidegger’s אֲבוֹת רַשִׁי Sive De Historia Sacra (1729), 1:105, Exercit. IV: De Adamo et Eva, § 70; and 2:381–82, Exercit. XIX: De Dudaïm Rubenis, 2:381, § 13. Hugo Grotius (Annotationes [Exod. 25:8, in Opera 1.1.55) argues that the four creatures – man, eagle, lion, and oxen – are respectively symbols of goodness, swiftness, vengeance, and slowness.” Still not satisfied, Mather wonders with Grotius at his side, “Why is that? Because all things are known more distinctly in the New Testament than in the Old.” So, too, does Cornelius à Lapide, who is magically drawn to these symbolic animals and offers a nearly exhaustive analysis of the shape and significance of the cherubim, in his commentary on Exod. 25:18 (Commentaria in Pentateuchum Mosis [1659], pp. 508–14). See also Mather’s annotations on Exod. 25:18 (above) and the main contestants in the debate as synopsized in Poole’s Synopsis Criticorum (1:446–47) and Works (5:205–07).

179 Witsius (163–65).

Hitherto, our Discourse is more Barren of useful Thoughts than we would have it. Lett us fly, & soar up, to a more profitable Conversation with the Cherubim.

The Cherubim that were placed over the Mercy-Seat upon the Ark, doubtless were to represent the Angels of God. Hence we read, Psal. 68.17. Sinai is in the Sanctuary. That is to say, Those that were truly on Sinai, were Symbolically represented, in the Sanctuary. There the Son of God appeared with His Holy Myriads of Angels, for the Giving of His Law. And here the Lord as it were satt on a Throne, with Angels about Him, and the Book of the Law, laid up in His Ark. The Attendance, which the Angels give unto our Lord-Redeemer, was hereby signified. The Excellency of the Angelical Nature, was intimated in the Gold, whereof the Cherubim were composed. Their Contiguity with the Mercy-Seat, & their Composition of the same Matter & Metal with it, intimated, That by the Propitiation which our Lord-Redeemer ha's made, Elect Men come to be united in the same Heavenly Commonwealth, with the Angels of God. Their Extending of their Wings over the Mercy-Seat, intimated, That the Protection which the Angels of God give unto us, is owing to the Propitiation made by our Lord. They Both did Bend their Faces, towards the Ark; To intimate their studious Enquiries into the Mystery of Christ; & how their Exemple is followed by the conjunct Endeavours of the Saints, who have obtained the like precious Faith under both Testaments.¹⁸⁰

| The Cherubim seen by Ezekiel, were also to intimate the Ministry of Angels. [Compare Zech. 6.6.] The Four Parts of the World, the Four Sides of the Temple, the Four Gates of the New Jerusalem, are answered in the Number of them; They are enough to perform the great Works of God, both in the World, & in the Church. The Wheels under their Management, intimate the Revolutions made in the Divine Providence. The Colour of the Wheels, being the mixt Colour of a Sardonyx, White and Red; it intimates the Temperament of Mercy and Justice, in the Divine Dispensations. The Eyes in the Wheels, intimate, the watchful Wisdome of Heaven, wherewith all things are carried on. The Dreadful Heighth of the Rings, intimates the Unsearcheableness of the Counsels and Judgments of God. A Wheel within a Wheel, may note the Admirable Agreement in the Works of the Lord. The Faces of the several Animals, may intimate something Analogous to the Properties of the Animals, here which wear the like Faces. We may add This; Two of the Faces belong to Wild Creatures; Two, to Tame. This may be, for the Terror of the Wicked, & for the Comfort of the Godly. The Lion seeks his Prey below; the Eagle seeks it Above. Not only Sinners upon Earth, but also Wicked Spirits in High Places feel the Restraints of the Angels. The Man, and the Ox, are both of them Terrestrial Creatures; We need the 180 Witsius (166–67).

Help of the Angels only while we are in our Terrestrial Circumstances; not after we come to Heaven. Bochart fetches these Hints, out of Launeus (or, Jonas Le Buy), upon the Revelation.¹⁸¹ The Bovine Foot of the Cherubim, notes the Steadiness of the Angelical Administration; their not being Hastily produced, nor Easily diverted. And their Sparkling like the Colour of Burnished Brass, intimates the Charity, the Sanctity, the Zeal for the Divine Glory, in all their Motions. Their Wings intimate the Celerity of their Obedience in the Commands of God. The Hands under the Wings, intimate, their Good, Wise, Regular, Conduct, accompanying the Celerity. Their Two Wings, lifted Upwards, intimate their continual Respect unto God, & Concern to have the Elect of God carried up unto Him. Their Two Wings with which their Body was covered, intimate, shall we say, their Modesty, or their Invisibility. Their going strait forward, intimates, In Vijs Dei non retroceditur; non est Via curva. There is a Regularity also in all the Angelical Actions; Nothing to be recalled, nothing retracted.¹⁸²

The Cherubim in the Visions of John, are of the same Importance. Tis much better to understand them, of the Angels, than of the Church; the Things attributed unto them are Angelical. That Clause, about, Redemption by the Blood of the Lamb, in the Song, [Rev. 5.9, 10.] may without any Difficulty, be restrained unto the Four & Twenty Elders. Tis a Rule, Prædicata suum monstrant Subjectum. [See Examples, Neh. 12.1, 2. and Jer. 21.7.]¹⁸³

Finally; Tis the Duty of the Faithful to Imitate the Angels; quo ii qui Angelis aliquandò similes se futuros esse sperant in Glorâ, ijsdem etiam similes sint in Sanctimoniâ.¹⁸⁴

III. The Third Assertion.

Those Points, wherein the Israelites agree with the Egyptians, are for the most part such as the Egyptians had in common with other Civilized Nations; & such as flow'd from the same Common Fountain of Natural Reason, or of 181 Bochart (Hieroicoicon, pars 1, lib. 3, cap. 6, col. 770, lines 45–48) synopsisizes Pierre de Launay's annotations on Rev. 4:6–9, in Paraphrase et Exposition sur L'Apocalypse (1651), exposition de chapitre IV, esp. pp. 121–32.

182 Witsius (167–68). With Witsius (168) at his side, Mather proclaims that “In the ways of God there is no going back; the way is not crooked.”

183 Witsius's rule (169) is “Preordained things make known their own matter.”

184 Witsius's concluding thought (169), that it behooves us to imitate angels, exhorts his readers, “for those who hope that they would be in glory like angels one day may also be like them in sanctity.” This evasive answer bespeaks Witsius's exasperation more so than it does his satisfaction with finding a watertight solution. Yet in cutting through this Gordian knot of figural bestiaries, he has good precedence in Maimonides (Guide 1.49.109–10; 2.6.262; 3.45.577). As Mather put it, “Be the Figure what it will; it is evident, That the Cherubim which Moses made by the Order of GOD, were Emblems of ANGELS.” For according to Maimonides, God's design “was to inculcate the Doctrine & Beleaf of ANGELS” (BA 2:340).

General Tradition; both of which also were more pure & clear among the Israelites, than among the other Nations.¹⁸⁵

We will begin with the Doctrine of the Creation. The Egyptians had nothing laudable in their Thoughts about it, but what was to be found among the other Gentiles. Plato was not the only Pagan, who held, the World, δια την του θεου γενεσθαι προνοιαν, was made by the Providence of God; but as Lactantius tells us, Uno Spiritu et Pari voce restantur, et inter philosophos penè universos convenit.¹⁸⁶ Strabo tells, that the Ancient Indians beleaved that God was the Creator & Governour of the World; and how remarkably tis beleaved by the Modern Indians in America, is now known to all the World.¹⁸⁷ As the Λογος δημιουργος, or, Creating WORD, was acknowledged by the Egyptians, thus was the, Νους and Ἀυδη, the Mind, & the Voice, that made all things among the Gracians.¹⁸⁸ The Quotations wee might bring to this Purpose, would be enough to overwhelm us. There are

¹⁸⁷ Witsius (lib. 2, cap. 14, p. 171); Strabo (Geographica 15.1.59, lines 47–52) relates that the Brachmanes (Brahmins) of India agree with the Greeks “that the universe was created and is destructible ... that it is spherical in shape, and that the god who made it and regulates it pervades the whole of it; and that the primal elements of all things else are different, but that water was the primal element of all creation; and that, in addition to the four elements, there is a fifth natural element of which the heavens and the heavenly bodies are composed; and that the earth is situated in the centre of the universe.” Witsius's source on the “Modern Indians in America” is Tobias Pfanner's Systema Theologiae Gentilis Purioris (1679), cap. 5, § 11, p. 156, and cap. 21, §§ 6, 19, p. 464, 467, 471, who cites from Descriptio Novum Anglorum (pars 1, cap. 4, p. 76), by Richardus Waitbornius, probably Richard Whitbourne (1561–1635), an English merchant adventurer and colonist, whose Descriptio was reprinted in Theodor de Bry's Historiae Americae sive Novi Orbis, continens in XIII. distinctis partibus. Decima tertia pars Historiae Americanae, quae continent exactam et accuratam descriptionem Novae Angliae, Virginiae, Brasiliae, Guianae et Insulae Bermuda (1634), pars XIII, lib. 1, cap. 4, p. 76. Thus Pfanner (1641–1716), a German Lutheran theologian and jurist, supplies Mather (via Witsius) with the third-hand reference to the beliefs of the indigenes of New England and Guiana. No doubt, Mather had access to more immediate sources on the religions of Native Americans; any number of John Eliot's tracts or, at the very least, Roger Williams's Key into the Language of America (1643), would have done the job. Circuitous as the network of information remained in Mather's day, this meandering form of source citations was still commonplace.

enough of them collected by Elias Schediūs, in his Treatise, De Dijs Germanis. And the Words of Maximus Tyrius are singularly emphatical.¹⁸⁹

Whatever the Egyptians have about the Order of the Creation, agreeable to the Mosaic Account, we find also among the Græcians. As Moses begins the Creation, with the Making of Heaven and Earth, so does Plato, with Fire and Earth. Answerable to the Tohu Vabohu, is the Poets, Rudis indigestaque moles. Thales ha's the Dark præceding the Day; and so ha's Aristophanes, as well as Moses.¹⁹⁰

Well; But the Græcians learnt these things from the Egyptians. Lett it be so.
[70v] But from whom did the Egyptians learn them? Surely, | Not from the Sagacity of their own Invention.¹⁹¹ Why might not both of them, learn from the pious Posterity of Shem, whom God had made the Depositories of His Truth? Learned Men have admirably cultivated this Assertion. Yea, why might not the Wise Men of all the Nations, derive their Wisdome, from the Chaldeans, whom Cicero calls, Antiquissimum Doctorum genus? Orpheus in his Verses, refers to them.¹⁹² And Clemens upon those Verses, makes Abraham to be in a peculiar Manner

189 Mather refers to De Dijs Germanis, sive Veteri Germanorum, Gallorum, Britannorum, Vandalarum Religione (1648), Syn. 1, cap. 12, pp. 221, by Elias Schedius (1615–41), a learned German Lutheran whose posthumously published work is among the first scholarly studies of Germanic mythology. See J. Bolte, “Schedius, Elias” (ABD 30:662). The Greek philosopher-rhetorician Maximus Tyrius (2nd c. CE) has much to offer on such numinous topics as the Egyptian Jupiter Ammon, the creator of the world (Dissertationes XXV, 2:48–58). See also Witsius, Aegyptiaca (1696), lib. 2, cap. 14, pp. 170–76.

190 Through Witsius (173), Mather hitches to his wagon Plato's Timaeus (31b, lines 6–7; 42e, lines 9–10): ἐκ πυρὸς καὶ γῆς (“out of fire and earth”); then the Mosaic מוֹחַ וְבוֹהוּ tohu vabohu (Gen. 1:2): “without form and void”; then Ovid's Metamorphoses (1.7), chaos, “a rude and indigested mass”; then the tongue-in-cheek response of the pre-Socratic philosopher Thales of Miletus (c. 624–546 BCE): “ἡ νύξ,” εἶπε “μῶν ἡμέρα πρότερον” (“The night earlier by one day”), who addresses the question, whether night or day existed first (Diogenes Laertes, Vita philosophorum 1.36, lines 2–3); then the rear is brought up with Aristophanes's Aves (693–94): Χάος ἦν καὶ Νύξ Ἐρεβός τε μέλαν πρῶτον καὶ Τάρταρος εὐρύς γῆ δ' οὐδ' ἄρ' οὐδ' οὐρανός ἦν. (“Only Chaos, Night, dark Erebus, and deep Tartarus existed in the beginning; earth, the air, and heaven had no existence”) – all this to evince that the Egyptians had nothing on their Mediterranean neighbors.

191 See Hugo Grotius, De Veritate Religionis Christianae (1627), lib. 1. § 16. The Truth of the Christian Religion (1719), bk. 1, sec. 16, pp. 27–68.

192 Witsius (174–75); the Latin quotation is not from Cicero but from a summary statement in an encyclopedia entry on “Philosophia,” in Johann Jacob Hofmann's Lexicon Universale, Historiam Sacram et Profanam (1698), tom. 3, p. 722. Here the author argues that the ancient philosophy was by Abraham, the Chaldean, taught to the Babylonians and Assyrians, who in their turn passed it on to Greeks. Be that as it may, the Latin passage, which Witsius attributes to Cicero (one of Hofmann's several sources), explains that the Chaldeans are an “ancient race of wise men.” See Cicero's De Divinatione (1.1.1–3). The divine singer Orpheus knew, so Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 5.14.123.2) and Eusebius Pamphilus (Præparatio evangelica 13.13.50, lines 1–14; 685ac) relate in an extant fragment, that the invisible God was known to one Chaldean, of whom Orpheus chants, “But one a scion of Chaldean race;/ For he the sun's path knew right well,/ And how the motion of the sphere about/ The earth proceeds, in circle moving/ Equally around its axis, how the winds/ Their chariot guide o'er air and sea” (The Stromata 5.14), in ANF (2:472).

intended. And, by the way, Orpheus was counted the Son of Musæus, (that is to say, Of Moses;) because he learn'd all his Theology of Moses, probably Orpheus himself designs Moses, in that Stroke.

Ὡς λόγος αρχαίων, ὡς υδογενῆς διατάξεν·

Moses, one Drawn out of the Water, was very agreeably called, υδογενῆς.¹⁹³

Nor were the Egyptians, the only People, that beleev'd, The First man to be made out of the Earth, with a Spirit infused into him of God, which imprinted the Image of God upon him. Socrates, and Zeno, and Plato, affirmed, the Original of Man to be of the Earth; and say, that this is ἐν των παλαι λεχθεντων· Ex ijs quæ ab antiquo memorentur.¹⁹⁴ Yea, Vossius will have Adana the ancient City of Cilicia, built by the Syrians, to retain in it, the very Name of the First Man, Adam. The Greeks not having any Words, that end in M, they pronounced the Name, Ἀδαν.¹⁹⁵ And Epicharmus in Plutarch, taught, That the Soul of Man is inspired from Heaven; πνευμα δε ανωτι.¹⁹⁶ Grotius brings us the like out of Euripides;¹⁹⁷ Yea, and Ovid finds Man made, in Effigiem moderantum cuncta 193 Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio evangelica 13.12.5, line 36) cites Orpheus from a fragment extant in Aristobulus: Ὡς λόγος αρχαίων, ὡς υδογενῆς διατάξεν, ("So men of old, so tells the Nile-born sage"). The υδογενῆς, i. e., "water-born" or "Nile-born" sage is, according to Eusebius, none other than Moses, who was pulled from the Nile by pharaoh's daughter (Praeparatio 13.12.666d; see also 9.27.432b). On the efforts of Jewish apologists – Eupolemus, Artapanus, Josephus, and Philo of Byblos – to crown Abraham, Joseph, and Moses as the original conduits of wisdom, culture, and religion to Chaldaea, Egypt, and Greece, see A. J. Droge, Homer or Moses? (1–48). See also Mather's BA (1:307–16, 358–69, 380–83).

194 Witsius (lib. 2, cap. 15, p. 176); In Plato's Politicus (269b, line 4) an interlocutor asks if it be true that man was "born from the earth" rather than procreated through generation. Young Socrates responds, Καὶ τοῦτο ἐν των παλαι λεχθέντων, "This too is one of the things that have been told through the ages" (Complete Works 310). By enlisting the pre-Socratic philosopher Zelon Eleates (c. 490–c. 430 BCE) in his train of authorities, Mather probably has in mind Plato's Parmenides, in which Parmenides, his companion Zeno, and the young Socrates, converse about the reality of imperceptible "Forms" (atoms) in nature (SEP). Mather erroneously copies the second-hand quotation of Plato as "ἐν των παλαι λεχθέντων"; the missing Greek iota in παλαι is silently restored.

196 Witsius (177). The works of the Greek poet-philosopher Epicharmus (c. 539–c. 440 BCE) survive only in fragments of Plutarch, Eusebius Pamphilus, Diogenes Laertes, and Clemens Alexandrinus. The garbled citation from Epicharmus of Kos (c. 540–450 BCE), adapted from Plutarch's Consolatio ad Apollonium (110a, line 10–110b, line 1), πνεῦμ' ἄνω, suggests that the "soul [is inspired] from Heaven."

197 Grotius on Gen. 1:16, in Annotationes ad Vetus Testamentum (p. 2), in Operum Theologorum (1679), tom. 1, p. 3, adds for evidence a fragment from the Greek Euripides's Aeolus (Fragmenta, fragm. 27, lines 1–5) as extant in Plutarch's De Fortuna (98e): ἡ Βραχὺ τοι σθένος ἀνέρος· ἀλλὰ ποικιλία πραπίδων δεινὰ μὲν φύλα πόντου χθονίων τ' ἀερίων τε δάμναται παιδεύματα [βουλεύματα], or "Slight, of a truth, is the strength of man; and yet / By his mind's resourcefulness / Doth he subjugate the monsters / Of the deep, and the purposes / Of the denizens of the air" (Plutarch's Moralia 2:80, 81). See also The Truth of the Christian Religion (1719), lib. 1, § 16, pp. 29–31 (n) – where Grotius provides many similar references.

Deorum;¹⁹⁸ That Likeness to God, Plato finds in the Soul, which he pronounces, ζυγγενή τω τε θείω και αθανάτω, και αιει οντι. Cognatam Divino et Immortali et Sem-piterna.¹⁹⁹ And the Likeness he more particularly finds in the Wisdom and Goodness of the Soul; ομοιωσις δε δικαίον και οσίον μετα φρονήσεως γενέσθαι. Similitudo autem Dei est Justum Sanctumque esse cum Prudentiâ.²⁰⁰ How agreeable to the Gospel! But had not Plato these things out of Egypt? No; If you'l Beleeve Clemens of Alexandria, he was παρα τινων τότε λογίων αναδιδαχθεις, Doctus ab aliquibus, quæ tunc errant Divinis Oraculis.²⁰¹ Yea, Plato himself acknowledges, That there was a more Safe & Sure Way, to have such Truths conveyed unto us, and that was, a Λογος Θειος, A Divine Word.²⁰² And where shall we meet with it, but in our Sacred Scriptures?²⁰³

T'was falsely done of Herodotus, to make the Immortality of the Soul, an Invention of the Egyptians. Eusebius well shewes, how Moses implied it, when he brings in the Soul made after the Image of God. And both Plato, and Porphyrie, approved the Argument.²⁰⁴

These Traditions were derived from the first Parents of Mankind, unto all Civil Nations, as well as the Egyptians. This is evident from the Poems of Homer; yea, from the Druids in the West, and the Brachmans in the East; whereof Strabo gives us an Account; And from the Nations in both the India's, whereof we have an Account in the Modern Travellers.²⁰⁵ It is well observed by Seneca, Quum

198 Ovid (Metamorphoses 1.83) tells his readers that the god Iapetus "moulded [man's divine substance] into the form of the all-controlling gods."

199 Plato (Republica 10.611e, lines 2–3) pronounces the soul συγγενής οὔσα τῷ τε θείῳ καὶ ἀθανάτῳ καὶ τῷ αἰεὶ ὄντι "akin to the divine and immortal and what always is" (Complete Works 1215).

200 Plato (Theaetetus 176b, lines 2–3) believes that a man becomes like God ὁμοίωσις δὲ δίκαιον καὶ ὅσιον μετὰ φρονήσεως γενέσθαι, "when he becomes [like Him] just and pure, with understanding" (Complete Works 195).

201 Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 2.19.100.3, line 5) insists that according to Plato, happiness consists of likeness to God as much as possible, either by assenting to the law or when παρὰ τινων τότε λογίων ἀναδιδαχθεὶς "instructed by certain oracles of the time" (Stromata 2.19), in ANF (2:369).

202 And Plato (Phaedo 85d, line 3) believes that the safest way to have truth conveyed to us is [τῇ] λόγου θείου "by [some] divine doctrine" (Complete Works 74).

203 Witsius (177–78).

204 Witsius (13–14, 178); John Marsham's Chronicus Canon (1672), secul. IX, § 9, pp. 216–27. Herodotus (2.123) relates that the Egyptians were the first to extol the immortality of the soul – along with metempsychosis – into another body during a cycle of three-thousand years. Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio evangelica 11.27.1, lines 2–3; 550d). In the same work (11.28.1–2), Eusebius cites from Porphyrius's Answer to Boëthius Concerning the Soul (11), in which the Neoplatonist philosopher of Tyre comments that Plato, too, deemed the soul immortal. "For if she [soul] is like that which is divine, and immortal, and invisible, and inseparable, and indissoluble, and essential, and firmly established in incorruption, how can she fail to be of the corresponding class to the pattern?" (Preparation 11.28.554c).

205 Homer (Odyssey bk. 11) seems implicitly to embrace the continuation of the souls of the dead when he has Odysseus visit the shades in Hades. Strabo (Geographica 4.4.4) considers de Animæ Immortalitate loquimur, non leve momentum apud nos habet consensus Hominum. He calls this, Persuasio publica. And, why should Egyptians run away with the Praise of it?²⁰⁶

The Fancy about, The Transmigration of Souls, we are content, that the Egyptians may challenge it, if our Authors please. But about, A Receptacle for Departed Souls, the Traditions were so general among all Nations, even the most Barbarous, that we must needs behold them, as having their Source no lower, than in the Instructions of Noah, and the oldest Patriarchs, to their Posterity.²⁰⁷

It is an Abuse, to maintain, That the Egyptians, had more Knowledge of the Future State, than the Israelites, under the Teaching of Moses. The Sadducees among the Israelites, were accounted Hereticks and Atheists, who forfeited an Interest in the Glory of the Future State. The Hebrew Doctors make the Resurrection of the Dead, not only to be a Fundamental Article, but also, to be Found in the Law.²⁰⁸ Solomon Jarchi has a notable Passage; *Etiamsi quis credat propter Traditionem, aut Rationem, futuram esse Resurrectionem, sed dicat; Non extare in lege, tamen est Apostata, nec habet partem in futuro Seculo. Quid enim nobis cum fide ejus, si non confiteatur eam in lege extare?*²⁰⁹ Origen against the Druids of Gallia exceptionally honorable and studied in natural philosophy. They believe “that men’s souls, and also the universe, are indestructible.” If Julius Caesar’s report in De Bello Gallico (6.14) can be trusted, the Druids also believed in metempsychosis, an account which Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca 5.28.6) confirms. See also Gerhard Vossius De Theologia Gentili (1641), lib. 1, cap. 10, pp. 70–79. For the dispersion of knowledge among the Brahmins of India and the Celtic Druids, see also BA (1:362). Among the “Modern Travellers” who confirm the same belief in the West Indies, Mexico, and Peru are – among others – the Dutch historian and traveler Jan Huygen van Linschoten (1563–1611), whose Itinerario. Voyage ofte Schipvaert naer Oost ofte Portugaels Indien (1596) provides much useful cultural information. An English translation of the work appeared as John Huighen van Linschoten his Discours of Voyages into the Easte and West Indies (1598). And so does the Spanish Jesuit missionary José Acosta, in his popular The Naturall and Morall Historie of the East and West Indies (1604).

206 Witsius (179). Mather’s third-hand Latin quotation – via Witsius (179) and Vossius, De Theologia Gentili (1642), lib. 1, cap. 10, p. 70 – from Seneca’s Epistolae morales ad Lucilium (117.6), reads, “When we discuss the immortality of the soul, we are influenced in no small degree by the general opinion of mankind.” Seneca calls it, “this general belief” (117.6).

207 Mather has much to offer on the ubi sunt of the departed souls before the resurrection, in his Trip Paradiseus (Threefold Paradise 112–51).

208 Witsius (180); according to the Mishnah, tractate Sanhedrin (10.1), “All Israelites have a share in the world to come, for it is written, Thy people also shall be all righteous, they shall inherit the land for ever; the branch of my planting, the work of my hands that I may be glorified [Isa. 6:21]. And these are they that have no share in the world to come: he that says that there is no resurrection of the dead prescribed in the Law, and [he that says] that the Law is not from Heaven, and an Epicurean” (The Mishnah 397). Manasseh ben Israel, the great Jewish scholar and teacher of Spinoza, asserts the immortality of the soul as a fundamental article of the Torah, in his De Resurrectione Mortuorum Libri III (1636), lib. 1, cap. 10, pp. 64–74.

209 The Latin citation from Solomon Jarchi’s (i.e., Rashi’s) commentary on the Mishnah (cap. 2, fol. 90) appears in Guilielmus (Willem) Vorstius’s translation of Yitzchak Abravanel’s ספר ראש אמנה Sefer Rosh Amanah. Liber De Capite Fidei (1638), cap. 21, p. 103. Referring to Rashi’s commentary on tractate Sanhedrin (10.1), Abravanel glosses, “even if one believes in

Celsus assures us, That the Children among the Jewes, did suck it in with their Mothers Milk.²¹⁰

Nature might teach the Egyptians to beware of Blasphemy. But other Nations were so taught it, no less than they. Socrates in Plato professes, to mention the Names of the Gods, with alwayes more than an Humane Reverence.²¹¹ And Plato ha's an Advice, which one would think Transcribed from the Tables of Moses; Tis alwayes a Good & a Just Thing, Θεων ονοματα μη χραινειν ραδιως, Not easily to pollute the Name of God; or toss it to & fro; but præserve pure & chaste all that belongs to Him.²¹² | And Plutarch mentions it, as a particular Vertue in Socrates; Ου γαρ ειρωνευμενος τε και παιζων προσεχρησατο αν [τ]ω του θεου ονοματι. He never used the Name of God, in a Speech that was not serious.²¹³

The Religion of an Oath, was famous among all Nations. Tho' that Part of the Twelve Tables which had it, be lost, yett Cicero ha's rescued this Clause from Oblivion; Perjurij pæna Divina, Exitium; Humana, Dedecus. It is worth our while, to descend unto some other things, recommended by the Light of Nature, whereof the Egyptians asserted nothing, but what was as well, or better, asserted among other Nations.²¹⁴

Holidayes and Festivals, were not peculiar to the Egyptians. They were perpetual Concomitants to the Worship of God. Hospinian will find you, a Tēmpus fixum Religioni, among the most barbarous Nations.²¹⁵ Macrobius com-the resurrection on the basis of tradition, or because of his speculation, but says that it is not from the Torah he is a heretic and has no portion in the world to come[,] for 'what need have we of his faith' if he does not admit that it is from the Torah?' (Rosh Amanah, ch. 21, p. 188).

 210 Witsius (181); in his Contra Celsum (5.42, lines 24–28), Origen wonders, "And how great was the advantage which they [Jews] enjoyed in being instructed almost from birth, and as soon as they could speak, in the immortality of the soul, and in the existence of courts of justice under the earth, and in the rewards provided for those who have lived righteous lives! These truths, indeed, were proclaimed in the veil of fable to children, and to those whose views of things were childish" (Against Celsus 5.42), in ANF (4:562).

211 In Plato's Philebus (12c, lines 1–3), Socrates tells his friend Protarchus, "I always feel a more than human dread over what names to use for the gods – it surpasses the greatest fear" (Complete Works 400). And yet, in his Cratylus (400d, lines 4–10), Socrates paradoxically admits "that we know nothing about the gods themselves or about the names they call themselves – although it is clear that they call themselves by true ones. ... [Thus] we hope the gods are pleased by the names we give them, since we know no others" (Complete Works 119).

212 Mather points at the similarity between the Second Commandment of the Decalogue and Plato's warning in Leges (11.66.917b, lines 4–5) that we should think twice before taking Θεων ὀνόματα μη χραινειν ῥαδιως "the names of the gods in vain" (Complete Works 1571).

213 Plutarch (Platonicae quaestiones 999c, lines 4–5) avows that Socrates, Οὐ γὰρ εἰρωνευόμενός τε καὶ παιζὼν προσεχρήσατ' ἂν τῷ τοῦ θεοῦ ὀνόματι "Never used the name of God, in a speech that was not serious." Witsius (cap. 16, sec. 1, p. 182).

214 Witsius (182). Mather invokes the punishments for breaking an oath once outlined in the Twelve Tables of the Romans, Leges Duodecim Tabularum. Cicero (De Legibus 2.9.22) quotes from the Tables, "For the perjurer the punishment from the gods is destruction; the human punishment shall be disgrace."

215 Witsius (183). In his off-reprinted De Origine, Progressu, Ceremoniis et Ritibus Festorum Dierum Iudaeorum, Graecorum, Romanorum, et Turcarum (1592), lib. 1, cap. 2, pp. 2–7, the mends Numa, for inventing a Distinction of Dayes; into, Dies Festi, which were dedicated unto the Gods; Dies Profesti, which were allowed unto Men for the administration of their own affairs; and, Dies Intercisi, which had certain Hours consecrated unto the Gods, and the rest might be applied by Men, unto what Uses they pleased.²¹⁶ The Roman Holidays were indeed thus distinguished; There were Stativæ, wherein all the People were concerned, & whereof the Times, the Months, and the Dayes, were stated in their Calenders; There were also Conceptivæ, which the Magistrates, with the Priests, agreed upon, for certain Times, or uncertain; There were likewise Imperativæ, indicted by the Consuls or Pretors at their Pleasure; And there were Nundinæ, which were the Fairs agreed among the Countreymen. The Light of Nature taught the Pagans, a Public Worship of God, on their Holidays, and a Sacred Rest from all that was Disagreeable to the Dayes.²¹⁷ It was among the Athenian Lawes, That upon an Holiday, no Injury should be done, either privately or publickly; μηδὲ χρηματίζειν, ο, τι αν μη περι εορτης η, Neve habeatur concio de alijs Rebus, quàm ijs quæ ad Festorum Religionem pertinent.²¹⁸ Among the Roman Lawes, this is one quoted by Cicero, Ferijjurgia amovento; easque in Famulis operibus patratis habento; which he explains, That the Children of the Family should then bee free from all Contest and Chiding; and the Servants free from all Service and Labour.²¹⁹ In Macrobius, the Priests affirm, Feris pollui, quoties, ijs indictis conceptisque, opus aliquid fieret. And yett Equity permitted this Αργια, to have some Exception among them. They allowed, a Work to be done, either, Ad Deum pertinens Sacrorumque Causa, or, Ad urgentens vitæ utilitatem respiciens. Accordingly, Scævola being asked, what might be done upon an Holiday, answered, Quod prætermisum noceret. Behold, the Law of the Sabbath, imitated among the Pagans!²²⁰

Swiss Reformed theologian Rudolph Hospinian, aka. Rudolf Wirth (1547–1626) traces the “fixed times of the religious cults” among the Israelites and their pagan neighbors (NSHE).

216 Witsius (184); Hospinian (De Origine, lib. 2, cap. 1, p. 30); Macrobius (Saturnalia 1.16) does so for the Dies Festi (“feast days”), Dies Profesti (“ordinary days”), Dies Intercisi (“days of intercession/prayer”) among the Romans established by Numa, the Roman lawgiver.

217 Furthermore, the Romans observed Dies Stativæ (“fixed holy days”), Dies Conceptivæ (“occasional” or “proclaimed holidays”), Dies Imperativæ (“days commanded by the governors”), and Dies Nundinæ (“market days”).

218 Witsius (184) quotes from Samuel Petitus’s bi-lingual Leges Atticae Collegit, Digessit, et Libro Commentario Illustravit (1635), Tit, 1, leg. 11, p. 2. According to Demosthenes Atheniensis (In Timocratem 29, line 10), the ancient Athenian laws decreed that μηδὲ χρηματίζειν ὁ τι αν μη περι της εορτης η neve habeatur concio de alijs rebus, quam iis quæ ad Festorum Religionem pertinent “a standing law that at such a time [religious holiday] we shall do one another no wrong either in private or public life nor transact business that does not concern the Festival.”

219 In Cicero’s De legibus (2.8.19), Marcus explains to Atticus, his interlocutor, “On holidays they shall refrain from law-suits; these they shall celebrate together with their slaves after their tasks are done.”

220 Witsius (184). Macrobius (Saturnalia 1.16.9–11). The priests affirmed “that religious festivals became polluted as often as any work was undertaken once they had been proclaimed and formally scheduled.” Equity, however, allowed some exception to a religious holiday or rest

The Use of Water in Lustrations, need not have been learnt of Egyptians. Nature tells us of nothing more agreeable. Jacobs Action, [Gen. 35.2.] was before his Acquaintance with the Egyptians. There was hardly any Nation under Heaven, tho' never so Barbarous, but what had a Sacred Baptism in Use among them. Clemens Alexandrinus will tell you, of their, λουτρον. And among the Athenians, there was an ὕδρανός, who by Baptism, initiated People in the Eleusinian Mysteries.²²¹ Tho' Marsham quotes Diodorus, to prove that the Eleusinia came from the Egyptians to the Athenians, the Design of Diodorus was only to exhibit unto the Knowledge & Judgment of his Reader, the Brags of the Egyptians, and he mentions this Boast of theirs, as, φιλοτιμότερον ἤπερ ἀληθινότερον, having more of Boast, than of Truth in it.²²² Among the Græcians there were some odd Instances of, (Δευτεροποτμοι, as they called them, whereof See Hesychius,) Men that had been reckoned for Dead; but the Dead being look'd upon as profane & unclean, when these returned unto Humane Conversation, they were Baptised with Lustral Waters, like New-born Infants.²²³ One Aristinus, was from the Delphian Oracle, directed unto such an Action.²²⁴ A Baptism was the First Rite, among the Fourscore Sacred Initiations of Mithras, among the Persians. Indeed, in the Religion of Mithras there was a great Resemblance of so many things in Christianity, (ἀργία) to a person who “served the gods or their sacred rites” or “performed some action that met a vitally pressing need.” Scaevola, the high priest, answered that on holidays those things are permitted “what would cause harm if neglected.”

221 Witsius (185–86); Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 5.11.71.1, line 1) relates that lustrations (baptisms) were as important to the Greeks as was the λουτρόν (“laver”) among the Barbarians (Stromata 5.11; in ANF 2:461). Likewise, among the Athenians, Hesychius tells us in his Lexicon (ΙΤ–Ω), alphab. letter upsilon entry 74, line 1, there was an ὕδρανός: ὁ ἀγνιστῆς τῶν Ἐλευσινίων, a “baptizer or purifier among the Eleusinian mysteries,” who initiated novices into the cult of Demeter and her daughter Persephone.

222 John Marsham, Chronicus Canon (1672), secul. X, “Eleusinia,” pp. 248–51, enlists Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca 1.29.5, lines 1–3) to trace the Eleusinian harvest and fertility rites from the Egyptians to the Greeks. However, with Witsius (186) at his side, Mather implicitly charges Marsham with quoting his source out of context. Diodorus only wanted to demonstrate that the Egyptians’ claim to having colonized the Eleusinians was spoken more φιλοτιμότερον ἤπερ ἀληθινώτερον “out of a love for glory than with regard for the truth.”

223 Some of the Eleusinian initiation rituals included instances of δευτερόποτμος “seeming deaths” (cases of suspended animation), yet they were only taken for πινὼν ὑστερόποτμος “supposedly dead, and then appearing alive” – as Hesychius (Lexicon Α–Ω, alphab. letter delta entry 746, line 1) defines the terms.

224 Mather pokes fun at the Eleusinian rite of symbolic death, rebirth, and lustration, as related in Plutarch’s Aetia Romana et Graeca (265ae). As the story goes, Aristinus, for whom funeral rites had been performed because he was believed to be dead, was not admitted into the temple because the dead would pollute the sacred precinct. Inquiring of the Delphian Pythia how to solve his dilemma, he was told to do as mothers do who have given birth to an infant. Aristinus accordingly performed the rite of purification as follows: he had himself washed, wrapped in swaddling clothes, and suckled like a baby. No doubt, Karl Marx did not have Aristinus in mind when the German philosopher declared in his Kritik des Gothaer Programms (1875), “Jeder nach seinen Fähigkeiten, jedem nach seinen Bedürfnissen” (“Each according to his ability, each according to his needs”).

that if the like had been found among the Egyptians, our Learned Folks would never have done crowing upon it.²²⁵ The Roman Lustrations are known to Schoolboyes; and their Sprinklers, of either Lawrel, or Olive, as the Hebrew were of Hyssop. Yea, Ovid, (and Virgil, and Juvenal,) do sing of a Treble Aspersions; Ter caput irrorat.²²⁶ The Brachmans of India too, have their Lustrations. And in the Fortunate Islands of the Atlantic Ocean, where there were no Footsteps of either Christianity or Mahometanism, They Solemnly Baptise their Infants. They do so upon the Coast of Coromandel in the East-Indies.²²⁷ And by Hornius, you will find the like done in the West-Indies too.²²⁸ So that we may well demand, What was there so very singular in the Egyptian Lustrations, that the Israelitish Ones must needs be derived from them? How much more agreeable was the Sense which Tertullian had of the Matter; *Diaboli sunt partes intervertendi veritatem, qui ipsas quoque res Sacramentorum Divinorum, in Idolorum Mysterijs emulatur. Tingit et ipse quosdam utique Credentes et Fideles suos. Expiationem Delictorum de Lavacro repromittit?*²²⁹

225 Mather, via Witsius (186–87), points to the rites of Mithras as synopsized in Abraxas, seu Apistopistus; quae est Antiquaria de Gemmis Basilidianis Disquisitio (1657), paragr. 3, pp. 11–15, by the Flemish Canon at Aire-sur-la-Lys (Artois) Johannes Macarius (c. 1540–1604). Extracting his evidence from Clemens Alexandrinus's Stromata, Tertullian's De Praescriptionibus Adversus Haereticos, and Justin Martyr's Apologia II pro Christianis, Macarius describes ABPAΞΣ (Abraxas), the symbol of the Ur-god Abraxas, from whom issued Spirit, Word, Providence, Wisdom, and Power (the five primordial forces), as taught by the Alexandrian Gnostic Basilides (c. 85–c. 145 CE), who is believed to have been a follower of Persian Zoroastrianism. (BBK).

226 Ovid (Fasti 4.315) relates how chaste Claudia Quinta performed her rites of lustration by letting the purifying water “thrice drip on her head.” Likewise, Vergil (Aeneid 6.229–31) relates how Corynaeus purified the bones of his dead companions with clean water by “thrice encircling his comrades and ... by sprinkling light dew from a fruitful olive-bough.” So, too, Juvenal, in his Satire (6.522–26), has his frenzied devotees of Bellona, the old Roman goddess of war, undergo purification in the frozen Tiber by submerging themselves three times.

227 The vademecum on the subject of lustration among the ancients and moderns, in India and the among the Muslims of Ottoman Empire, is Epimenides, sive, De Veterum Gentilium Lustrationibus (1681), by Johann Georg Lohmeyer (c. 1625–80), German Lutheran and professor of Greek at Rinteln (Westphalia). In ch. 20, pp. 199, Lohmeyer mentions that the Brahmins of Culcutta use a mixture of gall and blood for their lustrations.

228 In his De Originibus Americanis (1652), lib. 1, cap. 5, pp. 38–44, Georg Horn (1620–70), a German historian and professor of theology at Leiden, argues that the Mesoamerican peoples are descended from the Scythians and Phoenicians who migrated to America through an isthmus now submerged. Consequently, they carried their cultic practices with them in their proverbial backpacks – or so the argument goes. Much the same can be found in José Acosta's Natural and Morall Historie of the East and West Indies (1604), bk. 1, chs. 16, 18–25; bk. 5, chs. 1–31.

229 In his De Praescriptionibus Adversus Haereticos, cap. 40 [PL 002. 0054] Tertullian explains that the devil, imitating the rites of God, leads his followers into idolatry and heresy: It is “the devil to whom pertain those wiles which pervert the truth, and who, by the mystic rites of his idols, vies even with the essential portions of the sacraments of God. He [Satan], too, baptizes some – that is, his own believers and faithful followers; he promises the putting away of sins by a laver [of his own]” (On Prescription against Heretics 40), in ANF (3:262). Witsius (186, 187, 188).

[71v] | The Distinction of clean and unclean Creatures, could not be fetched from Egypt; for we find it at the Time of the Flood. And the Sacrifices of the other Nations had as much Resemblance to the Israelitish, as had those of the Egyptians. Yea, the Egyptians were different from them all, in that they never sacrificed any Females.²³⁰

The Offering of nothing to God, but what is perfect; is no more than what all Nations are taught, by the Light of Nature & of Reason. Achilles in Homer, brings an Offering of Unmaimed, and Unblemish'd Lambs and Goats; whereupon Eustathius, τοῖς Θεοῖς ὡς τελείοις προσάγειν χρη̃ τέλεια, Dijs tanquam perfectis, perfecta sunt offerenda.²³¹ Such were called, Ἀφελῆ, by Solon, as we are informed by Pollux. And thus Jason, would offer, βόας εὐ κρίνα[ν]τας, well-chosen Beeves.²³² Megasthenes, and Strabo, and Arrian, tells us, how Impious the Indians reckon'd it, for to offer unto God, any thing that had a Defect in it. And Pliny, mentions the Care, Non litare Vitulum claudicantem.²³³ Macrobius notes, That a Sacrifice was to be EXIMIUM, which, he saies, was not a Poetical but a Sacerdotal Word; The Offerings were to be, (as Veranius, by him quoted, expresses it,) Quæ eximuntur é' grege; vel quod eximia specie quasi offerenda Numinibus eligantur.²³⁴

The Hatred of Swine, was no more among the Egyptians, than among other Nations; No, nor so much. For None but Egyptians used their Swine in sowing their Fields; Eudoxus in Ælian tells us, That by the Feet of an Herd of Swine driven over their Fields, they struck their Seed into the moist Ground, that the Birds might not come at it.²³⁵ But the rest of Mankind abhorr'd Swine, as 230 Witsius (33, 188–89) Herodotus (2.41), Marsham (Chronicus Canon, secul. IX, “Sacrificia,” pp. 194–97).

231 Achilles hopes to assuage the anger of Phoebus Apollo by offering “the savor of lambs and unblemished goats” (Homer, Iliad 1.66). Eustathius Thessalonicensis (Commentarii ad Homerum Iliadem) glosses upon the passage, τοῖς θεοῖς ὡς τελείοις προσάγειν χρη̃ τέλεια, or, “perfect gods are to be offered perfect gifts.”

232 The grammarian Julius Pollux (Onomasticon 1.29, line 7) calls them ἀφελῆ “artless, simple” (in a positive sense) as decreed by Solon, the Greek lawgiver. Jason, in Apollonius of Rhodius’s Argonautica (1.356), would only offer βόας εὐ κρίναντας, “well-chosen cattle.”

233 The Indica of the Greek historian Megasthenes (c. 350–c. 290 BCE) is the main source on India for Strabo (Geographica) and for the Greco-Roman historian Lucius Flavius Arrianus (c. 86–c. 160 CE) in his Anabasis Alexandri, a hagiographical account of the life and exploits of Alexander the Great. Pliny (Naturalis Historia 8.70.183), as paraphrased in Bochart’s (Hieroicoicon, pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 33, col. 322, line 65–65), mentions the care with which the priests selected an appropriate sacrifice that “no lame calf be offered.”

234 Macrobius (Saturnalia 3.5.6), quoting from the Roman general Quintus Veranius Nepos (d. 57 CE), notes that a proper sacrifice was to be CHOICE, and the offerings (according to Veranius), are considered “choice” when they are removed from the herd, or because they are selected for their ‘choice’ appearance, as worthy of being offered to the gods.”

235 Witsius (190). In his De Natura Animalium (10.16), Claudius Aelianus reports that according to the Greek astronomer Eudoxus of Cnidus (4th c. BCE) the Egyptians drove herds of swine over their fields to have their trotters bury the seeds in the soil.

Enemies both to their Corn, & their Vines; for which they were sacrificed both to Ceres, and Bacchus, as the Scholiast upon Aristophanes observes, ὡς λυπαντικοὶ τοῖν θεοῖν δωρημάτων. *Ut quæ utriusque Dei dona dependunt.*²³⁶ Ovid saies, This was the First of all Sacrifices;

— Prima putatur

Hostia sus meruisse mori, quia Semina pando

*Eruerit Rostro, Spemque interceperit Anni.*²³⁷

Bochart also will give you a mighty Catalogue of People, who abstained from Eating of Swines-flesh.²³⁸ The Filthiness of the Creature, might be the Reason of it: For the Mud, as Varro expresses it, *Est illorum Requies, uti Lavatio Huminum.*²³⁹

The Use of Lights, in Worship, and on Holidayes, (even in the Day-light), among very many Nations, wee may read in Lipsius, and more largely in Fortunius Licetus's excellent Work, De Lucernis Veterum.²⁴⁰ Josephus will have the Use to have been first among the Israelites; Clemens Alexandrinus will have it first among the Egyptians, but at the same time, he falsely ascribes the First Invention of some other Things (as the Division of the Year into Months,) unto them.²⁴¹ Kircher brings those unto us, who hold, That the Three Dayes Darkness which was one of the Ten Plagues upon Egypt, was the Original of their Setting up Lights in their Sacred Ceremonies; and he adds, *Quibus non dissentis; præsertim quum ostenderimus pleraque Ægyptios ab Hebræis mutuara sui juris fecisse, tametsi alijs et alijs fabulis commentisque depravata.*²⁴² Johannes Baptista Casalius,

²⁴¹ Witsius (48, 190); Josephus Flavius (Contra Apionem 2.282); Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 1.16.74.2), in ANF (2:317).

in his Book, De Profanes Ægyptiorum ritibus, concludes, That the Holy-day of Lights, kept by the Egyptians, with Tears, and Mourning and Howling, was a Commemoration of the Black Night, wherein the Angel of Death destroy'd the Firstborn of Egypt.²⁴³ Perhaps, the Firstborn of King Pharaoh, was called, Osiris. Apuleius tells us, That this Holiday was kept at Full Moon; which, you know, falls out agreeably.²⁴⁴

But we are upon a Subject, on which we might easily be so copious, as to tire the Reader.

IV. The Fourth Assertion.

In those Points wherein we find some Agreement between the Israelites & the Egyptians, (and Points perhaps less clearly directed by the Light of Nature, common to both,) it never can be proved, that the elder Antiquity was on the Side of the Egyptians.

There are learned Men, who with mighty Violence maintain, that the Lawes of Israel were later than the Wayes of Egypt, and therefore, wherein there was any Conformity between them, those Lawes ow'd their Original unto these Wayes. But this Controversy turning upon Matter of Fact, it must not be determined by Subtil Flourishes, or Saucy Conjectures; It calls for proper Witnesses, who lived in those Ages, or near unto them.²⁴⁵ that the Egyptians had taken most of their own law from the Hebrews, even though altered by the admixture of other stories and other falsehoods."

243 In his De Veteribus Ægyptiorum Ritibus (1644), in De Profanis Ægyptiorum, Romanorum et Sacris Christianorum Ritibus (1681), pars I, cap. 25, pp. 45–46, Bishop Johannes Baptista Casalius (1578–1648), of Belluno, Italy, links the use of candles in sacred services with the darkness during the last of the ten plagues (Exod. 12:29–30).

244 Mather, via Witsius (191), refers to the Roman rhetorician Lucius Apuleius, whose Metamorphoseos (11.1, 27, 30) is quoted in Casalius, Veteribus Ægyptiorum Ritibus (1681), cap. 25, p. 46, to demonstrate the nexus between the Mosaic story and ancient Egyptian lunar rites – though Casalius's proof-text as employed by Witsius is something of a stretch: "Circa primam ferme noctis vigiliam expectatus pavore subito [video] praeimicantis Lunae candor nimio completum orbem, commodum Marinis emergentem fluctibus. Nactusque opacae noctis silentiosa secreta, certus etiam summam deam praecipua maiestate pollere resque prorsus humanas ipsius regi providentia, nec tantum pecuina et ferina, verum inanima etiam divino eius luminis numinisque nutu vegetari"; or "About the first watch of the night I awoke in sudden fright and saw, just emerging from the waves of the sea, the full circle of the moon glistening with extraordinary brilliance. Surrounded by the silent mysteries of dark night, I realized that the supreme goddess now exercised the fullness of her power; that human affairs were wholly governed by her providence; that not only flocks and wild beasts but even lifeless things were quickened by the divine favour of her light and might" (Metamorphoses 11.1; 2:238, 239).

245 The issues here raised are crucial, for if the Egyptian cults markedly shaped those of Moses and the Israelites, the doctrine of divine inspiration of Moses and the prophets is seriously impugned. Among post-Reformation polemicists who asserted Egypt's status as a considerably older culture, one that powerfully shaped the religion of the Israelites, are (in chronological order) Franciscus Moncaeus, Aaron Purgatus (1606); Jacques Gaffarel, Curiositez Inouyes (1629); Gerard Vossius, De Theologia Gentili (1641); Athanasius Kircher, Edipus Ægyptiacus (1652–54); Edward Lord Herbert of Cherbury, De Religione Gentilium (1663); John Marsham,

Now whatsoever we have concerning the most ancient Institutions of the Egyptians, (besides what is mentioned in the Sacred Scriptures,) it is fetched from Dion Cassius, and Lucian, and Plutarch, and Strabo and Diodorus Siculus, and Cheremon, and Herodotus, or certain Fragments of Manethon and Sanchuniathon. And lett us now enquire into the Antiquity of these Authors; to see whether their Authority be enough to determine us, in so important a Point as is now before us.²⁴⁶

Dion Cassius lived late enough; Even in the Dayes of Marcus Antoninus, & Commodus, and the next ensuing Emperours, a Gentleman of the Senatorian Dignity: Alexander the Son of Mammæa, advanced him to the Consulship, & unto that Alexander he continued his History. But the Learned quote him in our Case, for nothing, but the Calling of the Dayes after the Names of the Planets, as | an Invention of the Egyptians. A Trifle not worth contending about!²⁴⁷

Lucian was his Contemporary. What he affirms of the Egyptians, in the Beginning of his Dea Syria, That they were the First in the World, who had the Knowledge of God, is a manifest Falshood. The Mosaic Writings would have taught him otherwise. And even he, when he relates the Jewish Brags of Antiquity, concludes, τοὺς ἐγὼ πάντας μὲν ἔρω, δεχόμεναι δὲ οὐδαμᾶ. *Quos ego omnes referam, haut quaquam autem approbo.*²⁴⁸

Chronicus Canon Ægyptiacus (1672); Charles Blount, Great is Diana of the Ephesians (1680); John Spencer, De Legibus Hebraeorum (1685); Thomas Burnet, Archaeologiae Philosophicae (1692) and Doctrina Antiqua (1736); John Toland, Adeisidaemon et Origines Judaicae (1709); William Warburton, Divine Legation (1738–41). Among the apologists who sought to refute their claims are Theophilus Gale, Court of the Gentiles (1669–78); Thomas Tenison, Of Idolatry (1678); Pierre-Daniel Huet, Demonstratio Evangelica (1679); Herman Witsius, Ægyptiaca, et ΔΕΚΑΦΥΛΙΟΝ (1683); Philippus Riboudealdus, Sacrum Dei Oraculum (1685); John Edwards, ΠΟΛΥΠΟΙΚΙΛΟΣ ΣΟΦΙΑ. A Compleat History (1699); Pierre Jurieu, Critical History (1705), and a host of many other defenders of the faith.

Plutarch lived in the Dayes of Nerva, and of Trajan; and what he tells about Isis, and Osiris, and Typhon, was a great Part of it, fetched from the History of Moses, & mixed with many foolish Fables.²⁴⁹

Indeed Strabo was in Egypt, and he wrote his Geography there; but it was in the Reign of Tiberius.²⁵⁰

Diodorus Siculus lived in the Dayes of Julius Caesar and Augustus. The Egyptian Matters, before the Trojan War, by him written, he confesses that he could find, οὐδεν παραπλήγμα πιστευομενον, No foundation worthy of Credit, for them. He prudently observes also, That most Nations, whether Græcian or Barbarian, were of a Disposition to boast themselves the first Inventors, of Noble and Useful Things, & that they were mighty Pretenders to Antiquity. Wherefore, about the Quæstion, who had the best Claim to Antiquity, he saies, οὐκ ἂν διορροσσαιμεθα, Certi nihil definiemus. Only he Taxes the peculiar Ambition of Egypt, for such Pretences, especially in Matters of Religion.²⁵¹

Charemon, so often commended by Porphyrie, we may learn from Vossius, what he was. He was an Egyptian, and he wrote of Egyptian affayrs. He was the Tutor of Dionysius Alexandrinus, who taught from the Time of Nero, to the Time of Trajan.²⁵² Strabo tells us, He followed Ælius Gallus into Egypt. But others, 249 The Greco-Roman Platonist philosopher Plutarch of Chaeronea (c. 45–120 CE) was a contemporary of Roman Emperors Marcus Cocceius Nerva (30–98 CE) and his adopted son Marcus Ulpius Traianus (53–117 CE). Plutarch's De Iside et Osiride on the worship of the Egyptian deities Isis and her fraternal husband Osiris is a prime source on the religious rites of the Egyptians.

250 The Greek geographer Strabo (c. BCE 64–c. 24 CE) wrote an invaluable cultural geography in seventeen books. His lifetime is roughly coterminous with that of Roman Emperor Tiberius Julius Caesar (BCE 42–37 CE).

251 The Greek historian of Sicily Diodorus Siculus (fl. 1st c. BCE) composed his invaluable Bibliotheca historica in c. 60–30 BCE. He was a contemporary of Gaius Julius Caesar (100–44 BCE) and of Emperor Augustus Octavianus Caesar (BCE 63–14 CE), the founder of the Roman Empire. The Trojan War of Homeric fame (12th or 13th c. BCE) was a fixed point in the historiographical annals of Mather's time (BA 1:306–16) by which the greater antiquity of Moses and the Pentateuch were measured. Diodorus Siculus confesses that as far as the time before the Trojan War is concerned, he cannot be exact because μηδὲν παράπληγμα παρειληφέναι περὶ τούτων πιστευόμενον “no trustworthy chronological table covering them has come into our hands” (Bibliotheca historica 1.5.1, lines 3–4). Besides, as to giving precise dates, οὐκ ἂν διορροσσαιμεθα “nothing can be determined with certainty” (Bibliotheca historia 1.5.1, lines 3–4; 1.9.4, lines 3–4). As previously mentioned, Mather generally omits Greek and Hebrew dialects.

252 Chaeremon of Alexandria (fl. 1st c. CE) was an Egyptian priest, Stoic philosopher, and historian who wrote a Greek history of Egypt, its religion, and astronomy (OCD). As chief librarian, he supervised Ptolemy's famous library of Alexandria. Chaeremon tutored Dionysios Glaukou (KP), his successor at the library, and the young Nero, the later Roman Emperor Nero Claudius Caesar Augustus Germanicus (37–68 CE). Porphyrius of Tyre (De Abstinencia 4.6; Epistula ad Anebonem 2.8b–15c) relates that Chaeremon was highly regarded and steeped in the knowledge and mysteries of Egypt's religions. Gerard Vossius, however, appears to have had a low opinion of Chaeremon, in De Historicis Graecis Libri IV (1601), lib. 2, cap. 1, p. 165.

beside Josephus, taxed him for a Vain, a Proud, and an Ignorant Writer. Strabo tells us, That professing Skill in Philosophy, and Astronomy, he made himself the Laughing-Stock of the World, by his Ignorance and his Arrogance.²⁵³

Herodotus is the oldest of all the Greek Historians, that are extant. But he is many Ages later than Moses; flourishing in the Dayes of Darius Hystaspida, and Xerxes, and Artaxerxes Longimanus.²⁵⁴ But the Character of his Writings about the Egyptian Concerns, you may take from Josephus; who saies, πολλά Ηροδοτον των Αιγυπτιακων υπ' αγνοιας εψευσμενον, Herodotum frequenter in Aegyptiacis Ignorantione mentitum.²⁵⁵ And from Diodorus, who mentioning the portentous Relations of Herodotus, & others, who wrote about the Egyptian affairs, affirms, That they did, μυθους πλαττειν ψυχαγωγιας ενεκα, Voluptatis gratiâ Fabulas blaterare. Aelian tells us, That one Harpocraton wrote a Book, περι του καταψευσθαι την Ηροδοτου ιστοριαν, De Mendacii arguendâ Herodoti Historiâ.²⁵⁶

We may now appeal to any unprejudiced Minds under the Cope of Heaven, Whether the Authority of so late Writers, (& these too by knavish Egyptian Priests imposed upon,) be enough to establish the Antiquity of the Ceremonies practised among the Egyptians, before that of those which the Lord præscribed unto His Peculiar People?

Well; But Manethon may be a little more to be relied upon. Lett us understand who Manethon was. He was of a Sebennitic Extract, for his Nation; and for his Function he was as Eusebius tells us, An High Priest of the Egyptian Idols; or, as tis express'd by Syncellus, των εν Αιγυπτω μιαιρων ιερων αρχιερευς, Impurorum 253 Strabo (Geographica 27.2.29) relates that Chaeremon accompanied the Roman Praefect Gaius Aelius Gallus to Egypt (alas, this event took place in c. 26 BCE, long before our Chaeremon was born). Whichever Chaeremon Strabo has in mind, the one he mentions here “pretended to some knowledge of this kind [sacred rites of the Egyptians], but was generally ridiculed as a boaster and ignoramus.” Finally, Josephus Flavius (Against Apion 1.32–34) dismisses Chaeremon’s history (relating to the Mosaic Exodus) as downright false.

254 The Father of History, Herodotus of Halicarnassus (c. 484–425 BCE) composed a famous history admired throughout the ages. In Mather’s reckoning, this Greek historian lived nearly a thousand years after the Hebrew Lawgiver. Archbishop James Ussher lists Moses birth in “The year before Christ 1571” (Annals of the World [1658], p. 12). Darius Hystaspes was king of Persia (521–486 BCE); his successor, Xerxes, king of Persia (486–465 BCE), was followed by the “dextrous, long-handed” Artaxerxes I Longimanus (465–424 BCE).

255 Witsius (196–97); Josephus Flavius (Contra Apionem 1.73, lines 5–6) echoes Manethon, the Egyptian priest, arguing that he πολλά τὸν Ἡρόδοτον ἐλέγχει τῶν Αἰγυπτιακῶν ὑπ’ ἀγνοίας ἐψευσμένον “also finds great fault with Herodotus for his ignorance and false relations of Egyptian affairs” (Against Apion 1.14).

256 Seconding Josephus’s opinion, Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca historica 1.69.7, line 4) affirms that Herodotus and his ilk preferred μυθους πλαττειν ψυχαγωγιας ενεκα “marvellous tales and invented myths.” Suda, Lexicon (alphab. letter alpha entry 4013, line 3) states that according to the Roman rhetorician Claudius Aelianus (c. 175–235 CE) the Alexandrian Valerius Harpocraton (2nd c. CE) wrote a book titled Περὶ τοῦ καταψεύσθαι τὴν Ἡροδότου ἱστορίαν “Of the Lies proven against Herodotus’s history.” Another case of the pot calling the kettle black?

in Ægypto Sacrorum Summus Sacerdos.²⁵⁷ What he wrote of the Egyptian History and Theology, he translated into the Greek Tongue. He lived under Ptolomæus Philadelphus, to whom he Dedicated his History; and he comes later than Herodotus. Ptolomy being accommodated, with the Mosaic Antiquities, called upon Manethon to produce from the Archives of Egypt, what Monuments the Priests could supply him withal. But lett Josephus inform you, what Old Wives Fables, were under this Pretence imposed upon the World. Manethon's Hatred and Envy to the Jewes, caused him to Invent many things for the Honour of Egypt; and being a Priest of Divels, he envied every thing that might reflect Honour upon the God of Israel. There needs no more to do Manethon's business, than to read what he writes, about the Coming of the Israelites into Egypt, and their Going out of it.²⁵⁸

But is not Sanchuniathon, more Ancient, than Manethon, and more Accurate and Credible? Sanchuniathon, as Theodorus tells us, out of Prophyræ, in the Phœnician Tongue, signifies, φίλαληθς, A Friend of Truth.²⁵⁹ He writes a Phœnician History, wherein are many both Egyptian, and Israelitish Curiosities. He is of a venerable Antiquity, it seems; He lived before the Trojan War, & near the Age of Moses. But, without puzzling ourselves about the gross Parachronisms of several Historians on this Occasion, they can by no means make an earlier Date for their Sanchuniathon, than Four Hundred Years after Moses; and Scaliger and Vossius, prove him to have been | yett much later than so.²⁶⁰ And is he a fitt Wit-

257 Georgius Syncellus (Ecloga chronographia, p. 18, line 22) calls Manethon ἀρχιερεὺς τῶν ἐν Αἰγύπτῳ μαρῶν ἱερῶν, "a filthy high priest consecrated to the Egyptian religious rites."

258 Witsius (197–98). A contemporary of King Ptolomæus II Philadelphus of Egypt (309–246 BCE), Manethon of Sebennytos (lower Egypt) composed his famous history Aegyptiaca in Greek along with several other works on the Egyptian cults. Josephus Flavius excerpts Manethon's history at some length in his Against Apion (1.26–32), but takes him to task for (among other things) his prejudicial portrayal of the Israelites' exodus from Egypt, which occurred (so Manethon) because the Egyptians expelled the disease-ridden Israelite slaves.

259 The Phœnician historian Sanchuniathon (Σαγχουνιάθων, Sanchuniathon) is to have lived in the 13th c. BCE (hence before the Trojan War), but the little we know about him is only extant (along with fragments of his writings) in the work of Philo Byblos (c. 64–141 CE) and in those of the Caesarean bishop Eusebius Pamphilus (c. 260–c. 340 CE). Theodoretus (not Theodorus) Cyrrhensis (Graecarum affectionum curatio 2.45, line 2), quoting from a fragment of Porphyrius of Tyre (Contra Christianos, fragm. 41, line 10), praises the accuracy of Sanchuniathon's Phœnician history and dubs him φίλαλήθως, "a friend of truth."

260 The great Dutch philologist Joseph Justus Scaliger debates the issue at some length in his "Notae in Fragmenta" (p. 40), appended to his massive Opus De Emendatione Temporum (1629); Gerard Vossius, who does so in his De Theologia Gentili (1641), lib. 1, cap. 22, pp. 164–69, also deems Sanchuniathon a reliable source. Following Samuel Bochart's Geographia Sacra (1646), lib. 2, cap. 17, pp. 858–60, Pierre Jurieu, in Critical History (1705), vol. 2, part 3, ch. 5, p. 52, believes Sanchuniathon to be a contemporary of Gideon, the Israelite judge (Judg. 6–8), roughly two-hundred years after Moses. So, too, Richard Cumberland, bishop of Peterborough (1632–1718) surmises that the ancient Phœnician writer was a contemporary of Gideon, in his Sanchuniathos's Phœnician History. Translated from the First Book of Eusebius De Praeparatio Evangelica (1720), p. 10. See also BA (1:309, note 114).

ness, of Matters that were before the Dayes of Moses? It may be said, That he composed his History out of the most ancient Monuments. But, what have we to assure the Faith of those Monuments? And wheresoever Sanchoniathon had his Traditions, who is there that now can show us a Sanchoniathon? All that he wrote in the Phœnician Tongue is perished. One Philo Byblius, a Pagan, who lived in the Dayes of Adrian, Translated him into Greek. But with what Faith, or Skill, who can say? Nor have we any thing of that Philo, but some Fragments, in Eusebius, or one or two more. Nor do these afford any thing, to maintain the cruel Opinion, of the Israelitish Religion derived from the Egyptian.²⁶¹

If after all, Marsham will bring an Oracle of Apollo, to strengthen that Opinion, 't'wil be Answer enough, to return the Words of Clemens Alexandrinus; Μανικά ταυτα ως αληθώς ανθρωπων απιστων σοφιστηρια· Sunt hæc verè Insana hominum infidelium commenta.²⁶²

Nay, We may combate Marsham, & the rest of the Gentlemen in his Opinion, with those very Authors, whom they chiefly rely upon; and from those very Authors, we may prove that the greatest Antiquities in Religion among the Egyptians, are not so ancient as those of the Israelites.

The Oracle of Apollo, affirm'd; The Way to Heaven, to be known by the Phœnicians, and, Assyrians, and Hebrewes, as well as the Egyptians.²⁶³ And Porphyrie brings us another Oracle of Apollo, which said;

261 Witsius (201). A contemporary of Roman Emperor Publius Aelianus Traianus Hadrianus (76–138 CE), Philo Byblius, aka. Herennius Philo (c. 64–141 CE) was a Greek lexicographer who translated Sanchoniathon's history into Greek. The original and Philo's translation are no longer extant except that which was preserved in Eusebius Pamphilus's Praeparatio evangelica and in some other sources. It should be quite obvious by now that in this section Mather's strategy is to refute John Spencer's De Legibus Hebraeorum (1685) by attacking the trustworthiness – if not authenticity – of the only textual sources upon which both ancients and modern were able to build their respective cases. The modern discipline of archaeology had not yet been born to furnish external evidence one way or the other. In fact, in Mather's time, the Greek noun ἀρχαιολογία (archaeologia) still signified “ancient history generally; systematic description or study of antiquities” (OED), as instanced in Theophilus Gale's Court of the Gentiles (1672), part 1, bk. 3, ch. 6, p. 69, where the author writes, “First Plato here mentions the words of a certain Egyptian Priest, telling Solon, that the Grecians were ignorant of the account of true Archeologie or Antiquitie; having only some Fables or shadows of those real stories, which were lo[d]ged amongst the Egyptians.” In short, in Mather's time, archaeology meant exhuming textual proof from ancient documents – not unearthing material artifacts or ruins in the desert.

262 Mather (via Witsius 201) brushes aside Marsham's Chronicus Canon (1672), secul. IX, pp. 149–50, for relying on pagan oracles, and makes him eat his words with counter-evidence from Clemens Alexandrinus, Protrepticus (2.11.3, lines 2–3). The pathetic ravings of the Pythian oracles, the Alexandrian carps, are of a kind with the mysteries of the Egyptian temples: nothing but Μανικά ταυτα ως αληθώς ανθρωπων απιστων σοφιστηρια “Insane devices truly of unbelieving men” (Exhortation 2), in ANF (2:175).

263 In his Philosophy from the Oracles, Porphyrius (De philosophia ex oraculis, p. 140, lines 6–7) explains – as quoted in Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio evangelica 9.10.2, lines 12–13) – that the gods revealed the way to heaven and the source of all wisdom to those “who Nile's sweet waters drink/ From them the heavenward paths Phœnicia learned,/ Assyria, Lydia, and the Sanchuniathon it seems, must have this in common with Manethon, that they compiled their Books, from the ancient Monuments, of Thout, Ἑρμης, or, Mercury.²⁶⁵ Austin will have this Mercury to be later than Moses. But Artapanus, a very old Author, of whom we have some Fragments in Eusebius, will have Mercury to be no other than Moses.²⁶⁶ And Huetius has very notable Strokes, to explain the Parallel between them. So then, what is valuable in the Writings of Sanchuniathon and Manethon, may be fetched from the Mosaic Monuments.²⁶⁷ For, tho' crafty Men in after Ages, might use the Name of Mercury, for a thousand of their own Follies, yett there may be found some Reliques of Moses, in the heap of Rubbish. Such particularly may be those, which Manethon calls, Γενεκα του Ἑρμου, & which a learned Man understands, to be, Moses's Book of Genesis; the Title whereof among the Jewes themselves is, as tis noted by Scaliger, ספר תולדות/ Liber generationis.²⁶⁸ We are also informed, that Sanchuniathon was in his Writings assisted by, τα υπομνηματα Ιερομβалуου του Ιερεως του Θεου Ιαω· Or, Hebrew race." Tellingly, if Porphyrius intended the Egyptians "who Nile's sweet waters drink," it is Eusebius who believes the Israelites are here meant.

as Eusebius writes it, Ἰεῦω The Commentaries of Jerombalus, the Priest of the God JAO.²⁶⁹ Who was this JAO, but our Glorious JEHOVA, whom the famous Oracle of Apollo, in Macrobius, acknowledges by that Name?²⁷⁰ Jerombalus was doubtless Gideon, who was called Jerubbaal. Tho' he were not a Priest, a Stranger might easily count him one, from the Story of his Ephod; or, from the Mistake of the Word /כֹּהֲנִים/ as Bochart thinks, which the Hebrewes used for all their Chief Men, as well as their Priests.²⁷¹ A Judge might be called so. The Monuments of Moses might be ascribed unto Gideon on this Occasion. Gideon might have some Covenant and Commerce with the Berythians, who were Sanchoniathons Countreymen; and the Berythians coming to some Knowledge of the Israelitish Religion by the Means of Gideon, might easily make him an Author. The Baal-Berith; which the Apostate Israelites worshipped after the Death of Gideon, was Baal the Idol of Beryth, the Town of Sanchoniathon.²⁷² Indeed it is abundantly evident, That our Fabulous Author Sanchoniathon, had the Traditions of the Mosaic Monuments to help him in his Writings; tho' they are involved in wondrous Fables, and Confusions. Read what Bochart offers in his Geographia Sacra, and you'll see the Evidences.²⁷³

If we consider the Account that Manethos gives of the Israelites, we shall see, that the most Ancient Egyptian Traditions, are gross Follies and Fables, and of a much later Date than the Mosaic History; and ridiculous Depravations of a Matter so old, as to be almost utterly lost in Oblivion; and from thence we may infer, how impertinent it is, to rely upon those Traditions, for an Account of things in the Dayes of Moses; Manethos makes one Timaus, to have been the King of the Israelites, who with his Cruelty, made sad Ravages on the Egyptian Province, whereof without much Resistance, they became the Masters. There followed (according to him) several Princes, whom they called, Hycsos, that is to say, Royal Shepherds.²⁷⁴ At last | there arose a King, whose Name was Alisfragmuthosis, under

269 The oft-cited fragment appears in Porphyrius's Contra Christianos (fragm. 41, lines 5–6), as well as in Eusebius Pamphilus's Praeparatio evangelica (1.9.21; 10.9.12), Herennius Philo's Fragmenta (Vol.-Jacoby#F 3c, 790, F, fragm. 1, lines 16–17), and Theodoretus's Graecarum affectionum curatio (2.44, lines 3–4) – all insisting that the Phoenician priest Sanchoniathon τὰ ὑπομνήματα παρὰ Ἱερομβάλου τοῦ ἱερέως τοῦ θεοῦ Ἰαώ, “received his records from Hierombalus the priest of the god Iao.” Tellingly, only in Theodoretus is the name of this god spelled “Iao” – in all others it is Ἰεῦω (Ieuo).

270 According to Macrobius (Saturnalia 1.18.19, 20) – who cites De Oraculo Apollonis Clarii, authored by the Roman theologian and historian Cornelius Labeo (c. 2nd–c. 3rd CE) – Apollo was asked for the name of the god of gods; Apollo answered, Φράξο τὸν πάντων ὑπατον θεὸν ἔμμεν Ἰάω (Anthologiae Graecae Appendix, Oracula, Epigram 135, line 3), “the supreme god of all gods is Iao.” (DGRB, OCD).

271 Witsius (206–07); Samuel Bochart, Geographia (1646), pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 17, p. 859. The Hebrew term כֹּהֲנִים [kohanim], or Cohen, signifies priests.

272 Judg. 8:33.

273 Bochart (Geographia, pp. 858–60).

274 Josephus Flavius (Against Apion 1.14) excerpts the story from Manetho's Aegyptiaca (2) about the invading Hyksos (shepherds), whom Manetho and his peers associate with whom these Royal Shepherds who were called also Captive Shepherds, were conquered; & shutt up in a Placed called Avaris, containing in Measure Ten Thousand Acres. Themosis the Son of that Alisfragmuthosis, did with an Army of no less than Four hundred & Eighty Thousand Men besiege them there; but not prospering to his Mind in the Siege, it was agreed, that they should yett March out of Egypt, & go wither they would. Hereupon, Two Hundred & Forty Thousand of them, with their Families and Possessions, left Egypt, and went thro' the Desert into Syria, & there in the Land now called Judæa, they build a City capable of containing their Number, called, Jerusalem.²⁷⁵ Elsewhere our Author, Forgetting himself, (as Josephus thinks,) tells another Story; That Amenophis, the King of Egypt, was advised to gratify the Gods, by chasing all the Lepers out of Egypt; whereupon he gathered Fourscore Thousand of them; whom, with the Learned, but Leprous, Priests among them, he ordered to accept a Repose, in a Forsaken City, which once had belonged unto the Shepherds, called Avarim.²⁷⁶ This Place proving favourable to their Intention of a Rebellion, they constituted for their Leader, one, Osarsiphus, a Priest of Heliopolis, whose Name was changed into that of Moses. He bound them in an Oath, to such Things as were most contrary to the Customes of Egypt, (so saies Manethos!) & so they took up Arms against Amenophis. He then entred into a Covenant with the Shepherds, whom Themosis had chased into Syria; and in Conjunction with them, he drove Amenophis into Ethiopia; & with Fire and Sword wasted the Cities of Egypt, until Amenophis returning with a great Force out of Ethiopia, drove them all away as far as the Syrian Borders. In the Midst of all this wretched Stuff, we may find some few Footsteps of Ancient Verity.²⁷⁷

Manethos makes them Phœnician Shepherds, who came into Egypt. Abraham, with his Numerous Family, (accompanied perhaps, with many other Canaanites as Josephus intimates flying from the Famine then raging,) were Phoenicians or Israelites who settled in Memphis, lower Egypt (Manetho, Fragm. 9). This alternative view of the Israelite exodus from Egypt was widely known among the ancients and moderns. See Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio 10.13.500d) and the account of John Greaves, professor of Astronomy at Oxford, in his Pyramidographia (1646), p. 21 – all drinking from the same fountain.

Shepherds.²⁷⁸ Polyhistor, out of Artapanus, relates, That not a few of those, who went with Abraham into Egypt, were enticed by the Fruitfulness of the Countrey, to continue there.²⁷⁹ What Manethos writes, That they possessed Egypt, ραδίως και αμαχητι, easily, and without Fighting for it, was well enough to be written of Abraham; who by the advantage of the Learning, which he imparted unto the Egyptians, (as tis agreed among the Ancients), and the Respect which the Beauty of his Wife obtained for him, grew so rich among them, that he might be said for to have spoiled the Egyptians.²⁸⁰ And whereas Manethos tells us, This was under the King Timeus, with whom God was Displeased; who sees not in this Timeus, that Pharaoh, whom the Lord visited with Plagues because of Sarah?²⁸¹ Manethos tells us, That they brought great Calamities on Egypt. His Mistake was, That he did not ascribe them, to Pharaohs Intemperance. The Calamities, according to Josephus, were, A Pestilence, and a Sedition;²⁸² Philostratus tells us, They were unusual and very painful Diseases.²⁸³ Nor is it impossible, but that afterwards, the Offspring of those Phœnicians, who accompanied Abraham into Egypt, might in Length of Time, combine into a Body, that might vex the Egyptians with cruel Robberies. This People, who were called Shepherds, we read in Manethos, that in their own Sacred Books, they were called Captives; This falls out well enough to answer the Character of the Israelites; even Joseph himself was a Prisoner, and all the Israelites were in Captivity. That the conquered Shepherds, according to Manethos, made fearful Desolations upon Egypt, but were shutt up at length in one particular Place, under Alisfragmuthosis; There was in the Truth, a little Foundation for the Story. While Joseph was alive, the Israelites were in a sort Masters of all Egypt; when he died, they were shutt up in Goshen; a narrow, but a fruitful Countrey. The Force employed by Themosis, for the reducing of them, was answered in the Oppressions that Pharaoh used upon the Israelites. The Rest of the Story, tis plain, to every Reader, what gave Occasion for it.²⁸⁴ Grotius upon the whole, talks very well upon it; That the Relations of Manethon, and Lysimachus, and Cheremon, about the Israelites going out of Egypt, were full of Lyes, invented by the known Enemies of the Nation, from whom Tacitus also took his Invidious Memorials. Nevertheless, tis to be gathered from these Relations, That the Israelites, who had their Original among the Assyrians, did enjoy a Part of Egypt, & lead the Lives of Shepherds there; but afterwards finding Oppressions multiplied upon them, they went out of Egypt, with some Egyptians in their Company, under the Conduct of Moses; who carried them thro' the Arabian Desarts, into the Syrian Palestine; Ibique Instituta eos secutos Ægyptiorum | Institutis contraria; And there the Institutions which they followed, were quite contrary to those of the Egyptians. But then, saies Grotius, tis excellently demonstrated by Josephus, how many Ages, these Relations fall short of the Mosaic Writings, for the Antiquity of them.²⁸⁵ Nicolas Abram, a learned Historian and Chronologer, (a Jesuite,) hits the Nail on the Head; showing, That the Egyptians, in that Part of the Story of the Israelites, which imported any thing of Infamy upon their Nation, contrived a Fabulous Turn for it.²⁸⁶ And whereas they tell us, of Two Expeditions which they made out of Egypt, the former was that of the Ephraimites against the Philistines; [mentioned, 1. Chron. 7.21.] The other, (which was not of Shepherds, it seems, but of Lepers,) was that under Moses. But in feigning the Israelites, to be smitten with the Leprosy, they do, Quemadmodum Itali luem Veneream, eo tempore exortam, quo Galli Neapolim obtinebant, Morbum Gallicum, Galli contra Morbum Neapolitanum, appellant.²⁸⁷ Artapanus, we know, affirms, that the Pharaoh, who sought the Death of Moses, was the First, that ever died of a Leprosy.²⁸⁸ And Pliny writes, Ægypti peculiare hoc malum, et quum in Reges incidisset, populis Funebre; Quippè in Bal[i]neis solis temperabantur humano Sanguine ad medicinam.²⁸⁹

The Fable of Osiris, and of Typhon, related by Diodorus, and much more largely by Plutarch, was taken, a great Part of it, out of the History of Moses.²⁹⁰

²⁸⁵ Witsius (214); Hugo Grotius, De Veritate Religionis Christianae (lib. 1, cap. 16, p. 25, note 86), in Opera Omnia (1679), 3:25, glosses that Moses, joined by some of the Egyptians, went to "Palæstine Syria, and there established rites in opposition to those of the Egyptians."

²⁸⁶ Mather refers to Pharus Veteris Testamenti (1648), lib. 8, cap. 3, § 7, p. 200, by the Jesuit historian Nicolaus Abramus (1589–1655), professor of theology at the University of Pont-à-Mousson (France). Mather uses the same source in his commentary on Gen. 12:1 (BA 1:839, 841, 842, 843).

²⁸⁷ Abramus, Pharus Veteris Testamenti (1648), lib. 8, cap. 3, § 8, p. 201, knows that when things go wrong, each side blames the other: "Just as the Italians call the venereal infection, arisen at the time when the French were occupying Naples, the French disease, the French on the contrary call it the Neapolitan disease."

²⁸⁸ Witsius (215). Artapanus as quoted in Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio 9.27.434b) reports that Pharaoh Chenephres was "the very first person attacked by elephantiasis [leprosy] ... because he ordered the Jews to wear linen garments and not to wear woollen clothing, in order that they might be conspicuous, and be punished by him."

²⁸⁹ Pliny (Naturalis Historia 26.5.8) writes about leprosy, "that this plague is native to Egypt. When kings were attacked [with leprosy], it was a deadly thing for the inhabitants, because the tubs in the baths used to be prepared with warm human blood for its treatment."

²⁹⁰ Witsius (216–17). Diodorus Siculus tells the old chestnut of Osiris's dismemberment by his brother Typhon, in his Bibliotheca historica (1.21.1–22.7); Plutarch, in De Iside et Osiride (13.356b–22.359d).

Not that the whole Fable was later than Moses; for the Idolatry of the Calf in the Wilderness, was fetched from that of Osiris. But the old Fable was augmented with many Additions, whereof Bochart has given us an Account, with wonderful Sagacity.²⁹¹ Typhon, the Brother of King Osiris, (tho' not having the same Father with him,) made Attempts against the King, with Seventy two joining in the Conspiracy, and assisted by the Queen of Ethiopia. After various Exploits, he made his Escape upon an Ass; and when he had escaped; he begat Two Sons. Hierosolymus, and, Judeus. Moses lies hid in the Fable; Moses, the Adopted Son of Pharaoh's Daughter; Moses, who consulted with the Seventy Elders of Israel, in order to their Deliverance. The Queen of Ethiopia was the Wife of Moses, whom we find mentioned as an Ethiopian Lady. The Flight of Typhon, was the Departure of Moses. [Compare Exod. 4.20.] And every body sees the Meaning of the Ridiculous Mistake, about Hierosolymus and Judeus; a People came to Inhabit Jerusalem and Judea, by the Means of Moses. But it is impudently done of them, to impute unto Typhon, or Moses, the Crimes of their King. In Plutarch, tis Osiris, whom Typhon exposes in an Ark, upon the River Nilus. He tells us, That Osiris was thus cast, at the Taanitic Mouth of the River.²⁹² Moses was found hereabouts, [Psal. 78.12.] where the Royal Palace then stood. He saies, It was carried unto Byblus. The Ark of Reed, (or Papyr,) wherein Moses was laid, is called by Josephus, πλέγμα βυβλινον· And by Suidas, κιβωτιον εκ βυβλου.²⁹³ They ascribe a Red Colour to Typhon; perhaps, confounding, Jewes with Idumæans; which was often done. But Artapanus, in Eusebius, Reports Moses to have been μακρον και πυρραχη· Tall and Red.²⁹⁴ This was the Ancient Beauty [1. Sam. 16.12.] Thus Festus, upon the Name Rutilius, adds, Cujus coloris studiosæ etiam antiquæ mulieres fuerunt.²⁹⁵ The Fancy of Typhons tearing Osiris into Fourteen Peeeces, was moralized in what Moses tore from the Body of the Kingdome. There were Thirteen Tribes of the Israelites; and for a Fourteenth we may well reckon the Mixed Multitude that went up with them. The Rabbi's tell us, There were Forty Thousand of this last Sort; and Jannes and Jambres were their Leaders.²⁹⁶ The Supplying of Typhon with Evil and Noxious Creatures, was but Moses's Plaguing the Egyptians,

²⁹³ Witsius (218); Josephus Flavius (Antiquitates 2.220, line 3) reads πλέγμα βίβλινον “ark of bulrushes” (Antiquities 2.9.4); Suda, Lexicon (alphab. letter theta entry 382, line 1) has κιβωτιον εκ βύβλου “a chest out of papyrus.”

²⁹⁴ Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio evangelica 9.27.37, line 6): μακρόν και πυρραχή “tall and ruddy” (Praeparatio 9.27.436d).

²⁹⁵ Sextus Pompeius Festus (De Verborum Significatione [1699], lib. 16, p. 465, line 8) adds, “of that color even women of the past were admirers.”

with Frogs, and Lice, and Flies, and Locusts. The Shadow of the Earth, in which the Moon is eclipsed, they call by the Name of Typhon; In Memory doubtless of the Three Dayes Darkness, which Moses brought upon Egypt. The Egyptian Priests curse the Sea, and they call Salt, the Froth of Typhon, which they therefore will not have stand upon the Table. Doubtless in Memory of what befel the King of Egypt at the Red-Sea. As the Word /צוף/ Tzuph among the Hebrewes, thus among the Syrians /טוף/ Tuph, signifies, To overflow; Tuphan both among the Syrians and the Arabians, is, An Inundation. The Egyptians borrowed many Names of these their Neighbours. Behold, How Moses came to have the Name of Typhon. Thus, In the Night when the Israelites came forth; from among the Egyptians, God executed His Judgments upon the Gods of Egypt. [Exod. 12.12. Num. 33.4.] The Chaldee Paraphrase pretends to specify the Judgments; That the Idols of Metal were melted; those of Stone, were broken; those of Earth were shattered; & those of Wood | were turned into Ashes.²⁹⁷ But it is enough to observe, That the False Gods of Egypt, were conquered in those Irresistible Plagues, which the Lord sent by the Hand of Moses, on the Egyptians; the Memory whereof was continued, tho' Disguised with many Fables, for many Ages among them. They tell us, That their Gods, for fear of Typhon, lay hid in the various Forms, of we know not how many Animals. Probably, the Egyptians hid their Idols in Stables and Dunghils, when the Fear of Moses with an high Hand carrying the Israelites out of Egypt, was upon them. These Thoughts are much more likely than those of them, who pretend, That the Sacred Rites of Israel were borrowed from the Typhonicks of Egypt.²⁹⁸

The Antiquity of the Israelitish rather than of the Egyptian Traditions, is likewise to be inferred, from the little Story which Lucian ha's given us, of his Dea Syria.²⁹⁹ He describes his Deucalion so, as to leave no room for Doubt, of his being our Noah. And this Deucalion instructing first of all the Assyrians in Religion, it wounds the Pretences of the Egyptians to the Earlier Antiquity. Lucian does also mention some Special Rites of the old Assyrians, which have a mighty Resemblance of the Mosaic Institutions in them; as particularly, That of a Purification after the Touch of a Dead Carcase.³⁰⁰ Upon which, and some other Instances mention'd by Lucian, it is mighty well noted by Jacobus Micylus; — Propemodum credi posset, ex Judaeorum observationibus et sacris, pleraque illa transumpta, sed Tempore postea usuque adulterata, ac depravata fuisse; sive hoc populorum vicinitate atque commercio factum demus, sive Barbari, ad eorum ²⁹⁸ Moses as the Egyptian Typhon is yet another honorific in Mather's Euhemerist endeavor to link biblical patriarchs and heroes with the deities or rulers in pagan mythology.

²⁹⁹ Witsius (220–21); Lucianus, De Dea Syria (12–13).

³⁰⁰ Lucianus, De Dea Syria (52) speaks of the Galli (not the Assyrians), who have to undergo extensive rites of purification after they touched a corpse.

*exempla quæ à Judæis, tunc quum in Assyria captivi erant, Videbant fieri, suos quoque ritus conformarunt.*³⁰¹

The Fifth Assertion.

On the other Side, it is extremely probable, That the Egyptians derived many of their Sacred Customes, from Abraham, and Joseph, and Moses, and Solomon, and the Israelites.

What shall we say particularly of Circumcision?³⁰² We need not wonder, that Herodotus, or Diodorus, ascribe the first Use of it, unto the Egyptians.³⁰³ But for Christians, who know the History of Abraham, to do so; this is Wonderful; yea, tis Abominable. There cannot be a Shadow of a Reason given, why the Great God should be solicitous to have His Faithful & Aged Servant Abraham, take up such a Custome from the Egyptians.³⁰⁴

The Original of Circumcision, ha's been truly declared, by Him, who is Truth itself; Joh. 7.22. Moses gave unto you Circumcision, not because it is of Moses, but of the Fathers. Behold, A double Period of Circumcision; the Domestic, in the Family of Abraham, and the Catholic, on the Nation of Israel; and the elder of these, is not of the Egyptians, but of the Fathers. Abraham was the First that received it; about the Year of the World, 2107. and 406 Years before the going of Israel out of Egypt. And thus, Theodotus in Eusebius, mentioning the Circumcision of the Shechemites, ascribes the first Original of it, unto Abraham.

Αυτος απ' ουρανοθεν κηλετ' ανερα παντι συν οικω
 Σαρκ' αποσυλησαι ποσθης απο, και ρ' ετελεσσειν
Cælitus hunc tota jussit cum stirpe recurvo,
Glande sub extrema, præputia demere ferro.
Paruit. —³⁰⁵

³⁰¹ Witsius (lib. 3, cap. 5, pp. 221–22). Finally, the citation from the introduction to the Latin translation of Lucian's De Syria Dea, appears in Luciani Samosatensis Opera ... per Iacobum Miccyllum ... translata (1538), "Argumentum," fol. 313' (sign. gg), by Jacobus Miccyllus, aka. Jakob Moltzer (1503–1558), the German Renaissance humanist and professor of classics at the University of Heidelberg (NDB). Miccyllus's Latin translation of the Greek original went through several editions and reprints. Be that as it may, Miccyllus tries to account for the many similarities between the laws and ceremonies of the Hebrews and those of their pagan neighbors: "It can almost be believed, from the observations and sacred rites of the Jews, that most of those things were adopted, but in the time afterward spoiled by use and corrupted; whether it was finally done by this proximity and trade of peoples, or whether the barbarians conformed their rites also to the examples that seemed to be made by the Jews when they were captives in Assyria."

³⁰² The following "Assertion" targets John Spencer's claim (De Legibus Hebraeorum [1685], lib. 1, cap. 4, fols. 37–59) and that of John Marsham (Chronicus Canon [1672], secul. V, pp. 72–74, that circumcision was widely practiced among the Egyptian elites long before Abraham adopted it and before Moses constituted this rite among the Israelites.

³⁰³ Witsius (lib. 3, cap. 6, pp. 223–24); Herodotus (2.104) and Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca 1.28.3, 55.5).

³⁰⁴ Mather debates the same issue in BA (1:860–64).

³⁰⁵ Mather (via Witsius 225) follows the chronology of James Ussher's Annales Veteris

It was a Mistake in Herodotus, That the Cholcians had Circumcision among them from the Beginning. For the Cholcians were the Casluchim, which were a Colony, that went forth out of Egypt, before the Dayes of Abraham.³⁰⁶ From them arose the Philistines, which possessed the Seats of the expell'd Avites, in Palestine; with the *Sachims*³⁰⁷ of whom we find Abraham entring into Confœderacies. These Philistines were Uncircumcised; but the Cholcians who remained at home, knowing their own Egyptian Extract, many Ages afterwards received the rite of Circumcision, from Egypt, their Mother-Country. A thing expressly affirmed by Diodorus!³⁰⁸

It was another Mistake in Herodotus, That the Syrians inhabiting Palestine, confessed, that they received their Circumcision from the Egyptians & the Cholcians. No Inhabitants of Palestine, but the Jewes, were circumcised, as Josephus tells us; But the Jewes are far from confessing any such Matter. No; They affirm, that the Egyptians had their Circumcision from Joseph. Notable are the Words of Artapanus; That the Ethiopians themselves had such a Veneration for Moses, as to receive the Rite of Circumcision from him.³⁰⁹

[74v] And that all the Egyptian Priests | practised it. You must note, That Circumcision was not used by all the People, among the Egyptians, as it was among the Jewes; as you may learn from the Exemple of Josephus's Friend Apion, who was an Egyptian.³¹⁰

It was a Third Mistake of Herodotus, That the Phœnicians received Circumcision from the Egyptians. By the Phœnicians, as distinguished from the Syrians inhabiting Palestine, you will find in Ammonius, writing, De Verborum Differentijs, That the Idumæans are intended. Now all the World knowes, That these received Circumcision from their Father Esau.³¹¹

The True Progress of the Matter, is this. Abraham received the first Institution of Circumcision, from God. From Abraham, thro' Ishmael, the Arabians received it, & perhaps the Ethiopians. Other Nations received from him, thro'

Testamenti (1650), pp. 9, 19 in assigning the years Anno Mundi 2107 for Abraham's circumcision and A. M. 2513 for the Israelites' Exodus. Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio evangelica 9.22.7, lines 3–4) enlists Theodotus to attest that the God of Abraham, Αὐτὸς ἀπ' οὐρανὸθεν κάλεσ' ἀνέρα παντὶ ὄνι οἴκῳ / Ζᾶρκ' ἀποσυλῆσαι πόσθης ἅπο, καὶ ῥ' ἐτέλεσεν. "Bade him, from heaven to set the blood-stained seal/On flesh [prepuce] of every male; and it was done" (Praeparatio 9.22.428b).

³⁰⁶ Herodotus (2.104).

³⁰⁷ Mather here employs a term designating an Algonquian chieftain of New England.

³⁰⁸ Witsius (226); Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheka 1.28.4). On the origin of the Colchians and their relationship with the Egyptians, see Bochart's Geographia Sacra (1646), lib. 4, cap. 31, pp. 323–29.

³⁰⁹ Josephus (Antiquities 8.10.3); Artapanus as quoted in Eusebius Pamphilus (Preparation 9.27.433a).

³¹⁰ Josephus (Against Apion 1.22).

³¹¹ Josephus (Antiquities 8.10.3; 13.9.1); De adfinium vocabulorum differentiam (lexical entry 243, lines 4–7), by the Greek philosopher Ammonius Saccas Alexandrinus (3rd c. CE), the teacher of Plotinus (DCBL).

his Posterity, by Keturah. By Isaac, it was derived unto the Edomites, and the Israelites. Tis not easy to say, how it was derived unto the Egyptians; whether thro' the Arabians, or thro' the Israelites. From the Egyptians, it came among the Cholcians. From the Arabians, it came down unto the Saracens, and from the Saracens unto the Turks, who do to this Day maintain it.³¹²

It is an Observation, of Pierius, in his Hieroglyphicks; That the most Sacred sort of Apes among the Egyptians, were by that circumcised People esteemed so, because of a Natural Circumcision to be observed on those Animals. But, as for the Assertion of them, who hold, that the Jewes took up Circumcision from the Egyptians, *Eorum hæc est Fabula, qui Divinarum Literarum Historiam, tam Longa Annorum Serie, apud Populos Nationesque omnes receptam, obscurare conati sunt.*³¹³ He adds, That the Residence of so excellent a Person as Abraham, in Egypt, might afford us Occasion to think, That the Practice of Circumcision among the Egyptians, might be first owing to him. Nevertheless that Circumcision was not for diverse Ages after this commonly practised among the Egyptians, is plain from this, That Pharaohs Daughter knew the exposed Infant Moses, to be an Hebrew Infant, because the Marks of Circumcision were to be seen upon the Child. It seems, as if hitherto none but the Priests were Circumcised among the Egyptians.³¹⁴

There ha's been much Discourse, about the Humane Sacrifice, whereto the Patriarch Abraham was called of God. It ha's been maintained, That Ἀνθρωποθυσία was in Use among the Phenicians and Egyptians, & other People. [A Thing Forbidden by God. Lev. 20.2.] Marsham will have the Command given unto Abraham, to be a Conformity unto what was then usual among the other Nations.³¹⁵ However, he does but play upon his Readers, when he brings Philo Judæus his Authority for it: For Philo expressly argues, That Abraham could not have the Custome of any other Nations, to encourage him in his Action; but 312 Witsius (227).

313 The quotation from Johannes Pierio Valeriani's huge folio Hieroglyphica. Sive De Sacris Aegyptiorum Literis Commentarii (1556), lib. 6: "Circumcisio," fol. 48^r (top), tries to dismiss the claims of the ancients who claimed that circumcision was widely practiced even before Abraham adopted this rite: "This is the story of those, who tried to becloud the history of the divine writings, accepted among all peoples and nations, with such a long succession of years." A learned Renaissance humanist of Belluno (Italy), Giovanni Piero Valeriano (1477–1558) shared a great fascination for everything Egyptian with his latter-day sage Athanasius Kircher (1602–1680), who (two generations after Pierius) became famous for his bulky works on Egyptology and his Wunderkammer curiosities exhibited in Rome. See D. Stolzenberg, Egyptian Oedipus (2013).

314 Witsius (228).

315 John Marsham's discussion of Παιδοθυσία or "child-sacrifice" was a specific type of Ἀνθρωποθυσία "sacrifice of humans" well attested among the ancients, and appears in his Chronicus Canon (1672), secul. V, pp. 76–78. Much the same is asserted by his fellow "conspirator" John Spencer, De Legibus Hebraeorum (1685), lib. 2, cap. 10, fols. 313–26.

that, αὐτος ἐμελλε πρῶτος ἀρχεσθαι καινοτάτου καὶ παρηλλαγμένου παραδειγματος, Ipse primus Auctor futurus erat novi et inusitati exempli.³¹⁶ But perhaps Philo Byblius may from Sanchuniathon, satisfy us, That Saturn introduced the Practice of Sacrificing Children.³¹⁷ Bochart, after Becanus, & Vossius, and others, ha's demonstrated the Saturn of the Poets, to be no other than our Noah.³¹⁸ But we are sure, he sacrificed none of his Children. After all, It was the Manner of the Poets to confound Things; And it is plain, That the Saturn of Sanchuniathon was {the} very Abraham himself. For he ascribes unto that Saturn, the Institution of Circumcision; & saies, That the Phœnicians called him Israel. And the Son of Saturn was called, JEUD; which probably was the same with JEHID, /יהיד/ the Name of Isaac. [Gen. 22.1.] The Nymph Annobret, the near Kinswoman of Saturn, who was the Mother of that Son, was the fair Sarah, /חַן־שְׁבֶרֶת / Ex Gratiâ Concipiens.³¹⁹ In a Word, The whole Fable of that Saturn ha's a Foundation in the Story of Abraham. It need not be made an Objection, That the Jeud of Saturn was really killed, whereas the Isaac of Abraham was not so. The Divel was willing to have such a Thing Beleeved, that so an Exemple might be made of it. Yea, the Lord Himself accepted the Offering of the only Son, as if it had been Actually performed. [Gen. 22.12. and, Heb. 11.17.] Philo Judeus notes, That even the Minds of them that Read the Story, have the Idea of Isaac as actually sacrificed, strongly engraven on their Minds.³²⁰ And Gregentius in his famous Disputation 316 Witsius (lib. 3, cap. 7, p. 230); Philo Judaeus (De Abrahamo 193, lines 3–4) claims that it was not the custom in Chaldaea, the country of Abraham's nativity, to sacrifice human beings, but that αὐτὸς ἐμελλε πρῶτος ἀρχεσθαι καινοτάτου καὶ παρηλλαγμένου πράγματος "he himself was about to be the first to set the example of a novel and most extraordinary deed" (Works 427). The Latin translation is that of John Christopherson's Philonis Iudaei, Summi Philosophi (1561), tomus prior, De Abrahamo (326).

317 Herennius Philo, aka. Philo Byblos, as extracted in Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio 1.10.36d, 40d; 4.16.155b–156d) tells the ancient legend of Uranus (Cronos, Saturnus), who swallowed his own children the moment they issued from their mother's womb. The same myth can be found in many other places including Hesiod's Theogonia (453–91). See also BA (1:917–18, 992–97).

318 Witsius (231). Like many of his fellow Euhemerists, Samuel Bochart (Geographia Sacra [1646], pars 1, lib. 1, cap. 1, pp. 1–11) musters a string of sources to equate Noah and his offspring (and several other patriarchs) with the deities of Chaldea, Phoenicia, Egypt, and Greece, whom the pagans remembered in a muddled and distorted manner. The Flemish scholar Joannes Goropius Becanus, aka. Jan Gerartsen van Gorp (1519–72) has his say on the topic of Noah as Saturn in his nearly twelve-hundred-page folio Origines Antwerpianae (1569), lib. 4, pp. 372, 406–08. Much the same proof appears in Gerard Vossius, Theologia Gentili (1641), lib. 1, cap. 18, esp. pp. 140–43.

319 Mather erroneously transcribes חַן־שְׁבֶרֶת (Witsius 231) as /חַן־עֹבֶרֶת/ misreading the letter ש (shin) as ע (ayin waw). Excerpting Philo Byblus and Porphyrius, Eusebius (Preparation 1.10.40d; 4.16.157d) has Saturn (Cronos) sacrifice upon an altar his "only begotten son" Iedud (Ieoud, Jeud) by the nymph An(n)obret. If Anobret is the mother of Jeud, then Sarah, at 90, "conceived by grace" her son Isaac. See also Cicero's De Natura Deorum (2.25.64) for a variant of this story.

with, Herbanus, thus expresses the Action of Abraham, | εσφάξεν, και ουκ εσφάξεν, [75r] Jugulavit et non Jugulavit.³²¹ And the Mahometans, when they speak of Isaac, still call him, The Sacrificed of God. The Fabulous Gentiles also confounded the Story of Abraham, with that of Jephthah.³²² According to Dictys Cretensis, there was a Substitute provided for Iphigenia; And tho' Calchas in Virgil, saies, Sanguine placastis Ventos, et Virgine Cæsa; upon, Virgine Cæsa, the note of Servius, is, Non verè, sed ut videbatur. Et sciendum in Sacris Simulata pro veris accipi.³²³

But Suppose, that the Pagan Saturn had no Relation to our Abraham. In what Age did their Saturn live? Theophilus writing to Autolycus, does from Thallus, make him so few Centuries before the Trojan War, that he must hardly be so early as the Days of Moses.³²⁴ And thus Arnobius runs down the Pagans, that 321 Mather enlists Pseudo-Gregentius, Dialexis (cap. 1., lines 76–78), by St. Gregentius (d. 552) archbishop of Taphar (Yemen), according to whom Abraham “cut the throat and did not cut [Isaac’s] throat,” suggesting that God took Abraham’s will for the act. Best remembered for the legendary debate between Gregentius and the Jew Herbario, the archbishop miraculously succeeded to convert five million Jews all at once and had them baptized. Published in a bilingual edition, S. Patris Nostri Gregentii Archiepiscopi Tephrensis, disputatio cum Herbario Iudæo (1586), the work was republished at least six times between the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries. Mather also drew on the story in his eschatological treatise “Triparadisi,” alternately embracing (and rejecting) the miraculous conversion of Homerite Jews of Arabia in the fourth century CE, to accommodate his changing expectation of the National Conversion of the Jewish people at the Second Coming (Threefold Paradise, pp. 164, 228, 309). See also BA (5:715–16).

322 The issue is less clear-cut than Mather’s statement makes it seem, for according to the Qur’ân, surah 37:99–113, two of Abraham’s sons are implied: the one to be sacrificed and the other for whom the patriarch received the good news that Isaac would be a prophet. On this topic, see EJ (“Ishmael”). The story of Jephthah’s daughter (Judg. 12:11–40) is well known – according to which the Gileadite sacrificed his daughter to fulfill his vow to God to offer up anyone who would come out of his own house to meet him if the Almighty gave Jephthah victory over Ammon.

323 Witsius (234). According to Dictys Cretensis, mythical companion of Idomeneus during the Trojan War, Agamemnon did not sacrifice his daughter Iphigenia to appease the goddess Artemis (Diana), but used a beautiful stag as a substitute (Fragmenta, vol. Jacoby#-F 1a, 49 F fragment 5, lines 1–10; The Chronicles 1.20). Vergil seems to have followed the version presented in Euripides’s Iphigenia at Aulis, for it is Calchas, the Argive prophet, who tells Agamemnon what needs to be done to placate Artemis (Diana). Vergil (Aeneid 2.116) has Calchas, the seer, convey the message from the oracle of Phoebus: “With blood of a slain virgin [Iphigenia] ye appeased the winds” to sail to Ilium, and another human sacrifice is required of the Argives to return home. The gloss of Servius, Vergil’s commentator, reads, “Not truly, but so it seemed. And it must be known that falsities were accepted in the sacred rites in place of truths” (Servius, In Vergilii carmina commentarii 1:237–38, # 116, G. Thilo).

324 Witsius (234–35); St. Theophilus Antiochenus (later 2nd c. CE) (ODCC), bishop of Antioch, writes to his friend Autolycus, that according to the chronology of the LXX, the creation of the world took place 5,698 years before the death of Emperor Lucius Aurelius Verus (d. 169 CE). The venerable Antiochian therefore argues that according to the Greek historian Thallus (who covers the period from the Trojan War, c. 13th or 12th c. BCE, to the 167th Olympiad, c. 112–109 BCE), Belus and his contemporary Saturn lived “322 years prior to the Trojan war.” Moses, however, “lived somewhere about 900 to 1000 years before the Sack of Troy” (Ad Autolychum 3.28–29), in ANF (2:120). In Mather’s age – as indeed today – the horological objected against us, the Novelty of our Religion, with Asserting, That the oldest of their Gods, was then hardly Two Thousand Years old. He tells the several Ages of them, in a fine Discourse, whereon Christianus Schotanus has written a learned Commentary.³²⁵

We will annex a few Thoughts upon the Jus Levirationis; or, The Law of a Younger Brothers marrying the Widow of his Elder Brother, who died childless. Marsham would faign fetch this Custome from Egypt.³²⁶ The first mention we have of it, is in the Family of Judah; but we find it so mentioned, as to render it evident, That it was no New Practice, but that it had before this been practised, in the Families of the Patriarchs. The Hebrewes will have it introduced by the Earliest among the Sons of Noah; but as not belonging to the Greater or the Lesser Precepts, nor as any otherwise than a Part of the Civil Law. But our Folks go yett Higher, and, as Heidegger has it, not only, The Consistorium Semi, as the Hebrewes called it, but Adam himself, they think, had it from Divine Revelation.³²⁷ What signifies it, that in the Emperour Zeno's Time, there were some few Persons in Egypt, who did something akin to it?³²⁸ If it had been the very Same Thing, yett here had been but small Proof of its Antiquity there. Much more to the Purpose, is the Discourse of Junius, upon the Fact of Onan; who mentioning the Leviratic Law in Deuteronomy, saies, Lex illa Deuteronomij non recens Institutio est, sed antiquae observationis confirmatio et obsignatio. Hujus autem observationis Auctor idem qui confirmator ducendus est. Atque haec res quidem Cæremonialis, qua indè a Conditu Orbis Dignitas CHRISTI, qui Primogenitus est inter multos Fratres, fuit adumbrata.³²⁹ Rivet harmonizes with Junius; That and chronometrical conjectures could swing as widely as the magnetic needle of any compass passing points of attraction. See especially A. T. Grafton's "Joseph Scaliger" and "Scaliger's Chronology."

325 Witsius (235–36). The Christian apologist Arnobius of Sicca, in his Disputationum Adversus Gentes Libri Septem (2.71), dismisses the pagan gods as of no validity because they are less than "two thousand years" old. Thus the pagan religion and its deities to which Arnobius's challenger adheres "are young and little children, who should still be fed with their mothers' milk" (Against the Heathens 2.71), in ANF (6:461). Witsius's predecessor at Franeker, Christian Schotanus (1603–71), Dutch Reformed theologian and professor of classical philology at Franeker (J. C. van Slee, "Schotanus, Christian"), dates the origin of the Roman gods Janus and Saturnus to the time of the traditional founding of Rome (8th c. BCE) and, by implication, long after the Mosaic period, in his De Peregrinatione Israëlitarum (lib. 1, cap. 19, subsec. 2, p. 263), in Bibliotheca Historiae Sacrae Veteris Testamenti (1662), vol. 1, p. 263 (4th series of pag.).

326 Witsius (lib. 3, cap. 8, pp. 237–38); John Marsham, Chronicus Canon (1672), secul. IX, sec. 4, p. 166.

327 Johann Heinrich Heidegger's אֲבוֹת רַאשֵׁי [Rashi Aboth] Sive De Historia Sacra Patriarcharum (1729), 1:14, Exerc. I, § 16. The "Consistorium Semi" is the "consistory of semen," i. e., Adam, as the first man, to whom the Leviratic law was revealed.

328 Byzantian Emperor Flavius Zeno Augustus (c. 425–91 CE) was emperor of the Eastern Roman Empire from 474–91 CE.

329 In his Libri Geneseos Analysis (1596), p. 178, Franciscus Junius (1545–1602) argues that Onan's eponymous sin (Gen. 38:9) was such that it did not dare to speak its name even among this Usage was not first of all taken up, from the Canaanites, or other Nations in the Neighbourhood; but an Appointment of God, wherein the Glory of the Lord-Messiah was considered.³³⁰

But might not the Division of Time into Weeks, and consequently the Recurrence of a Sabbath, be an Egyptian Invention? By no means. Tis more truly asserted by Philo, That it was πανδημος και του κοσμου γενεσιος, Ab omnibus Gentibus recepta, ac mundo Coeva.³³¹ Salmasius observes from the Chronology of Syncellus, That the old Fathers used Weeks, before Months and Years, in their Computations. The Annals of Michael Glycas, will have Seth, to have been the first Inventor of Weeks.³³² But R. Jehuda, in the Dialogue entituled, Sepher Cozri, ascribes them to Adam, from the very Day, that he was expelled out of Paradise.³³³ We may allow the Egyptians, to have been the First, that putt Planetary Names, upon the Dayes of the Week; and yett assert the Week itself, to have been of a much earlier Original. It is well noted by Philoponus, That there was no the Gentiles, but was blissfully plied by the Gnostics, as Epiphanius knowingly relates. Says Martial in his Epigram (9.42), “Veneri servit amica manus” or “A loving hand is a servant to sexual appetite,” in Poole’s Synopsis Criticorum (1:253) and Works (3:303). Be that as it may, Franciscus Junius argues, “that law of Deuteronomy is not a fresh custom, but a verification and seal of ancient observance. The creator of this observance moreover is the same that is held as its establisher. And this matter, indeed ceremonial, by which thence from the founding of the world the dignity of CHRIST, who is the firstborn among many brethren, has been outlined.”

330 The renowned Huguenot professor of theology at Leiden, André Rivet (1572–1651), trying to maintain harmony among the tribes of befuddled commentators, is convinced that the practice of Leviratic marriage was appointed by God (Scholasticae & Theologicae Exercitationes CXC in Genesin [1633], Exercitatio CLII [Gen. 38], pp. 736–37). Witsius (lib. 1, cap. 5, p. 20; lib. 3, cap. 8, pp. 237–40).

331 Witsius (lib. 3, cap. 9, p. 241). Herodotus (2.4) bestows this honor on the Egyptians. Philo Judaeus adds that the division of time into six days followed by a seventh, a holy day, is a festival for all the world. Thus he explains in his De Opificio Mundi (89, lines 5–6) that ἡν κυρίως ἄξιον και μόνην πάνδημον ὀνομάζειν και τοῦ κόσμου γενέθλιον “it is proper to call [the seventh day] the day of festival for all people, and the birthday of the world” (Mather’s second-hand citation is an adaptation of the preceding). On the different divisions of time among the ancients, see John Jackson’s “Concerning the ancient Years, Æras, and Computations of Time,” in Chronological Antiquities (1752), 2:1–94.

332 Georgius Syncellus (Ecloga Chronographia, p. 34, lines 9–25); Claudius Salmasius, De Annis Climactericis et Antiqua Astrologia Diatriba (1648), esp. pp. 654–55. Michael Glycas (12th c. CE) was a historian, theologian, and astronomer of Byzantium (Constantinople) (EB), and ascribed to Seth the invention of writing, astrology, and the division of months into weeks, which divine arts were revealed to him by the angel Uriel (Othniel), in Glycas’s Annales. Nunc Primum Latinam in linguam transcripti & editi per Ioannes Lewenclaium (1572), pars 2, “De Caianitarum Secta,” pp. 167–68.

333 According to Judah ha-Levi’s ספר כוזרי Liber Cosri Continens Colloquium seu Disputationem De Religione (1660), pars 2, § 20, pp. 88–89, the calendar was begun six days after the creation, when Adam was expelled from Eden and transferred to Palestine, his new abode. Here he began to name the days of the week in the same manner as he had done the animals and all else.

Reason for making the Week to consist of Seven Dayes, η μόνον ον εἰρηκε Μωυσης, But only that which Moses ha's assigned us, in his History of the Creation.³³⁴

Tis with much Hæsitiation, that Herodotus and Lucian ascribe the first Original of Temples, unto the Egyptians. Hospinian reckons up above Seventeen uncertain Opinions about the first Original of Temples.³³⁵ But Lucian, will have the Temple of his Dea Syria, built by Deucalion; and Apollonius will have Deucalion to be the first Author of Temples; that is to say, Our Father Noah himself.³³⁶ Giraldus in his Sepulchralia, mentions it, as the Opinion of most, That Sepulchres gave the first Original to Temples. And thus Prudentius;

Heroum, numerare licet.*³³⁷

[75v] We will not envy unto the Egyptians | the Glory, of turning into Temples, the Sepulchres of their Kings, whom they worshipped; which Philo Byblius testifies of them, & of the Phœnicians.³³⁸

As Mankind improved in their Numbers and Manners and Riches, they built Houses, wherein they might come together for the Worship of God; you have ³³⁴ In Cap. I. Geneseos, De Mundi Creatione Libri Septem (1630), lib. 7, cap. 14, p. 281, we learn from pagan grammarian turned Christian apologist Joannes Philoponus of Alexandria (c. 490–c. 570) (SEP) that Moses named the days of the week after the seven planets (!): the Sun, the Moon, Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Venus, and Saturn. Joannes Philoponus, De opificio mundi (7.14, p. 307, line 3): η μόνον ον εἰρηκε Μωϋσῆς. Mather supplies his own translation.

³³⁵ At issue is John Spencer's claim (De Legibus Hebraeorum [1685], lib. 3, Diss. 6, caps. 1–2, fols. 817–50) that the design and blueprint of the Solomonic Temple is derived from Egyptian models. Mather, here following Witsius (lib. 1, cap. 6, sec. 8, p. 25; lib. 3, cap. 10, p. 243–44), rebuffs this allegation and brands John Marsham's Chronicus Canon (1672), secul. I, p. 34, as audacious. Herodotus (2.4) believes that the Egyptians not only were the first to divide the year into twelve months, 365 days, and seasons, but also to name months after twelve gods, assign altars to them, and build temples in their honor. Lucianus (De Syria Dea, secs. 2–3) confirms that the Egyptians were the first to receive revelations from the gods, build temples and altars in their name, and introduce religious festivals. Alas, the Reformed theologian of Zurich, Rudolpho Hospinian, begs to differ in his 1,200-page opus De Templis: Hoc est, De Origine, Progressu, Usu et Abusu Templorum, ac omnino rerum omnium ad Templum pertinentium, Libri V. 1595 (Editio Secunda. Tiguri, 1603), lib. 1, cap. 5, pp. 22–28; he lists as many different opinions on the subject of firsts as he was able to muster. A copy of Hospinian's De Templis was in the Mather Family Library (Tuttle, "Libraries," pp. 15, 18).

³³⁶ As if to contradict himself, Lucianus (De Syria Dea, sec. 12 cf. secs. 2–3) reports that the people believe the Scythian Deucalion or Sisylthus built the temple in Babylonia after the great flood. Apollonius Rhodius (Argonautica 3.1087–89) bestows those laurels on the Noah of the Greeks as well. Wonder what Utnapishtim of Gilgamesh renown would have to say about this?

³³⁷ In his De Sepultura ac Vario Sepeliendi Ritu Libellus, in Opera Omnia Dubis Tomis Distincta (1696), 1:689–90, the Italian scholar Liliud Gregorius Gyrardus of Ferrara, aka. Giglio Gregorio Giraldu (1479–1552) (EB), like a true Euhemerist, believes that the first temples arose from the tombs of deified kings. And Aurelius Prudentius Clemens (Liber Contra Oratationem Symmachi 1.190–91) knows that all earth-born divinities were gathered into a single home, "and you may count as many temples of gods in Rome as tombs of heroes in all the world."

³³⁸ Philo Byblius (Herennius Philo) testifies to this fact in an extant excerpt in Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio 1.9.31d–33b).

it well expressed by Tranquillus, & repeated by Isidorus, That Men fell into this Point of Devotion, Quum [enim] primum [homines] exuta feritate rationem vitæ habere cæpissent.³³⁹ But no Man alive, can tell, or guess, what Nation it was, or whether it were not more than one, that began the Practice. For the Temple of Jerusalem, tis an unhappy Mistake in Chrysostom, to intimate, That the Disposition of a People newly coming out of Egypt, was therein accommodated.³⁴⁰ We don't find, That when David first meditated the Building of the Temple, there was any Thought of Egypt in his Mind. Yea, on that Occasion, the Lord expressly declares, That in His now giving a Direction for the Building of the Temple, He had no regard unto any thing they had seen in Egypt. Nor have we in the Sacred Scriptures, the least Hint, of the Tabernacles being made, according to the Pattern seen in Egypt; Extrà que in hisce rebus sapere, est nihil sapere.³⁴¹ The true State of the Case, was this. The Government of Israel was, as the Jewish Historian well observes, A THEOCRACY.³⁴² [See Judg. 8.33.] In Conformity to Royal Circumstances, Jerusalem was made the Metropolis of the Kingdome; and the Temple was the Palace of the Great King; where, the Priests were His Ministers, and the Sanctuary His Presence-Chamber; the Altar, His Table; and the Levites His Musicians. Thus R. Schem Tob, commenting upon Maimonides, having said, Deus, cui laus, talem sibi Domum condi jussit, qualis esse solet Domus Regia; proceeds in making an Elegant Comparison, between the Temple, and a Palace; concluding, Atque hæc omnia eò spectabant, ut intelligeret vulgus, Regem, nempe Dominum exercituum, inter nos versatum esse. Est enim ille Rex Magnus, omnibusque Gentibus metuendus.³⁴³ Moreover, The Tabernacle and the Temple, had many 339 Witsius (244). Quoting a fragment of the Roman biographer Tranquillus Suetonius (De poetis, fragm 2.1), in Suetonius, Vitæ Duodecim (1845), p. 386, Isidorus Hispalensis, in his Etymologiarum sive Originum (8.7.1) [PL 082. 0308], maintains that “when people first began to possess a rational way of life,” they gained self-knowledge and devised poetry to worship their gods with lofty rhymes.

341 That the Mosaic Tabernacle derived its precedent from Egyptian models is, of course, the thesis of John Spencer (De Legibus Hebraeorum [1685], lib. 3, Diss. I, cap. 3, fols. 548–62), which Mather, Witsius, and their peers are trying to refute. Thus Mather piously claims with Witsius's Ægyptiaca (1696), lib. 3, cap. 10, sec. 6, p. 246, at his elbow that there is not the least indication in the Bible that Moses relied on Egyptian precedents, and that “beyond what anyone can know of this thing is to know nothing.”

342 Josephus Flavius (Antiquitates 4.223, lines 1–4). Both Witsius (246–47) and Mather take some liberties with Josephus's Mosaic edict, for according to the Greek original, the Jewish historian speaks of Ἀριστοκρατία, i. e., Aristocracy, not Θεοκρατία Theocracy! Thus in Whiston's famous translation (Antiquities 4.8.17), Josephus says – with his contemporary audience narrowly in mind – that “Aristocracy, and the way of living under it, is the best constitution: and may you never have any inclination to any other form of government; and may you always love that form, and have the laws for your governors, and govern all your actions according to them; for you need no supreme governor but God.” Mather's reference to Judg. 8:33 is a less-than-trenchant proof-text. See also Mather's gloss on Judg. 8:33, in BA (3:182).

343 Mather's third-hand quote (via Witsius 247–48) appears in R. Schem Tob's commentary on Maimonides (More Nebuchim 3.45.), as rendered into Latin in William Outram's De Mysteries in the Appurtenances of them; They were, as Abarbanel truly expresses it, A Book of the Sublimest Wisdom.³⁴⁴ And it is a great Mistake, That the Idea of them, was taken from what the Israelites had seen in Egypt; We are positively told in the Word of God, That it was Received from the Blessed God Himself. [See Exod. 25.9. and 2. Chron. 38.11, 12.] And hereby, He taught the Israelites, how unacceptable it is unto Him, to be worshipped by the Inventions of Men. It is true; The Temples of Egypt, as described by Strabo, had some Resemblance to that of Jerusalem.³⁴⁵ Nevertheless, there is no Pretence that those were more Anc[i]ent than That. And the great Fame of Solomons Temple, might well enough occasion some Imitation & Emulation in the Neighbourhood. This we know, The Christian Temples of old especially those of the Greek Churches, did mightily Imitate that of Solomon; of which you may consult Procopius.³⁴⁶ And Pollet, Sacrificiis Libri Duo (1677), lib. 1, cap. 3, pp. 35–36. Outram's source is the commentary of the learned Spanish Rabbi Schem Tobh Ben-Joseff Abenfalauerra (1225–90) on Maimonides, which was published in the Venice edition of Rabbi Moses Maimonides. Doctor Perplexorum. Cum commentariis R. Schem Tobh et R. Ephodaei (1551), lib. 1, cap. 3. Stating that "God, to whom be praise, ordered such a house to be founded for him as was wont to be a palatial home," the rabbi concludes, "and all these things were regarding him thereby that ordinary people would understand that the King, assuredly the Lord of Hosts, was situated among us. For he is that great King, to be feared by all people."

344 R. Isaac ben Judah Abarbanel (Exod. 25:8–9) argues that "It is inconceivable that this Ohel Moed (Tent of Meeting) with all its vessels and furnishings is just an ordinary tent without having any special meaning to it. G-d of the hosts, who had designed it and its contents, surely had some profound reasons for the way He designed it." Although he admits that many of his fellow commentators – ancient and modern – have much to say on this topic with which he disagrees, Abarbanel does accept the notion that "the Mishkan [tabernacle] was a miniature replica of the entire universe" of God's creation, "and every aspect of the tabernacle represented a particular aspect of the creation" (Selected Commentaries Shemos/Exodus 2:313, 321, 306).

345 Witsius (249–50); Strabo (Geographica 16.2.34–35) relates that "the most prevalent of the accredited reports in regard to the temple at Jerusalem represents the ancestors of the present Judaeans, as they are called, as Egyptians. Moses, namely, was one of the Egyptian priests, and held a part of Lower Egypt, as it is called, but he went away from there to Judaea, since he was displeased with the state of affairs there, and was accompanied by many people who worshipped the Divine Being."

346 Procopius Caesariensis (De aedificiis 1.4.12, lines 9–16) gives a detailed description: When the ancient building of the church dedicated to the Apostles became unsound, "the Emperor Justinian pulled it down entirely, and he was at pains not simply to restore it, but to make it more worthy both in size and in beauty. He carried out his effort as follows. Two straight lines were drawn, intersecting each other at the middle in the form of a cross, one extending east and west, and the other which crossed this running north and south. On the outside these lines were defined by walls on all of the sides, while on the inside they were traced by rows of columns standing above one another. At the crossing of the two straight lines, that is to say at about the middle, there was set aside a place which may not be entered by those who may not celebrate the mysteries; this with good reason they call the "sanctuary" (hierateion). The two arms (pleurai) of this enclosure which lie along the transverse line are equal to each other, but the arm which extends toward the west, along the upright line, is enough longer than the other to make the form of the cross. That portion of the roof which is above the sanctuary, as it is called, is built, in the centre at least, on a plan resembling that of the Church of Sophia, except in his, Historia Fori Romani, will satisfy you, That the Pagan Temples, among the Romans, had a great Resemblance hereunto.³⁴⁷ It is particularly Remarkable, That Vitruvius, describing the Rules for Sacred Edifices, does extremely conform to those of Solomons Temple. L. Capellus will at large, give you the Demonstrations of that Conformity.³⁴⁸ But, what Man will be so foolish, as to say, That Solomon took his Measures of Doric Architecture from the Temples of the Dorians? We have Reason rather to Beleeve the Learned Villalpandus; That the Rules of Architecture taught by the Græcians to the Romans, & at length collected by Vitruvius, were first of all fetched from the Temple at Jerusalem.³⁴⁹ We shall have our Selden consenting with us.³⁵⁰

There has been much Discourse about the Urim and Thummim; and Spencer, as well as others, has more shown his own Witt, than brought any Truth to Light concerning them.³⁵¹ He that Reads Philo Judæus, and Flavius Josephus, will think, That the Knowledge of them was utterly lost under the Second Temple. It was not without a wise Intention of Heaven, that Moses passes over them that it is inferior to it in size. The arches, four in number, rise aloft and are bound together in the same manner, and the circular drum (kykloteres) which stands upon them is pierced by the windows, and the dome (sphaeroeides) which arches above this seems to float in the air and not to rest upon solid masonry, though actually it is well supported. Thus, then, was the central portion of the roof constructed. And the arms of the building, which are four, as I have said, were roofed on the same plan as the central portion, but this one feature is lacking: underneath the domes (sphairikon) the masonry is not pierced by windows" (Buildings 1.[2].4, pp. 50–51).

347 Witsius (250–51); Mather refers to the oft-reprinted Historia Fori Romani Restituta (1572), lib. 1, cap. 3, esp. pp. 25–26, by Franciscus Polletus, aka. François Pollet (1516–48), a learned French jurist of Douai.

348 Vitruvius, De Architectura Libri Decem (1649), lib. 4, cap. 1–7, pp. 59–77. See also "Templi Jerosolymitani, Forma, structura, situs, atque delineatio," in Historia Apostolica Illustrata (1634), pp. 153–62; (1691 ed.), pp. 265–284, by Ludovicus Capellus (1585–1658), distinguished philologist and professor of theology at Saumur, whose description of the Temple is derived from that of Josephus Flavius. The editors of the London Polyglot deemed irresistible Capellus's elegant visual reconstruction of what purports to be Solomon's Temple and reprinted it in Brian Walton's magnificent Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (6:1–49, sep. pag.)

349 Juan Bautista Villalpando, in his three huge folios on ancient architecture, In Ezechielem Explanaciones et Apparatus Urbis ac Templi Hierosolymitani (1604), tom. 2, pars 2, lib. 5, diss. 1, cap. 13, pp. 536–37, believes that "Omnes Basilicae construendae leges ex hac una Salomonis mutuatus est Vitruvius," or loosely, "All basilicas are constructed on the basis of the [architectural] laws [of proportion] which Vitruvius derived from Solomon's Temple." Alas, Marcus Vitruvius Pollio (1st c. BCE), in his handbook to classical architecture De Architectura (1649), lib. 6, cap. 5, 109–13, appears to speak of the Graeco-Roman, and Egyptian temples, not their architectural derivation from Solomon's in Jerusalem.

350 John Selden, De Jure Naturali & Gentium (1640), lib. 1, cap. 2, p. 26, takes Villalpando at his word and also claims that Vitruvius followed the design of the Temple in Jerusalem. Witsius (lib. 3, cap. 10, pp. 243–52).

351 Witsius (lib. 3, cap. 11, pp. 253–54); John Spencer, Dissertatio De Urim & Thummim (1669), reprinted in a slightly expanded version in his De Legibus Hebraeorum (1685), lib. 3, Diss. 7, caps. 1–8, fols. 851–988.

with so much of Brevity.³⁵² And our Prideaux's Admonition upon it, is worthy to be considered; *Sufficit observasse, Urim et Thummim, à Deo tradita, à Mose recepta, et inter Rationalis Duplicitatem, veluti in Theca quadam fuisse inclusa. Ultra qui temere quid asseruerit; videat, ne venditando scientiam, tam imperitis, quam sagacioribus debeat ludibrium.*³⁵³ It is an Assertion well maintained by the excellent J. Alting, | That the Urim and Thummim, were a peculiar Workmanship, formed by the Immediate Hand of Heaven, & lodged by Moses in the Pectoral of the High-Priest, and perhaps never seen so much as once, by any of the Israelites. They were Symbols of the Divine Presence, Irradiating the Mind of the High-Priest, & furnishing him with Knowledge & Utterance, to Direct the People of God, in their weighty Affairs. The Greek Terms, Δηλωσις, and, Αληθεία, represent the Intention of them; for a Light from Heaven making a Manifestation to the High Priest, there was Truth delivered for the Satisfaction of the People.³⁵⁴ As the Urim, was not the same with the Teraphim, among the ancients; thus, the Thummim, was not the same, with the little Image, which Ælian, and Diodorus tell us, hung about the Neck of the Egyptian High-Priest, with ΑΛΗΘΕΙΑ engraved upon it. Diodorus and Ælian themselves, are not agreed, what that Ornament was; One saies, It was an Image made of a Sapphire;

352 Exod. 28:30. Philo Judaeus allegorizes the Urim and Thummim, in his Legum Allegoriae (3.40.119), but see his Vita Mosis (2.24.122). In the former, Philo argues that the Urim and Thummim signify “manifestation and truth,” which are nothing else but “the organs of speech” and “the power of language” to speak “judiciously and well approved” or “inconsiderate[ly], and such as will not stand examination.” Yet in his Vita Mosis (2.24.122), Philo waxes astrological by adding that “the two round stones” are to some “emblems of those stars which are the rulers of night and day” (moon and sun), even “emblems of the two hemispheres (above and below the earth) or a “nearer approach to truth.” Josephus Flavius prefers a more supernatural explanation and identifies these “stones” as “sardonyxes,” which were worn on the shoulders of the high priest: “The one of them shined out when God was present at their sacrifices ... bright rays darting out thence, and being seen even by those that were most remote; which splendor yet was not before natural to the stone” (Antiquities 3.8.9).

353 The Latin quote is extracted from Opera Theologica, Quae Latine extant Omnia (1672), Oratione II, “De Vestibus Aharonis,” sec. 3, p. 338, by Johannes Prideaux (1578–1650), Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford and bishop of Worcester: “Suffice it to observe that Urim and Thummim had been handed over by God, accepted by Moses, and confined between the doubleness of the rational just as in a certain sheath. The one who has rashly defended the thing should beware lest by offering knowledge for sale, he become the laughingstock as much to the inexperienced as to the more sagacious.” On the topic of the Urim and Thummim, see also Humphrey Prideaux’s The Old and New Testament connected in the History of the Jews (1716–18), vol. 1, part 1, bk. 3, sec. 3, pp. 151–158, by the Dean of Norwich, Humphrey Prideaux (1648–1724), distant relative of the former (ODNB).

354 Jacobus Alting’s assertion about God’s workmanship appears in his “De Vestimentis Summi Sacerdotis propriis: III Ephod & Pectorale,” in Academicarum Dissertationum Heptades Duae (1671), pp. 424, 426. The Greek terms Δηλωσις and Αληθεία, representing the two stones Urim and Thummim, signify “Interpretation, Explanation, Urim” and “Truth” (LXX Exod. 28:50; Lev. 8:8; Esdras 5:40).

The other saies, It was made of several precious Stones.³⁵⁵ And if God ordered an Egyptian Ornament for His High-Priest, why not the Name also, which was used in Egypt; from which that of Thummim is very different? The Egyptian Ornament belonged unto their High-Priest, only as he was the Chief Judge of the Land; Among the Israelites, it was at the Liberty of the Sanhedrim, as Maimonides tells us, whether they would admitt, their High-Priest so much as to sitt among them.³⁵⁶ Nor had the Thummim such a Place assigned for it as the Egyptian Ornament had, which was hung in open View, to conciliate among the People, a Reverence for the Gentleman that wore it. And after all, what Proof have we, that this Αλθθεια of Egypt, for its Antiquity came near to the Thummim of Israel? The Writers that lived before Diodorus and Ælian, say nothing of it.³⁵⁷ About this, and the other Sacerdotal Vestments, there are some good Passages, in an Oration of Dr. Prideaux, on that Subject; wherein he shoves, how the Pagans have Aped the Church of God.³⁵⁸ The Summ whereof we will now rather take in the emphatical Words of Grotius; Imitati hoc sunt, sed up pueri, virorum res imitantur, Ægyptij.³⁵⁹

But whereas tis pretended by some learned Men, so Improbable, so Impossible a Thing, for the Egyptians to be Imitators of the Israelites, Lett us a little enquire into the Disposition of the Egyptians. Clemens Alexandrinus observes, That it was the Humour of the Pagans, & especially of the Egyptians, to Θεολογεῖν, advance into the Number of the Gods, those that had obliged the World, by giving 355 Witsius (lib. 1, cap. 6, sec. 13, p. 28; lib. 3, cap. 11, pp. 255–56); Claudius Aelian (De varia historia 14.34, lines 8–9) believes the Αλθθεια [Aletheia] was a “sapphire”; Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheka 1.75.5, line 2; 1.75.7, line 6) thinks it was an undetermined precious stones.

356 Maimonides, as quoted in Petrus Cunaeus’s De Republica Hebraeorum (1617), lib. 1, cap. 12, p. 106; and Hebrew Republic (1.12.49). In Hilchot Sanhedrin V’Haonshin Hamesurim Lahem (2.4) Mishneh Torah 23:22, Maimonides points out that while a king of Israel is not permitted to sit in the Sanhedrin (kings must not be contradicted), the High Priest can participate “if his knowledge makes him fitting.”

357 Whereas the Greco-Roman historian Diodorus Siculus lived in the 1st c. BCE, the Roman historian Claudius Aelianus lived more than a century before his Sicilian colleague from c. 175–c. 235 CE.

358 Prideaux, “Oratione II: De Vestibus Aaronis,” in Opera Theologica, Quae Latine extant Omnia (1672), p. 341, § 7, is neither the first nor last to make such claims. Theophilus Gale, in his The Court of the Gentiles, in 4 parts (1669–78) and, of course, Gerard Vossius’s De Theologia Gentili et Physiologia Christiana (1641) are prime examples. In fact the argument that the Egyptians, hence the Greeks and Romans, derived their culture, religion, and laws from Moses and the Patriarchs is at least as old as the Jewish apologists Eupolemus (2nd c. BCE), (pseudo-) Eupolemus, Artapanus (2nd c. BCE), and Flavius Josephus (Contra Apionem) – all of whom wrestled with the preponderance of Greek philosophy in their day only to insist on the Mosaic primacy. See also A.J. Droge’s Homer or Moses? (1989).

359 The sublime Hugo Grotius, in De Veritate Religione (lib. 1, § 17 annot. 111), in Opera Omnia (1679), 3:28, offers the following rationale: “The Egyptians imitated this, just as children imitate men.” Witsius (258, 261).

of good Lawes and Rules unto them.³⁶⁰ Diodorus observes the Manner of the Egyptians, thus to Recompence their Benefactors. And they thus acknowledge, not only their own Countreymen, but Strangers also, whom Virtue had rendred conspicuous and considerable. The Respects they paid unto Darius, the Father of Xerxes, are an Instance of it; for even, while he was yett living, his Virtue moved them to Deify him.³⁶¹ Now, is it unlikely that Men so renowned for Wisdom and Virtue, as Abraham, and Joseph, and Moses, Men whom no Age could æqual, should not among the Egyptians find a more than ordinary Veneration? We know, how Honourable Abraham was in the Court of Egypt. Eupolemus, in Polyhistor, quoted by Eusebius, amplifies upon his admirable Character; whereof the Egyptians could not but be sensible.³⁶² Nicolaus Damascenus also celebrates his powerful and perswasive Conferences among them. And there is as much Reason to beleeeve these Gentlemen, as to beleeeve Herodotus.³⁶³ The Merit, the ³⁶⁰ Witsius (lib. 3, cap. 12, p. 263). Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 1.15.67.3–68.2) quotes Plato's Symposium (209e) to affirm that the wise men and lawgivers among the barbarians were deified (ἐθεολόγησαν) and honored by having temples reared in their names. And so did the Brahmins, Odrysians, the Getae, and especially the Egyptians, along with the Chaldeans and Arabs of Palestine. Perhaps better known as "Euhemerism," the historical apotheosis of famous lawgivers or rulers was common enough.

³⁶¹ Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca 1.90.2, lines 7–11) relates that the Egyptians – above all others – give thanks to their benefactors because "they hold that the return of gratitude to benefactors is a very great resource of life." So in the case of Darius, father of the Persian Xerxes, who revered the Egyptian temples, studied their sacred books with the priests of Egypt, and followed the example of the great pharaohs. "For this reason," Diodorus adds (1.95.5, lines 8–11), Darius "was the object of such great honour that he alone of all the kings was addressed as a god by the Egyptians in his lifetime, while at his death he was accorded equal honours with the ancient kings of Egypt who had ruled in strict accord with the laws."

³⁶² Witsius (264). The Greco-Jewish historian Eupolemus, whose Concerning the Jews of Assyria is extracted by the Greek historian Lucius Cornelius Alexander Polyhistor (fl. 50 BCE) and copied in Eusebius Pamphilus's Praeparatio evangelica (9.17.419c), reveals that "Abraham dwelt with the Egyptian priests in Heliopolis and taught them many things; and it was he who introduced astronomy and the other sciences to them, saying that the Babylonians and himself had found these things out, but tracing back the first discovery to Enoch, and saying that he, and not the Egyptians, had first invented astrology."

³⁶³ In another excerpt from the prolific Greek historian-philosopher Nicolaus Damascenus (c. 64–after 4 BCE), extracted by Josephus Flavius, and quoted in Eusebius (Praeparatio evangelica 9.16.417c–418b), the Caesarian bishop asserts that "Abraham was king of Damascus" and revered among the Egyptians as "a very wise man, and strong not only in intelligence but also in persuasive speech on whatever subjects he undertook to teach." Better yet, Abraham taught the Egyptians "the science of arithmetic, and also communicate[d] to them the facts of astronomy. For before Abraham's arrival the Egyptians were ignorant of these subjects; for they passed from the Chaldees into Egypt, and thence came also to the Greeks." Mather clearly trusts the sources sanctioned by Eusebius and the early Church Fathers more than he does those of the pagan Hesiod, Homer, Herodotus, Manethon, or Plutarch, who maintained that all the arts, sciences, and the gods came from Egypt, the most advanced civilization in the region. Put in another way, by reviving the ancient debate among Jewish and Greco-Roman apologists about the primogeniture of culture and philosophy, Mather and his peers aim to refute the charges of the likes of John Selden, Herbert of Cherbury, John Spencer, John Marsham, Athanasius Kircher, Thomas Burnet, John Toland, and William Warburton, who gave new life to this Figure, the Authority of Joseph, among the Egyptians, is well-known to all the World. We are divinely informed, That he taught their Senators Wisdome; And no doubt, Religion must be no little Part of that Wisdome. What if we should think, That from the Time of Josephs, marrying into a Sacerdotal Family, the Priests of Egypt conformed unto the Rite of Circumcision. Moses was adopted by a Princess of Egypt, & educated in the Court of Egypt, and all agree, that he was a Man of mighty Interest among the Egyptians. They counted him so admirable a Person, that they challenged him for their own; they would needs have him to be an Heliopolitan. Doubtless they received many good Instructions from him. And when he opposed their Tyranny with such amazing Plagues from Heaven upon them, they could not but conceive a mighty Fear of him; Fear, which is no small Instrument and | Incentive of Religion in the World. Suidas tells us, [76v] That there had been Prophecies among the Egyptians, concerning the Exploits, which this great Person was to do upon them. And they were as ready to worship what Harmed them, as what Served them.³⁶⁴

We may further observe, That the Fame of the Lawes uttered by GOD, with so much awful Solemnity, unto the Israelites, Did fill the Nations in the Neighbourhood, with High Thoughts concerning this People, and the Lawes observed among them. [Deut. 4.6, 8. Josh. 2.9, 10, 11.] And the Victories gained by the Israelites under Joshua, had yett a further Influence, to raise the Reputation of the Nation, & of its Religion. But their Flourishing State in the Reign of David and of Solomon, rendred their Credit yett greater in the World, & procured vast Numbers of Proselytes unto them. [1. King. 8.41, 42. and, 1. King. 10.1.] And there can be no Quæstion, but that the Illustrious Condition of Daniel, of Nehemiah, of Mordecai, did contribute unto the Esteem of the Nation, & of the things professed & practised among them. It is a great Mistake, to think, That the Institutions of the Israelites, were not known beyond the Bounds of Palastine, or were but mock'd where they were known. Origen against Celsus very well notes, That the Great Creator of the World, made the Lawes which He had given unto this His Chosen People, to have no little Fame and Force throughout the World.³⁶⁵ Certainly, The Egyptians did not look on the Israelites as their Slaves, when King Solomon married Pharaohs Daughter!

snake-in-the-grass that Moses had adapted the laws and customs of the superior Egyptians (their former overlord) and those of their more cosmopolitan neighbors.

364 Witsius (267). Suda, Lexicon (alphab. letter iota entry 176, lines 1–10, voce Ἱερογλαμματοῖς) prominently mentions the Lawgiver Moses (“Μωϋσέως”).

365 Witsius (269). In his polemic against Celsus, the Church Father Origenes Alexandrinus (Contra Celsum 1.18, lines 24–26) notes that whereas the wisdom of the pagans – along with their poetry – has perished, the Mosaic Laws and the knowledge of the true God has flourished, even among the pagans. “For it became the Creator of the universe, after laying down the laws for its government, to confer upon His words a power which might subdue all men in every part of the earth” (Against Celsus 1.18), in ANF (4:404).

The Sixth Assertion.

The Græcians, as well as the Egyptians, derived their Wisdome from the same Fountain of Israel. The most ancient Writers do still join the Hebrewes, with the other Philosophers of India, as the first Authors of the Græcian Philosophy. So particularly does Megasthenes, an old Historian, who lived in the Dayes of Seleucus Nicanor.³⁶⁶ And Clearchus brings in Aristotle, as using the Name of, A Jew, to signify the same with, A Philosopher. Numenius also, and Porphyrius, join the Jewes, with the Brachmans, and the Magi, in the fame of the ancient Philosophy.³⁶⁷ This Fame caused the Jewes to be visited by learned Men of all Nations, that from them they might learn their Wisdome. Aristobulus, the Tutor of Ptolomæus Philometor, does Report this of Pythagoras; (and so does Josephus;) The same Report he gives of Plato; yea, he affirms, That the Peripatetic Philosophy, & Aristotle the Author of it, had Countenance from the Law of Moses.³⁶⁸ Clemens Alexandrinus makes no Doubt of the Truth in the Words of Aristobulus, about Pythagoras;³⁶⁹ yea, both he, and Theodoret, affirm the Circumcision of Pythagoras; and our Selden inclines to beleieve them; inasmuch as Laertius relates, that he was Initiated in the Mysteries of the Barbarians; whereto Iamblichus

366 Witsius (lib. 3, cap. 13, p. 271). The Greek historian Megasthenes (c. 350–c. 290 BCE), author of Indica, and diplomat to the court of Seleucus I Nicator (c. 358–281 BCE), declares the following in an extant fragment in Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 1.15.72.5) and Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio evangelica 9.6.5): “All that was said about nature by the ancients is said also by those who philosophise beyond Greece: some things by the Brahmins among the Indians, and others by those called Jews in Syria” (Stromata 1.16), in ANF (2:317).

367 The Peripatetic philosopher Clearchus of Soli (4th–3rd c. BCE) brings in Aristotle, his teacher, in a citation extant in Josephus Flavius (Contra Apionem 1.179, lines 2–4), stating that according to Aristotle a learned Jew taught the Greeks philosophy. This man “was by birth a Jew, came from Celesyria; these Jews are derived from the Indian philosophers; they are named by the Indians Calami, and by the Syrians Judaei, and took their name from the country they inhabit, which is called Judea” (Against Apion 1.22; Complete Works 615). The Neopythagorean philosopher Numenius of Apamea (2nd c. CE), as quoted by Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio 9.6.411a, 9.7.411c), wonders, “What is Plato, but Moses speaking in Attic Greek?” And more ambiguously, that all the philosophy of Pythagoras and Plato should be squared with “all that the Brachmans, and Jews, and Magi and Egyptians arranged.”

368 Mather’s source is Witsius (272), whose vademecum is John Selden’s De Jure Naturali & Gentium (1640), lib. 1, cap. 2, p. 14. See also J. P. Rosenblatt Renaissance England’s Chief Rabbi (158–81). The Hellenist Jewish philosopher Aristobulus of Paneas (fl. 2nd c. BCE), believed to have been the teacher of King Ptolomæus VI Philometor (c. 185–145 BCE) of Egypt, is quoted at second hand in Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio evangelica 9.6.411a) as saying that “Plato too has followed our [Mosaic] legislation, and has evidently studied carefully the several precepts contained in it.” Josephus Flavius (Against Apion 1.22) adds that Pythagoras of Samos was greatly esteemed as “a person superior to all philosophers, in wisdom and piety towards God. Now it is plain that he did not only know our [Hebrew] doctrines, but was in very great measure a follower and admirer of them” (Complete Works 614).

369 Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 5.14.97.7) paraphrases Aristobulus’s assertion that “there were abundant books to show that the Peripatetic philosophy was derived from the law of Moses and from the other prophets” (ANF 2:467).

consents, and adds his Conversation with the Phœnician Priests.³⁷⁰ Ambrose tells us, That Pythagoras not only Derived his Philosophy from the Jewes, but also was originally one of that Nation. Clemens calls Plato, τον ἐξ Εβραίων φιλοσοφον, Ex Hebraeis Philosophum.³⁷¹ And he saies, That the Greek Philosophers were Theeves, who stole all the Good they had, out of Moses, & the Prophets, and never acknowledged it. Ambrose also saies, That Plato went into Egypt, that he might learn the Mosaic Actions and Oracles.³⁷² Pythagoras lived about the Time (as Austin observes,) when the Jewes returned from their Captivity.³⁷³ Some have thought, That Nazaratus, (or, Zabratus) the Assyrian Tutor of Pythagoras, was no other than our Prophet Ezekiel.³⁷⁴ Be sure, when Pythagoras was in Egypt, there were Jewes enough there; yea, our Prophet Jeremiah, or at least the fresh Memory of him, was then living among them. It is not likely, That he who Travelled upon Enquiries would enquire nothing of these. Austin also tells us, That Socrates, & by Consequence Plato, lived after Ezra.³⁷⁵ They both of them conversed with the Jewes in Egypt; whereof tis evident from the Forty fourth Chapter of Jeremiah, that Multitudes had been settled there, time out of Mind. And we may observe by the way, That the Communication between the Jewes & the Egyptians, was not so shutt up, as Marsham & Company, would have us to imagine. In fine, what saies Tertullian? Quis Poetarum, quis Sophistarum, qui non omninò de Prophetarum Fonte potaverit? Inde igitur Philosophi sitim ingenij sui rigaverunt.³⁷⁶

370 Selden (De Iure Naturali & Gentium [1640], lib. 1, cap. 2, p. 15) cites Theodoretus's Graecum affectionum curatio (1.15–16) to affirm that Pythagoras, to be initiated into the Egyptian mysteries, underwent circumcision. The same affirmation appears in Diogenes Laertius (Vitae philosophorum 8.2. lines 9–10), Iamblichus (De vita Pythagorica 3.14), and Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 1.15), in ANF (2:315).

371 Witsius (273). Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 1.1.10.2): ἐκ Εβραίων φιλόσοφος “the philosopher [who learned] from the Hebrews” (ANF 2:301). In his letter to Irenaeus (Letter XXVIII. A.D. 387) St. Ambrosius, bishop of Milan (c. 340–97), relates that Pythagoras was greatly influenced by the wisdom of the Hebrew Bible (Letters of St. Ambrose, XXVIII.1, p. 196).

373 St. Augustine, De Civitate Dei (18.37), in NPNFi (2:382).

374 Witsius (274); John Selden, in his De Iure Naturali & Gentium (1640), lib. 1, cap. 2, p. 18; and De Diis Syris Syntagma (1617), synt. 2, cap. 1, pp. 119–20, calls him Zabratus. Porphyrius (Vita Pythagorae 12, lines 15–11) mentions Zaratus, teacher of Porphyrius in Babylon. Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 1.15.70, line 2) says that according to [Cornelius] Alexander's On the Pythagorean Symbols [Fragmenta 138a, line 2] “Pythagoras was a pupil of Nazaratus [Nazaratus] the Assyrian [and that] (some think he is Ezekiel; but he is not, as will afterwards be shown), and he [Alexander] will have it that in addition to these, Pythagoras was a hearer of the Galatae and the Brahmins” (ANF 2:316). Archbishop James Ussher, in his Annales Veteris Testamenti (1650), p. 151, is certainly one among those who identify this Nazaratus as the prophet Ezekiel. And if Pierre-Daniel Huet be allowed to have the final say on this matter, then this Zabratus, Na-Zaratus, or Zaratus was none other than the famous Zarathustra of the Persians, also known as Zoroaster (Demonstratio Evangelica [1690], prop. IV, p. 90B). Well, there it is.

375 See St. Augustine (City of God 8.2–4), in NPNFi (2:145–47).

376 The firebrands are John Marsham, in his Chronicus Canon Aegytiacus (1672), and John Spencer, in his De Legibus Hebraeorum (1685), along with those already mentioned (above).

[77r] | But the Testimonies of the Pagans themselves, concerning themselves, one would think, should end the Matter. Hermippus, a most ancient Writer of the Life of Pythagoras, affirms, That he received many things from the Jewes, which he translated into his Philosophy.³⁷⁷ Yea, elsewhere he ascribes the whole Philosophy of Pythagoras, to a Jewish Original; you find the Passage quoted by Origen against Celsus.³⁷⁸ And Porphyrie saies, That Pythagoras obtained the principal Part of what Wisdome he had, by repairing to the Hebrewes & the Chaldees.³⁷⁹ With Numenius the Pythagorean also Plato is no more than Μωσῆς Ἀττικίζων, Moses expressing himself in the Language of Athens; He saies, That what Plato writes about God, and the World, he stole from the Mosaic Writings.³⁸⁰ And Clearchus the Peripatetic, affirms, That he himself knew the Jew, that was Aristotles Companion and Instructor.³⁸¹ Origen also mentions one Hecataeus and Historian, & an Abderite who wrote an History of the Jewes, with such Applause of their Wisdome, that Herennius Philo suspects him to have been hired by the Jewes to write in their favour.³⁸² The Force of all these Testimonies, is not enervated, by one flourish of Lactantius, to the Contrary.³⁸³ For besides these Testimonies, we Tertullian's rhetorical question (Apology, ch. 47) sums it all up: "What poet or sophist has not drunk at the fountain of the prophets? Thence, accordingly, the philosophers watered their arid minds" (ANF 3:51).

377 Witsius (274–75). The Peripatetic philosopher Hermippus Smyrnaeus (3rd c. BCE), in a fragment (Fragmenta 22, lines 1–11), extant in Josephus Flavius (Adversus Apionem 1.22.163), reveals in his history of Pythagoras (bk. 1) that the great philosopher confessed to having incorporated into his philosophy "the doctrines of the Jews and Thracians." Josephus proudly adds, "it is very truly affirmed of this Pythagoras, that he took a great many of the laws of the Jews into his own philosophy" (Against Apion 1.22.614).

378 Origenes (Contra Celsus 1.15, lines 8–10) discloses that "It is said . . . that Hermippus has recorded in his first book, On Lawgivers, that it was from the Jewish people that Pythagoras derived the philosophy which he introduced among the Greeks" (Against Celsus 1.15), in ANF (4:402).

379 Porphyrius (Vita Pythagorae, sec. 12, lines 5–10).

380 In an extant fragment in Eusebius Pamphilus, the Neopythagorean Numenius declares, "Τι γάρ ἐστι Πλάτων ἢ Μωσῆς ἀττικίζων, or, "For what is Plato, but Moses speaking in Attic Greek?" And in the same anthological collection, the Hellenist-Jewish philosopher Aristobulus – as quoted by Clement of Alexandria and excerpted by Eusebius – admits that Plato and Pythagoras "transferred many of our [Hebrew] precepts into his own system of doctrines" – all in Eusebius Pamphilus's Praeparatio evangelica (9.6.411a).

381 According to Clement Alexandrinus – as quoted by Eusebius – "Clearchus the Peripatetic says that he knew a Jew who associated with Aristotle" (Praeparatio evangelica 9.6.410b).

382 Origenes (Against Celsus 1.15) says that "there is extant a work by the historian Hecataeus [of Abdera], treating of the Jews, in which so high a character is bestowed upon that nation for its learning, that Herennius Philo [Philo Byblus], in his treatise on the Jews, has doubts in the first place, whether it is really the composition of the historian [Hecataeus] . . . [or derived from] the plausible nature of the Jewish history" (ANF 4:402–3).

383 Throwing a monkey wrench into this intricately woven net, Lactantius wonders that when Pythagoras and subsequently Plato quested for truth even among "the Egyptians, and Magi, and Persians," they did not approach the Jews only, in whose possession alone it [truth] then was, and to whom they might have gone more easily[?]." Answering his own question, have the Remarkable Agreement between the Mosaical and the Pythagorean Præcepts, to confirm what is asserted in them.³⁸⁴

The Seventh Assertion.

The Design of God, in Instituting the Ceremonies observed by the Israelites, was not, that He might indulge a Stiff-necked People, in some Conformity, to the Customes of their Neighbours, from which it was not easy to dissuade them: [According to the Political Maxim, Arcanum Novi Status, Imago Antiqui.]³⁸⁵ In such a Vain Imagination, poor Mortals go to make the Blessed God altogether such an one as themselves. No, The whole Constitution of the Divine Worship, even in the smallest Circumstances of it, præscribed unto the Israelites, was given from Heaven, to Moses in the Mount; and nothing was left unto meer Humane Determination; all was directed, required, imposed, with this as a sufficient Reason for all, I am JEHOVAH. What can be more positive, than these Words of the Great God? Deut. 12.30. 31, 32. Take heed, That thou enquire not after their Gods, saying, How did these Nations serve their Gods? Even so will I do likewise. Thou shalt not do so unto the Lord thy God. What thing soever I command you, observe to do it; Thou shalt not add thereto, nor diminish from it. Compare, Lev. 18.2, 3, 4.³⁸⁶ Yea, tis well done of Maimonides, to maintain, That many Lawes were given to the Israelites, for which tis not easy to find any Reason but this; Their Contrariety to the Wayes of the old Egyptians, and Zabians, and Canaanites.³⁸⁷ And Abenophius, Lactantius adds, “But I think that they were turned away from them [Jews] by divine providence, that they [Pythagoras and Plato] might not know the truth, because it was not yet permitted for the religion of the true God and righteousness to become known to men of other nations” (Divine Institutes 4.2), in ANF (7:102).

³⁸⁵ Mather and Witsius (lib. 3, cap. 14, p. 282) here again single out John Spencer’s De Legibus Hebraeorum (1685), lib. 3, Diss. 1, caps. 1–12, fols. 519–638, who compares the religious ceremonies of the pagan nations, especially those of Egypt, with the ones among the Israelites, and postulates that Moses and the priests adapted the rites of the pagans to their own purposes (see esp. lib. 2: “In quo de Legibus Mosaicis, quibus Zabiorum Ritus occasionem dedere, fusè differitur,” pp. 235–470). Be that as it may, the political maxim (attributed to Tacitus) suggests that “the Secret of setting up a New Government is to retain the Image of the Old.” Put in another way, for innovations to be acceptable to the hoi polloi, they have to have the appearance of the old.

³⁸⁶ Witsius (283–84).

³⁸⁷ Maimonides, מורה נבוכים [More Nebuchim] Doctor Perplexorum (1629), pars 3, cap. 29, pp. 424–25. In short, Mather argues that Moses established a “counter-religion,” which turned certain rites of the idolatrous Zabians and Canaanites upside down – not by outlawing them per se, but by redirecting them to the service of the true God. As Maimonides put it, God in His wisdom employed a “gracious ruse,” knowing that human nature cannot change on a sudden. The Lord therefore did not prescribe “the rejection, abandonment, and abolition of all these kinds of [pagan] worships,” but allowed them to remain and “transferred them from created or imaginary and unreal things to His own name ... commanding us to practice them with regard to Him.” Consequently, “through this divine ruse it came about that the memory of idolatry was effaced and that the grandest and true foundation of our belief [that God is quoted by Kircher, carries the Matter so far, as to say, Tota lex opponitur Erroribus Antiquorum.³⁸⁸

Indeed, the best Way of Confuting the False Causes of the Mosaic Institutions, will be by assigning the True Causes of them.

And, first, it was very agreeable unto the Condition of that People, to hold them under so severe a Servitude, as was in the Rites of Moses imposed upon them. God, by such Worldly Elements, very agreeably begun His Discipline upon the Minds of a People, sunk into the Spirit of this World. The Yoke was many Ways useful to them; & it served also as a Wall, or a Tower, including this Peculiar People, with a Separation from the other Nations of the World. Yea, there was a sort of Enmity thereby produced; the Jewes who had the Lawes of Heaven, despised the Gentiles who were enslaved unto the Divel: And the Gentiles look'd with Contempt and Hatred on the Practices of the Jewes; as in the Writings of Diodorus, & of Tacitus, you will find sufficient Expressions of it.³⁸⁹ The Apostle tells us, That the Lawes of the Israelites, were to make a Distance between them & the rest of the World; but Marsham and Spencer and our Modern Gentlemen, tell us, The Lawes were so accommodated as to make a Resemblance & a Communion between them. I suppose, we are not at a Loss now, which of these we are to believe!³⁹⁰

One] ... was firmly established, while at the same time the souls had no feeling or repugnance and were not repelled because of the abolition of modes of worship to which they were accustomed (Guide 3.32.526, 527). On the Mosaic "counter-religion," see especially J. Assmann's Moses the Egyptian (55–90), F. Parente's "Spencer, Maimonides" (277–304), and R. Smolinski's "Eager Imitators" (303–10).

388 Witsius (285) translates into Latin a passage from Abenophius's Arabic De Mysteriis Egyptiorum, as quoted in Athanasius Kircher's Edipus Aegyptiacus (1652), syntag. I, cap. 4, p. 249. The passage reads, "The whole Law is opposed to the errors of the ancients." If Daniel Stolzenberg is correct, then Abenophius, aka. "Abenephius Arabs," aka. "Rabbi Barachias Nephi of Babylon," is probably a fictive name devised by Kircher to establish the authorship of an obscure Arabic text he was long in translating (Stolzenberg's Egyptian Oedipus, pp. 71–88).

389 Witsius (288). Forms of anti-Semitism already existed in ancient times, if Diodorus Siculus' fragmentary account in Bibliotheka (34/35.1.1–2) is a trustworthy report: The councilors of Antiochus VII Evergetes advised him that when laying siege to Jerusalem, he should "wipe out completely the race of Jews, since they alone of all nations avoided dealings with any other people and looked upon all men as their enemies." So the Roman historian Tacitus, in his Historia (5.4.1–20; 5.4.5.1): "Moses introduced new religious practices, quite opposed to those of all other religions. The Jews regard as profane all that we hold sacred; on the other hand, they permit all that we abhor. They dedicated, in a shrine, a statue of that creature whose guidance enabled them to put an end of their wandering and thirst, sacrificing a ram, apparently in derision of Ammon. They likewise offer the ox, because the Egyptians worship Apis. They abstain from pork, in recollection of the plague, for the scab to which this animal is subject once afflicted them. ... the other customs of the Jews are base and abominable, and owe their persistence to their depravity."

390 Witsius (lib. 3, cap. 15, sec. 4, p. 294).

We must add, That in the Mosaic Rites, there were admirable Figures of Evangelical & Coelestial Mysteries. But is it likely, that the Lord would go to Hell, to borrow from thence the Figures?

| What tho' some of the Christian Fathers, have lett fall unwary Passages, that countenance the sinful Assertion, which we have been all this while refuting? Spencer himself confesses, That the Words of Chrysostom are too lavish. Nor is their Authority of much Weight in such a Matter, if there be not good Reason to support it, & enforce it.³⁹¹ Spencer also brings these into the field against us, which rather are on our Side; Maimonides especially, who saies, *Horum omnium una et eadem est Intentio, videlicet, Ne colamus ipsum eo modo quo Idololatæ fictitia sua Numina colere solebant.*³⁹² [77v]

Origen against Celsus, affirms, That the Rites of the Jewes, were acceptable to them, on the Score of their Contrariety to an Impure and Impious World; and that there was in them, *A Representation of the Heavenly City.*³⁹³ And if Grotius have said any thing elsewhere, that may seem to favour the Opinion, That the Rites of the Jewes were borrowed from the Pagans, & corrected, he does in his Book, De Veritate Religionis Christianæ, overthrow it all.³⁹⁴

But so much for this Noble Subject. The wretched Assertion, That the Lawes of Israel, were derived from, & conformed to, the Manners of the Gentiles; An Assertion maintained with such pompous Pretence of Reading and Learning, by the luxuriant Pens of some in our Dayes; It ha's been but a Fine, and perhaps the Last, Essay of Satan, to introduce Irreligion into the World, & countenance the growing Infidelity of the Age. I desire my Reader, to join with me, in giving Thanks to Heaven, for Inspiring & Assisting, such rare Persons as our WITSIUS, to refell that wicked Assertion. And I count myself happy, That

391 I have been unable to locate Spencer's "confession."

392 Witsius (296). Maimonides Libor מורה נבוכים [More Nebuchim] Doctor Perplexorum (1629), lib. 3, cap. 45, p. 477, says, "In all this there is one and the same purpose, namely, that we should not worship God in the form of the particular cults practiced by idol worshippers" (adapted from Guide 3.45.578).

393 Witsius (297). Origenes, Contra Celsum (5.42, lines 11–16).

394 Witsius (299). Hugo Grotius, De Veritate Religionis Christianæ (1.15), in Opera (3:9), gives credit to the truth of Moses and his writings because ancient tradition acknowledge him as God's greatest prophet and because the Lawgiver humbly confessed his own errors: "All which plainly show, that he had no occasion to falsify his History; as the Style of it further evinces, it being free from that Varnish and Colour, which uses to give Credit to Romances; and is very natural and easy, and agreeably to the Matter of which it treats. Moreover, another Argument for the undoubted Antiquity of Moses' Writings, which no other Writings can pretend to, is this; That the Greeks (from whom all other Nations derived their Learning) own, that they had their Letters from others; which Letters of theirs, have the same Order, Name and Shape, as the Syriack or Hebrew: And further still, the most antient Attick Laws, from whence the Roman were afterwards taken, owe their Original to the Law of Moses" (Truth of the Christian Religion [1719], pp. 25–26).

his ÆGYPTIACA have been by the good Providence of Heaven brought into my Hands; from whence I have collected the Things, which, thus becoming AMERICANA, I have now putt into the Hands of my Readers.³⁹⁵ ³⁹⁵ Here, then, ends Mather's lengthy abstract of Witsius's oft-reprinted refutation Ægyptiaca, et ΔΕΚΑΦΥΛΙΟΝ. Sive de Ægyptiacorum sacrorum cum Hebraicis collatione libri tres (1683, 1696), a three-hundred-page quarto, which Mather reduces to roughly twenty-five double-columned folios. In his "Note Book of Authors" (Lev. ch. 27), Mather lists what he deems to be among the most important authors and works to be consulted on Leviticus: Targums Jonathan ben Uzziel and Hierosolymitanum – both in the fourth volume of Brian Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (1653–57), Matthew Poole's Synopsis Criticorum (1669–76), St. Augustine's Quaestiones in Heptateuchum, in Opera Omnia. Tomi 4 (1569); Lyranus, Biblia Sacra cum Glossa Ordinaria ... Et postilla Nicolai Lyrani. Tomi 6. (1617); Franciscus Vatablus's Biblia Sacra, cum Duplici Translatione (1584); John Calvin's Opera Omnia (1671); Henry Ainsworth's Annotations (1626–27); John Jackson's Index Biblicus (1668); Andrew Willet's Hexapla in Leviticum That is, A Six-Fold Commentarie upon the Third Booke of Moses, called Leviticus (1631); Gervase Babington's The Workes ... Containing Comfortable Notes upon The Five Bookes of Moses (1615), by Gervase Babington (1549/50–1610), Elizabethan theologian, bishop of Worcester, member of the Hampton Court Conference and opponent of the Puritan cause. See J. S. Macauley's biographical essay, "Babington, Gervase (1549/50–1610), (ODNB); Matthew Henry's An Exposition Of the Five Books of Moses (1707); and Manasseh ben Israel's Conciliator, sive De convenientia locorum S. Scripturae (1632).

Q. Some Account of the Method used by the Ancient Hebrews, in Computing their Months and Years, may be very agreeably introduced here? v. 1.

A. In all Civil Matters, the Hebrews did, like the other Nations, begin their Year about the Autumnal Equinox; and so they did their Sabbatical Years and Jubilees. But their Deliverance out of Egypt happening about the Vernal Equinox, they did from thence begin their Ecclesiastical Year, & from thence they did calculate their Festivals.²

But the Form of the Year they made Use of, was, as Dr. Prideaux, after many others, observes, very Inartificial.³ It was made up of Lunar Months, which were sett out by the Appearance of the Moon. When they saw their New Moon, then they began their Months, which sometimes consisted of 29 Days, and sometimes of 30, according as the New Moon did appear sooner or later. The Synodical Course of the Moon, (that is, from New Moon to New Moon) being 29 Days and an half, the Half-Day which a Month of 29 Days fell short of it, was made up with adding it unto the Next Month, which made it consist of 30 Days; and so their Month consisted of 29 Days, and of 30 Days alternately. None of them had fewer than 29 Days; and therefore they never looked for the New Moon before the Night following the 29th Day; and if they then saw

2 The following paragraphs are extracted from the “Preface” of Humphrey Prideaux's popular Old and New Testament Connected in the History of the Jews, Second Edition (1716), vol. 1, part 1, preface, pp. v–i. This multivolume work went through at least ten editions in the eighteenth century and was reprinted until the middle of the nineteenth century.

3 Prideaux (Preface, p. v) benefited from the chronological calculations of several of his predecessors, most significantly from those of the Dutch scholar Joseph Justus Scaliger (1540–1609), the French Jesuit Dionysius Petavius (1583–1652), and the learned Anglican Hebraist John Selden (1584–1654). In an effort to align the differing chronologies employed by the ancients with those used in the Hebrew Bible, Scaliger collated the various lunar, solar, or lunisolar calendars in use among the peoples of the Fertile Crescent, using as his fixed point the astronomical calculations of the First Olympiad (776 BCE) and Claudius Ptolemy's astronomical treatise Amalgest (2nd c. CE). For the present purpose, see Scaliger's Opus De Emendatione Temporum [1583] (1629), lib. 2: “De Anno Lunari,” pp. 64–187. Dionysius Petavius, Scaliger's colleague, published his De Doctrina Temporum Divisum in Partes Duas (1627), introduced AD 1 as a fixed date for Christ's birth, and established the concepts of AD and BC as a means of ordering historical events before and after Christ's birth. See esp. tom. 1, lib. 2: “De Anno Lunari,” pp. 89–250. John Selden – a favorite in Mather's Biblia Americana – published a work on the civil, i.e., solar-luni, calendars in use among the ancient Israelites, Greeks, and Near-Eastern peoples, titled De Anno Civili Veterum Judaeorum et de Macedonum et Asianorum Anno Solari (1683). See also A. T. Grafton's “Joseph Scaliger and Historical Chronology,” P. Rossi's Dark Abyss of Time (137–67), and J. Evans's The History and Practice of Ancient Astronomy (1998).

it, the next Day was the First Day of the following Month. Neither had they any of their Months more than 30 Days; and therefore they never look'd for the New Moon after the Night following of the Thirtieth Day; but then, if they saw it not, they concluded, that the Appearance was obstructed by the Clouds, and without any further Expectation made the Next Day to be the First Day of the Month ensuing. And of Twelve such Lunar Months their Common Year consisted. But the Twelve Lunar Months falling short Eleven Days of the Solar Year, every one of those common Years began Eleven Days sooner than the former; which in Thirty Three Years time would carry back the Beginning of the Year thro' all the Four Seasons, to the same Point again; and gett a Whole Year from the Solar Reckoning, as it is now done in Turkey.⁴ For the Remedying of this, their Usage was, that sometimes in the Third Year, and sometimes in the Second, they cast in another Month, and made their Year to consist of Thirteen Months; whereby they constantly reduced their Lunar Year, as far as this Intercalation could effect it, unto that of the Sun; and they never suffered the one, for any more than a Month, at any time to vary from the other; And unto this they were forced, for the sake of their Festivals. Their Passeover, the First Day whereof was always fixed unto the middle | of the Month Nisan, being to be celebrated, by their Eating of the Pascal Lamb, and the Offering up of the Wave-Sheaf, as the First-Fruits of their Barly-Harvest; And their Pentecost, which was kept the Fiftieth Day after the Sixteenth of Nisan, when the Wave-Sheaf had been offered; being to be celebrated, by the Offering of Two Wave-Loaves, as the First-Fruits of their Wheat-Harvest; And their Feast of Tabernacles, which was always begun on the Fifteenth of Tisri, being fixed unto the Time of their Gathering in all the Fruits of the Earth; Hence, the Passeover could not be observed, before the Lambs were grown fitt for to be eaten; and the Barly fitt for to be reaped; Nor the Pentecost, until the Wheat was ripe; Nor the Feast of Tabernacles, until the Ingathering, of the Vineyard and Olive-Yard were over. And therefore, these Festivals being fixed unto such Sett-Seasons of the Year, the making of the Intercalation was necessary, for the keeping of them, within a Month sooner or later to them. The Rule for doing it was this:⁵ Whenever according to the Course of the common Year, they foresaw the Fifteenth Day of Nisan (which was the First Day of Unleavened Bread, and the First Day of the Paschal Solemnity) would happen to fall before

4 Prideaux (Preface, pp. v–i). Mather's erroneous "now down Turkey" emended for "now done in Turkey."

5 Prideaux (Preface, pp. vii, xii). The complexity of establishing the "New Year" among the ancient Hebrews can be seen in the Mishnah, tractate Rosh Ha-Shannah (1.1): There are four 'New Year' days: on the 1st of Nisan is the New Year for kings and feasts; on the 1st of Elul is the New Year of the Tithe of Cattle (R. Eleazar and R. Simeon say: The 1st of Tishri); on the 1st of Tishri is the New Year for [the reckoning of] the years [of foreign kings], of the years of Release and Jubilee years, for the planting [of trees] and for vegetables; and the 1st of Shebat is the New Year for [fruit-]trees (so the School of Shammai; and the School of Hillel say: on the 15th thereof)," in The Mishnah (188).

the Day of their Vernal Equinox, then they Intercalated a Month, and the Paschal Solemnity was thereby carried on a Month farther into the Year, and all the other Festivals with it. For, according as the Paschal Festival was fixed, so were all the rest. Here also tis to be observed by the way, That the Barly-Harvest was before the Wheat-Harvest, in Judæa, as it was likewise in Egypt. [See Exod. IX. 31, 32.]⁶

The Hebrew Months were as followeth:

1. Nisan.	March / April.
2. Ijar.	April / May.
3. Sivan.	May, / June.
4. Tamuz.	June / July.
5. Ab.	July / August.
6. Elul.	August / September.
7. Tisri.	September / October.
8. Marchesvan.	October / November.
9. Cisleu.	November / December.
10. Tebeth.	December / January.
11. Shebat.	January / February.
12. Adar.	February / March.

In their Intercalated Years, here was another Month, which they called, Ve-adar, or, The Second Adar; and then they had Thirteen Months in their Year.⁷

| But this Inartificial Way, of their forming their Months and their Years, was [3r] in Use among them, only while they lived in their own Land; and there might easily receive Notice of what was ordained in this Matter, by those who had the Care and Ordering of it. For when they became dispersed through all Nations, they were forced to make Use of Cycles, and Astronomical Calculations, for the fixing of their New Moons, and Intercalations, and the Times of their Feasts, and Fasts, and other Observances; that so they might every where be uniform in them. The first Cycle they used for this Purpose, was that of Eighty Four Years; By which, as Bucherius has instructed us, they fixed the Paschal Festival, and the whole Year besides. From them, the Primitive Christians borrowed the Use of it, and for some of the First Centuries, fixed their Easter every Year according to it. But after some time, this being found faulty, Meto's Cycle of Nineteen Years, was after the Council of Nice, brought into Use by them for this Purpose instead of the other. And the Jews following their Exemple, almost about the same time, came into the same Usage also; and upon this Cycle is founded the present Form of their Year.⁸

The First, who began to work it into this Shape, was R. Samuel, Rector of the Jewish School, at Sora in Mesopotamia. R. Adda, who was much of an Astronomer, pursued the Scheme.⁹ After him, R. Hillel, about the Year of our Lord, 360, brought it unto that Perfection, in which now it is; And being the Nasi, or Prince of their Sanhedrim, he gave it the Authority of a Sanction; and by Vertue thereof it ha's been ever since observed, by them, and they say, tis always to be observed, unto the Coming of the Messiah.¹⁰

According to this Form, within the Compass of the said Cycle of Nineteen Years, there are seven Intercalated Years consisting of Thirteen Months, and Twelve Common Years consisting of Twelve Months apeece. Their Intercalated Years are, the Third, the Sixth, the Eighth, the Eleventh, the Fourteenth, the Seventeenth, and the Nineteenth of that Cycle. When one Round of the Cycle is over, they begin another; and so constantly according to it, fix their New Moons, (at Doctrina Temporum Commentarius (1634), pp. 315–432, by Aegidius Bucherius Atrebatius, aka. Gilles Bouchier (1576–1665), a Belgian Jesuit and chronologer. The Greek mathematician and astronomer Meton Atheniensis (fl. 450 BCE) discovered that a cycle of 235 synodic (lunar) months almost completely equals 19 years (EB). It became the basis of the lunisolar Attic calendar (432 BCE) and is believed to have been incorporated into the Hebrew calendar by R. Hillel the Nasi (c. 330–65 CE), prince (or president) of the Sanhedrin, as a means to fix the observation of the Passover (EJ). The Council of Nicea (325 CE) followed suit and adopted the Metonic cycle as a means to fix the date of Easter on the first Sunday after the first full moon of the Vernal Equinox, which in the Greek and Russian Orthodox Churches was fixed as March 21 in the Julian, and April 3 in the Gregorian Calendars (EB). According to St. Ambrosius of Milan's "Epistle XXIII" to the bishops of Aemilia (A. D. 386), the Council of Nicea fixed "the day of the celebration of Passover" based on "a plan for nineteen years with the aid of the most skillful calculators, and constituted a sort of cycle to serve as a pattern for subsequent years. This cycle they called the nineteen years' cycle, their aim being that we should not waver in uncertain and ungrounded opinions on such a celebration, but ascertain the true method and so ensure such concurrence of the affections of all, that the sacrifice for the Lord's Resurrection should be offered everywhere on the same night" (The Letters 166–67). The first edition of the King James Version (1611) printed in its preface a perpetual calendar "To finde Easter for ever."

9 Rav Samuel (d. 250 CE) was a distinguished Babylonian amora, astronomer, and preceptor at the celebrated academy of Sora (aka. Matha Mahasia), which was founded by the renowned Rav Abba Arekka (d. 243 CE). According to tradition, Rav Samuel "fixed the solar year at 365 days and 6 hours," yet his equally famous colleague and fellow astronomer Rav Ad[d]a Bar Ahaba (b. 183 CE) improved upon Rav Samuel's calculations by computing "the solar year at 365 days, 5 hours, '997 [milli minutes] and '048 [moments]," in "Ada" (BD 1:266–67). See also J. W. Etheridge, Jerusalem and Tiberias; Sora and Cordova (1856), pp. 156–58. Maimonides mentions this calculation in Hilchot Kiddush HaChodesh (9.2), in Mishneh Torah 9.2:500).

10 Prideaux's primary source (Preface, pp. ix–) for the discussion of the Hebrew Calendar as fixed by Rabbis Hillel Ha-Nazi, Samuel, and Adda is Exercitationes Ecclesiasticae in utrumque Samaritanorum Pentateuchum (1631), Exercit. I, cap. 3, pp. 31–54, by Joannes Morinus, aka. Jean Morin (1591–1659), a notable French biblical scholar and theologian. See also R. David Ganz, צמח דוד [Zemach David] Chronologia Sacra-Profana. A mundi conditu ad annum M. 5352 vel Christi 1592, dicta צמח דוד Germen Davidis (1644), pp. 83–84, 112, 116–17, 280–81. For a useful extract of Morinus's sources, see "Tractatus de Temporibus et Festis Diebus Hebraeorum," pars 1, cap. 8, p. cccxcix–cxccc [429–30], in Blasius Ugolini's Thesaurus Antiquitatum Sacrarum (1744).

which all their Months begin,) and all their Feasts and Fasts for every Year. This Form of their Year, is well enough contrived; and as Dr. Prideaux observes, *It may be reckoned, the greatest Peece of Art and Ingenuity, that is to be found among that People.*¹¹

| Maimonides Tract entituled, Kiddush Hakkodesh, translated by Du Veil, under the Title, De Consecratione Calendarum, gives a fuller Account of it.¹² It is a Remark justly added by Dr. Prideaux, That since the Jewish Kalender was fixed by R. Hillel, Tables may be made, which may point out unto which Day in that Kalender, every Day in the Julian Year shall answer.¹³ But this cannot be done, for the Time that went before. Nor, when we find the Day of any Jewish Month mentioned in the Sacred Scriptures, can we reduce it exactly to its Time in the Julian Year, or there fix it any Nearer, than within the Compass of a Month, sooner or later.¹⁴ [3v]

Kepler indeed holds, That the Jewish Year was a Solar Year, consisting of Twelve Months, of Thirty Days each, and an Addition of Five Days after the last of them. And our Usher and Lydiat, go into that Opinion. Such a Year was in Use among the Chaldeans, from Abraham descended; and among the Egyptians, with whom the Israelites lived. The Time of the Flood is manifestly constituted by it, in the Book of Genesis; where an 150 Days are made equal to 5 Months; which is 30 days for a Month. But after the Israelites came out of Egypt, the Mosaic Law obliged them to Months purely Lunar; and so there must be an Inter-calary Month to reduce the Year unto the Solar Form.¹⁵

12 Maimonides's Kiddush Hachodesh (i. e., The Sanctification of the New Moon), was translated by Ludovicus de Compiègne de Veil, a French Jewish converso to Christianity (1655), who translated into Latin several tractates of Maimonides's commentaries, and later became librarian to Charles II in England (CBTEL). Mather here refers to Ex Rabbi Moses Majemonidae opera, quod Secunda Lex, Sive Manus Fortis inscribitur Tractatus de Consecratione Calendarum, & de Ratione Intercalandi (1669). See also John Selden's De Anno Civili Veterum Judaeorum (1663), cap. 7, pp. 35–45.

14 Prideaux (Preface, p. x).

15 Prideaux (Preface, pp. xi–ii) praises both Archbishop James Ussher's Chronologia Sacra (1660), Thomas Lydiat's Praelectio Astronomica De Natura Coeli & Conditionibus Elementorum (1605), and Lydiat's posthumously published Emendatio Temporum (1654) and Canones Chronologici (1675). A now almost forgotten English astronomer and chronologer, Thomas Lydiat (1572–1646) shared “the developing belief in a fluid universe, and, like [the German astronomer Johannes Kepler] [(1571–1630)], he abandoned the established astronomical principle of circularity [of the planetary orbits] in the face of empirical observation. He was one of the first to state that the sun ‘describes a segment, not of a circle, but of an oval line’ (Praelectio astronomica, cap. 7, p. 64). He remained harnessed to scripture, however, arguing that creation, while fluid, was finite, being ultimately contained within a sphere surrounded by water and controlled by God,” in P. Sherlock, “Lydiat, Thomas (1572–1646)” (ODNB).

Q. On that, All that are able to go forth to War in Israel, thou and Aaron shall Number them by their Armies? v. 3.

A. Dr. Gell moves to have the Translation mended. In the Hebrew Text, there is nothing that answers to, Able. And /צבא/ here signifies a Going forth, not to Fighting, but from Egypt. It should be read, Every one that went forth from Egypt. And /פקד/ which we render, to Number, signifies, To Visit, or, more properly, To Muster; An Armilustrium, a Viewing of Souldiers, & Weapons, & Harness.¹⁶

Q. What is there observable, in the Numbers of the People of Israel? v. 46.

A. Altho' the Great God is not bound unto Numbers, yett He ha's admirably limited & signalized some Numbers in His Dealings with His People. There are Singular and surprizing Speculations, wherewith one might entertain you, on this admirable Subject. But I shall at present forbear. However, No doubt, you observe That when the Israelites came out of Egypt, there was taken an Account of their Numbers; and all the Men above twenty Years of Age, were found 603 550. [See Exod. 38.26.] In this Account the Levites, (whose Numbers were somewhat Remarkable 22 000) were comprehended. Well, now the best Part of a Year after this, the Israelites have an Account again taken of their Numbers, in which Time tis much if Mortality had not been doing its Part in several Instances & Accidents. From the Second Account, the Levites are wholly left out: And yett the Numbers proved præcisely the same that they were before; 603 550. Behold the Proportion observed by God, in the Multiplication of His People.¹⁷

All I will add is, That the Number of the Elect, is determined by God; it can have no Addition or Subtraction befalling of it. But I will proceed no further in the Contemplation.

¹⁷ Mather's annotation echoes the conflicting interpretations of Gersonides and Abarbanel, who argue that "The fact that the two census totals are exactly the same demonstrates that the Levites were not counted during the first census either (Gersonides). The Levites were indeed counted in the first census, since they had not yet been chosen from among the people; that is why the total for the second census does not record the natural growth of the population" (Abarbanel), in JPS Migra'ot Gedolot (4:9). For a modern account of how the numbers do add up in Numb. 1:46, see C.J. Humphrey's illuminating article, "The Numbers in the Exodus from Egypt."

Q. But are you sure, that the Levites were comprehended, in the first Numeration of the Israelites, which was made Seven Months ago, in order to their Taxation for the Tabernacle? [v. 45, 46.]

A. Dr. Patrick thinks, They were not; but that the Levites | were the Persons, [4v] who took the Account of the rest, & had before then consecrated themselves unto the Lord; whereupon, he observes it, as a thing observable, That not one Man should among all that mighty People Dy, for Seven Months together. For the Man then stoned for Blasphemy, was not an Israelite, by the side of his Father. Nadab, and Abihu, belonged not unto the Tribes that were numbred.¹⁸

Q. The Exemption of the Levites, from the Numbers of the People; what Imitation of it, can we find among the Gentiles? [v. 49.]¹⁹

A. From this Exemple, Dr. Patrick thinks, it was, that the Heathen learn't to exempt all these who ministred unto their Gods, from all other Services; particularly, from War. Strabo notes this Custome to have been as old as Homers Time; For in all his Catalogue, there is no mention of any Ship, that went against Troy, from Alalcomenou; because that City was sacred unto Minerva, who thence is called by Homer, Ἀλαλκομενης Αθηνα. The same is observed by Cesar, of the ancient Druids; That they were freed, both from War, and from Tribute.²⁰

Our Basil challenges this Priviledge, as belonging to the Clergy, κατὰ τὸν παλαιὸν νόμον. According to the Ancient Law. [Ep. CCLXIX.] And Nazianzen does the same in many Places; particularly in his Letter to Julianus. [Ep. CLXVI.]²¹

¹⁹ Extracted from Patrick (Numbers 13–14).

Q. The Stranger (tho' an Israelite) that came nigh the Tabernacle, to do any of the peculiar Levitical Offices, was to be putt to Death. How? v. 51.

A. The Author of Schebet Jehudah, saies, There was a Golden Sword hung up in the Gate of the Temple, with this Inscription, The Stranger that comes nigh, shall be putt to Death.²²

Q. Wee have before us, the Tribes of Israel, marshalled into Four Squadrons. Now, you know, we have a famous Tradition, received by all the World, concerning the Four Banners of the Squadrons, and the Animals exhibited in them. Aben-Ezra gives us the exact Report. Ante cessores nostri dixerunt, fuisse in Reuben vexillo Figuram Hominis, juxtà vim symbolicam mandragorarum; et in vexillo Judæ figuram Leonis; quia illum Jacob Leoni comparavit; et in vexillo Ephraim, figuram Bovis; quia dicitur, Primogeniti Bovis illius decor est ei; et in vexillo Dan, Figuram Aquile; ut similes sit Cherubinis, quos vidit Ezekiel propheta. The like you find, in Chizkuni, and Bar Nachman, on Num. 3. And what think you now of this Tradition? v. 1.¹

¹ Mather's source for this and the following paragraph is Herman Witsius's Ægyptiaca, et ÆKAΦΥΛION [1682] (1696), lib. 2, cap. 13, §§ 17–18, pp. 160–61, whose own source, in turn, is Samuel Bochart's Hieroicoicon (1663), pars 1, lib. 3, cap. 5, § VIII, cols. 772–73. Much the same appears in Johann Heinrich Heidegger's ראשי אבות Sive De Historia Sacra Patriarcharum [1667–71] (1729), 2:381–82, Exercit. XIX: De Dudaim Rubenis (§ 13). Be that as it may, Rabbi Ibn Ezra's gloss on Numb. 2:2 reads, "The ancients said that the standard of Reuben had the form of a person on it [Ba-Midbar Rabbah 2:6] (based on the symbolic strength of the mandrakes [Gen. 30:14]), and Judah's flag had the figure of a lion, for Jacob had compared him to a lion [Gen. 49:9]; Ephraim's banner had the image of an ox [Deut. 33:17], because of the saying, 'his first-born bull is pleasing to him'; and the standard of Dan had the figure of an eagle; so that they were similar to the [shape of the] cherubim, which the prophet Ezekiel saw [Ezek. 1:10; 10:14]"; see Ibn Ezra's Commentary on the Pentateuch: Numbers (11). The French medieval Rabbi Chizkiyahu ben Rabbi Manoach, aka. Chizkuni, aka. Hizkuni (fl. c. 1240–60), glosses in his cabalistic commentary on Numb. 2:2 that the flags had the Hebrew initials of the Patriarchs' names inscribed upon: On Reuben's "was an inscription א"י, the respective first letters of the names of the patriarchs יעקב, יצחק, אברהם [Jacob, Isaac, Abraham]. On the second flag (there were four flags, for each army group of four tribes) there were inscribed the letters בצ"ע, the second letter in the names of each of the three patriarchs. The third flag had the letters רח"ק representing the third letter in the respective names of Avraham, Yitzchok and Yaakov, and the fourth flag the letters מ"ק, representing the last letters each in their names. The letter ה which had been added to Avraham's name, would be represented by the protective cloud that rested above the Israelites and protected them against nosy intruders during all the years they were in the desert." As an alternative interpretation Chizkuni also offers the traditional reading that the four banners (one for each group of three tribes) either exhibited the shape of a human in red (reminiscent of Reuben's mandrakes), the red color representing the gem stone on Aaron's breastplate; the outline of a lion in turquoise (Judah); of an ox in the colour onyx (Ephraim); and of an eagle, variously colored "iridescent, as the gemstone that represented the tribe of Dan on Aaron's breastplate" (Chizkuni 3:851–52; see also JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot 4:10). Bar Nachman, aka. Nachmanides (Ramban) offers much the same but in more detail in his Commentary on the Torah: Numbers (4:20–23).

A. I think with Bochart; Hoc commento putidius nihil quidquam est.²

For, besides more particular Objections against it, It is not likely, that Moses, would have putt Images into the Banners of a People, whom he saw so monstrously prone unto Idolatry. Moreover, We find, That when Vitellius would have led his Army, thro' Judea, against the Arabians, the Jewes, (as Josephus tells us,) objected against it, because Banners with Images in them, (which his were) might not be seen in their Countrey.³ Why should the Roman Eagle be so offensive to them, when they had them of their own? In short; Neither the Scripture, nor Josephus, nor the Books of the Life of Moses in Philo, nor any one Place of all the Talmuds, do mention this Tradition. And I wonder, how Posterity three Thousand Years after, should become so acquainted with the Secret.⁴

2 Mather agrees with Samuel Bochart's dismissive remark in Hierozaicon (1663), pars 1, lib. 3, cap. 5, § VIII, col. 772, line 74, that "this silly figment [of Vitellius complying with the Jewish proscription against images on Roman ensigns] is not worth mentioning to anyone."

3 Josephus Flavius (Antiquities 18:5.3) relates that the Roman Consul Aulus Vitellius (15–69 CE), the later Roman Emperor (for 8 months), had his army against the Arab Aretas "march along the great plain" to avoid offending the Jewish leaders who reminded him that the images in the Roman ensigns were offensive to the law of the land.

4 See also Patrick (Numbers 17–18), who drank from the same fountainhead: Bochart's Hierozaicon (1663), pars 1, lib. 3, cap. 5, cols. 772–73. Neither Flavius Josephus (Antiquities, Wars) nor Philo Judaeus (Life of Moses I–I) mentions the incident.

Q. Why are the Persons here enumerated, called, The Generations of Aaron, & Moses; when they were the Sons of Aaron only? v. 1.

A. They were the Sons of Aaron by Nature, and the Sons of Moses, by Education. The Jewish Rabbins tell us, They are called, The Sons of Moses, Quòd eos Moses legem docuisset.¹

In the Scripture, Disciples are called, Children. [see 2. King. 2.5, 12.]²

Q. Well; But Moses had Sons of his own; And why did none of them succeed in the Priesthood; when as we find, (Psal. 99.6.) Moses himself among the Priests?

A. Here was a Glorious Demonstration, that Moses designed not the Advancement of his own Family, in his Conduct about the People of Israel; and therefore, be sure, he could be no Impostor.³

But the old Author, of the Book De Mirabilibus Scripturæ, assigns another Cause, for the Exclusion of the Sons of Moses from the Priesthood; He places it unto their Mothers Account. Hæc quæstio rationem dando vincitur, cum Filij Moysi de Gentili Matre, peregrinationis causa generantur.⁴

² The Hebrew term in 2 Kings 2:5 is בן [ben], which (according to Strong's # 1121) can have the signification Mather suggests here. "Disciples," however, might be more indicative of the Greek μαθητής [mathetes] (Matth. 10:24). Mather's reference to v. 12 appears to be misplaced.

Q. Here is a sort of Difficulty, that seems to want a good Solution. Wee read, in v. 39. that the Levites numbred, were 22000.
 And yett, if you cast up the three Families,
 v. 22. of the Gershonites, 7500.
 v. 29. of the Kohathites 8600.
 v. 34. of the Merarites. 6200.
 You'l find the Sum total is, 22300.
 Well, anon v. 43. you find all the First-born of the Israelites, to be, 22273.

And it is added, v. 46. That the First-born of the Israelites, were 273 more than the Levites. How shall this Matter be Reconciled? v. 15.

A. R. Solomon, and Aben Ezra help us here; Those learned Rabbins, did six hundred Years ago see the Difficulty. And as the Writings of the Rabbins, are often very helpful to us, they are in this Case particularly so. They tell us, That the Three Hundred, above the Twenty two Thousand, in the Number of the Levites, that so encumber our Account, were the First-born of the Levites. And these being the Lords already, the thirty ninth Verse, very justly leaves them out of the Account.⁵

5 R. Solomon Yitzchaki, aka. Jarchi, aka Rashi (on Numb. 3:39) reasons, "there are dots over [the word] אֲהֲרֹן [Aaron], to teach that he was not included in the counting of the Levites. When counting them individually, however, one discovers three hundred extra: the sons of Gershon, seven thousand five hundred; the sons of Kehos, eight thousand six hundred; the sons of Merori, six thousand two hundred [hence 22,000]. Why aren't they included among the rest to redeem the firstborn, thus exempting the two-hundred seventy-three overlapping firstborn from redemption? Our sages answered, in Maseches Bechoros [5a], that the three hundred Levites were, themselves, firstborn. It was sufficient for them to release themselves from redemption" (Metsudah Chumash/Rashi: Bamidbar 4:29). Abraham ibn Ezra is even more forthcoming in his Commentary: Numbers (3:39): "When you add up the figures you will find that they come to three hundred above the figure given in Scripture [3:22, 28, 34]. Some say that Scripture is being brief and mentions only the thousands and neglects the hundreds. However, this cannot be the case. Scripture mentions less than three hundred over and above the round number [v. 43]. The truth is in according with tradition which states that a first-born does not free a first-born [see Bekhorot 5a]. The meaning of our verse thus is, all that were numbered of the Levites with the exception of the first-born [were twenty and two thousand]. Judah the Persian [an early Karaite scholar] calculated to prove, from the number that the first-born of the Levites were one seventy-third of the Levites [22,000 divided by 300 comes to 73 and a fraction]. He went on to say that if you divide the number of Israelites [603,550 (Numb. 2:32)] by seventy-three [equals 8,267], and take the number of Levites who came to serve in the tabernacle [8,580 (Numb. 4:8)] rather than the number of Levites age one month and above [22,273], then the number will be close [8,580 – 300 = 8,267]. However, all this is nothing. The Israelites were counted from twenty and above. No other fixed unit was used. However, the Levites were counted from twenty to fifty. There is a large difference between them. We will rely only on tradition [that the 300 were first-born]." For the substance, see also JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot (4:19–20). Though apparently not Mather's source, the Reformation and post-Reformation

Q. Upon the Number of the Levites, what is there peculiarly observable?

A. It is observable, That the Number of the Levites, was the smallest of any Tribe; They were no more than 22300; from a Month old & upward: when some Tribes were Twice, nay, Thrice as many; not reckoning the Children, but only the Men, from Twenty Years old, & upwards. The Divine Providence herein was most conspicuous; which intended the Dedication of this Tribe unto the Lord. Whereas if the Tribe had grown proportionably to the rest, there would have been more Levites by far, than the First-born of all the Tribes.⁶

Q. Is it not somewhat strange, That from above Six hundred thousand Men, there should not be more than 22273 First-born Sons?

A. Dr. Patrick saies, it must be considered, that thus many were born, since the Slaughter of the Egyptian First-born (which was not much above a Year ago?) after which time, all the First-born of Israel became the Lords; but not those that were born before.⁷

Q. There being 273 First-born, more than there were Levities; accordingly there could be no Exchange of Levites for them. Wherefore Five Shekels apiece by the Pole were demanded for them, which Money was properly enough given to Aaron & his Sons. Now, 't'was a Difficulty to determine, which of the First-born should be Redeemed by paying this Money. No doubt, every one of the Israelites, was desirous rather to have his First-born Redeemed by a Levite, than by paying Five Shekels for him?

A. The Jewes, (particularly R. Solomon,) think, there was no way to satisfy this Doubt, like that of a Lott. Whereof, they tell us, Moses took 22000 Scrolls of Parchment, & wrote in them the Words, A Son of Levi; and 273 more Scrolls, wherein he wrote, Five Shekels. Then putting all together in an Urn, and shaking it, to mingle them; he commanded every one of the First-born to come, and putt in his Hand, & draw out a Schedule. To him, who drew of the former sort, he said, A Levite hath Redeemed thee; if the latter, he said, Pay thy Price.⁸ This is the Story in the Gemara Babylon: and it is probable enough, unless we suppose divines canonized in Poole's Synopsis Criticorum (1:626–27) and Works (7:51–52) are equally circuitous in their reasoning (Numb. 3:39), although neither Rashi nor Ibn Ezra seem to have been in their purview here.

⁷ Patrick's gloss on Numb. 3:43 (Numbers 42),

⁸ Rashi on Numb. 3:50, in JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot (4:21), paraphrasing Babylonian Talmud (Sanhedrin 17a).

the Congregation to have Redeemed the 273 First-born out of a common Stock; which was a shorter way, but as Dr. Patrick saies, not so Divine.⁹

⁹ According to the Soncino Babylonian Talmud, tractate Sanhedrin (17a), “Moses reasoned: How shall I act toward Israel? If I say to a man, ‘Give me [the 5 shekels for] thy redemption,’ he may answer, ‘A Levite has already redeemed me.’ What did he do? He [Moses] brought twenty-two thousand slips and wrote on each, ‘Levite’, and on another two hundred and seventy-three he wrote, ‘five shekels’. Then he mixed them up, put them into an urn and said to the people, ‘Draw your slips.’ To each who drew a slip bearing the word ‘Levite’, he said, “The Levite has redeemed thee.’ To each who drew a ticket with ‘five shekels’ on it, he said, ‘Pay thy redemption and go.’” Mather’s source is Patrick on Numb. 3:47 (Numbers 43–44).

Q. It is here said of the Levites, From Thirty Years old & upward, even until Fifty Years old, they were to do the Work in the Tabernacle of the Congregation. But it is elsewhere said, Chap. 8.24. From Twenty five Years old and upward, they shall go in, to wait upon the Service of the Tabernacle. Here seems to be a Contradiction? v. 3.

A. And it is but a Seeming one! They are two Distinct Præcepts. The former præscribes the Age of 30, Ad faciendam Functionem; the latter, the Age of 25, Ad subministrandum Ministerium. From 25 to 30, they served a Sort of Apprenticeship.¹

The Jewes, in the Gemara Babylonica, thus reconcile the Matter; They were admitted to Learn their Duty at Five & Twenty, & to Do it at Thirty.² So saies Aben-Ezra. They were Probationers, and might do some Service at Five & Twenty, but not all.³

Q. Why is it said, Putt in the Staves thereof? They were never taken out? v. 6.

A. The Hebrew should be translated, Putt the Staves thereof; that is, upon their Shoulders. Thus Aben-Ezra expounds it; or, Fitt them, Dispose them, Order them; that is, a Chaskuni expounds it, so run them in the Rings, that they may

1 John Selden's De Successione in Pontificatum Ebraeorum (1636), lib. 2, cap. 4, esp. pp. 221–25 appears to be the primary text for the debate on the age at which a Levite may serve as an apprentice in the Temple and when he can assume full responsibilities. At age thirty, the full “execution [of his service] can be carried out” and at age twenty-five he can begin as “a helper [apprentice] in the [Temple] service.”

2 The Gemara (i. e., Teaching) in the (Soncino) Babylonian Talmud, tractate Chullin (24a) solves the apparent contradiction as follows: “At the age of twenty-five [the Levite enters the service] for training, and at the age of thirty he performs service. Hence the dictum: If a student does not see a sign of blessing [progress] in his studies after five years, he never will.”

3 Ibn Ezra (on Numb. 8:24), in Commentary: Numbers (62); the French tosafist R. Joseph ben Isaac Bekhor Shor of Orleans (mid 12th c. CE) is more specific on what an apprentice can do from age twenty-five to his maturity at age thirty: “they begin to join in the lighter task of singing in the chorus and flaying the sacrificial animals, but they do not begin the portorage described here [Numb. 4:4–49] until age 30” (JPS Miqra’ot Gedolot 4:21). Mather’s vademecum for the first and last paragraph of this gloss is Patrick (Numbers 45–46). John Lightfoot goes into greater detail on this issue in his The Temple Service As it stood in the dayes of our Saviour (1649), ch. 6, sec. 1, § 2, p. 42.

fall into the Two Notches which were in the Staves, to keep the Ark from sliding up & down.⁴

On this Occasion I may observe to you, That there are several Words in this Chapter, whereof the Translation seems to call for some Correction. As now, –

[7v] In v. 10. the Word, Bar, should | rather be Bier. It signifies, an Instrument, whereby things are carried from one Place to another, and intimates also a Breadth in the Instrument; for here, the Candlestick was carried upon it.⁵

In, v. 23. To perform the Service, is to be translated very properly, To war the Warfare.⁶

Q. Every Leper, & every one that had an Issue, & whosoever was defiled by the Dead; was to be Putt out of the Camp. What Camp? v. 2.¹

A. It is observed by Maimonides, & many others mentioned by our Selden, That there were Three Camps. There was the Camp of the SHECHINAH, or of the Lord; namely, the Sanctuary, with the Courts of it, which are called, [1. Chron. 31.2.] The Tents of the Lord. There was then, the Camp of the Levites, who, with the Priests, made a Camp about the Tabernacle. And, finally, there was the Camp of Israel; which encompassed all. Answerable to these, when the Temple was built, they reckoned the Temple itself, from the East-gate, to be the Camp of the Lord; and the Camp of the Levites to be from the Entrance of the Mount of the House of the Lord, to the East-gate of the Temple; and the Camp of Israel, they thought extended from the Entrance of Jerusalem, to the Mount of the House of the Lord.²

Now, Lepers were so unclean, that they were not admitted into any of these Three Camps, but shutt out of them all. He that had an Issue, was only shutt out of the Two First Camps; but he might be in the Camp of Israel. He that was defiled by the Dead, was only excluded from the First, & not from the other Two.³

Q. What means, Any Sin that Men commit? v. 6

A. The Hebrew is, Any Sin of Man. That is to say, Any Sin against another Man, or against a Neighbour. As Joel 3.19. Violence of the Children of Judah, is truly translated, Violence against the Children of Judah. The Context here plainly shoves, the Speech to be, of Offences against our Neighbours, which indeed are (as it followes,) A Trespass against the Lord.⁴

1 Patrick (Numbers 64–65) is Mather's primary source for the following paragraphs.

2 John Selden, De Synedriis & Praefecturis Iuridicis Veterum Ebraeorum (1653), lib. 2, cap. 1, sec. 5, pp. 24–25 is the source text for Patrick and Mather. Selden's own is, among others, Maimonides's Hilchot Bi'at HaMikdash (3.1–4), in Mishneh Torah (29:230–32). Abarbanel's comment is most illustrative here: "It is from the three uses of the word 'camp' in vv. 2–3 that the whole notion of three 'camps' derives. The camp of the Levites is within that of the Israelites, and the camp of the Shekhinah is within that, like the heart inside a living body – and, like the heart, requiring that nothing but the cleanest and choicest get anywhere near it" (JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot 4:30).

3 See also Poole's Synopsis Criticorum (1:631) and Works (7:75–76) for the Reformation and post-Reformation commentators on this issue.

4 Patrick (Numbers 66).

Q. Why was the Law of Jealousies instituted? v. 12.

A. The Great God would hereby declare Himself privy to the most Secret Crimes. And He show'd His Respect unto the Præservation of Conjugal Faith, Chastity, & Honesty, as a very great Interest of Humane Society. He show'd likewise His Concern to protect Innocence; And, in fine, He show'd His Will that Man & Wife should live Happily together.⁵

Q. The Occasion for the administration of The Water of Jealousy, was, If any Mans Wife go aside. What was meant by that Going aside? v. 12.

A. Being private for some Time, with another Man, whose Company her Husband had charged her that she should not keep; & his therefore suspecting her for an Adulteress. It is plain, that by a Wife that goes aside, (which the Hebrewes call Sota) is not meant, one that hath certainly committed Adultery; but one that is with some Reason suspected of the Crime. It is a Rule among the Jewes, The Bitter Waters, never are used, but in a dubious Case.⁶

Q. The Husband brings an Offering for the suspected Wife: (I say, For her, as the Text plainly intimates; for, as Abarbanel notes, He had done nothing that needed a Sacrifice.) The Intention of it was, (as Wagenseil observes,) to supplicate the Divine Majesty, that He would clear the Womans Innocence, if she were causelessly suspected, or otherwise, direct and punish her Guilt.⁷

But why must the Offering be of Barley-Meal, and this also coarse, and not sifted from the Bran? whereas, the common offering of this Kind, was, of the Wheat-flower, and tho' there was one Offering of Barley, [Lev. 23.10.] yett it was Fine Flower, well- sifted, from the Bran? v. 15.⁸

[8v] A. The Mischnah gives this Reason, | for it; The Woman was supposed, for to have committed the Act of a Beast (which is not confined unto one,) therefore the Food of a Beast, was to be her Sacrifice; for so Barley was in Judea. Many such pretty Conceits are collected out of their Authors, by Simeon de Muis, in

5 See also John Selden's influential Uxor Ebraica (1646), lib. 3, cap. 15, pp. 401–11.

6 Patrick (Numbers 69–70).

7 Patrick, on Numb. 5:15 (Numbers 72), here mines Johann Christoph Wagenseil's translation and detailed explication of the Mishnah, tractate Sotah, in Sota. Hoc est: Liber Mischnicus De Uxore Adulterii Suspecta (1674), cap. 2, sec. 1, p. 349, "Annotata l. Maritus," which is also the source for R. Abarbanel's Hebrew-Latin comment as Englished by Patrick and here excerpted by Mather. See also Abarbanel's Selected Commentaries Bamidbar/Numbers (4:61–62).

8 Abarbanel's answer is to the point: "The man brings barley as her offering because he wants the Lord to be angry with her" (JPS Migra'ot Gedolot 4:36).

his Varia Sacra upon this Place. But with Dr. Patrick, the simplest Reason seems to be, that a, viler Sacrifice was most suitable to her vile Condition.⁹

Q. But why must they pour no Oyl, & putt no Frankincense, on this Offering?
A. The Reasons given by the Jewes for this Prohibition, are some of them Fanciful, but sometimes Ingenious. As, That a Good Name is compared unto Oyl; [Eccl. 7.1.] It is here omitted, because the Woman had lost her Good Name. A little more Judicious is Maimonides, who looking on the Oyl and Frankincense, as added unto Sacrifices for the Dignity of them, he thinks, God would have that Splendor (as his Word is) to be wanting unto such a Womans Offering, because of the Baseness of her Behaviour, which had been the Occasion of it.¹⁰ But none (as Dr. Patrick thinks) gives a better Account of it, than Chrysostom, [Orat. V. adv. Judæos]; Because the Woman was loaded with Sorrow, & heavy Accusations, & evil Suspicions, ἐμίμειτο τὴν συμφορὰν τῆς οἰκείας θυσίας τὸ σχῆμα. The Form of the Sacrifice imitated the Domestic Calamity.¹¹ For every one knows, that Oyl and Frankincense, were Signs of Joy and Gladness; Therefore not fitt for so sad an Occasion as is now before us.¹²

Q. On, The Dust of the Floor of the Tabernacle? v. 17.

A. Of the Holy Water, taken out of the Laver in the Court, the Priest was to take the Quantity of half a Log, or about three Eggs. After the Building of the Temple, where the Floor had no Dust, as Monsr. Jurieu observes, They left loose a Marble Stone, which they lifted up with the Help of a Ring. From under the Stone, they took the Dust, which being putt upon the Water, swam upon the Surface; and it must be drunk without any Stirring of it.¹³

Q. One thing in the Plague of the Adulteresse, is, Thy Thigh to Rott! v. 22.

A. Both Bochart and Heinsius give many Instances, to prove, that the Thigh means the Secret Parts.¹⁴ Thus we read, in the Passion of Perpetuana, and Fælicia; That when Perpetuana was thrown to the Beasts, and lay on the Ground, she drew back her Coat, which was torn from her side, Ad velamentum Femoris; being Pudoris magis memor quam Doloris.¹⁵ The Mischna here notes, With what Measure, Men mete, it shall be measured unto them again. For in that very Part that offended, the wretched Woman suffered for her Offence.¹⁶

Q. The Effects of the Water of Jealousy, how soon did they follow? v. 22.

A. Presently. The Woman presently grew Pale, with her Eyes ready to start out of her Head; so that they cried out, Carry her forth! Carry her forth! Lest she de-file the Court of the Temple! by dying there; as the Mischna relates it.¹⁷ The Adulterer also, as the Jewes assure us, dyed the same Day & Hour. Only the Gemara affirms, That if the Womans husband had been an Adulterer, then these Effects followed not.¹⁸

So the Jewes invite us to read it; v. 31. If the Man shall be guiltless from Iniquity, then the Woman shall bear her Iniquity.¹⁹

Q. The Water of Jealousy, præscribed among the Jewes; was there any Imitation of it, among the Gentiles? v. 22.

A. Yes. The old Greeks tryed their Shee-Priests, or, Nuns, who were suspected of Whoredom, with a Draught which they tendered them to Drink; and the Party

14 Samuel Bochart, in his Hieroicoicon (1663), pars 2, lib. 5, cap. 15, p. 758, lines 14–70, discusses the “femur” or “thigh-bone,” whose neck is closest to the human genitals and thus euphemistically refers to the “Secret Parts” here alluded to. The previously cited Daniel Heinsius, in his Aristarchus Sacer (1627), pars 2, Exercitationes, cap. 1, pp. 13–14 (sec. ser. of pag.), provides similar euphemisms from the ancients.

15 In 203 CE, the noblewoman Perpetua and her slave Felicity of Carthage (N Africa) are to have been executed – along with several other early Christians – during the birthday celebrations of Roman Emperor Publius Septimus Geta Augustus (189–211 CE). Uncertain author of the martyrology Passio Sanctorum Perpetua et Felicitatis (cap. 6, sec. 3, § 20) [PL 003.0055] tells us that Perpetuana made sure “to cover her upper thigh [pudenda],” because she was “mindful more of shame than pain.”

Drinking, was presently struck Dead, if shee were guilty. Philostratus also tells us, That they had another Water to try Perjury; which might bee of the same Original: namely, the Waters in Cappadocia, that were sacred unto Jupiter.²⁰

Q. Some further Footsteps of this Ordeal, imitated among the Heathen? v. 22.²¹

A. Polemon in his Book, De miris Sicilia, speaking of the Cups of the Palicians, ha's this Passage; "The Adjurors, having a Writing before them, go before the Adjured, with the Matters upon which an Oath is required. Hee that is Adjured, flourishing a Branch of an Olive-Tree, being crowned, & ungirt, & having only a little Coat on him, touching the Cup, utters the Oath dictated unto him. And if the Gods approve the Things that are sworn, the Man goes away without any Damage: but if the Man that swears, hath contemned the Gods, hee Dyes immediately."²² And in the Book, of Wonderful Things, which goes under the Name of Aristotle, wee read of such a Matter as This. "There is a Manner of Swearing, which is accounted very Sacred. The Things which a Man Swears, hee writes on a Table: The Table is cast into the Water: If he have Sworn right, the Table swims; if otherwise, the Table sinks, and the Man is burnt."²³

Consult the XI Book of Diodorus Siculus.²⁴ Pliny also ha's the like, L. 31. c. 2. Amnis Olachas in Bithynia, Brietium alluit: Hoc est et Templo et Deo Nomen, cujus gurgite perjuri notantur pati, velut flammam urentem.²⁵ Porphyrie writing about the Waters of Styx, ascribes this Force unto them; φῦσιν ἔχον ἀμύνεσθαι

²³ Aristotle's Mirabilium Auscultationes (843*b*, lines 11–15). As in the preceding paragraph, Mather supplies his own translation.

²⁵ Mather second-hand quote from Hugo Grotius (Annotationes Numeros 5.17) is based on Johannes Frellon's undated and unpaginated incunabula edition of Pliny's Naturalis historia (31.18.23). Our modern editions render the Latin passage as follows: "Amnis Alcas in Bithynia Bryazum adluit – hoc est templo et deo nomen – cuius gurgitem periuri negantur pati velut flammam urentem," or, "The river Alcas in Bithynia flows by Bryazus – this is the name both of a god and of his temple – the current of which perjured persons are said to be unable to endure, as it burns like a flame."

τοὺς κατ' αὐτοῦ ψευδῶς ὁμόσαι τολμήσαντας. *They have the Nature, to punish those who swear falsely by them.*²⁶ Solinus writing about the Fountains of Sardinia, has this Passage; *Coarguentis valent Furibus: nam quisquis sacramento raptum negat, Lumina aquis attrahat; ubi perjurium non est, cernit clarius; si perfidia abnuat, detegitur facinus cecitate, et captus oculis admissum tenebris fatetur.*²⁷ Moreover, Statius, and Eustathius, have some Things of the like Importance.²⁸

Huetius thinks, The Fable of the Stygian Lake, & several other Rites to find out secret Crimes, were invented by the Greeks from this Exemple.²⁹

Q. Is there any further Modern Imitation of the Bitter Waters in the ancient Pædagogy? v. 22.

A. In Dampiers Voyage round the World, there is this Passage.

“On the Gold Coast of Guinea, when Men or Women are taxed for a Crime, be it of what nature it will, but especially Adultery, and the Matter cannot be proved by Evidence, the Fetissero or Priest, decides the Difference, by giving a Portion of Bitter Water, to the Person accused: which, if they refuse to take, they are supposed to be guilty without further Proof: But, if they drink it off, the Event is said to be, that if the Persons be Guilty, this Water immediately Swells their Bodies till they burst; but if Innocent, they are not hurt thereby. What Tricks the Fetissero’s may play, in compounding this Water, I know not: But this Kind of Trial is frequent among them, & seems to be a Remainder of the old Jewish Trial by the Waters of Jealousy, spoken of in the fifth Chapter of Numbers. A Guilty Person does ordinarily so dread the being brought unto this Trial, that for the most

Part, he or she choose rather to suffer the Punishment of the Countrey; which is, To be sold to the Europæans as Slaves. This Potion is called, Bitter Water; and tis given by Way of Trial, upon any light Suspicion, even of a small Injury.”³⁰

I will take this Occasion, to insert a Remarkable Occurrence, which lately happened in my own Countrey.

A Woman had her First-born Child brought forth so early after her Marriage, that a Fornication was charged upon her. She did with a Solemnity not short of an Oath, assert her Innocency unto the Church that in their Jealousy quæstion’d her upon it. Soon after it she was taken with a strange Swelling, & the Tumour with inexpressible Dolour proceeded unto such a Degree, that the very Ribs were torn from her Backbone. In a bitter Agony, an anguish that could not be born, she sent for the Minister, & own’d her Guilt & Crime; and died.³¹

³¹ Unidentified. Associating premature births, fetal malformation, death in childbed, or disease with transgressive behavior – moral, social, or religious – was not an uncommon response to marvelous occurrences and prodigies. There were no such things as chance or accidents in a world still governed by providential rewards and punishments. Well-known cases include those of Antinomian Anne Hutchinson and Quaker Mary Dyer as described in John Winthrop’s Journal (for March 27, 1638), pp. 253–56. On providence in general, see Increase Mather’s An Essay for the Recording of Illustrious Providences (1684), and Cotton Mather’s Thaumaturgus: vel i. e. Liber Memorabilium, in Magnalia Christi Americana (1702), bk. 6, fols. 1–88. Q. Your Illustrations upon that Rite of Nazaritism. The (first) Nourishing, and (then) Shaving and Burning, the Hair, of the Nazirite? v. 21.¹

A. The Ceremonies appointed, and observed among the ancient People of God, receive no little Illustration, from the like Ceremonies found among the ancient Pagans. Whether wee think, That the Lord, in Compliance with the Egyptian Disposition of His People, did Retain, but at the same Time, Correct, many of their Heathen Ceremonies; which is an Opinion, by some learned Men much contended for; or, That the Divil, who takes a particular Pride, in having Divine Homage paid unto him, did therefore choose, to teach the Pagans the Ceremonies of Israel, as those, which in their Divel-Worship, were upon that Impudent Account, more agreeable to him, than any other; to which Opinion I do myself Incline: Still they will Illustrate one another wonderfully; And I will bee beholden, to Dr. Spencer, here, as well as elsewhere for those Illustrations.²

Now, for the Rites that concerned the Hair of Nazaritism, Eustathius ha's told us, That the Greeks, who at all other Times Nourished their Hair, did, cutt it off in Times of Mourning; and that when Young Men came to their τελείας ηλικίας, Perfect Stature, they did in like Manner cutt off their Hair, & offer it, unto Apollo, the Juvenum Altor, and unto the Rivers.³ It may bee proved by Innumerable Instances, That what *Theodore*t saies, was True. It was the Manner of the Gentiles, to lett the Hair of their Children grow, και τουτους μετα χρονον ανατιθεναι τοις δαιμοσιν· and afterwards dedicate it unto Divils.⁴ The *Scholias*t saies as much,

1 A Nazirite – one who is separated, consecrated, or set apart – is a person who has taken a vow to abstain for a period of time from any food or intoxicants related to grapes, from cutting his or her hair, and from any form of impurity, especially from touching a corpse or even a tomb. The vow renders the Nazirite “holy unto the Lord” (Numb. 6:8) and was generally taken in fulfillment of a particular wish or request requiring divine agency (JE). According to the Mishnah (tractate Nazir 1.3, 4), if “vowed without a fixed duration,” the Nazirite is bound “for thirty days.” However, if he or she says, “I will be a Nazirite like as the hairs of my head,” or, ‘like as the dust of the earth’, or ‘like as the sand of the sea’, he becomes a lifelong Nazirite, and he must cut off his hair every thirty days” (The Mishnah 281).

2 As Mather’s introductory response illustrates, he does not brush aside John Spencer’s thesis, but presents diverse viewpoints of the debate. In De Legibus Hebraeorum (1685), lib. 3, diss. I, cap. 6, sec. 1, fols. 583–85, Spencer argues that such vows (as those taken by the Hebrew Nazirites) were common among the Egyptians and other pagans and that Moses adopted this practice from the Israelites’ former overlord.

3 Eustathius Thessalonicensis, Commentarii ad Homeri Iliadem (1:255, line 3), glosses that when boys attained their manhood or τελείας ηλικίας, “fully grown manhood,” they cut off their hair in sacrifice to Apollo, “the young man’s foster father” or “nourisher.”

4 In his commentary on Lev. 28, Theodoretus Cyrrhensis (Quaestiones in Octateuchum, p. 181, lines 6–7) glosses that the pagans let their children’s hair grow long, και τουτους μετὰ of the Sisoī then used, which was a Weaved Lock, a πλέγμα, Consecrated unto Saturn.⁵ And it is by Diodorus Siculus affirmed, That Osiris was the first Author of this Coma Votiva; and that from his Exemple, The Egyptians undertaking a Journey, would keep their Hair untouched, until they Returned.⁶ Arrianus also, affirms, the Indians to have been taught by Bacchus, in the first Ages, the like Usages.⁷ But there is a whole Synod of learned Men, that have written of this Matter; Hadrianus Junius, and Sardus, and Meursius, and Stellartius and Petrus Castellanus, and Montacutius, and Lindenbrogius, and Lipsius, and Heinsius, and Casaubon, and Ouzelius, and John Doughty, and Stanley, have all handled the Subject of Coma Sacrata; and it would bee an Immense Labour, to quote all the Testimonies from Antiquity, which they have brought concerning it.⁸

The Israelites, under the Vow of Naziritism, did not only keep their Hair, but also Broid it, Fold it, Weave it, and Curle it with much of Curiositie. The Seven Locks of Sampson, do intimate so much unto us.⁹ The LXX call them, Σειραι.¹⁰ Now Σειραι, according to Eustathius, are the same with πλέγματα.¹¹ And χρόνον ἀνατιθέναι τοῖς δαίμοσιν “and, after a while, dedicate it to demons” (Questions on the Octateuch 2:67). Mather’s rendition of pagan gods as “Divels” is consistent with biblical tradition.

5 See for instance, Suda (Lexicon, alphab. letter kappa entry 2489, line 1), πλέγμα, a lock of “plaited hair.”

6 Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca 1.18.3) argues that Osiris “offered his hair in fulfillment of a vow,” not to cut his hair (coma) until his return to Egypt. This custom (so Diodorus) “was observed among the Egyptians until recent times.”

7 Spencer (584–85). Lucius Flavius Arrianus of Nicomedia (c. 86–c. 160 CE) was a distinguished Greco-Roman historian and philosopher, whose Indica describes customs of the Indians and other peoples in the region of the Persian Gulf (EB). Mather here refers to Arrianus’s Historia Indica (7.7–9), which describes the Dionysian customs among Hindus in India.

8 We shall here follow Mather’s example and only list the authors and their respective works, which contain hair-raising discussions on the “coma sacrata” or “consecrated hair” among the ancients: Hadrian Junius’s De Coma Commentarium (1556), cap. 4, 5, 6, pp. 350–90. Alexander Sardus, De Moribus et Ritibus Gentium (1599), lib. 1, cap. 12. Joannes Meursius, Graecia Feriata (1619), lib. 3, pp. 125–29 (voce ΕΦΗΒΙΑ), and lib. 5, pp. 237–40 (voce ΠΡΟΤΕΛΕΙΑ). Prospero Stellartius, De Coronis et Tonsuris Paganorum (1625), lib. 1, cap. 5, pp. 18–20. Petrus Castellanus, EOΠΤΟΛΟΓΙΟΝ, sive de festis Graecorum syntagma (1617), pp. 27–29 (voce ΑΠΙΛΟΓΙΑ). Richardus Montacutius (Richard Montagu), Diatribae on the first part of the late History of Tithes (1621), ch. 3, pp. 533–34. Henricus Lindenbrogius, Censorini Liber De Die Natali (1614), cap. 1, p. 6 (nota: Statius, Thebaid, lib. 2). Justus Lipsius, Ad Annales Cornelius Taciti Liber Commentarius, Sive Notae (1627), p. 536. Daniel Heinsius, Aristarchus Sacer (1627), pars 2, cap. 4, pp. 107–10. Isaac Casaubon, Theophrasti Characteres Ethici (1592), pp. 37–38 (voce ΜΙΚΡΟΦΙΛΟΤΙΜΙΑΣ). *Jacobus Ouzelius, in M. 9 See also Mather’s annotations on Judg. 16:13 (BA 3:221).

10 Judg. 16:13 (LXX): ἐὰν ὑφάνης τὰς ἑπτὰ σειρὰς τῆς κεφαλῆς μου σὺν τῷ διάσματι, etc. “who-soever weaves the seven locks of my head with the web.” Σειρά, σειρὰς signifies “chain, rope,” also “web.”

11 The phrase Σειραι πλέγματά, suggesting “twisted rope,” or “web” appears in Archbishop the Pagans did the same; they had the πλοχμος or σκολυς, or Chain of Hair, mentioned by Julius Pollux. Euripides calls it, a πλοκη τριχων.¹² The Locks that People call Elves-Locks, are much of the same Fashion with them.¹³

Among the Israelites, they were Young Men mostly, which were concerned in the Vow of Naziritism; [Compare, Amos. 2.11. and Lam. 4.7.] In Dei κουροτροφου Honorem.¹⁴ Now the Pagans likewise did chiefly aim at this; For their Young Men to offer the First Hair of their Head and Face, unto some Deity, in token of their Gratitude. Plutarch tells us, the Young Men of Athens did thus unto Apollo Pythius.¹⁵ And Xiphilinus reports of Nero, that hee kept the Juvenalia, and the first Time of his being shaved, hee consecrated his Hair in a Golden Box, unto Jupiter Capitolinus.¹⁶ And Martial in one of his Epigrams, do's mention to Esculapius, the Hair, which – misit ab urbe puer.¹⁷

An Israelitish Nazarite, when the Time of his Vow, was out, was to shave himself, before the Door of the Temple, and burn his Hair, in the Fire of the Sacrifices; by which Rites, they were secured, from falling into the Superstitions of the Pagans, who dedicated their Hair, (and their Heads with it) unto Idols, and Rivers, and Nymphs, and Trees, and what not? – and, Capillum, ubi tondebantur, in ejus Dei Templo consecrabant, in cujus Honorem se gestasse professi sunt.¹⁸

Eustathius Thessalonicensis's Commentarii ad Homeri Iliadem (4:695, line 18), but is in Mather's text at third hand (via Spencer 585) from Johannes Buxtorf's Lexicon Chaldaicum Talmudicum, et Rabbinicum (1639), p. 390, voce שֵׁרָטָה, which Buxtorf renders "Filum, Funis Densus"; i. e., "a thread" or "thick rope."

12 Julius Pollux (Onomasticon 2.30, line 4) speaks of πλοχμὸς ἢ σκόλλυς, of which Mather provides his translation. The Greek comic playwright Euripides, in his Bacchae (494) and Phoenissae (308), speaks of the πλόκαμος, "lock" or "braid of hair," and τριχῶν, i. e., "curly locks."

14 In his Commentarii ad Homeri Iliadem (2:788, line 27; 3) and elsewhere, Eustathius speaks of "rearing children in honor of God."

15 Plutarch (Theseus 5.1) explains that "since it was still a custom at that time for youth who were coming of age to go to Delphi and sacrifice some of their hair to the god, Theseus went to Delphi for this purpose, and they say there is a place there which still to this day is called Theseia from him. But he sheared only the fore part of his head, just as Homer [(Iliad 2.542)] said the Abantes did, and this kind of tonsure was called Theseis after him." The priestess Pithia of the Oracle of Delphi presided over Apollo's temple, whose prophecies she imparted to his devotees.

16 The story is related in Cassius Dio's Historiae Romanae (Xiphilini epitome) (Dindorf-Stephanus page S157, lines 7–9), an epitome made by the Byzantine monk Joannes Xiphilinus (11th CE), which includes this anecdote of the future Roman Emperor Nero Claudius Caesar Augustus Germanicus (37–68 CE), whose lock was kept in the grandest of the ancient Roman temples on the Capitoline Hill.

17 Martial (Epigram 9.17, line 4) sings, "your boy has sent you from the city [Latium]" the locks dedicated to Aesculapius, god of healing. Spencer (586).

18 Spencer (587) second hand quote is from the previously cited Petrus Castellanus's EOPTOAOΓION, sive de festis Graecorum syntagma (1617), p. 27. The passage relates like the Hebrew Nazirites, pagans who had "consecrated their hair were being shaved in the temple of the God in whose honor they declared that they had worn it." See also Lev. 17:5–7.

The Divel had his Nazirites; thus the Prophet saies, [Hos. 9.10.] They went to Baal-Peor, and became Nazirites (for so I read it) unto that Shame. The Nourishing of their Hair, was a Sacrament, by which they signified their Devotion. But now, among the Israelites, a Nazirite is called still, One Holy unto the Lord.¹⁹

Tis very sure, That among the Gentiles; t'was usual, for a Man, when hee took a Journey, to consecrate his Hair (and under that Cæremony, Himself) unto some God; and leaving his Hair untouch'd until hee Return'd, at his Return hee offered it up unto his Idol. So, saies the Poet, in his Argonautics,

*Tectus et Eurytion Servato colla Capillo,
Quem Pater Aonias reducem tondebit ad Aras*.²⁰

And in Petronius Arbiter, one of the Speakers ha's that Expression, Cui Deo crinem vovisti, Pharmace? Responde.²¹ And Homer, in his Twenty Third Iliad, brings in Achilles, before his Trojan Expedition, vowing his Hair, to the River Sperchius, for the Success of his Undertaking.²² When Maimonides writes, That a Jew might have no Concerns with a Gentile, on the Day of his Returning from Sea, tis thus explained by Vossius: Post peregrinationem, Deorum Templā adibant Ethnici, gratias Acturi pro Incolumitate; comam quoque tum præscindebant, ac Dijs dicabant.²³

Now wee find Exemples of the like Matter among the Jewes. There is the Exemple of Absalom: [2. Sam. 15.7, 8.] And besides that, there is the Exemple of Paul; [Act. 18.18.] a thing of much Torture, to and from Interpreters.²⁴

¹⁹ Spencer (587).

²² Homer (Iliad 23.139–51) has Achilles “cut off a golden lock, the rich growth of which he had nursed for the river Spercheius, and in agitation he spoke . . . : “Spercheius, in vain did my father Peleus vow to you that when I came home there to my dear native land I would cut my hair to you and offer a holy hecatomb, and would sacrifice fifty rams, males without blemish, into your waters on the spot where is your precinct and your fragrant altar. So vowed that old man, but you did not fulfill for him his intent. Now, therefore, since I will not return to my dear native land, let me give this lock to the warrior Patroclus to take with him.”

| But Oecumenius hath a good Hint upon the Place; To cutt ones Hair, with a Vow, Ἰουδαϊκὸν ἦν was a Jewish Custom.²⁵ When the Apostle begun his Journey to Corinth, hee did according to the Custom of his Nation, make a Vow of keeping his Hair, till his Journey were finished: Accordingly, having prospered in his Journey, hee did, in Token of his owing Himself unto God, the Author of his Prosperity, there cutt off His Hair, & hee seems therein to consider the good Success of his further Journey to Jerusalem. As for the Strict Point of offering up the Hair, at the Door of the Temple, the Mischna, as well as Maimonides, gives us to understand, that in the latter Times, they did not so strictly stand upon it.²⁶

What the Gentiles thus did, with relation to a Journey, they also did with relation to any Remarkable Distress. A Deliverance from a Storm at Sea, would Occasion the making & paying a Vow of consecrated Hair. Lucillius ha's a Passage to this Purpose, thus Interpreted;

*Naufragio sospes Lucillius, hosce capillos
Dedico; nil aliud quod superesset habens.*²⁷

And this Rasure, is by Petronius called, Naufragorum ultimum Votum.²⁸ And this will help you to expound the Words of Juvenal, – Gaudent ubi Vertice Raso, Garrula Securi narrare pericula nautæ.²⁹ Diodorus likewise relates, That the Egyptians, make Vowes to their Gods for the Rescue of their Children from Death, ξυρῆσαντες τὰς τρίχας. With cutting their Hair.³⁰ And Artemidorus tells us, upon being saved from Shipwreck or Sickness, ξυρώνται οἱ ἀνθρώποι. Men are shaved.³¹

³⁰ Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca 1.83.2, lines 6–7) with diacritics reads, ξυρῆσαντες τὰς τρίχας or “shave off their hair.”

And Censorinus tells us, Quidam pro cæterâ bonâ Corporis valetudine, crinem Deo sacram pascebant.³² And the Sicyonian Women, as Pausanias tells us, did use to sacrifice their Hair, to Hygia, (or Health) the Daughter of Esculapius.³³

Now among the Jewes wee shall find something of the like. I'll only quote you, Josephus, who mentioning the Coming of Berenices, after sore Disasters, to Jerusalem, and performing her Vowes there, saies, T'was the Manner, for them that were distressed with Sickness, or any other Calamities & Perplexities, to make a Vow, & for thirty Dayes before they slew their Sacrifices, to abstain from Wine, and at last, ξυρησασθαι τὰς κόμας To shave their Hair.³⁴

Finally, Both Jewes and Gentiles agreed, in wearing their Nourished Locks of Hair, as a Token, of their Devotion to some God, and their Dependence on the Protection and Assistance of that God continually; The Jewes, of the True; The Gentiles of a False. And all that I now desire is, That they may Illustrate one another.³⁵

Q. What further Thoughts may one entertain about the Law, and the State, of the Nazirites?

A. I'll recited unto you, Dr. Lightfoots Thoughts. Hee saies, When I more narrowly consider that severe Interdiction, by which the Nazarite was forbidden, the Total Use of the Vine, I cannot but call to Mind;

I. Whether the Vine might not bee, the Tree in Paradise, that had been Forbidden to Adam, & by the Tasting whereof, hee sinned. The Jewish Doctors positively affirm This, without any Scruple.³⁶

³² The third-century Roman grammarian Censorinus, in his "birthday book" De Die Natali Liber ad Q. Caerellium (1.10) relates that "some even, in thanks for continued good health, used to let their hair grow as sacred to the god" (Birthday Book, p. 3).

³⁶ Babylonian Talmud, tractate Sanhedrin (70a–b) tells the following story: "And Noah

II. Whether the Law about the Nazarites had not some reference, to Adam, while hee was under that Prohibition, in the State of Innocency. If the Bodily, and Legal Uncleanesses, about which there are such strict Præcepts, especially the Leprosy, the greatest of all Uncleanesses, did excellently decipher the State and Nature of Sin; might not the Lawes about Nazarites, which concerned the greatest Purities, in a most pure Religion, bee something in Commemoration of the State of Man before his Fall?³⁷

Q. If the Nazarites were to Drink no Wine, how could they conform to some other Lawes of Heaven? By those Lawes, there was, the /יין מצורה/ Wine of Command, as the Jewish Doctors call it. Such was the Wine of Tithes; (Deut. 12.17, 18.) And such was the Wine of the Passeover. The Nazarite, now, if hee Drink, hee violates the Command of his Order; if hee Drink not, hee breaks another Command. What shall hee do?

A. You have propos'd a Jewish Difficulty; pray, accept a Jewish Solution. All that I can find said by the Jewes upon it, is, Lett Elias untie this knott, when hee comes.³⁸

Q. What may be meant by, The Liquor of Grapes, interdicted unto the Nazarites?

A. That was forbidden, when Wine was forbidden.

Wherefore, the /משרה/ in this Pro{hi}bition, means Water, wherein Grapes have been steeped; Water tintured with Grapes; or wherein Grapes have been moistened. Arias Montanus renders it, Madefactionem.³⁹ began to be a husbandman, and he planted a vineyard, – R. Hisda said in R. 'Ukba's name ... The Holy One, blessed be He, said unto Noah: 'Noah, shouldst thou not have taken a warning from Adam, whose transgression was caused by wine?' This agrees with the view that the [forbidden] tree from which Adam ate was a vine. For it has been taught: R. Meir said: That [forbidden] tree from which Adam ate was a vine, for nothing else but wine brings woe to man."

³⁹ The glosses (Numb. 6:3) of Rashi, Ibn Ezra, Rashbam, Gersonides, Abarbanel, and Sforno are in full agreement, in JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot (4:38). Mather's source appears to be Arias Montanus's gloss "madefactionem," i. e., "the moistening," as incorporated in Poole, on Numb. 6:3, in Synopsis Criticorum (1:636) and Works (7:101).

Q. The Typical Consideration of Nazaritism, will bee of Use to Illustrate the Oracles of God, with some Evangelical Thoughts, as wee Read them? v. 21.

A. Indeed the Nazarites were an Order in much Esteem, among the ancient People of God. See Amos. 2.11. and Lam. 4.7. Some were Nazarites all their Life; like Sampson. Others, like Paul, were Nazarites for no more than a particular Term of Time; of which, the Jewes tell us, a Month was the shortest.⁴⁰

Now, the Nazarites were Types of our Lord Jesus Christ. Indeed, Hee was not literally a Nazarite; for Hee Drank Wine, at other times, as well as His Last Supper. But, Hee was, Jesus of Nazareth: And so, at least Allusively, Hee was called a Nazarene, (some think, as the Antitype of Judg. 13.5.) And, Hee was an Holy Thing, and the most Holy One, and entirely separated unto God.⁴¹

But the Nazarites were also Types of all the Saints, who are an Holy People, under a peculiar Separation unto the Lord.⁴²

And under the Order of the Nazarites, there was an adumbration of the Benefits, which the Saints do receive by the Lord Jesus Christ.

The Nazarites were Persons Devoted unto God; All Beleevers are so.

As the Nazarites were to forbear the Use of Wine; thus Beleevers are to bee Temperate, and Moderate, and Mortified; and instead of Wine, to bee filled with the Spirit.⁴³

As the Nazarites might not cutt their Hair; Thus Beleevers are to nourish the Growth of their Divine Graces in them.

As the Nazarites were by no means to Touch the Dead; thus, Beleevers are as much to Abstain from Dead Works. And as they might not Mourn for the Dead, so much Magnanimity must Beleevers express, in the Loss of their dearest Comforts.⁴⁴

If a Nazarite were by Chance Defiled, hee was to begin all again upon a New Score; This taught the absolute Purity & Perfection of the Divine Law, which will not admitt the least Failing whatsoever. [Gal. 3.10. Jam. 2.10.]

And when a Nazarite had fulfilled his Vow, hee was to bring a Sacrifice of Atonement. This taught the Secret and Unseen Guiltiness, which cleaves to the ⁴⁰ Based on Numb. 6:5, Bekhor Shor argues that according to Gematria “the numerical value of ‘he shall be’ is 30.” Thus “the basic nazirite term lasts for 30 days” (JPS Miqra’ot Gedolot 4:38).

Q. In the Form of Blessing præscribed unto the Priests of Israel, there is the Name of God Three Times repeted. From this Repetition, and its Conformity, to several Passages in the New Testament, (especially, 2. Cor. 13.14.) we Christians do readily apprehend an Intimation of the Trinity. But how, if you could find any thing in the Writings of the Jewes, to countenance this our Doctrine of the Trinity, it would be very serviceable? v. 24, 25, 26.

A. I can find very much.

Indeed R. Bechai, in Pentat. fol. 169. col. 2. [Edit. Crac.] upon these Words, in the Book of Numbers; He observes the Name Jehovah, repeted Three Times, with respect unto the Three several Times, the Present, the Past, & the Future, which the Divine Being, ha's a Power over. Now, I pray, compare this with those Words, Rev. 1.4. *Grace be unto you, and Peace, from Him which is, & which was, & which is to come.*⁴⁶

Somewhat more material unto our present Purpose, will it be, to take notice, of what the Jewish Writers observe, in the very ancient Book, Bahir, on this Occasion.⁴⁷ That Book, [as you'l find own'd by R. Bechai, ib: And R. M. Markanti, in Leg. fol. 173. col. 1. Edit. Ven.] It saies, That the Repeating Jehovah Three Times in this Place, teacheth us, That these Names of the Blessed God, are Three Powers, and adds, ושמא כשמו דומה לחברד ושמה כשמו Every Distinct Power, is like to each other, and hath the same Name with it. That is to say, Every one is, & is called Jehovah. The same Author adds [Ibid. col. 3.] That in the Words of the Psalmist, where it is said, The Lord reigneth; the Words bear Witness of the

⁴⁷ Attributed to R. Nehuniah ben HaKana, Sefer ha-Bahir (item 111), as quoted in R. Bechai's Midrash Rabbeinu Bachya (6:1935–36), is one of the oldest classic commentaries on the Kabbalah. The first printed edition of סֵפֶר הַבְּהִיר Sefer ha-Bahir (Book of Illumination or Brightness) appeared in Amsterdam (1651). For a modern edition of this work and the applicable pages, see Aryeh Kaplan's translation The Bahir Illumination (1979), pp. 40–42.

Three /היות/ or Subsistencies, which are in the Blessed Creator. And what is said, That all is closed with Jehovah, the peculiar Name of God, intimates That He is the Fountain of all, & from Him are the Emanations of all. He adds, That it is said in the Book Zohar, That in these Words, The Lord Reigneth, there is a great Mystery.⁴⁸

Q. You are then satisfied, That here is a Respect unto the Trinity?

A. Yes. R. Menachem observes, That the Repetition of the Name, JEHOVAH Three Times, in these Three Verses, & that with a Different Accent in each of them, hath made the Jewes themselves to think, that there is a Mystery in it; And, we Christians understand the Mystery better than they. It may well be [11v] look'd upon, by us, as having a Respect unto the Three Persons in {the} | Trinity beleev'd by us; This Mystery, as Luther wisely observes (In Psal. V.) is here, occultè insinuatum, tho' not plainly Revealed. And, as Dr. Patrick notes, Tis not hard to show, how properly, God the Father, may be said to, Bless us & Keep us; and God the Son, to be Gracious unto us; and God the Holy Spirit, to give us Peace.⁴⁹

The Jewes think it utterly unlawful, to add a Fourth Benediction unto these Three.⁵⁰

Q. What were the Covered Wagons, (& for what?) that the Twelve Princes of Israel, presented before the Lord? v. 3.

A. In the first Place, they made a Present for the Tabernacle itself, & the Service of it; Namely, that such Parts of it, as were most cumbersome, might be more conveniently carried, & be kept free from Dust, Rain, or Hail.

The Covered Wagons the LXX call ἀμάξας λαμπηνίκας. Now, as Pollux reckons λαμπήνη among the Wagons and Chariots then used, so Hesychius tells us, it signifies, that sort of Wagons which Illustrious Men & Women used; and were (as tis here said,) covered overhead.¹

No doubt, they were sumptuous, inasmuch as Two Princes joined in presenting One Wagon.

From each of the Princes, there was one Ox; that there might be a Pair of Oxen, to draw each Wagon; & probably they were yoked, when the Two Princes drew near with their Offering.²

Q. When did the Twelve Dayes begin, for the Solemn Dedication, that is here before us? v. 11.

A. It is not easy to determine. But it seems a Reasonable Computation, that is made by Fortunatus Scacchus; [in his Myrothec. Sacr. Elaeochrism.]³

The Tabernacle being erected, the first Day of the first Month of the second Year after they came out of Egypt, Seven Dayes were spent in the Consecration of it, & of what belong'd unto it. On the Eighth Day, Moses began to consecrate Aaron and his Sons; which lasted Seven Dayes longer. Then the Fifteenth Day of that Month, was the First Day of Unleavened Bread; which God commanded, to be observed in the First Month, & lasted until the Two and Twentieth Day. The rest of the Month, we may well suppose to be spent in Giving, and Receiving, & Publishing the Lawes mentioned in the Book of Leviticus. After this, on the First Day of the Second Month, he began to Number the People, according to the Command in the Beginning of this Book. This we may suppose to have lasted Three Dayes. On the Fourth were the Levites numbred. On the Fifth, we may conclude, they were offered unto God, & presented unto the Priests. On the Sixth, they were Expiated and Consecrated. On the Seventh, their several Charges were parted among them. After this, the Princes began to offer, upon the Eighth Day of the Second Month, for the Dedication of the Altar; which lasted until the Nineteenth Day inclusively; and on the Twentieth Day of this Month, they removed from Sinai, to the Wilderness of Paran.⁴

Q. Why is not Nahshon called, The Prince of the Tribe of Judah; when the Leader of every other Tribe, is expressly called, The Prince? v. 12.

A. He may be called only, Nahshon of the Tribe of Judah, for a Reason, which you will find among our Illustrations on the Genealogy of our Saviour.⁵

But, besides that; one Reason of this Omission may be (what is offered by Dr. Patrick;) Because he offered first; This was Honour Enough; and there needed no more to be said of him.⁶

Q. Well, but the Nature and Intent of the Offering? v. 13.

A. The Silver Charger & Bowl, were plainly, by their Metal, for the Use of the Altar of Burnt-Offerings, in the Outer Court; for all the Vessels of the Sanctuary, were of Gold.

Probably, the Charger, (or, Platter) was to receive the Flesh, which was offered at the Altar, or the Fine Flour for the Meat-Offerings. And the Bowl received the Blood, or was used for pouring out of Wine.⁷

The Golden Spoon was plainly for the Use of the Golden Altar.

[12v] | The Burnt-Offering then, is first mentioned; being the most ancient sort of Sacrifice, long before we read of any other.

But in Likelihood, the Sin-Offering was now offered before it.⁸

The Peace-Offerings were more numerous, than the Burnt-Offering, or the Sin-Offering, because the Priests, and the Princes, and as many of the People as they invited, had their Share of them, & Feasted before the Lord upon them, with great Rejoicing.

⁴ Scacchus (col. 678) and Patrick (Numbers 116–17). According to Numb. 2:3, Nahshon, the son of Aminadab, of the tribe of Judah, offered his sacrifice on the first day.

This Custome, as Mr. Selden observes, flowed from hence, to the Gentiles, who Dedicated their Altars, Temples, & Statues, with much of Ceremony; and the ancient Greeks, πολυτέλεστέρους ἱερείοις, with more sumptuous Sacrifices; but the ancient Romans, with publick Largesses also, as well as Feasts and Playes. At last, the Holidayes became Anniversary; as the Feast of Dedication among the Jewes, was, after the Times of Antiochus; in which there was, λυχνοκαΐα, Illuminations, or Setting up of Candles, in token of Joy.⁹

Q. What is there to be observed, in General, of the Offerings now before us? v. 88.

A. There is no Difference in the Offerings of these Princes; but all offered Plate of æqual Weight & Worth, and an æqual number of Sacrifices, without the least Variation. This was either by common Agreement, or by Divine Appointment; that the Vanity of Vying one with another, might be prevented; & none might brag of their out-doing their Brethren; and all might be confident, that they were æqually interested in the Altar, & accepted by the Divine Majesty.¹⁰

Q. Why does Moses, distinctly, and at Length, sett down the Offerings of the Princes, of every Tribe, tho' they were the very same, without any Difference? v. 88.

A. It was prudently done; That an honourable mention being made, of every one apart, none might think themselves, in the least neglected.¹¹

3687.

Q. Are there no moral Documents to be learned, from what was done, by the Twelve Great Men of Israel? v. 88.¹²

A. Hear Conradus Pellicanus, upon this Matter.

“Great Men should learn to be devoutly Religious, & so possess the Fear and Reverence of the LORD GOD, in their Breasts; to be Strong in Faith: far from Covetousness: Unanimous in their Endeavours to Honour God: to give ⁹ Patrick on Numb. 7:17 (Numbers 119) draws on John Selden's De Synedriis (1655), lib. 3, ch. 14, sec. 3, p. 261, arguing that Israel's pagan neighbors enviously imitated the Mosaic cultic rites – pious arguments widely proliferated among Christian apologists but challenged by such post-Reformation controversialists as Lord Herbert of Cherbury, John Marsham, John Spencer, Athanasius Kircher, John Toland, William Warburton and others. See P. Rossi's Dark Abyss of Time (123–32, 236–45) and D. Levitin's fine article “John Spencer's ‘De Legibus Hebraeorum’ and ‘Enlightened’ Sacred History” (49–92) and Levitin's Ancient Wisdom in the Age of Science (113–229).

Q. What Reflection may one make upon, the Articulate Voice of God, so audibly speaking to Moses, from between the Two Cherubims? v. 89.

A. Dr. Patrick thus reflects upon it.

“This Voice from God, which was perceived by Humane Ears, represented God, as if He was Incorporate: And may well be look’d upon, as an Earnest of that great Mystery, God manifested in Flesh; who in the Fulness of Time, became a Man, and spake to all the Jewes familiarly in their own Language.”¹⁴

Q. The Lustrations used among the ancient People of God, now call for your Illustrations? [Ponder, Heb. 9.10.]

A. The Israelites used certain Purifications, which were chiefly, [Ad Munditatem,] To præserved their Daily Cleanness: Washings Imposed on them, who were polluted from the Touch of a Dead Body, of a Menstruate, of a Reptile, & on them who laboured under Unclean Fluxes, or touch’d them who did so. Hereto may allude, Zech. 13.1. A Fountain shall bee opened, for Sin & for Uncleanness: And the Pool of Siloam, seems to have been particularly Designed for that Purpose; for which Cause, tis call’d by the Syriac, Locus Baptisterij. Yea, they had Private Washing-Places, therefore as well as Public Ones: whereof consult, Lev. 11.36.¹⁵

¹³ Conradus Pellicanus, on Numb. 7:88, in Commentaria Bibliorum (1536), 1:165.

¹⁵ Mather’s query is based on John Spencer’s De Legibus Hebraeorum (1685), lib. 3, diss. III (“De Lustrationibus & Purificationibus Hebraeorum”), cap. 3, sec. 1, fols. 691–92. Here, Spencer’s source is John Lightfoot’s explication of John 5:2, in Horae Hebraicae, Impensae In Evangelium S. Johannis (1671), pp. 97–98. The Syriac translation of John 5:2, in the Latin rendition of Brian Walton’s Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (1658) 5:418, reads “in Jerusalem locus quidem baptisterii quo vocatur Hebraicè, Beth Hesdo, domus misericordiae” or, “Jerusalem is certainly the place where the baptistry is located, which in Hebrew is called Beth Hesdo, house of mercy.”

Of the peculiar Lustral Water made with the Ashes of the Red-Heifer, wee have elsewhere discoursed.¹⁶ Wee shall here only note, the Imitations, which there were of these Lustrations, among the ancient Pagans; among whom there were, as Porphyrus tells us, ἀγγεῖαι οἰκεῖαι καθ' ἑκάστον Θεόν, Purifications, peculiar for each particular God.¹⁷ Maimonides informs us, about the old Zabians, Eos labores magnos habuisse circa pollutiones; and hee thinks, that the Lord, in His Institutions, about their daily Lustrations, did propose to ease His People of Numberless & Cumbersome Rites, therein used among the Pagans.¹⁸ My Dr. Spencer Judges, that the Egyptians did refuse to Eat with the Sons of Israel, [Gen. 43.31.] for fear of contracting Impurity from their Communion with People, not enough purified with Lustrations, then commonly practised. Whether that were so, or no, it should seem, that of old, when the Nations Return'd from War, there was one special Occasion, on which these Lustrations were used among them. Consider Num. 31.19, 20.¹⁹

Thus Amphitruo saies to Hercules, in Seneca;

– Manantes prius

Manus cruentâ Cæde, et Hostili, expia.

And, Eneas in Vergil, saies;

Me, Belle stanto digressum et Cæde Recentis,

Attrectare nefas, donec me flumine Vivo

Abluero. –²⁰

But then the Israelites used further Purifications, which were, [Ad cultum,] To præpare for Sacred Worship.²¹ When they addressed themselves unto their Prayers, they first washed their Bodies, or, at least, their Hands. Judith did so, in 16 Mather touches upon this issue in his commentary on Lev. 27 (69v–70r); see especially Spencer's discussion of the sacrifice of the red heifer, in De Legibus (lib. 2, cap. 15, secs 3–5, fols. 382–93).

17 Spencer (693) conflates two portions of two sentences from Porphyrius (De Abstinencia 4.7, lines 24–25): ἀγγεῖαι οἰκεῖαι καθ' ἑκάστον Θεόν, or “purifications adapted to the several divinities” (Selected Works, p. 117).

18 Maimonides, Liber מורה נבוכים [More Nebuchim] Doctor Perplexorum (1629), pars 3, cap. 47, p. 492, argues that the Zabians (pagans), “had unpleasant things imposed on them in cases of uncleanness” (adapted from Guide 3.47.594).

19 Spencer (693, 694). Israelite warriors were commanded to purify themselves, their captives, and any object and garment that had come in touch with any person killed (Numb. 31:19–20).

20 Spencer (694). The passages from Seneca's Hercules Furens (4.1.919) has the horrified Amphitruon admonish Hercules, who approaches the altar with bloody hands: “first purify thy hands, dripping with thy slaughtered foeman's blood.” On the topic of ritual purity after acts of warfare, see J. J. Lennon's “Pollution, Religion and Society in the Roman World” (52–54). Likewise in Virgil's Aeneid (2.717–20), the poet has Aeneias address his parent: “Father, do thou take in thy hand the sacred things and our country's household gods; for me, fresh from such a conflict and recent carnage, it were sin to handle them, until I have washed me in a running stream.”

21 Spencer (695). Lat. Ad cultum, “for worship.”

her Story; and Clemens Alexandrinus mentioning this Custome among the Gentiles, adds, That the Jewes were so Accustomed hereunto, ὡς καὶ πολλάκις ἐπὶ κοίτῃ βαπτίζεσθαι, quod sæpè vel in lecto Jacentes Tingerentur.²² Thus Dr. Pocock informs us, how Washing at Rising, became a Law among them, with an Opinion, That when a Man betook himself unto his Morning Prayers, God look'd not on him as Pure, Antequam manus Aquâ perfuderit.²³ A very old Poet, in Clemens hath celebrated this Usage of the Jewes;

Ἀλλὰ γὰρ αἰρουσιν πρὸς οὐρανὸν ὠλένας ἀγνάς κλ.
At contrà puras tollunt ad sydera palmas,
Manè ubi de lecto veniunt, se virgine lymphæ
*Semper mundantes.*²⁴

To which, no doubt, alludes the Apostle, when he bids us Pray, 1. Tim. 2.8. Lifting up pure Hands. And Philo ha's a Passage to the like Purpose; For a Man to pray, καθαρὰς καὶ παρθένους χεῖρας εἰς οὐρανὸν ἀνατείνας²⁵

And that, these Euctical Washings, are at this Day in Use among the Jewes, is well known to all Mankind. But now, among the Gentiles, we find an Imitation of them; Yea, so early an Imitation, That one may think, our Father Noah, and the Inspired Patriarchs, to have been the first, who, not without a Divine Warrant, Introduced such Cæremonies.

The Poet saies of Telemachus,
 Χειρας νηψάμενος πολὺς ἄλος, εὐχετ' Ἀθηνῇ·
Ablutis manibus pelago spumante Minervæ
*Oravit.*²⁶

And for the Salt Water thus used by the Gentiles, we find in Aristæas, that it was used by the Jewes also, To wash their Hands in Sea-Water, ὡς ἂν ᾔψαντο πρὸς τὸν

22 In the apocryphal book Judith (10:3; 12:7), the heroine washes and anoints herself before she separates drowsy Holofernes from his head. And Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 4.22.142.3, line 1) adds in the dual-language rendition, that it was customary among the Jews "to wash frequently after being in bed" (The Stromata 4.22, in ANF 2:435).

23 The citation from Edward Pococke's Notarum Miscellanea (1654), ch. 9, p. 388, affirms that a man was not pure "until he washed his hands in water."

24 In his Protrepticus (6.70.2, lines 5–8), Clemens Alexandrinus upbraids Plato, claiming that the Egyptians taught him geometry, the Babylonians astronomy, the Thracians healing, and the Assyrians many other things; the Hebrews, however, taught him ritual purity: Ἀλλὰ γὰρ αἴρουνσι πρὸς οὐρανὸν ὠλένας ἀγνάς κλ. "But [they] raise to heaven pure arms etc.:/ When they rise from bed, purifying themselves with water,/ And worship alone the Eternal, who reigns for ever more" (Exhortation to the Heathen, ch. 6; in ANF 2:192).

25 The adapted passage from Philo Judæus's De virtutibus (sec. 57, line 5) advises that a man should "stretch his pure and virgin hands towards heaven."

26 Spencer (696) asserts with Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 4.22.142.2, line 3) that Odysseus's son Telemachus Χειρας νηψάμενος πολὺς ἄλος, εὐχετ' Ἀθηνῇ "having washed his hands in the hoary sea, prayed to Athene [Minerva]" (The Stromata 4.22, in ANF 2:435) and Homer's Odyssey (2.261).

Θεόν.²⁷ Yea, sometimes, according to Euripides, they thus washed all their Bodies, as well as their Hands.

υδασι ποταμιοις λευκον χροα

Ελουσατ' κλ.

– Aquis fluvialibus candidam cutim

Lavit. –²⁸

Hesiod assures us, That the Usage was very Ancient.²⁹ Apuleius finds it among the Egyptians; Discussà pigrâ quiete, alacer exurgo, meque purificandi studio, marino lavacro trado; septiesque submerso fluctibus capite, letus et alacer Deum prepotentem sic apprecabar. Homer finds it among the Græcians; unlawful to worship,

Χερσι δ' ἀνιπτοισιν.³⁰

Plutarch finds it among the Romans; telling us, that Marius made his Vowes, νηάμενος τὰς χεῖρας, καὶ πρὸς τὸν οὐρανὸν ἀνασχών Washing his hands, & Lifting 'em up to Heaven.³¹

Thus Ovid also saies, prays

Spargit et ipse suos Lauro rorante Capillos,

*Incipit et Solitâ fundere voce preces.*³²

And thus Turnus, in Virgil;

27 Spencer (696) quotes from the fabled Letter of Aristeas to Philocrates (2nd c. CE), which relates the story of the Hebrew Bible's translation into Greek (Septuagint). Spencer here relies on Aristeas's Letter as quoted in Humphrey Hody's Contra Historiam Aristee De LXX Interpretibus Dissertatio (1684), cap. 19, p. 288. Perhaps the strangely garbled Greek passage might best be rendered, "before they offered up prayers to God."

28 A maid in Euripides's tragedy Alcestis (159–60), first performed at the Dionysian festival in Athens (438 BCE), relates to the chorus that when Alcestis heard that her hour of death had arrived, she "ὑδασι ποταμιοις λευκὸν χροά / Ελούσατ' κλ., "bathed her fair skin in flowing water."

29 Spencer (697) believes that lustrations were ancient practices and points to Hesiod's warning (Opera et Dies 737–39): "do not cross on foot the fair-pouring water of everflowing rivers before you have prayed, looking into the beautiful stream, and washed your hands with lovely, clear water: whoever crosses a river, unwashed is evil and in his hands, against him the gods feel resentment, and they give him pains afterwards."

30 Spencer's adapted quotation from Apuleius's Metamorphoses (11.1.14–16, 18–19) has Lucius, roused from his nightmarish sleep at full moon, narrate, "I shook off my sluggish sleep and arose eagerly. Desiring to purify myself I went at once to bathe in the sea, plunging my head under the waves seven times. Then, joyfully and eagerly, I prayed to the mighty goddess [Isis, Queen of Heaven]" to be returned to my human shape. Homer (Iliad 6.266) has Hector of the sparkling helmet decline the cup of honeyed wine, for he dares not offer libation to Zeus with Χερσὶ δ' ἀνιπτοισιν, "hands unwashed."

31 In his campaign against the invading Germanic Cimbri (109–102 BCE), the Roman general Gaius Marius (c. 157–86 BCE), according to Plutarch's Vitae parallelae: Marius (26.3, lines 1–2), chased the invaders and "after washing his hands, lifted them to heaven," and pledged one hundred head of cattle to curry the favor of the gods (Life of Marius 26.2).

32 Spencer's Latin quotation (698) is adapted from Ovid's Fasti (5.679–80). On the Ides of March, the narrator, calling upon Evander (grandson of Atlas), dips his laurel bough into the sacred water, "sprinkles, too, his own hair with the dripping laurel / and begins his prayer in a voice accustomed to confirm."

– Ad undam

*Processit, summosque hausit de gurgite lymphas,
Multa Deos orans, oneravitque aethera Votis.*³³

Finally, Tertullian complains, of these Lotions, as a Peece of Gentilism, crept into the Christian Church. Reprehending the Rites, which in his Time, were gott in among the Christians, hee ha's this Passage; *Hæ sunt veræ munditiæ, non quas plerique superstitiosè curant, ad omnem orationem, etiam cum lavacro totius corporis, Aquam sumentes.*³⁴

What the Jewes did thus, before they presented their Prayers, they much more did, before they Approached their Altars. When the Priests came to sacrifice, they were washed, according to Institution. [Exod. 30.18, 19, 20.] And that the vulgar Israelites also washed before a Sacrifice, is evident from that Passage in the Book of Judith [ch. 16.18.] ἡνίκα ἐκαθαρίθη ὁ λαὸς – *when the People were purified, then they sacrificed.*³⁵ Thus Philo also reports, that only washed Hands might bee laid on the Head of a Victim. Compare Psal. 26.6.³⁶

Now, so early was this Usage, that wee find Jacobs Family washing themselves, [Gen. 35.2.] before their Sacrificing at Bethel. Yea, and among the Gentiles too Diodorus Siculus, gives us this as the first Thing done, in a Morning by the Kings of Egypt, *They washed themselves & so they sacrificed.*³⁷

[13v] | Yea, Plutarch did fill a Volumn with respect to the Ceremonies of this Usage among all Nations, found in the Archives of Antiquitie.³⁸

Nor was it only when they came to the Altar, but also whenever they came to the Temple, that the Jewes did such a Thing. The Priests had a well-known Laver to this Purpose: And when the Psalmist saies, [Psal. 134.2.] Lift up your Hands in the Sanctuary; some understand it, with the special Emphasis, of, Washed Hands. And that the vulgar Israelites likewise Washed on this Occasion, 33 Sworn enemy of Virgil's hero Aeneas, young Turnus, king of the Rutuli, implores the goddess Iris in prayer. Upon finishing his invocation, he "went onward to the river, and took up water from the brimming flood, calling oft on the gods and burdening heaven with vows" (Aeneid 9.23–24).

34 The Latin citation from Tertullian's De Oratione (13.5–7) reads, "This is the true cleanliness, not that which certain persons are superstitiously careful of, rinsing their hands at every prayer, even when they have just come from a bath of the whole body."

35 LXX Judith (16:18, line 2).

36 Philo Judaeus (De specialibus legibus 1.198, lined 4–5) exhorts, ἔπειτα δ' ἀπονιψάμενος ὁ προσάγων τὰς χεῖρας ἐπιφερέτω τῇ τοῦ ἱερέου κφαλῇ, "Let him who brings it [sacrifice] wash his hands, and lay his hands on the head of the victim" (Works 552).

37 Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca 1.70.4, lines 6–8) reports that ἔπειτα λουσάμενον καὶ τοῖς τῆς ἀρχῆς συσσήμοις μετ' ἐσθήτος λαμπρὰς κοσμήσαντα τὸ σῶμα θύσαι τοῖς θεοῖς "After he [king of Egypt] had bathed and bedecked his body with rich garments and the insignia of his office, he had to sacrifice to the gods."

38 In his Roman Questions, Quest. 4 (264d), the Sabine priest Cornelius instructs Antor Curiatius that an ancient custom of the Sabines requires "to bathe in the Tiber" before Antor can sacrifice his beauteous heifer to Diana on the Aventine (Plutarch's Moralia 4:11).

wee have plentiful Assurances both from Josephus and from Philo.³⁹ Therewith compare Act. 24.17, 18. The Gentiles did the same. Saies Euripides,

– καθαραις δὲ δρόσοις
 Αφύδρανάμενοι, στείχετε ναούς·
 – Purâ verò Aquâ
Abluti, Ite in Templum.⁴⁰

Saies Apuleius, Me prius sueto lavacro traditum, circumrorans abluit Sacerdos, rursumque, ad Templum reductum, ante ipsa Deæ vestigia constituit. Saies Porphyrius, Sacraria puritate operam non dantibus, nequaquam a denuda.⁴¹ Sozomen finds the like among the Gracians, and Ovid among the Romans.⁴²

Sheringham speaking of the בית הטבילה / House of Washing, for them who entred the Jewish Temple, saies, Hoc purgationis genus ceteræ quoque gentes à Judæis arripuerunt, quæ ad eorum Imitationem suas lustrationes et lavandi Ritus habuerunt, cùm Templâ sua Ingrederebantur.⁴³ Allow, that the Jewish Nation, derived much of these Rites, from their Holy Antemosaic Ancestors, (with whom, Wash'd ³⁹ Spencer (701); Josephus Flavius (Antiquitates Judaicæ 8.96, lines 4–5; Antiquities 8.3.5–6); Philo Judæus (Quod Deus Sit Immutabilis 8, lines 1–4) assures his readers that “it is foolishness to imagine, that it is unlawful to enter into temples, unless a man has first washed his body and made that look bright, but that one may attempt to sacrifice and to pray with a mind still polluted and disordered.” More to the point, “shall any one endure to approach God without being purified as to his soul, [and] shall any one while impure come near to the purest of all beings, and this too without having any intention of repenting? On the Unchangeableness of God (8), in Works (158).

Hands, were a Token of Innocency; because, as Aristæas notes, πᾶσα ἐνέργεια διὰ τῶν χειρῶν γίνεταί, All Business is done by the Hands,) and I shall consent thereto, much rather than to the learned Spencers Opinion.⁴⁴ As for the Pagans, I content myself with Justin Martyrs Account, who on those Words of the Prophet, [Wash yee, make you clean,] saies, when the Dæmons heard this Washing required by the Prophet, they caused their Votaries, coming to them, with any of their Devotions, to lustrate themselves with Sprinkling of Water, yea, to wash all their Bodies.⁴⁵

There were Three Wayes of Lustrating with Water, used among the Hebrewes. One was, by Immersion of the Body; This was /טבילה/ λούσις. Another was, by Ablution of the Hands & Feet; This was /קדש/ νίψις. A Third was, by the Aspersion of Water; This was /נדה/ or /הזיה/ ραντισμός. On the Two former, wee have had some Reflections; Beholden to, tho' Opposing of, Dr. Spencer in them. In the like Manner, wee will make a few more particular ones now upon the Third.⁴⁶

The Gentiles did use to carry the Lustral Water about the Person to bee Lustrated, and Sprinkle him Around. In Virgil, — ter socios purâ circumtulit undâ,

there circumferre, is used for, purgare; and hence the Præposition, περι, is commonly præfixed unto Words, wherein there is a Lustration signified.⁴⁷ Now, Quære, whether the Jewes did the like? For the LXX used the Words περιεῤῥαντίθη and περιῤῥαίνων, in the Business of the Sacred Aspersions.⁴⁸

Moreover, The Gentiles did practise Aspersion, just after an Immersion, or an Ablution, præceding it. Besides what Apuleius intimates of This, there is a Devotion employed by Theophrastus, upon his Bigot, for going forth ἀπονιψάμενος τὰς χεῖρας, καὶ περιῤῥανόμενος, Manibus elotis, et Aquâ lustrali Aspersus prodiret.⁴⁹

44 Mather provides his own translation of the passage from Aristæas's famous letter, Aristæae epistola ad Philocratem (sec. 306, line 4), insisting all along that whatever similarity exists between Jewish and pagan rites is because all peoples inherited their share of Prisca Theologia from their common, antemosaic ancestor Noah, whose descendants carried the essence of true religion into all the world during their dispersion.

45 Mather translates Spencer's Greek quotation (703) from Justin Martyr's Apologia (62.1, lines 1–4).

46 Spencer, De Legibus Hebraeorum (1685), lib. 3, Diss. III, cap. 4, fol. 704, argues that the Israelites and their descendants imitated the custom of ablution from their former Egyptian overlord. See Numb. 8:7, 19:19; Ezek. 36:25.

47 Spencer (704); Aeneas and his men weep for their dead comrade Misenus as his body is cremated on the pyre; Corynaeus, meanwhile “thrice encircled his comrades and cleansed them with pure water” (Virgil's Aeneid 6.229). Spencer's explanation that “circumferre” (“encircle”) metaphorically signifies “purgare” (“cleanse”) is based on the annotation on Aeneid 6.229, in Servius's compendium In Vergilii Carmina Commentarii (2:42).

48 The LXX appears to suggest that the term “purify” (Numb. 19:13) signifies to cleanse by “sprinkling” (literally: casting aspersions) water on the unclean (Numb. 19:18, 19, 21).

49 Apuleius tells of many such lustral sprinklings in his previously cited Metamorphoses (9.23; 11.1.14–16, 18–19). The Greek philosopher Theophrastus likens a superstitious man to a person

Pythagoras visited these Jewes, inquiring this Thing, [for] the Jewes did what was much akin; whereto the Apostle alludes, in Heb. 10.22. *Having our Hearts sprinkled from an Evil Conscience, and our Bodies washed with Pure Water.*⁵⁰

Indeed, the Usage among the Gentiles, was degenerated into that horrid Superstition, mentioned by Macrobius; *Constat, Dij superis sacra facturum corporis Ablutione purgari; cum verò Inferis litandum est, satis actum videtur, si adpersio sola contingat.*⁵¹ Aeneas therefore does refer to the Rites of the Dij Superi, when hee saies,

– Donec me Flumine Vivo

Abluero. –

But Dido refers to the Dij Inferi, saying,

Annam, cara mihi nutrix huc siste sororem,

*Dic corpus properet Fluviali spargere lymphâ.*⁵²

There were likewise Remarkable Differences, between the Aspersions of the Jewes and of the Gentiles. The Holy Water of the Jewes, was made with the Ashes of a Red-Heifer infused: The Gentiles made Theirs, with Quenching therein a Firebrand, which they took off the Altar. The Jewes, for a Sprinkler, had a Bunch of Hyssop; with the Gentiles, t'was, according to Virgil,

*Spargens Rore levi, et Ramo felicitis olivæ.*⁵³

These were the Ordinary Purifications among the Jewes. Lett us bestow a Touch or Two, upon the Extraordinary.⁵⁴ who would not begin his day until he had “washed his hands and sprinkled himself with water [at the Nine Springs]” (Characteres 16.2, lines 1–2).

50 Spencer (704–05) relies on Diogenes Laertius’s Life of Pythagoras (Vitae Philosophorum 8.33), in which the famous Greek philosopher reportedly speaks of how those who approach the gods must first attain purity through penitence, baths, and aspersions, and by abstaining from touching corpses, from having sexual intercourse of any kind, and from consuming meat of perished animals. The similarities of these rites of lustration and purity with those of Moses, it is commonly believed, suggest that Pythagoras learned of these practices from the Jews of Palestine or from the priests of Egypt into whose cult he had been initiated (Vitae 8.2–3).

51 Spencer (705); Macrobius (Saturnalia 3.1.6) distinguishes between the ablutions for celestial and infernal deities: “It’s agreed that someone intending to sacrifice to the heavenly gods washes his body clean, whereas to sacrifice acceptably to the gods of the underworld it is considered enough merely to sprinkle oneself.”

52 Virgil’s Aeneias, too, believes that he cannot well sacrifice to the celestial gods “until I have cleansed myself in a flowing stream” (Aeneid 2.719–20). However, Queen Dido of Carthage does not believe that the infernal gods are as demanding, when she summons her servant: “My dear nurse, bring my sister here to me: tell her to quickly sprinkle her body with river water” (Aeneid 4.634–35) – both quotations from Virgil appear in Macrobius (Saturnalia 3.1.6, 7) and are here offered by Mather via Spencer (705).

53 Spencer (706); Virgil has Corynaeus, Aeneas’ comrade-in-arms, “sprinkle light dew from a fruitful olive-bough” (Aeneid 6.230).

54 The following paragraphs are extracted from Spencer’s De Legibus (1685), lib. 3, Diss. III, cap. 5, fol. 706 ff.

The Purifications of the Priests, did consist in, first, an Ablution: [Exod. 29.4. and 30.19, 20.] especially, if they had contracted any late Impurity. [Lev. 22.2, 3. Deut. 23.10, 11. Lev. 22.4.] Secondly, an Aspersion, of the Lustral Water. [Num. 19.13, 20.] Thirdly, a Tinging, and Sprinkling with Blood of the Sacrifice. [Exod. 29.19, 20.] Fourthly, an Abstinence; particularly, from all Venery: [1. Sam. 21.4.] And from Wine: [Lev. 10.9. and Ezek. 44.21.] Of which latter, both Josephus and Philo speak notably;⁵⁵ and it is a Passage in Hecatæus, That the Jewish Priests, τὸ παράπαν οἶνον οὐ πίνειν ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ, did always abstain from Wine, when they were employ'd in the Temple.⁵⁶ And finally, From all Funeral Rites, and every thing that had Uncleanness in it.

Now the Gentiles had the like Ceremonies among Them also. Else Arrianus would not have said, That a Man was to come unto the ancient Ceremonies, μετὰ θυσίας, καὶ μετ' εὐχῶν, καὶ προηγνευκότα, with Sacrifice, and Prayers, and Chastity.⁵⁷ The Aspersion with the Blood of the Sacrifices, used among the Gentiles, is abundantly mentioned by Suidas, by Schaccus, by Wormius, by Pocock, and others.⁵⁸ The Abstinence from Women, required of them, that were to celebrate their Mysteries, is noted by Porphyrie, as well as others; who putts, α, πρὸ δὲ πάντων, an, especially, upon this Point, – Abstinence from ἐμυλίας γυναικείας, the Conversation of Women.⁵⁹ As for Wine, Lett Apuleius tell you, How being a Candidate of the Religion of Isis, hee was kept, Invinius, (an elegant Word for, one, without Wine.) Ten Dayes together.⁶⁰ Plutarch also will tell you, That the Egyptian Priests, οἶνον οὐκ εἰσφέρουσι τὸ παράπαν εἰς τὸ ἱερόν, carried no Wine into the | Temple, {πολλὰς δ' αἰνους ἀ}γνείας ἔχουσιν, Multus autem Invinias exercent castimonias.⁶¹

55 Both Josephus Flavius (Antiquities 3.12.2) and Philo Judæus (De ebrietate 32.126–29; Works 218) address the Mosaic proscription against priests imbibing wine.

56 Hecatæus Abderita (Fragmenta, Jacoby # F 3a, 265, F, fragm. 21, line 61) as extant in Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio evangelica 9.4.5, line 2). Mather translates the Greek passage.

57 Spencer (708) identifies Arrianus (Epistola 3.21) as the source of this citation, but the passage is actually extant in Dissertationes ab Arriano digestae (3.21.14, lines 3–4) by Epictetus Hieropolis (c. 55–c. 135 CE), a Greek stoic philosopher and teacher of the Roman historian Lucius Flavius Arrianus Xenophon (c. 86–c. 160 CE), best known for his highly popular biography of Alexander the Great, Anabasis Alexandri.

58 Suidas (Lexicon, alphab. letter theta entry 302, 303), voce θεός Ἄρης. Fortunatus Scacchus, Sacrorum Elaeochristaton Myrothecium Sacroprophanum (1625–27), in Thesaurus Antiquitatum Sacro-Prophanarum (1725), pars 2, cap. 77–78, fols. 701–15; Olaus Wormius, Danicorum Monumentorum Libri Sex (1643), lib. 1, cap. 3, p. 7; Edward Pococke, Notae In Quibus Aliquam-Multa Quae ad Historiam Orientalium (1648), appended to Specimen Historiae Arabum (1650), pp. 100–01.

59 Porphyrius of Tyre (De Abstinencia 4.7, line 31).

60 Apuleius (Metamorphoses 11.23), as previously cited, had to abstain from all pleasures, especially from those of wine, until his day of consecration to the goddess Isis.

61 Spencer (708); Plutarch (De Iside et Osiride 353a, lines 11, 12; 353b, lines 2–3). The Heliopolites who revere their god “bring no wine into the temple,” because they deem it unseemly to imbibe in vino veritas during the day, when their king watches them (353a, lines 11, 12, 13);

But it is to bee Remark'd, That the Gentiles, in their Purifications, outwent the Jewes, with many Difficult, and Troublesome, Circumstances. The Priests of Egypt were, as Porphyrie saies, Forty Dayes, or more, a Purifying: And, τρις τῆς ἡμέρας ἀπελούοντο ψυχρῶ, They washed Thrice a Day in Cold Water.⁶² The Priests of Israel, had their Matters dispatch'd at once. The Aspersion undergone in Tau-robolijs et Criobolijs, by some of the Priests, among the Pagans, intended for Isis, or Ceres, was abominable. Prudentius informs us, That they were lett down into a Pitt, covered with Planks, which were bored full of Holes: On these Planks, was kill'd a Bull, or a Ram, so that the shed Blood of the Creature, might run thro' those Holes, on every Part of the poor Knaves in the Pitt.⁶³ The Aaronic Priests, had only an Ear, a Thumb, a Toe, lightly touch'd with Blood. The Heathen Priests, did not seldome with Castration præserve Chastity, or, by Juice of Hemlock, not so much Flie from Lust, as Putt it unto Flight. The Jewish Priests, knew none of these Hardships!⁶⁴

Nor were the Common People among the Israelites, without their extraordinary Purifications, at the Approach of extraordinary Solemnities. [Consider, Joh. 11.55. on which Place, take Theophylact for an Expositor, They that had sinned, willingly or unwillingly, kept not the Passeover, except they were first purified, according to the Custome; by Washing, and Fasting, and Shaving, and Offering the Appointed Sacrifices, — ἐι μὴ πρότερον ἡγνίσθησαν κατὰ τὸ ἔθος, hee saies.]⁶⁵ R. Isaac therefore saies, Tenetur unusquisque ad se purificandum antè Festum. And in Mohed Katon, you have the Rites of it; Hi se tondent intrà Festum, — ijdem etiam lavant Vestes intrà Festum.⁶⁶ And if any special Pollution had happened however, others among the Egyptian priests who indulge but moderately "have many periods of holy living [i. e., abstinence]" devoted to their studies (353*b*, lines 2–3).

62 Porphyrius of Tyre (De Abstinencia 4.7, lines 32–33).

63 Prudentius (Peristephanon Liber 10.1008–50) describes this sanguine initiation ritual at some length. The "Taurobolia" or "Criobolia" involve the sacrifice of a bull or ram to Cybele, the Great Mother of the Gods, who was revered in Greece and Rome. See also R. Duthoy, The Taurobolium (1969).

64 Spencer (709). Exod. 29:20–21. In his Thesaurus Antiquitatum Sacro-Prophanarum (1725), lib. 2, cap. 77, col. 702, Fortunatus Scacchus draws attention to the resemblance between the Mosaic rites of consecrating a priest and those of the Israelites' neighbors.

65 Spencer (710–11) attributes this passage to Theophylact (probably Theophylact [c. 1055–c. 1107], archbishop of Ohrid [Macedonia] and biblical commentator); however, it appears to be based on a rendition by the Presbyter Hammonius, in Catena in Joannem (catena integra) (e codd. Paris. Coislin. 23 + Oxon. Bodl. Auct. T. I.4.), in Catena Graecorum patrum in Novum Testamentum (2:323, lines 15–17). Be that as it may, the Greek passage reads, "if they did not purify beforehand according to the custom."

unto them, Then, as Eulogius tells us, ἁμαρτάνοντες πρότερον μὲν ἡγνίζοντο.⁶⁷ when they fell into Sin, they first purified themselves; they then were washed with Water; and so they offered Sacrifices for their Sins. That the Gentiles did the like, all Ages Testify. Wee will now quote no Testimony, but one from Tertullian; *Penes veteres, quisquis se Homicidio infecerat, purgatrice Aquâ se expiabat.*⁶⁸

From the Purification of Men, if wee pass to the Purification of Things, wee shall find that Sacred Things among the Jewes were Purified, partly by Dedication, or, Consecration, partly by a proper Mundification. A Dedication, or Consecration, to Divine Uses, was performed, by the Sprinkling of Blood on them; [Heb. 9.22] and by the Pouring of Oyl on them; [Lev. 8.10, 11.] A Mundification from Impurities, was accomplished, by Washing; [Lev. 1.9.] and by Removing all that was Filthy. [1. Mac. 4.44, 45, 46.] Civil Things were Purified, by passing thro' either Fire, or Water, according to the Capacitie of the Things themselves, to bear the Lustration Imposed upon them. What Conformitie there was to some of these Rites, among the old Gentiles, it would bee either an Hard, or a Long, Work to Relate. But I am sure, wee find Unctions for Purification, in the Highest Antiquity. Clemens of Alexandria, mentions the Gentiles, as, πᾶν ξύλον καὶ πάντα λίθον λιπαρὸν προσκυνούτας, *Worshipping every Stock and Stone, that was Anointed.*⁶⁹ Thus Arnobius, mentions, Lubricatum lapidem, et ex olivi unguine ordinatum; Apuleius mentions, Lapidem unguine delibutum; Lucian speaks of, Ara oleo perfusa. —⁷⁰

Compare Gen. 28.18. — with the Words of Mercer thereupon, *Hic Ritus non à Jacobo primum institutus, sed jam olim, à patribus acceptus fuerat.*⁷¹

67 The shortened Greek passage from the Greek Patriarch St. Eulogius of Alexandria (d. 608), as quoted in Photius's Bibliotheca (Codex 280, Bekker page 540b, lines 23–24), signifies, “when they [the Hebrews] fell into sin.”

68 Tertullian (Liber de baptismo, cap. 5, col. 1205A) explains that the use of purifying waters among the heathens was customary, especially “among the ancients, whoever had defiled himself with murder, was wont to go in quest of purifying waters” (On Baptism, ch. 5, in ANF 3:671).

69 The Greek quote is adapted from Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 7.4.26.2, lines 1–2) and Stromata (7.4), in ANF (2:529).

70 Arnobius of Sicca (Disputationum Adversus Nationes 1.39) [PL 05. 0767] confesses that whenever he saw “an anointed stone and one bedaubed with olive oil,” he adored it (Against the Heathen 1.39), in ANF (6:423). So does Apuleius (Libro Floridorum 1.5), in L. Apulei Mad-aurensis floridorum (1865), p. 1, who speaks of “stones anointed with fat.” And Lucianus Samosatenus, in his Deorum concilium (12.7) speaks of, Βωμὸς χρησμοδεῖ, ὃς ἂν ἐλαίῳ περιχυθῇ or “the altar imbued with oil.”

71 Finally, In Genesisin Primum Mosis Librum (1598), p. 495C, Johannes Mercerus (Jean Mercier) comments, “This rite was not first instituted by Jacob, but was now accepted by the Fathers.” The two preceding paragraphs are extracted from Spencer's De Legibus (1685), lib. 3, diss. III, cap. 6, fol. 713.

Q. What we render, Water of Purifying, is there any need of using such a Trope, as we use, in so rendring of it? v. 7.

A. No; none at all. The True Translation is, Waters of Sin, or as we may say; Sin-Waters. Arias Montanus renders it, Aquas peccati. So the Tigurin Bible, and so Vatablus. Luther putts both into one Word, SUNDWASSER; Piscator and Aynsworth do the like.¹

Q. When tis said, Aaron shall offer the Levites before the Lord; the Hebrew Words are, Aaron shall wave the Levites before the Lord, for a Wave-Offering. And we know, that an Agitation to & fro, before the Altar, was a Solemn Consecration of a Thing to God, as a Sacrifice. But it was impossible for Aaron, to wave them, as he did some Parts of a Sacrifice? v. 11.

A. And therefore, it is probable, that He, lifting up his hands, & turning about unto all sides (as he did, when he offered a Wave-Offering.) They, at his Command imitated his Motion; & so were offered up unto God, & became wholly His.

This is Dr. Patricks Notion of it.²

Monsr. Saurin has this Thought upon it. The same Term that is employ'd to signify a certain External Act of Religion, is often made Use of also to denote the Internal Act, whereof the other is only a Type, & draws all its Efficacy from it. Thus, because that Sacrifices represent Prayers, and the former are of no Validity without the latter, for this very Cause, Prayers are called Sacrifices. In like Manner, the Act of Waving the things offered, imported their Consecration to GOD. For this Reason probably, the Consecrating of the Levites to the Lord, is express'd here, by a Word that imports Waving, in the primary Signification of it.³

1 "Aguas peccati" ("sin-waters") is the term used by Arias Montanus, in Poole, Synopsis Criticorum (1:642); in the Tigurin Bible, aka. Biblia Sacrosancta Testamenti Veteris & Novi (1543), on Numb. 8:7 (p. 64^v); and in Franciscus Vatablus, Biblia Sacra Bibliorum Sacrorum (1584), p. 88^r (Scholia in Cap. VIII). The marginal annotation on Numb. 8, in Martin Luther's German Biblia: Das ist: Die gantze Heilige Schrifft (1545), reads "Sündwasser" (Mather's rendition omits the Umlaut); Johannes Piscator, Commentariorum in Omnes Libros Veteris Testamenti Tomus Primus (1646), p. 327 (Scholia in cap. VIII). Ainsworth's Annotations (1627), on Numb. 8:7, p. 52 (sep. pag.)

Q. The Levites, how might they spend their Time, after they were by Age discharged from the laborious Part of their Service? v. 25.

A. They had then Time to apply themselves unto Learning & Study; by which Means, they became Expert (as Mr. Lewis remarks in his Origines Hebraeae;) in Medicine and Policy, and other Liberal Arts. Thus they became able to do Good among their Neighbours, & govern Schools for the Education of Youth, & qualified for high Posts in the Governments; and many of them were advanced unto the principal Offices in the Commonwealth.⁴

Q. What is there to be observed concerning the Ministry of the Levites, who were, as you know, to be a Sort of Guard unto the Tabernacle, but cease to do any laborious Work, after Fifty? v. 26.

A. When there was no further Occasion to carry the Ark and the Tabernacle, then David made of {them} Singers in the Temple, and Porters. For this they were counted fitt at Twenty Years of Age; but continued their Employment no longer, than till Fifty, (as the Jewes tell us,) when their Voice began to decay.⁵

Whence that Observation of Abarbinel, upon this Chapter; *Age makes Levites unfit for Service, not Blemishes in their Bodies: But Priests are unfit by Blemishes in their Bodies, not by Age.*⁶

The Priests, it seems, continued their Service, as long as they lived. And tho' they did not begin it, until Twenty Years of Age, yett no Law of God forbad them (as Dr. Patrick thinks,) to begin it sooner.⁷

The Levites were discharged at Fifty; because their Service was an hard Labour; and because the Voices of the Singers were then under some Decay.

Monsr. Jurieu observes, They had no peculiar Habits; their Garments were like those worn by the rest of the People. Josephus tells us, under the Reign of Agrippa, the Levites obtained from the King, & the Sanhedrim, a Priviledge of wearing Linen Tunicks, like the Priests, but they did not enjoy it long, the Destruction of the Temple being so near at hand.⁸

⁶ Don Isaac Abarbanel, quoting Rashi on Numb. 8:25, argues that a Levite who was to carry the holy vessels of the temple, had to be a “minimum of thirty years old and not older than fifty.” Once he had reached the age of fifty, he “was forbidden to carry the holy Tabernacle’s artifacts on his shoulder, but he continued to perform all the rest of the Levite tasks, such as singing, closing and opening the gates, and perform guard duties, and help loading and unloading the wagons, for as long as he was physically fit” Selected Commentaries Bamidbar/Numbers 4:95, 96). See also Talmud, tractate Chullin (24a).

Q. It is required, That the Passeover be kept, in its appointed Season, according to all the Rites of it, and according to all the Ceremonies thereof. What may be the Difference, between Rites and Ceremonies? v. 3.

A. If there be any Difference we may suppose, the Rites to be, the Unleavened Bread, and the Bitter Herbs, & some other things in the Twelfth of Exodus: But the Ceremonies, to be, their Eating it in Haste, with their Loins girt, their Shoes on their feet, & their Staves in their Hands; unto which they were not bound, when they came into the Land of Canaan, and were no longer Travellers; but no doubt, these were observed, while they were in the Wilderness.¹

Q. Where did they gett Flocks and Flour, to observe the Passeover, in the Wilderness? v. 5.

A. They might easily purchase from their Neighbours, who lived not far from them. But after they removed from Sinai, where they rested about a whole Year, they were so uncertain in their Motions, that they did not circumcise their Children; who consequently, could not eat of the Passeover. Indeed we never do read of a Passeover kept, after this, during the Forty Years Peregrination in the Wilderness. Nor had they now kept this, which we find in the Chapter now before us, without a special Command for it. But there are Christian Writers, who deliver it as the Opinion of the Hebrewes themselves, that they kept another Passeover, a little before they Ended their Wandrings in the Wilderness; namely, in the first Month of the Year, wherein Miriam died.²

Q. Did they also keep the whole Feast of Unleavened Bread for Seven Dayes following the Passeover, in the Wilderness?

A. Probably, No. It would have been hard for to have gott Bread enough.³

² Patrick (Numbers 138) synthesizes John Selden's discussion in De Synedriis & Praefecturis Juridicis (1653), lib. 2, cap. 2, sec. 1, pp. 57–62.

³ Interestingly, Mather here disagrees with Patrick on Numb. 9:5 (Numbers 138). With reference to Numb. 4:7 to back him up, Patrick believes that flour and bread were not hard to come by in the Sinai desert, because these supplies could be bought from neighboring peoples in this wilderness.

Q. About the Time of keeping the Passeover, there was Provision for a Man in a Journey afar off. What was counted, a Journey afar off? v. 10.

A. The Mischna reckons this Derek rechokah, to be, Fifteen Miles, from Jerusalem, or the Tabernacle;⁴ For, as Maimonides notes, a Man might under that, afoot reach to Jerusalem, time enough to keep the Passeover.⁵ But if so small Distance, might have been a good Reason, to have excused their Absence, most of the Nation might have made some Excuse to stay away. Philo determines the Distance much better, when he saies, The Second Passeover was permitted, unto such, who were hindred by their Travels into Countreyes a great Way off, [τοις μακρᾶς χάριν ἀποδημίας κωλυομένοις:] from Sacrificing with the rest of their Neighbours.⁶

I will only add; The Jewes, who are called, Karaites, as Mr. Selden observes, expressly tell us, That at the Second Passeover, they were obliged unto no more than Eating the Lamb, with Unleavened Bread & Bitter Herbs; & not unto the Feast of Unleavened Bread for Seven Dayes, because they might do that, in the Passeover of the First Month; the Unclean were not prohibited from that Action.⁷

If Persons were hindred from the Passeover in the Second Month also, they were hindred altogether; they could not keep it, the Third & Fourth, lest they confounded one Feast with another.⁸

Q. Wee read of that coelestial & wonderful Cloud, which abode upon the Tabernacle in the Wilderness; whether it were two Dayes, or a Month, or a Year, that the

⁵ Maimonides, Hilchot Korban Pessah (5.8), in Mishneh Torah (30:52).

⁶ Philo Judaeus (De vita Mosis 2.232, lines 1–2) glosses that “those who are travelling in a foreign land, or dwelling in some other country, do no wrong [by offering oblations in common with their Jewish neighbors], so as to deserve to be deprived of equal honour with the rest, especially since one country will not contain the entire nation by reason of its great numbers, but has sent out colonies in every direction” (Works 512). Patrick (Numbers 143).

⁸ Patrick on Numb. 9:11 (Numbers 144).

Cloud tarried upon the Tabernacle, remaining thereon, the Children of Israel abode in their Tents, & journeyed not; but when it was taken up, they journeyed? v. 22.

A. Saies Maimonides, These Words may seem superfluous unto those, who do not consider the Intention of Moses in this Relation: which was, to confute the Conceit of profane People, who imagined, the Reason of the Israelites continuing so long in the Wilderness, to be, because they lost their Way. The Arabians, he saies, in his Dayes, called this Wilderness, The Wandring Desert; fancying the Israelites, to have been so bewildred here, that they wandred like Men in the Dark, not knowing which Way to turn themselves. Therefore the Scripture punctually shoves, That all their Removals (which were Irregular,) and the Time they rested in any Place, (which was very unæqual, being sometimes for Eighteen Years, & sometimes only for one Day or Night,) were all ordered by a Special Direction of God.⁹

The Way from Horeb, to Kadesh-barnea, was [a] Plain, Known, Beaten Road, of about Eleven Dayes Journey; which it was not easy for them to miss. The Cause therefore of their going about, & staying Forty Years in the Wilderness, is here declared by Moses.¹⁰

Q. Here is an Order given, for the Making & Sounding of Trumpetts. What Footsteps of 'em in Antiquity? v. 2.¹

A. There were several Sorts of Trumpetts, of different form, among the Ancients. Eustathius upon Homer tells us, there were Six of them. The Second of these, was called στρογγύλη, Turned up round like a Rams Horn. This, he saies, the Egyptians used (it being found out by Osiris) when they called the People to their Sacrifices; Χρῶνται δι' αὐτῇ πρὸς θυσίαν καλοῦντες τοὺς ὄχλους δι' αὐτῆς. It was called in their Language, Χνουή.² Now in this, Moses opposed the Egyptians; [which, saies Dr. Patrick, they would do well to take notice of, who make their Customes, to be of the greatest Antiquity:] For those here ordered by Moses, were Long, such as we use at present. Josephus, who gives us a large Description of them, [Antiq. L.III.c.11.] tells us, They were a Cubit long, & narrow like a Pipe; but wider, as ours, at the bottom.³

Tho' only Two, were ordered now to be made, in Solomons time we find no less than an Hundred & Twenty Priests furnished with them. Josephus mentions a vast Number more. [Antiq. L.8.c.2.]⁴

Q. Who was Hobab? v. 29.

1 Mather's answer – including the quotations from Eustathius and Josephus – is extracted from Patrick (Numbers 151–52).

2 Eustathius Thessalonicensis (Commentarii ad Homeri Iliadem 4.165, lines 10–11); a nearly identical version appears in Scholia in Iliadem (Iliad 18.219b1, lines of scholion 6–7). At any rate, the shrill clarion call is sounded when a besieged city is about to fall, Eustathius explains. The Egyptians “sounded this trumpet [ram's horn] when they called the people to their sacrifices.” They called it Χνουή [Knoue], or “summons.”

3 Patrick (Numbers 152). Josephus Flavius, in his Antiquities (3.12.6), narrates that Moses devised two trumpets made of silver. They were a “little less than a cubit” [long], their mouthpiece consisting of “a narrow tube, somewhat thicker than a flute,” and “ended in the form of a bell, like common trumpets.” In Hebrew, their sound was called “Asotra” and summoned the chief elders when one of the trumpets sounded or the multitude of people when two were sounded. They were also sounded when Moses instructed the Levites to transport the disassembled tabernacle, and when sacrifices were offered on the altar. Rashi offers much the same (JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot 4:65).

4 Josephus gives the number of trumpets, which Solomon had made for the Temple, as “two hundred thousand trumpets, according to the command of Moses” (Antiquities 8.3.8), a Plinyism? See also Mather's “Appendix: XI Psalmes, or, The Ancient Music and Poetry of the Hebrews” (appended to his commentary on Revelation).

A. Theodoret understands him, to be Moses's Brother in Law; His Wifes Brother. He is called, The Son of Raguel. Many take Raguel and Jethro to be the same. Or, if Raguel were Jethro's Father, as others think, then Hobab was the Grandson of Raguel.⁵

What we read, Father-in-Law, in this Verse, may be translated, Brother-in-Law; & so it may refer to Hobab. The Hebrew Word, signifies often, a very near Kinsman. It cannot without great Straining be otherwise expounded, in Judg. 1.16. and, 4.11.

After Jethro was gone back to his own Countrey, his Son Hobab staid still with his Sister Zipporah; & accompanied Moses all the Time he staid near Sinai; which was not far from Midian. He thought he would return thither; now the Israelites were marching away from that Neighbourhood. But –⁶

Q. The True Reading of the Words used, at the Moving, & the Resting, of the Ark? v. 36.

A. In that Clause, Lett them that hate thee, flee before thee, the Hebrew Expression should be retained in the English; Before thy Face. The Face of the Lord, is an Expression of so much Consideration in the Scriptures, that it ought not to be covered. The Tigurin Bible, and Vatablus, and Pagnin, and Munster, and Tremellius, and Piscator, keep it in the Text before us.⁷

And then, that Clause, which we render, The many Thousands of Israel, is in the Original, The Myriads, the Ten Thousands Thousands; which Expression

5 In his "Questions on Judges, IV," Theodoret of Cyrus raises the same issue: "Why is the lawgiver's father-in-law called Hobab in this passage [Judg. 1:16], but Jethro [Exod. 3:1; 4:18] and Reuel in the earlier narratives [Numb. 10:29]?" Theodoret glosses, "I have already remarked that Hobab was Reuel's son. Nonetheless, he is called πενθερόν (penthéron), an 'in-law,' since he was the brother of Moses' wife. Even today, many people call these relatives πενθερίδες (penthērides), or 'brothers-in-law.' So Hobab's children were Jethro's grandchildren" (Questions on the Octateuch 2:313). The classic Jewish commentators don't seem to see eye-to-eye on the identity of Hobab either. For instance, Rashi explains that Hobab is no other than Jethro, who had "several names: Jethro, because he left behind (jathar) a passage in the Torah, and Hobab, because he clearly loved (chibeb) the Torah." Nachmanides argues that "Hobab was the name that Jethro took after he converted to Judaism (as is the custom of converts): 'But His servants shall be given a different name' (Isa. 65:15)" (JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot 4:69).

6 Patrick (Numbers 162–63).

our Interpreters do seem to have been afraid of; lest so many People should not be found in Israel. But no need, Syrs, of being so shy. The Words contain a glorious Prophesie in them; which is in the Latter Dayes to have its Accomplishment. The Prayer of Moses, will then be answered, in both the Senses of it. First, God will Return the ten thousands of thousands, of His Israel, unto Himself, & unto one another, & unto their ancient Possessions. And, secondly, [As the Word, unto, is here a Supplement;] God will Return unto the Ten Thousands of Thousands, of His Israel, & Exhibit Himself gloriously among them. The Full Number herein præserted by Pagnin, and the Spanish Bible, & our Aynsworth.⁸

Q. The Carrying about of the Ark, in the Wilderness, was there any thing like it, in Pagan Antiquitie? v. 36.

A. Yes. The Pagans carried about their Gods, in little Tabernacles, or, portable Temples. As you know, there was, The Tabernacle of Moloch. [Amos. 5.25. Act. 7.43.]

Hear the Words of Gaspar Sanctius; “The Tabernacle of Moloch (saith hee) was a certain Bier, on which Moloch was carried about, in a Solemn Pomp; whom they carried with them, whithersoever they went, in a Religious Manner, and for Protection-sake; even, as the Jewes of old, carried the Ark, and in it, the Divine Oracle, thro’ the Wilderness.”⁹

And, Hear the Words of Doctor Godwyn. “The bearing, or taking up, of this Tabernacle, (saith hee) may seem to have its Original among the Heathen, from an unwarrantable Imitation of Moses’s Tabernacle; which was nothing else, but a Portable Temple, to bee carried from Place to Place, as Need Required. For it cannot bee Denied, that many Superstitions were derived unto the Heathen, from the true Worship of God, which Hee Himself had præscribed unto His People.”¹⁰

The learned Pen, of Spencer, would needs perswade us, That the Tabernacle of Moloch, was the first Original of the Tabernacle of God;¹¹ and that it is a Vulgar Error, to think, That the Divil Apes the Almighty. But it is a wonderful Thing, that so Accomplished a Person, should pervert his Accomplishments, to maintain such monstrous Assertions. Hee will never bring so Præposterous a Scheme to bee embraced in the Church of God!¹²

⁹ Mather provides a paraphrastic translation of the gloss on Acts 7:43, by the Spanish Jesuit Gaspar Sanctius, aka. Sánchez (1553–1628), in Commentarii in Actus Apostolorum (1616), cap. 7, p. 171, § 94.

Tis true, Gods Tabernacle was portable; and so was Molochs. Gods Tabernacle had in it, his Ark & the Images of Cherubims; and Molochs had his Image in it. God, exhibited, by Audible answers, & otherwise, his peculiar Presence in His Tabernacle; and Moloch did the like in his. God appeared as a King, in the Circumstances of His Tabernacle; and Moloch in his, claimed a Name that signifies as much.

But it is far from True, That the Tabernacle of God, fetched its Pattern, from that of Moloch; or, that the Cursed Fiend is Imitated by the God of Heaven.

The Figure, which wee call, The Cart before the Horse, runs thro' the Writings of some learned Authors.

But, wee now add, that from the Ark in the Tabernacle, the Gentile Worshipers borrowed, the Little Chests, wherein they carried about their Gods.

And there is a strange Passage in Acosta, about the Indians, who came from far, to settle about Mexico.

“That the Divil, in their Idol, Vitzlipultzli, governed that mighty Nation, & commanded them to leave their Countrey, promising to make them Lords of all the Provinces, possessed by Six other Nations of Indians, and give them a Land, abounding with all precious Things. They went forth, carrying their Idol with them, in a Coffe of Reeds, supported by four of their papal Priests; with whom hee still discoursed, in secret; Revealing to them, the Successes, and Accidents, of their Way. Hee advised them, when to march, and where to stay, and without his Commandment, they moved not. The first Thing they did, wherever they came, was to erect a Tabernacle, for their False God; which they sett alwayes, in the Midst of their Camp, and there placed the Ark upon an Altar. When they, tired with Pains, talked of, Proceeding no further, in their Journey, than a certain pleasant Stage, whereto they were arrived, the Divil, in one Night, horribly kill'd them, that had started this Talk, pulling out their Hearts. And so they passed on, till they came to Mexico.¹³

13 This paragraph was added to the preceding commentary at a later time. See also Mather's Wonders of the Invisible World (1693), pp. 139-40. Perhaps inspired by Spencer's allocation of comparative evidence, Mather adds to his own collection an adapted passage from the Spanish Jesuit José Acosta (1539-1600), whose story of the Mexican serpent-headed god Vitziliputzli (Huitzilopochtli) is detailed in the English translation Naturall and Morall Historie of the East and West Indies (1604), bk. 7, ch. 4, pp. 504-5. "The chieftest idoll of Mexico," Acosta explains, this "Vitziliputzli ... was an image of wood like to a man, set upon a stoole of the colour of azure, in a brankard or litter, at every corner was a piece of wood in forme of a Serpents head. The stoole signified that he was set in heaven" (bk. 5, ch. 9, p. 352). Both Increase and Cotton Mather mined Acosta's history for diverse purposes.

Q. What might bee the Fire of the Lord, & what might mean the uttermost Parts of the Camp, where it consumed the People? v. 1.

A. The Lightning is eminently a Fire of the Lord. But some take the Phrase to mean only, A very great Fire.

Quere, might it not rather be a Fire darted from the Pillar of Cloud & Fire over the Tabernacle?

In the uttermost Parts of the Camp, were the Mixt Multitude, who came out of Egypt, & probably now stir'd up the Israelites, to complain of their tedious Journey, which had not yett brought them near to the Land of Canaan. And it may be, some of them lagg'd behind, on Purpose, that they might complain of Weariness, or of Want of stronger Food.

But Bochart has demonstrated, That this Word, which we translate, The uttermost Parts, rather signifies, In all, or, Throughout. [Of which he gives Instances, from Lud. de Dieu, upon Ezek. 33.1. See, Gen. 19.4. & 47.2.] wherefore it should here be rendred, Consumed some in every Part of the Camp.¹

Q. What we render, The People complained, in the Original is, The People were like the Murmurers. v. 4.

A. The Meaning of it, is to be fetch'd from the Fourth Verse ensuing. The People were like the Mixt Multitude, who were the Murmurers there appearing on this Occasion. This is Dr. Gells Illustration upon it. The People, that Mixt Multitude which came up out of Egypt, they began the Murmuring and were punished for it. And the Israelites became like them; did so too.²

Q. The Israelites make a fearful Stir with the Remembrance of, the Onions and Garlick, which they enjoy'd in Egypt? v. 5.³

A. Herodotus tells us, that the First King who built a Pyramid in Egypt, was Cheops: and that the biggest Pyramid was Twenty Years in Building, by no fewer than an Hundred Thousand Workmen; and that for the Diet of the Workmen, the Price of only the Onions and Garlick, amounted unto Sixteen Hundred

Talents of Silver. You see what Occasion, the poor Slaves had, to Remember their Onions and Garlick.⁴

Q. But must the Word necessarily be translated, Onions?

A. The Hebrew Word, Chatzir, properly signifies, Grass: which not being any Part of Humane Food, the LXX render the Word, Onions.⁵ But the learned Ludolphus thinks, they had no other ground so to render it; & therefore, out of the Arabian Language, he rather interprets it Lettice, or, Sallets, in general; which in Egypt were very excellent.⁶

Q. A Remark on the Distress of Moses? v. 10.

A. I'll transcribe the Words of Monsr. Saurin upon it. "It is a Matter worthy of Consideration, that this same Moses, to whom nothing appeared difficult, after he had accepted the Commission of Law-giver to the People of GOD, lost all Courage assoon as ever these unhappy Creatures fell into any great Crime. The Sins of a Nation, are more terrible, than the most Invincible Armies."⁷

Q. What may be the Import of that Expression, unto me, when it is said, Gather unto me? v. 16.

A. The Talmuds interpret it as an order for a Standing Council, to endure throughout all Generations. Wherever they meet with this Word, לִי unto me, they think, it signifies, a thing to be established by God, unto all Generations. — They bring many Instances.⁸

⁴ Herodotus (2.124, 125).

⁵ The Hebrew noun חֲצִיר [chatsiyr] variously signifies "grass, leek, green grass, herbage" (Strong's # 2682), which the LXX renders πράσον ("leeks") or κρόμμυον ("onions"), in Brian Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (1657) 1:586.

⁶ Patrick on Numb. 11:5 (Numbers 175); the German polymath Hiob Ludolphus, aka. Iobi Ludolf, Hiob Leutholf (1624–1704), in his Appendix Secunda ad Historiam Aethiopicam Iobi Ludolfi continens Dissertationem de Locustis (1694), pars 2, cap. 14, p. 27 (note h), insists that the LXX, which interprets the Hebrew term as πράσον ("porros"), i. e., "leeks," should rather be rendered (according to the Arabism) as "lactucas vel olera," i. e., "lettuce or [generically as] vegetables." Ibn Ezra agrees, arguing that although the Hebrew term חֲצִיר (Psal. 147:8) signifies "grass" (Numb. 11:5), it should be rendered generically as "greenery" (JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot 4:74).

⁸ Patrick's muse (Numbers 181–82) is John Selden's De Synedriis & Praefecturis Juridicis Veterum Ebraeorum (1653), lib. 2, cap. 4, sec. 2, p. 110, which identifies many parallel passages — Exod. 20:24, 25:18, 28:41, 30:31; Lev. 25:55; Num. 3:12, 13, 11:24, 28:2; 1 Sam. 16:1 — in which the Hebrew particle לִי "unto me" is to be understood in an eternal sense. See Babylonian Talmud, tractates Yoma (28b) and Sanhedrin (3b), (17a), (110b).

Q. How comes there to bee a New Sanhedrim, (if we may call it so?) constituted for Israel, after that in the twenty-fourth of Exodus? v. 16.

A. The State of the Israelites had hitherto been governed, especially in Religious Matters, by a Council of LXX Elders; to whom, that they should the more willingly comply with Moses, God vouchsafed a Manifestation of His Glory. Exod. 24.9, 10, 11. But they growing Proud, False, or Lazy, lett the People fall several Times into Murmuring & Rebellion; which to avoid for the future, God commanded Moses to choose LXX other Elders, among the Schoterim, or Inferiour Ministers, who had faithfully Acquitted themselves, in their former Employment of Instructing the People; that so, by the Rise of these Deserving Persons, the Public Affayrs might bee the better managed, & the Negligence and Corruption of their Predecessors punished.

This is a Jewish Account of it.⁹

Q. About the same Time, that a Sanhedrim was thus erected among the Israelites, was there any thing like it erected among the Gentiles?

A. 'Tis a little observable! About the same time, that this Number of Seventy Judges, was here constituted in the Wilderness, the Great Judicature in Areopagus was constituted among the Græcians; to wit, in the Reign of Cecrops, the First King of Athens, after the Ogygian Flood; when, according to Eusebius, the People of Israel were brought out of Egypt.¹⁰ The Marmora Arundeliana indeed say, This Court was erected, in the Time of Cranaus; but that makes little Difference: for he was the Successor of Cecrops.¹¹ We do not find, of what Number

it consisted; but we find for certain, That it was the Highest, πάντων τῶν ἐν τοῖς ἑλλήσι Συνεδρίων, Of all the Courts among the Græcians.¹² And it is no less Remarkable, That as that Court began about the same Time with the Constitution of this among the Israelites, thus (as Mr. Selden shoves) then both ended in the Reign of the Emperour Vespasian.¹³

Q. What is the Meaning of that Expression, Of their Eating Flesh until it come out at their Nostrils? v. 20.

A. 'Tis a Phrase for, A Vomit. They should Vomit it up so violently, that it would come out, not only at their Mouth, but at their Nostrils.¹⁴

Q. It is said of the New Judges here, They prophesied, and they ceased not. What may be the Meaning of their Not Ceasing? v. 25.¹⁵

A. Their *Prophecy*ing, was, Their Setting forth the Praises of God, in such a Strain, as none could imitate; or giving such admirable Instructions to the People, as manifested their being Raised above themselves. A Power from God, carrying Persons beyond their Natural Capacity, & all this, while they were waking, & in the full Vigour of their Senses;¹⁶ This may seem to be the Gift of Prophecie, now falling from Heaven on these Elders, as a Testimony that God had Accepted ad Graecorum Epochas," pp. 92–93, John Selden dates the period of the reigns of Cecrops and of his successor Cranaus to c. 1582–1529 (BCE). See also Selden's De Synedriis (1653), lib. 2, cap. 16, sec. 10, pp. 691–93.

¹³ According to John Selden (De Synedriis, lib. 2, cap. 16, sec. 10, pp. 691–93), the Great Sanhedrim and the Athenian Areopagus both ended during the reign of Roman Emperor Titus Flavius Vespasianus (69–79 CE). Among Selden's principal sources on the Greek legislative body are Areopagus, sive De senatu areopagitico (1624, 1669) and his earlier Cecropia: Sive, De Athenarum arce, & ejusdem antiquitatibus (1622), by the Dutch classical scholar Joannes Meursius, aka. Jan van Meurs (1579–1639).

¹⁵ The two following paragraphs are extracted from Patrick (Numbers 191).

them. This Power was peculiarly called The Holy Spirit. And as in the New Testament, the Prophets are placed next unto the Apostles; thus here, these Persons were next unto Moses.¹⁷

In that Passage, They ceased not, our Translation follows the Chaldee Paraphrasts.¹⁸ But the LXX translate it, And they added no further; (which the Hebrew Words will well bear;) meaning, That they Prophesied that Day, but not afterwards. This is the Sense of the Talmudists; particularly of Jarchi, who saies, All these Elders prophesied only this first Time, that the Spirit rested on them as they stood about the Tabernacle; but they did not prophesie after that.¹⁹ Indeed the Spirit was not sent upon them, to make 'em Prophets, but Judges; & therefore this Gift was only to procure them Reverence among the People. Theodoret therefore saies, The LXX did not prophesie beyond this Day, because God promoted them not to Prophesie, but to Govern.²⁰

Q. How came Eldad & Medad thus to continue in the Camp? {v. 26.}

Truth to tell, “it was Gods ordinary method to call those persons out of these Schools, whom he did employ in the discharge of the propheticall office” (pp. 152, 156, 157).

¹⁷ Acts 2:3, 1 Cor. 12:26.

²⁰ Mather cuts the Gordian knot by embracing the solution of Theodoretus Cyrrhensis (Quaestiones in Octateuchum, Numeri, Qu. XX, p. 209, lines 1–8), who addresses this conundrum as follows: “Why did the seventy prophesy immediately after being appointed but never again? Because he appointed them not for prophecy but for administration, which is another of the Spirit’s charisms. Thus, along with apostleship, prophecy, teaching, and gifts of healing, St. Paul included assistance and leadership. This is the charism that was accorded to the seventy. It was only so that the people would realize that they had received the divine gift that they immediately spoke in prophecy” (Questions on the Octateuch 2:121, 123).

A. Out of Modesty; saying, They were not æqual to such a Dignity, as the Words are in the Gemara Babylonica. Or, perhaps, they loved a private Life, as being afraid of being envied by the People; whom they saw to be unruly, that it made them decline the Burden, like Saul hid among the Stuff.²¹

We don't find the Names of any of the LXX, but only these two; who, as Jonathan saies, were Moses's brothers, by the Mothers Side. Jerom ha's this Tradition: but there is no Certainty in it.²²

It may be, they are mention'd in honour of their vertuous Modesty which made them think themselves unworthy of such Dignity.²³

Q. Some Remarkables relating to the Quails, bestowed upon the Israelites, (a little Breakfast, if you please upon those Quails,) may be acceptable? v. 31.²⁶

²¹ Soncino Talmud Babylonica, tractate Sanhedrin (17a).

²³ Patrick's source for Numb. 11:26 (Numbers 192–93) is Selden's De Synedriis (lib. 2, cap. 4, sec. 3, pp. 118–22).

²⁵ Mather here follows Ibn Ezra's rendition, which also informs the translation of the Jewish Publication Society, in JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot (4:82).

A. It seems clear, that Quails were twice afforded unto the murmuring Israelites. They had Quails on the fifteenth Day of the Second Month, in the Desert of Sin, a little after their coming out of Egypt, & before their coming to Sinai. (Exod. 16.13.) And they had Quails again, at Kibroth-Hattaavah, which was after their coming out of the Desert of Sin, (Num. 33.16.) even Three Days after it.²⁷ (Numb. 10.33.) Now This was at least 1 Year after the former (Num. 10.11.) The former Time, they had Quails for no more than one Day; the latter Time, they had Quails, for no less than a Month together; Josephus, therefore ha's the Matter Twice over in his Antiquities. And thus we have determined one Point, whereabout Interpreters have been puzzled.²⁸

It hath been quæstion'd, whether Quails may be a wholesome Foule to feed upon; inasmuch as they Feed upon Hellebore, and other venomous Plants; as is observed by Galen, and Lucretius, and many others of the Ancients.²⁹ But nothing hinders us from concurring with Aloysius Mundella; Coturnicis Nutrimendum, Laudandum potius quàm Damnandum censeo.³⁰ And because they are particularly good for the Falling-Sickness, and helped Hercules when he was troubled with that Sickness, the Pagans had a Fable, (which you may read in Athenæus;) That Hercules, being slain by Typhon, was restored unto Life, by the Scent of a Quail applied unto him.³¹

But, whence came the Quails unto the Israelites? We read, There went forth a Wind from the Lord, and brought Quails from the Sea.³² Many of the Ancients, because it was not easy to say, whence these, Aves Migratoriæ, came, imagined

Steven Dilday – in Works (7:192–98). See also the contemporaneous discussion of why God chose “quails” rather than any other species for this purpose, in “Occasional Annotation, III,” in Bibliotheca Biblica (1728), 4:129–31.

27 Kibroth-Hattaavah, or “the graves of lust” (KJV, 1611 ed.)

28 Bochart (col. 97); Josephus Flavius (Antiquities 3.1.5; 3.13.1)

29 Galen (De theriaca ad Pisonem 14:277, lines 14–15) knowingly relates that “hellebore is the food of quails”; Lucretius (De Rerum Natura 4.640–41) agrees, stating, “hellebore is rank poison to us, but given to goats and quails makes them fat”; and so does Sextus Empiricus (c. 160–210 CE), the Greek philosopher-physician of Alexandria who gave Pyrrhonism a bad name. Mather refers to Pyrrhoniae hypotyposes (1.57, lines 1–2), which states that poisonous hemlock makes quails fat!

30 Bochart (col. 99); Aloysius Mundella (d. c. 1553), Swiss professor of philosophy and Galenic medicine in Basel, wins the day with his verdict, “the raising of quail, I think, is to be praised rather than condemned.” The Latin citation appears in Mundella’s oft reprinted Epistolae medicinales (1543), epist. 6, p. 66.

31 Bochart (Hieroicoicon, cols. 97, 99); Athenaeus Naucratis (Deipnosophistae 9.47, lines 30–36) tells the old story preserved in a fragment of The Description of the Circuit of the Earth (Fragmenta, fragm. 284a–b), by the Greek astronomer Eudoxus Cnidius (c. 408–c. 347 BCE). The Phoenicians – so the legend goes – offered meat of a quail to mighty Hercules (son of Asteria and Jupiter) because, when hideous Typhon (progenitor of all Greek monsters) slew Hercules, the Theban Iolaus (Hercules’s nephew) revived him by holding a quail to his nose.

32 Numb. 11:31.

them really to come out of the Sea.³³ But they came no otherwise out of the Sea, than Pliny saies of the Doves, That they did, In Agrum Volaterratum Palumbium vim è Mari quotannis advolare.³⁴ The Quails then that visited the Israelitish Camp, were such as flew thither out of Egypt, over the Red-Sea. This is intimated by Josephus;³⁵ and it is a notable Passage in Diodorus, concerning the Region thereabouts, (L. 1. p. 38.) That near the Shore, they spread Nets for many Furlongs, wherein they catch Quails, (φερονται γαρ ουτοι κατ' ἀγέλας μείζονας εκ του πελάγους, the very same Phrase that is used by Moses here;) which fly thither in great Flocks, out of the Sea.³⁶

Well; but how shall we Reconcile this, with what the Psalmist saies? Psal. 78:26. He caused an East-Wind to blow in the Heavens, & by His Power He brought in the South-Wind; He Rained Flesh upon them. What need of an East-Wind, for to bring the Quails over the Egyptian Sea unto the Arabian Coast? A West-Wind would have been more agreeable; Jerom therefore translates the Words of the Psalmist so, He Took away the East-Wind out of the Heavens, & by His Power He brought in the South-West-Wind. And the Greek Version, and the Vulgar Latin, countenance this Translation. The Hebrew עֹרֵם/ is according unto them, to be rendred, ἀπήρεν abstulit.³⁷ But Bochart makes Objections against the Proposal; and goes another way to work. The Israelites were now in the Desart of Paran, gone three Dayes Journey beyond Sinai. The Bay of Arabia was now therefore to the Southward of them; and it might well be esteemed by the Psalmist, a South-Wind, that brought the Quails from thence unto them.³⁸ Now both Aben-Ezra and Kimchi inform us, That this Wind was called קַדִּים/ Kadim, as 33 From the point of view of those standing on the shore, the “Aves Migratoriae” (migratory birds) crossing the Mediterranean into Africa (and vice versa) appear to come out of the sea. Ibn Ezra glosses that the quails possibly came “from the direction of the sea” (Commentary: Exodus 16:13).

34 Pliny (Naturalis historia 10.41.78) relates that “a quantity of pigeons every year fly from the sea to the district of Volterra” (Tuscany, Italy).

35 According to Josephus Flavius (Antiquities 3.1.5), “a vast number of quails, which is a bird more plentiful in the Arabian gulf than anywhere else, flying over the sea, and hovered over them [Israelites], till wearied with their laborious flight, and, indeed, as usual, flying very near to the earth, they fell down upon the Hebrews, who caught them and satisfied their hunger with them, and supposed that this was the method whereby God meant to supply them with food.”

36 Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca historica 1.60.10, lines 5–6): φέρονται γὰρ οὗτοι κατ’ ἀγέλας μείζονας ἐκ τοῦ πελάγους. (“these [quails] are driven in large coveys from the open sea”). It is unclear which of the several 16th or 17th editions of Diodorus Siculus’s Bibliotheca historica Mather (via Bochart, col. 100) draws upon.

37 Bochart (col. 101); St. Jerome (Divina Bibliotheca 28. Liber Psalmorum Iuxta Septuaginta Emendatus Ps. 78:26) [PL 029, 0261, 0262]. Poole’s rendition (as translated by S. Dilday) is useful here: “Thus Jerome and the Greeks [LXX] and the Vulgate, who render עֹרֵם ἀπήρεν, to lead away, transtulit, to transfer, or abstulit, to carry away; in which sense הִסִּיעַ occurs here and there.” Ps. 78:26: “He caused to blow (עֹרֵם) an east wind in the heaven (בְּשָׁמַיִם): and by his power he brought in (הִסִּיעַ) the south wind. ... עֹרֵם signifies to pull up, or to set out; in the Hilphil conjugation, to cause to set out” (Works 7:193, note 5).

38 Bochart (col. 102, lines 16–26).

well as /תִּימָן/ Theman; East as well as South.³⁹ But why so? Not because it was, as they say, The Euro-notus, or South-east Wind; but for another Cause. Tho' there be Four Cardinal Winds, which are subdivided into many more; yett in the Books of the Ancient Philosophers and Physicians, you will find them all divided only into, τὰ βόρεια, and τὰ νότια, The Northern and the Southern.⁴⁰ Thus Aristotle very particularly, in his Meteorology. To the Northernly, as the Colder Sort of Winds, they reckoned the Westernly; To the Southernly, as the Hotter Sort of Winds, they reckoned the Easternly.⁴¹ Aristotle in his Politicks using this as a Similitude, for his Distribution of Governments, ha's this Passage; τὸν μὲν ζέφυρον τοῦ βορέου τοῦ δε νότου τὸν εὐρον· Zephyrum esse Borææ, Austri verò Eurum.⁴² Hence the Verse in Lucillius (as Restored by Salmasius),

*Rex Cotys ille duos Ventos, Austrum atque Aquilonem, Novisse ajebat solos se Demagis.*⁴³

In the Words of the Psalmist then, the East-Wind, and the South-Wind are synonymous; and, Kadim signifies no more than the following Theman.⁴⁴ And it is to be observed, That the Scripture assigns to the Kadim usually those Destroying Effects, that are more peculiar to the Theman. Jonathan and Onkelos particularly understand this Wind, by the Fire, in Deut. 32.22. Yea, Kadim is commonly rendred, Νότος, by the Greek Interpreters.⁴⁵

39 See JPS Migra'ot Gedolot (4:83) and Poole (Works 7:194).

40 Again, Poole's Synopsis Criticorum (1:654) as translated by S. Dilday (Works 7:194) is right on target: "The ancient Physicians and Philosophers, although they reckon four principle winds, yet they name only τὰ βόρεια, the Northern winds, and τὰ νότια the Southern winds." Mather's and Bochart's muse (col. 102, lines 30 ff) for Aristotle and Theophrastus is Claudius Salmasius's Plinianæ exercitationes in Caji Julii Solini Polyhistora (1629), 2:1250 (B–E), mis-numbered as 1240.

41 Aristotle (Meteorologia 2.6.364a, lines 18–24) explains that "more generally these winds [Aparctias, Thracias, Meses, Caecias, Phoenicias, Argestes] are classified as northerly or southerly. The west winds are counted as northerly, for they blow from the place of sunset and are therefore colder; the east winds as southerly, for they are warmer because they blow from the place of sunrise. So the distinction of cold and hot or warm is the basis for the division of the winds into northerly and southerly" (Meteorology 1:590).

42 Aristotle (Politica 4.3.1290a, line 19): τὸν μὲν ζέφυρον τοῦ βορέου, τοῦ δε νότου τὸν εὐρον, or "just as among the winds we make the west a variation of the north, and the east of the south wind." More briefly, "Zephyrum esse Borææ, Austri verò Eurum," the west is the north, and the east is the south wind.

43 Salmasius's Plinianæ exercitationes in Caji Julii Solini Polyhistora (1629), 2:1250 (D), (mis-numbered as p. 1240), supplies Bochart (col. 102) with the second-hand quote from a fragment of Satirarum (16.3), by early Roman satirist Gaius Lucilius (c. 180–102 BCE), in A Persius Flaccus cum Interpretatione Latina Lectionum Varietate Adnotationibusque Novis (1830) 3:380. At any rate, Lucilius quotes a saying of Cotys (probably the ally of Perseus [2nd c. BCE]) that "King Cotys knew these two winds, the south wind and the north wind, very much more than others" (Satires 16.544–46).

44 That is, "East wind" as well as "South wind."

45 Bochart (col. 103); Targum Onkelos and Targum Jonathan ben Uzziel (on Deut. 32:22), in Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (1:855, 5:382). Both "Kadim" and "Nóτος" suggest "south wind" (LSJ).

Indeed the Writers of Natural History, as Pliny, and Solinus, as well as Aristotle assert, That Quails will not fly, while the Southerly Wind is blowing. But all that can truly be gathered from their Assertion, is, That in such a Wind, the Quails fly with more Difficulty and are more easily taken.⁴⁶

[19v] | And this falls in very sensibly with the Case now before us, wherein the Wind not only brought in, but also struck down the Quails, and make them very Takeable by the Israelites.

In so vast a Number they were now taken, that the Psalmist saies, they were as the Sand of the Sea.⁴⁷ Moses tells us, They were not only scattered, thro' the whole Camp of Israel, but also a Dayes Journey, (which wee may take to be Twenty Miles at least,) on both Sides of the Camp. It is added, They were, as it were two Cubits High, upon the face of the Earth.⁴⁸ What! Shall we imagine, That the whole Earth was covered every where Two Cubits Thick? Both Jerom, and Jonathan, carry that Passage, as only meaning, That the Quails did Fly Two Cubits High above the Earth;⁴⁹ And R. Selomo, notes, Volabant ad Humanis pectoris Altitudinem, ne quisquam in earum collectione se attollendo aut deprimendo fatigaret.⁵⁰ Philo therefore takes notice of such a Flight ordered for the Quails, ες ευθηρον, That the Israelites might have the more easy Fouling of it. Nor is this Disagreeable to the Condition of the Quail, which, as Pliny remarks, Cum ad Nos venit, Terrestris potius quàm sublimes est.⁵¹ But Bochart seems to præfer another Sense of it; Namely, That there were scattered and Numberless Heaps of Quails, (they lay in Dispersed Heaps every where not far asunder) Two Cubits High. The Angels of God, by the force of the Winds, caused them to light in Heaps, as being, (because Tired) unable to fly any further.⁵²

It is said, Hee that gathered least, gathered Ten Homers. But the Lord promising the Quails to the People, for no more than a Month, each particular Person had no Need of Scrambling for Ten Homers to be his particular Portion; a Third Part of One Homer might have served for one Man. For the Quantity of Manna

50 R. Selomo is no other than R. Salomon (Shlomo) Jarchi (Rashi), whose rational approach speaks volumes: "They [quails] flew to a height which corresponded with a person's heart [or breast], so that it would not be tedious to gather them, neither to rise nor to bend" (Metsudah Chumash/Rashi 4:155). See also R. Salomonis Jarchi, Commentarius Hebraicus in Pentateuchum Mosis 1110), pp. 1111–12.

51 Philo Judaeus (De Vita Mosis 1.209, line 6) renders it, "to be easily caught" (On the Life of Moses 1.37.209), in Works (478); Pliny (Naturalis historia 10.33.65) explains that, although the quail is small, "when it has come to us remains on the ground more than it soars aloft."

52 Bochart (Hieroicoicon, col. 105, lines 58–65).

that served for one Man per Day, among the Israelites, was no more than the Tenth Part of an Ephah; and an Ephah was but the Tenth Part of an Homer. [Ezek. 45.11.] An Homer of Quails, by that Proportion might have sufficed one Man, for an Hundred Days together. Wee need not then suppose every Individual Person to be a Gatherer of Quails on this Occasion; but that so many did gather; as there was Occasion. Bochart now rather thinks, That the /עשרה חמרים/ are not, Decem Cori, but, Decem Acervi; rather, Ten Heaps, than Ten Homers.⁵³ Do but compare the Hebrew, in Exod. 8.14. about, The Heaps of Frogs, (where the same Word is used,) and you'll see, that Bochart is not without some good Pre-tence for his Interpretation. Yea, Onkelos, and, the Arabic, do so render, even that very Text that is now before us.⁵⁴ Lett it be likewise Remembred, That the Definite Number of Ten, is in Scripture often putt for the Indefinite Number, of Many; (I can give you Ten Instances of it!) It will then come to This, That Moses here only saies, He that gathered least gathered many Heaps of them, which may for ought I know, satisfy you as well as if you should be at the Pains to compare the præcise Number of Quails, that were gathered by the Israelites; As Cornelius à Lapide did, and found them to be, Twelve Thousand Millions.⁵⁵

A Vast Number of Quails may be Reasonably allow'd on this Occasion. Varro tells us, That the Quails visited Italy, at the Season of them, Immani Numero.⁵⁶ And Pliny and Solinus add, That such was the Number of Quails then flying over the Mediterranean, as to endanger, yea, and sometimes oversett (non sine periculis Navigantium;) the Vessels at Sea, upon which they would, sometimes thro' Weariness alight.⁵⁷ But there was no where a greater Plenty of Quails, than in the Land of Egypt, from whence the Lord now brought them unto the Israelites. Many ancient Writers tell us, They were so many in their Seasons, that 53 Bochart (col. 106, lines 10–20); The ancient Hebrew “homer,” measuring capacity (volume), amounts to c. 100 liters or c. 26 US liquid gallons (ABD 6:903–4).

54 Bochart (col. 106, lines 19–20); Targum Onkelos and Versio Arabica (Numb. 11:32), in Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (1:593); Bochart relies on Guy Michel Le Jay's Paris Polyglot (1629–45), which – like Walton's London Polyglot (1655–57) – included an Arabic version.

55 Cornelius à Lapide, on Numb. 11:32, in Pentateuchum Mosis Commentaria (1626), p. 785, guesimates that the meandering Israelites “collegerint duodecim millia millionum coturnicum” – an unimaginable multitude rivaling the vast flocks of American Passenger Pigeons wiped out in the late 19th century. For Mather's essays on this lost species of pigeons, see the informative articles by A. W. Schorger's “Unpublished Manuscripts by Cotton Mather on the Passenger Pigeon” (1938), F. T. Lewis's “The Passenger Pigeon as Observed by the Rev. Cotton Mather” (1944), and Lewis's “Cotton Mather's Manuscript References to the Passenger Pigeon” (1945). Mather sent his description of, speculations on, the American Passenger Pigeon to the Royal Society of London, “5 [June, 1714] ‘The Pigeons,’” in his unpublished collection of “Curiosa Americana” (Second Series, 1713–14). See T. J. Holmes, Cotton Mather. A Bibliography 1:202, 203.

56 Bochart (col. 107); the Roman historian Varro (De re rustica 3.5.7) speaks of “tremendous numbers” of quails, which seasonally pass across Italy.

Q. But after all; what if there should be no Quails at all in the Case? v. 33.

A. Dr. Patrick thinks, That no body he ha's mett withal, hath laboured so much to give a clear Explication of this History, as Job Ludolphus, in his most learned Commentary upon his Ethiopic History.⁵⁹

There he ha's a long Discourse to show, That the Hebrewes take not the Word Selav (used here) to signify Quails; but we take the Translation only from Josephus.⁶⁰

Notwithstanding all that is produced by the most learned Bochart, there seem to be several Things in the History, which by no means can agree to Quails. Ludolphus will therefore have Selav, to signify, Locusts; by which, it is easy to give a plain Explication, of all that is here said concerning them.⁶¹

Tis very certain, That Locusts were not only used for Food, in those Parts of the World; but that some of them were very delicious Meat, in several Countreys. They that have eaten them, compare them to Young Pigeons; or to a Fresh Herring; or to a Crab, or Lobster, (which they resemble in their Figure:) And they are several Wayes præpared, and accounted very wholesome Food, when they have thrown away the Heads, and Wings, and Legs. Pliny saies, That some Parts of Ethiopia lived upon them; & that they were præserted, Fumo et Sale,

⁵⁹ Patrick, on Numb. 11:31 (Numbers 198) enlists Historia Aethiopica (1681), lib. 1, cap. 13, § 16, by Hiob Ludolphus, the German Orientalist and grammarian of the Ethiopic language Amharic.

by being dried in the Smoke, and salted, for their nourishment, throughout the whole Year.⁶²

Now all that occurs in the History before us, (he thinks) will have an easy Meaning, if we follow this Interpretation. But not, if we take them for Quails, or Pheasants, or Sea-fowl. As for Exemple; what we read concerning a mighty Wind sent by the Lord, is not hard for to be understood, if we suppose it spoken of Locusts, which all Authors tell us, are brought with a Wind. But it was never heard, That a Wind brought Quails, which cannot fly High nor Far; much less, so far, as from the Sea, to the Middle of Arabia Petraea.

Probably, they came out of Africa, where they abound.

Which Way soever the Israelites went, for Sixteen or Twenty Miles together, (which at least, were the Dimensions of the Camp,) there lay Heaps of them upon the Ground. If we understand this, of Quails, it cannot be conceived without Heaps of Miracles. And if we resort thither (as Dr. Patrick thinks,) what need was there of any Wind, for the bringing of them, when it must be supposed, That God miraculously created them, as He did the Manna. But the thing will be found less Wonderful, & very Natural, if it be understood of Locusts, who come in thick & vast Clouds, which darken the Sky, as all Authors tell us.⁶³

That Clause, of their being Two Cubits high upon the Face of the Earth, is by Interpreters look'd upon as impossible.⁶⁴ The Quails must have been unavoidably choaked & stifled, | if they had been heaped so deep one upon another. [20v] And therefore they have devised the Addition of a New Word, & refer it not unto their falling upon the Ground, but their flying in the Air two Cubits high above the Ground, that so they might the more easily be taken by their Hands. But there is nothing of this in the Text; and it is contrary to what the Psalmist saies, They fell in the Midst of their Camp; and they came down like Rain, which alwayes falls upon the Ground.⁶⁵ There are some other Difficulties in it, also mention'd by Ludolphus.⁶⁶ And therefore, it seems better to expound it of

⁶³ Patrick, too, is weary of resorting to miracles to explain these events (Numbers 200).

⁶⁴ Numb. 11:31. Whereas Ramban, Kimchi, and Bachya ben Asher remain silent on this issue, Ibn Ezra, Abarbanel, and Bekhor Shor do not seem to take exception to a literal signification of this quantity. See Ramban (Commentary: Numbers 112), Bachya ben Asher (Commentary 6:2006), and JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot (4:83). Poole (Synopsis Criticorum 1: and Works 7:197–87), though mentioning the disagreement among interpreters, follows Bochart's authority, in Hierozycon (1663), pars 2, lib. 1, cap. 15, cols. 104–08, which discourages miracles. If the Cyprian bishop Epiphanius Salamiensis (c. 315–403 CE) is correct, then the ancient biblical cubit – measuring the length from the elbow to the end of the middle finger – amounts to c. 45.7 cm (c. 18 inches), in Treatise on Weights and Measures (sec. 60).

⁶⁶ Hiob Ludolphus, Appendix Secunda ad Historiam Aethiopicam (1694), pars 2: De Locustis, caps. 48–49: "Sexta Controversia," pp. 48–49.

Locusts; who, tho' they fall one upon another, to a great Depth, are not thereby suffocated, by reason of their Legs being so Long, & their Wings being so Thin.

It is evident, that what the People gathered, was Lying on the Ground, & not Flying in the Air.

Every Master of a Family gathered Ten Homers. A vast Quantity, if they were Quails! It would have served them, not for a Month, but for a Year, or two; as is observed by Ludolphus. Besides, we don't use to Measure Fowl, but Number them. And therefore, Bochart being sensible of this Impropriety, takes the Word, Homer here, to signify, only, An Heap. But Ludolphus ha's confuted him.⁶⁷

Whereas it follows, They spread them all abroad for themselves. This is another Indication that they were Locusts; which they spread, so to Drie them in the Sun. The Spreading of Quails would have been præposterous, & but the sooner have made them stink. Interpreters therefore ordinarily pass by this Passage; they don't care to meddle with it; and the Vulgar Latin, omitts the Word, spread. Whereas all Authors tell us, This is the principal Way of præparing Locusts; & præserving them for a Month or more; which they then boil'd, or otherwise Dress'd, as they had Occasion.⁶⁸

From almost æqual Probability, for Borchart, & for Ludolf, Monsr. Saurin, infers, The Vanity of Sciences; And, How great Men can give themselves much Trouble, & can propose Opinions full of Erudition, upon Matters of very small Moment, & of no less Uncertainty.⁶⁹

Q. In the Conclusion of the Month, we find, The Lord smote the People with a very Great Plague. What sort of Plague? v. 33.

A. Aben Ezra supposes, The Pestilence.⁷⁰ Others think, They wasted away in a Consumption; their Vomiting, perhaps, continuing so, that they never could retain any Meat until they died; This they gather from that; Psal. 106.15. He sent

*Leanness into their Soul.*⁷¹ But Bochartus and Menochius think, That the Lord burnt them up with a Fire from His Presence; – grounding it on Psal. 78.21. *A Fire was kindled in Jacob.*⁷²

Is it not rather probable, That it was a suffocating Distemper, like the Squinancy, that choak'd them while they were eating, or very soon upon it?

Compare, Psal. LXXVIII.30, 31.⁷³

Q. Who was the Ethiopian Woman, married unto Moses, upon whose Account his Brother & Sister quarrel'd {with} him? v. 1.

A. The Ancients, both Jewish & Christian, have a Tradition, That Moses, while employ'd in the Court of Egypt, made an Expedition against the Ethiopians, and obtained a Victory by means of a Correspondence, with Tarbis, Daughter to the King of Ethiopia, who thereupon became a Wife unto our victorious Moses.¹

But wee will rather suppose, That Zipporah, is the Woman here called, An Ethiopian. And while some tell us, That the Blackness of her Colour, was made the Reproche of her Husband; Others tell us, That shee was called, An Ethiopian, κατ' ἀντίφρασιν, because of her contrary & exceeding Beauty;² and that His Relations were Angry at him for his no more Loving and Minding of her. Tis in Conformity to this Gamatrie, that the Targum of Jerusalem on this Place, is to this Purpose, Et locuti sunt Miriam et Aaron cum Mosé, propter Negotium Ethiopissæ quam duxerat; et ecce, Zippora, uxor Mosis, non erat Ethiopissa; sed quemadmodum Ethiops differt carne suâ ab omni creaturâ, talis erat Zippora, uxor Mosis, decenti forma, et Pulchra Aspectu, et diversa operibus bonis, ab omnibus mulieribus illius etatis.³ But after all; The Wife of Moses is not indeed called,

1 This ennobling story is told in Josephus Flavius's Antiquities (2.10.2).

2 Although a Medianite, Zipporah was pejoratively called an Ethiopian contrary to her stunning beauty. Rashi clarifies this seeming oxymoron thus: Calling Zipporah a Cushite "teaches that everyone agreed to her beauty, just as everyone agrees to the blackness of the Cushite." Or, "Because of her beauty, she was called 'Cushite' like a man who calls his attractive son 'Cushite' to ward off the power of the evil eye over him." Put in another way, "her beauty was as singular as the blackness of the Chushite," in Metsudah Chumash/Rashi: Numbers (4:157, 158). Ibn Ezra follows suit (JPS Migra'ot Gedolot 4:84–85). See also the wrangling among post-Reformation divines in Poole's Synopsis Criticorum (1:656–57) and Works (7:205–08). Given the nature of this ancient debate, associating desirable or undesirable shades of skin color with biblically sanctioned or disapproved lines of descent (Cush being a son of Ham) evinces how the origins of early concepts of race are deeply rooted in, and informed by, biblically sponsored norms. On this topic, see for instance D.M. Goldenberg's The Curse of Ham (2003), S. R. Haynes's Noah's Curse (2002), B. Isaac's The Invention of Racism (2004), C. Kidd, The Forging of Races (2006), and J. Stievernann, "The Genealogy of Races" (2010).

3 This second-hand citation from Targum Hierosolymitanum, on Numb. 12:1, is from the Parisian Polyglot, whose Latin rendition here given by Mather is nearly identical to that in the London Polyglot of Brian Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (4:260). Either way, the passage reads, "And Miriam and Aaron spoke against Moses about the Ethiopian [Cushite] woman whom he had taken; and observe, Zippora, wife of Moses, was not an Ethiopian, but of a flesh different from every creature, whereas Zippora, the wife of Moses, was of a comely form and beautiful countenance, and more abundant in good works than all the women of her age" (adapted from Etheridge's translation, The Targums 2:377). Much the same is rehearsed in Paulus Fagius's

An Ethiopian, here at all. Zippora is intended; and the Term of Cushite, which we have rendred, An Æthiopian, here, in Truth, but, A Midianitess. The Incomparable Bochart, ha's proved, that in the Scripture, it is not כוש but לוד that is the Name of Ethiopia.⁴ The Name כוש intends Arabia; and by the Chushites are meant these People, that were once called Scenites, but since that, Saracens.⁵ But having thus rescued Zippora, from the Defamations of a Blackamoor, what the Quarrel of her Friends about her was, we must leave to further Enquiry. Nay, Why may it not bee sufficiently expressed in the Text itself; The Wife of Moses, being not an Israelitess, but a Midianitess, this was thrown in his Dish, as a Reproch unto him; when they could find nothing else to Revile him with.⁶

Q. What? When he had already been Forty Years married unto her? Certainly, a better Account of the Quarrel & Clamour now raised against Moses, may be thought of? v. 1.

A. I find a good one, in Dr. Patricks Commentary on the Place.

Probably, they were Jealous of Moses's being too much ruled by his Wife, & by her Relations; For it was by her Fathers Advice, that he made the Judges, mention'd in the Eighteenth of Exodus. And perhaps they imagined, that she and Hobab, had an hand in choosing the Elders lately made; which make the Story in the foregoing Chapter connected unto This. It is evident, those Elders were nominated, without consulting either Aaron, or Miriam, about it. These taking themselves to be neglected, in so great an Alteration made of the Government, without their Advice, were very Angry. But because they durst not charge Moses directly, with this Neglect of them, they fall upon his Wife; whom in Scorn they call, A Cushite, or Arabian Woman. These were in after-times counted a Vile People: [Amos. 9.7.] For that Countrey was inhabited by diverse Nations, mingled together; Ishmaelites, Midianites, Amalekites, & the like. Some think, they were from this Mixture called Arabians; For, Ereb, in Hebrew, signifies a Miscellaneous Company, or, a Mixture of many People. These very People are called by that Name. [Jer. 25.20, 24.]⁷ annotations on Numb. 12:1 in his Thargum. Hoc est Paraphrasis Onkeli Chaldaica in Sacra Biblia (1546), sign. D^{7v}-D^{8r}.

⁷ Patrick (Numbers 205–06).

Q. The Translation here? v. 1.

A. It is thus most conformed unto the Hebrew. And Miriam spake, and so did Aaron, against Moses. The Spirit of God intimates, That Miriam first offended; & then drew her Brother Aaron into the same Offence.⁸

2340.

Q. One of the Cavils, made by Deism, against the Writings of Moses, is, His commending himself. v. 3.⁹

A. I know no Damage that would ensue; if wee should suppose the Parenthesis here, in Commendation of Moses, added by some other Prophet, in the Transcription. But if such a Thing should not bee supposed, yett this were no Argument against the Writings being genuine.¹⁰ How often doth Xenophon, in his History of the Expedition of Cyrus, relate his own great Skill in managing the Army, & great Fame among the Souldiery, and Contempt of Money, & the like? How often doth Cæsar, in his Commentaries, make Fetches, to blazon his Fortitude & Clemency?¹¹ Josephus, in his History of the Jewish Wars, declares himself to bee, The Wisest of all the Jewes; that hee was admired by the Roman Chiefs for his Virtues; that Titus wondered at his Fortitude under Affliction.¹² Which is as much as what Moses writes of himself, That hee was the meekest Man upon the

¹¹ Mather has in mind Xenophon's Greek Anabasis, a laudatory history of Cyrus the Younger's campaign against his brother Artaxerxes II of Persia; and Julius Caesar's De Bello Gallico and his campaign against the Gauls.

¹² According to Josephus Flavius (Wars 5.7.4), Titus and his Roman armies admired the fortitude of the beleaguered Jews in the face of Jerusalem's destruction.

Earth. And Moses was here under a sufficient Provocation, from his Brother and Sister, to speak as much as this comes to.¹³

Q. Dr. Lightfoots Remark on the Murmuring about the Wife of Moses? v. 4.

A. Jethro comes not unto Moses, until Now; because of the Distaste he took at Moses, for sending Zipporah back, when he went for Egypt.

Aaron, & Miriam now murmur against Moses's Heathenish Wife, which was but newly come among them.¹⁴

Q. When the Lord saies, He made Himself known to the Prophets in a Vision; what may be the Import of the Word Vision? v. 6.

A. God herein represented things unto the Prophets, when they were Awake, as if they had perceived them by their Senses, which yett at the same Time were locked up; and all was transacted by a Divine Operation upon their Mind & Imagination. [See Dan. 8.1, 15.]¹⁵

Abarbinel mentions one, who observes, That the Word Marah [the Plural whereof, Maroth, signifies, Looking Glasses, Exod. 38.8.] is a different Word from Mareh, which is commonly used for, Vision; and teaches us, That all the Repræsentations made in this Way to the Prophets, were only as the Images of Things represented in a Glass; in which we behold the outward Shape, or Shadow, (as we may call it,) but not the Thing itself.¹⁶ And so the Apostle Paul seems to have understood this Word, (if he alludes to this Place, as Grotius thinks he does,) when he saies, 1. Cor. 13.12. We now see thro' a Glass darkly.¹⁷

Q. What were the peculiar Preheminencies of Moses, in his Conversation with Heaven? v. 8.

A. Abarbinel mentions Four.¹⁸ First, God spoke to others, by a Mediator, (or, an Angel;) but unto Moses, by Himself. Secondly, Others never prophesied, but 13 William Bradford's famous log Of Plymouth Plantation also problematizes the position of Bradford as a third-person narrator who evaluates his own performance as colonial governor.

14 John Lightfoot's Chronicle of the Times, and the Order of the Texts of the Old Testament, "The Book of Numbers" [Exodus (!) XVIII], in The Works (1684) 1:33–34.

15 This and the following paragraph are excerpted from Patrick (Numbers 211).

16 Abarbanel, on בְּהַעֲלֵךְ יְיָ בְּמִדְבָּר, in Commentarius in Pentateuchum Mosis (1710), Beha'alotekha. Rashi adds (Deut. 12:6, 8), "The presence of My name does not reveal itself to him [Moses] through a glass clearly, but in a dream, a vision," adding that the Lord spoke to Moses "plainly and not in riddles" (JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot 4:87).

18 Abarbanel, on the thirteen principles of faith, סֵפֶר רֹאשׁ אֲמָנָה [Sefer Rosh Amanah] Liber De Capite Fidei (1638), cap. 1, pp. 5–6.

their Senses were all bound up in Dreams, or Visions; but Moses was perfectly Awake, as we are when we discourse with one another. Thirdly, Others, after the Vision was over, were often left so Feeble, that they could hardly stand upon their Feet; but Moses, had a Conversation with the Divine Majesty, without any Consternation or Alteration, like what one Friend ha's with another. Fourthly; No Prophet could understand the Mind of God when he pleased; God communicated Himself unto them only when He thought good. Whereas Moses might at any time resort unto God, & enquire of Him, & receive Answers from Him. To this Purpose also Maimonides, in his Book, De Fundamentis Legis.¹⁹

Q. Why was not Aaron smitten with a Leprosie, as well as Miriam, when both of them together, began to Rebel against the Authoritie of Moses? v. 10.

A. It was a remarkable Circumstance, by the Providence of God, attending the Leprosie of old, That the Priest, who was to be Judge of the Leprosie, could never bee tainted with it. And for this Cause, Aaron here escapes it.

I will take the Liberty to transcribe the Words of Mr. Jeremiah Dyke upon this Matter.

"Both were in the same Sin; what was the Reason why only Miriam is in the Punishment? Is GOD partial? GOD forbid. What then might be the Reason? Surely, methinks, Chrysostom gives a passing good one. [Hom. 3. ad Coloss.]²⁰ That Aaron was not smitten with Leprosy, for the Dignity of the Priesthood; lest the inflicting of such an unclean Disease on his Person should redound to the Dishonour of his Office, GOD did forbear him. GOD had a Respect unto the Holiness & Honour of the Priesthood; GOD would not therefore have His Priest infected with Leprosy. He that was to judge of Leprosy in others, & to separate others for the Leprosy, he himself was not to be Leprous. Tho' I find Leprous Kings, yett I find not a Leprous Priest in all the Scripture."²¹

Q. Was there any singular Mystery, in the Leprosy of Miriam, and her Exclusion from the Camp Seven Dayes, on the Score of that Leprosy? v. 14.

²⁰ Via his citation from Jeremiah Dyke, Mather paraphrases a line from Joannes Chrysostom's In Epistulam ad Colossenses (homiliae 1–12), hom. 3 [PG 062. 0323, lines 38–39]. See also Homilies of St. John Chrysostom, On the Epistle of St. Paul the Apostle to the Colossians, "Homily III" (NPNFi 13:274).

A. I am exceedingly pleased, with a Note, which Ferus ha's upon this Matter. *Ut symbolum sit hoc Judeorum, qui prophetis suis Turgidi, Christum aspernantur, ac tantisper exulant ab Ecclesià, dum gentium advenit plenitus.*²² Master Wild here speaks very soberly.

Tis clear, That Miriam, was a Type of the Church of Israel.

And this Church, is now, like Miriam shutt out, under the Leprosy of Unbeleef. The Occasion of the Excommunication with which this Church ha's been censured, is the same with Miriams; a not acknowledging the great Leader of the Congregation.²³

More than all this; If you Turn to the Twenty sixth Chapter of Leviticus, you'll see the sad Condition of the exiled Jewes, terminated by the Number of, Seven Times. The Seven Dayes of Miriams Exile, seem to bee propheticall thereof.

I will add a further Curiosity upon it. The Action of Moses in espousing a Midianitess, was a Type of our Saviours espousing a Church of the Gentiles. And the Murmur of the Jews, against this Action of our Saviour, ha's a Share in procuring for them the Leprosy under which they now stand excluded from the Camp of God.²⁴

Q. The Wilderness of Paran? v. 16.

A. We find Ishmael settled here; Gen. XXI.21. And since the Ishmaelites did not molest the Israelites in their Marches, they seem to be more Friendly unto them than the Descendents of Esau.

In a larger Sense, the Wilderness of Paran, seems to denote all the Desert and Mountainous Tract, lying between the Wilderness of Shur Westward, or Egypt; and Mount Seir Eastward, or Edom; Canaan to the Northward, & the Red-Sea to the Southward. So it comprehended the Wilderness of Sin in it. And so it is to be understood, when we read, Deut. I.19. of, That Great & Terrible

22 Mather refers to Johannes Ferus, aka. Johann Wild (1497–1554), a German Franciscan, biblical commentator, and popular cathedral preacher, whom Pierre Bayle identifies as a “warden of the Franciscans at Mentz [Mainz] . . . one of the greatest preachers of the XVIth century.” Bayle adds, “There are no more than a few writers of the Romish communion more esteemed by the Protestants than Ferus” (Dictionary Historical and Critical [1736], 3:44). The Latin passage appears to be a paraphrase of Ferus’s allegorical interpretation of Numbers, ch. 12, in Annotationes Piae et Doctae in Exodum, Numeros, Deuteronomium (1571), “Annotationes in Numerorum,” pp. 51 (sep. pag.). A copy of Ferus’s 1571 edition is listed in the Catalogus Librorum Bibliothecae Collegij Harvardini (1723). Mather’s Latin quote addresses the issue of removing the wall of separation between Christians and Jews at the Second Coming. Until that time, Miriam’s leprosy, a type of the exclusion of the Jewish Church, remains active: “That it may be a symbol to the Jews, who puffed up with their own prophets, despise Christ, and in the meantime they are banished from the Church until the wholeness of all peoples has arrived.”

Wilderness. In the stricter Sense, it seems not so Great and Terrible; For so, it was more peculiarly that Part of the Desert of Stony Arabia, which lies between Mount Sinai, and Hazereth to the West, and Mount-Seir to the East. We find a City in these Parts near the Red-Sea, called Pharan; which probably gave Name to the adjacent Wilderness.²⁵

²⁵ The preceding paragraphs is a near verbatim extract from Edward Wells, Historical Geography of the Old Testament (1711), vol. 2, ch. 2, sec. 4, pp. 126–27; See also Wells’s map of the area (folded between 2:78–79). This map of the geographic description of the Israelites’ meanderings is most likely based on the oft-reprinted map Terra Sancta Sive Promissionis, olim Palestina (1659) of Nicolaes Visscher, the Elder (1618–79), a Dutch cartographer and printer. The map’s English title is “The Forty Years Travels of the Children of Israel out of Egypt through the Red Sea and the Wilderness in to Canaan, or the Land of Promise” (Imprint, c. 1688). Instructions generally recommended to “Place this Mappe at the 33 Chapter of Numbers” – a recommendation which Mather heeded by attaching (with sealing wax) an excised copy of Visscher’s map to fols. 54^v (below) of his annotations on Numb. 33:49 and his “An Appendix, to the ILLUSTRATIONS on the Stations in the Thirty third Chapter of NUMBERS.” See also BA (3:124).

Q. How come the Names of the Spies to be in that Order, wherein we find them here placed? v. 10.

A. There can be no Account given of the Order; except perhaps it should be This; They being to disperse themselves, when they entred the Countrey they were to search, & think it not Prudence to go above Two at the most, in a Company; they cast Lotts who should be associated; and the Lotts fell, as we find them here enumerated.

The Names of all the Wretches are here particularly remembred, as it should seem, for the Sake of those two worthy Men, Caleb and Joshua, whose Names must be embalmed, for their Faithfulness in the Midst of such a Crooked & Perverse Generation.¹

Q. The Names of Abiman, Sheshai, and Talmi, the Sons of Anak, what might they signify? v. 22.

A. Bochart thinks, That Anak signifies as much as the Roman Name, Toropiatius; being like to that Gaul, who was vanquished by Manlius. And Abiman signifies as much as, who is my Brother? Importing that there was none to be compared with him. Sheshai he takes to be much the same with Sixtius, one Six Cubits high, as Goliath was. Talmi he derives from Talam, a Furrow; as if he seem'd in Length to æqual a Furrow in the Field.²

Q. What ingenious Flourish have the Ancients, upon the Cluster of Grapes carried between Two? v. 23.

A. 'Tis a pious & a witty Meditation, which Augustin ha's upon it; Duo Viri qui Uvam detulerunt, significant duo Testamenta; item duo præcepta, quibus diligitur

² Patrick (Numbers 226–27) draws on Samuel Bochart's Geographia Sacra (1646), pars 2, lib. 1, cap. 1, fols. 363(E)–364(A), or col. 348, lines 2–18 (1707 edition). Either way, Bochart offers "Torquatium" and "Sextium" (rather than "Toropiatius" and "Sixtius" as listed in Patrick and Mather) as etymological significations for "Anak" and nickname for the size of the Gallic giant. Bochart refers to the Roman consul Titus Manlius Imperiosus Torquatus (fl. 4th c. BCE), who accepts the challenge of a giant Gallic warrior, and David-like kills his Goliath in single-handed combat while the armies of both sides are watching the spectacle. The story is told in Livy's Ab urbe condita (7.10).

Q. The Cluster of Grapes, which was carried between Two. What is there in Antiquity, to Countenance the Report of it? v. 23.⁴

A. A great many Authors mention Vines and Grapes of an extraordinary Greatness, in the Eastern and Southern Countreys. We need only refer to Strabo, who saies, The Vines in Margiana, and other Places, were so big, that a Couple of Men could scarce compass them in their Arms; and that they produced βότρυς δῖπυχυν, A Bunch of Grapes of Two Cubits.⁵ This is in Part justified by Olearius, in his Travels into Persia; where he saies, That not far from Astracan, he saw Vines, whose Trunks were so thick, that a Man could do no more than grasp them about, with both his Arms.⁶ And Forsterus, in his Dictionarium Hebraicum, saies, There was a Preacher at Norimberg, called Achacius, who lived as a Monk Eight Years in Palastine; & who told him upon his Sick-bed, That in his Time, there were Clusters of Grapes at Hebron, of such bigness, that one Single Kernel was enough to Quench his Thirst a whole Day, when he was there sick of a Tympany.⁷ Dietericus has collected a great deal more unto this Purpose, in his

3 Mather's quotation appears to be an adaptation of St. Augustine's pious meditation, in Sermones Suppositios, in Quatuor Classes Subjecto Nunc Primum Ordine Digestos. Classis I. De Vetero Et Novo Testamento, Appendix tomi quinti, Sermones XXVIII (a), [PL 039. 1799, 1800(a)]. "The two men who have taken down the grape signify two testaments along with two precepts, by which we are to love God and our neighbor. This image typifies the Jewish people and the Christian: the Jew goes first, the Christian follows, bearing their own grape safe, namely Christ, before their view."

4 The following extract (except for Mather's concluding sentence) is from Patrick (Numbers 228–29).

5 Strabo (Geographica 2.1.14, line 39; 11.10.2, line 7).

6 The German mathematician and geographer Adam Olearius, aka. Oelschläger (1599/1603–1671), whom Duke Frederick III of Holstein (1597–1669) sent on a diplomatic mission to Moscow and Persia (1635–39), published his popular travel log Beschreibung der Newen Orientalischen Rejse (1647), which was translated into several European languages (ET). It was translated into English by John Davies and published as The Voyages and Travels of the Ambassadors sent by the Duke of Holstein to the Great Duke of Muscovy and the King of Persia, In Seven Books (1662). Mather refers to Voyages (1662), bk. 7, p. 394, where Olearius expresses his amazement at the huge size of the vines, which he first encounters in the city of Astrachan (bk. 4, p. 171), a Russian city on the Volga River near the Caspian Sea, which reminds him of Strabo's account: "The Vines in these parts are so big, that they exceed a man's bulk. I have said as much before, though I believe some will hardly believe it: but besides that all who travell'd with us, are ey-witnesses [sic] of this truth, I may allege, to make good what I affirm, the Authority of Strabo, who saies the same of the Vines of Margiana, which is part of the Province of Chorasan" (bk. 7, p. 394), in what is modern Turkmenistan.

7 The third-hand story is related in Dictionarium Hebraicum Novum (1557), # 1624, p. 848 (misnumbered p. 862), by Ioannes Fosterus, aka. Johann Forster, aka. Förster (1496–1558), German Lutheran theologian, Reformer, collaborator with Martin Luther in the translation of

Antiquitates Biblicae;⁸ and since him Huetius in his Quaestiones Alnetanae; where, he observes; that Islands of the Archipelago afford Bunches of Grapes, weighing Forty Pound.⁹ Just now, I find a celebrated Gardener in England, showing a Bunch of Grapes that measures half a Yard in Length, & above an Ell in Circumference, & the Grapes in Proportion as large. —¹⁰

Q. But how is the Land of Canaan circumstanced, for its Grapes at this Day? v. 23.

A. Thro' the Curse of God it is come to pass, that as Lyserus, quoted by Dietericus, tells us, There are now scarce any Vineyards at all in all the Countrey. He saies, That one Ass were able to carry all the Grapes, in the biggest Part of Palæstine. Dietericus thus expresses the Condition of the Land; Vitibus quæ olim instructa abundabat, nunc Spinis et Dumis, ubi quondam arbusta et vineta optime culta, nunc Spineta et Dumeta horrida.¹¹ the Bible into German, and professor of theology and Hebrew at the University of Wittenberg (NDB). I was unable to discover the identity of Achacius, the monkish preacher at Nuremberg, whose story is also quoted in Joannes Conradus Dietericus's Antiquitates Biblicae (1671), p. 249 (see below), and there attributed to Aegidius. Achacius suffered from tympanites, a distended abdomen caused by the buildup of gas (MedTerms Medical Dictionary).

¹⁰ No telling whose georgic Mather has in mind, Albion – though not renowned for the sweetness of her grapes by any means – is by Mather added to validate the Mosaic story of Caleb's giant cluster of grapes in the Land of Milk and Honey. And yet those of Hampton Court Palace in London were celebrated in the late 18th and early 19th centuries. According to The Gentleman's Magazine (Nov. 1801), vol. 71, part 2, p. 1046, we learn that "The two celebrated grape-trees of Hampton Court and Valentines in Essex have been amazingly productive this year (1801); the former having yielded one ton 650 lb. weight, the latter one ton 227 lb. For one year's crop of the latter the late Mr. Weltje, about fifteen years ago, gave 400 guineas. That at Hampton Court entirely fills a grapery, 24 yards long and six wide. The tree is 30 years old; and had upon it in 1798 eighteen hundred bunches of grapes, supposed to weigh a pound, one with another, and to be worth altogether at least 400 l. [£ sterling]."

¹¹ Although Patrick (Numbers 229) refers to Joannes Conradus Dietericus, Mather quotes directly from Dieterich's commentary on Exod. 13:24, in Antiquitates Biblicae (1671), p. 250 B (lines 21–24). Mather's query addresses the seeming contradiction between Canaan as a land of milk and honey and Palestine's present condition as an arid desert: The Holy Land "once abounded with grape vine, now with thorns and bushes; where once shrubs were well cultivated, now thickets and grim thorn bushes." Via Dieterich's Antiquitates Biblicae (p. 249A, lines

Q. How might Calebs endeavour to still the People, as it is said, Before Moses, be managed? v. 30.

A. The Spies, if you mind the Report they make, their Intention was to represent, unto the People, That whether they Invaded the Land by the Southern Parts, or the Eastern, they would find both of them to be guarded strongly by a mighty People, in force much superiour unto them.¹²

The People hereupon falling into a Mutinous Disposition, Caleb endeavours to still them, as tis said, Before Moses. The Hebrew Phrase El Moscheh, may signify, that he stilled them, as they were coming towards Moses, in a Seditious Manner; or as we render it, In his Presence, namely, when they were just ready to fly in his Face.¹³

One of the Doctors in the Gemara, saies, That Joshua being about to speak, they bitterly reproached him, and would not suffer him to proceed. Caleb thought good therefore to give them a great many Blandishing Words, & to call Moses, This Son of Amram, which look'd like a Contempt of him; whereby he so stilled them, as to dispose them to listen to him. He then proceeded, *Is not he the Person that brought us out of Egypt; that divided the Red Sea for us to pass thro' it; that gave us Manna from Heaven? What if he should bid us make Ladders, and climb up into the Skies? Should we not obey him?*¹⁴

58–59), Mather refers to Polycarp Lyserus, D.D., aka. Polycarp Lyser (1552–1601), a German Lutheran divine, professor at Wittenberg, and author of Josephus, Hoc est, Theologica Expositio Sexta & Ultimatae Partis Geneseos (1609). According to Lyser's explication of the history of Jacob's son Joseph (Gen. ch. 49; John 2:11), pp. 497–98, the soil of Palestine was subjected to a curse when the Messiah was rejected; that is why "hodie ex toto illo tractu non posse vel unum asinum uvis onerari, quod olim ex una vite factum fuit" (Josephus, Hoc est, Theologica Expositio Sexta, p. 498). That such matters were not to be dealt with lightly is evident in the doleful case of the Spanish physician Michael Servetus (1511–53), whom none less than John Calvin condemned to burn at the stake. As the oft-debated story goes, in annotating his new edition of Ptolemy's Geography with eyewitness accounts of travelers in Palestine, Servetus appeared to call Moses a liar, for these latter-day travelers confirmed Ptolemy's portrait of Judaea as barren and arid – not a land of milk and honey at all. Fake news? Ask the Genevan Reformer. See R. Willis, Servetus and Calvin (1877), bk. 2, ch. 3, pp. 324–26 et passim. See also Mather's gloss on Numb. 20.5 and Deut. 8:7 (below).

12 Patrick, on Numb. 13:29 (Numbers 233).

13 Patrick, on Numb. 13:30 (Numbers 234). The preposition אֶל [el] in the Hebrew phrase אֶל-מֹשֶׁה [el-mosheh] denotes "motion to or unto a person or place after every kind of verb expressing motion" (Strong's # B 472). Or, as Rashi put it, Caleb "silenced them [complaining spies] all. To hear what he would say about Moshe" (Chumash/Rashi: Numbers 4:176), they stopped shouting because they believed Caleb, Amram's son, would deliver the coup de grâce.

Q. What Occasion might the Wretches have, to give that Report of the Land, It eats up the Inhabitants thereof? v. 32.

A. The Hebrewes, who love to excuse the Sins of their Fore-fathers, do suppose, That there was at this Time a Great Plague in the Countrey. However, they made a very malignant Use of what they saw. If they saw the People of the Countrey every where as they passed along, carrying their Neighbours to their Graves, they should have ascribed it unto the Providence of God, who sent this Mortality, that they might have the fewer Enemies to oppose them, and the Spies might freely pass, with the less Observation. But they most wickedly ascribe it unto the Badness of the Air, which being unhealthful to the Natives, might much more be so to Strangers.¹⁵

¹⁵ Via Patrick (Numbers 236), Mather here paraphrases the explication of Raba in the Talmud, tractate Sotah (35a). On the sentence, "It is a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof [Exod. 13:32]," Raba glosses, "The Holy One, blessed be He, said I intended this for good but they thought it in a bad sense. I intended this for good because wherever [the spies] came, the chief [of the inhabitants] died, so that they should be occupied [with his burial] and not inquire about them. (Others say that Job died then and the whole world was occupied with mourning for him.) But they thought it in a bad sense. It is a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof" (Sotah 35a). Maimonides, in his Liber מורה נבוכים [More Nebuchim] Doctor Perplexorum (1629), lib. 1, cap. 30, pp. 36–37, and Guide (1.30.63–64) offers a linguistic interpretation of the passage. Mather employs the same annotation in his Successive Generations (1715), p. 14. On his use of demographic statistics and mortality rates as a soteriological and hermeneutic device in his sermons, see T. McCormick's "Statistics in the Hands of an Angry God" (563–86).

Q. What Remarkable is there, in that Plea of Moses, Lett the Power of my Lord bee great? v. 17.

A. The Jewes find a Letter of a greater Figure than usual there; to intimate, they say, something of an extraordinary Greatness in the Matter. But what is it? It followes, Pardon, I beseech thee. None but one that ha's the Great Power of a God, can Pardon Sin and our God gloriously delights to show His Greatness in our Pardon. That Power must bee Great, and the Patience and the Goodness, must bee Greatly Powerful, that shall Pardon such Great Sinners as the People of God, must sometimes acknowledge themselves to bee.¹

Q. How are wee to understand that Syllable, in the Name of our God, By no means clearing of the Guilty? v. 18.

A. There is nothing said of, The Guilty, in the Original.

Why may not wee thus understand the Clause? The Lord is of Great Mercy, Forgiving Iniquity & Transgression, and Clearing Hee will not clear, – (that is, tho' Hee Forgive, yett Hee will chastise, & not altogether leave unpunished.)²

However, tis here intimated, That when the Lord Forgives Iniquity & Transgression, Hee will not clear the Sinner, with a meer Clearing; Hee will not clear the Sinner, without a Sacrifice: The Vengeance of God must proceed; the Surety

for the Sinner must endure it. God clears the Sinner, but it is in Punishing, it is in Revening, it is in taking Satisfaction, upon the Oblation substituted for him.³

Q. What was the præcise Day of the Month, when the heavy Doom was passed upon the Israelites, That they should not enter into the Promised Land? v. 23.

A. As Moses Kotzensis reports the Opinion of the Jewish Doctors, They tell us, it was on the Ninth Day of the Month Ab, which answer to our July. On this very Day, they also tell us, both the First and Second Temple were levelled with the Ground; and on the same Day, again the Jewes with their King Ben Coziba, were horribly destroy'd, and their City of Pritter sack'd. And to render this Day the more dismal, Turnus Rufus, plough'd up the Ground on which the Temple, & the buildings about it, stood, on this very Day.⁴

Q. That Encomium upon Caleb, He hath followed me fully? v. 24.⁵

A. The Original runs, He hath fulfilled after me. There is an Emphasis in this Word, After me, which as Dr. Gell observes, no Translation takes notice of. You must observe, That it is CHRIST who speaks in this Place. The Will of God is 3 Mather's implicitly Christological reading (Christ as the only true substitutional oblation) echoes a similar explication in the Gemara: "Only the undoubted guilt-offering [atones], but not the suspensive one? But is not the word 'forgiveness' written with regard to it too [Lev. 5:18]? – These [others] procure complete atonement, the suspensive guilt-offering does not procure complete atonement. Or else, As for these [others] [i. e., the sin-offering and certain guilt-offerings] another can effect their atonement, whereas in the case of the suspensive guilt-offering nothing else can effect their atonement. For it was taught: If those who were liable to sin-offerings, or guilt-offerings [for the] undoubted [commission of offences] permitted the Day of Atonement to pass, they are still obliged to offer then, up; but in the case of those who are liable to suspensive guilt-offerings, they are exempt" (Talmud, tractate Yoma 35b).

4 Patrick (Numbers 250–51) translates his paragraph (here extracted by Mather) from the bilingual Hebrew/Latin version of the commentary on the Gemara, by R. Moses ben Jacob Kotzensis (Cotzensis, Kozensis), aka. Moses ben Jacob of Coucy, aka. Moses Mikkotsi (13th c.), a French Tosafist, Halakhic scholar, and author of Sefer Mitzvoth Gadol. Liber Magnus Praeceptorum [Large Book of the Commandments] (Soncino, 1488) (JE). Patrick's English translation is based on a Hebrew/Latin passage of Sefer Mitzvoth Gadol (Semag. folio 248, col. 3) as extracted in Johann Christoph Wagenseil's Sota, hoc est Liber Mischnicus De Uxore Adulterii suspecta cum (1674), cap. 7, sec. 10, nota 8, "Excerpta Gemara," p. 736. King Ben Coziba is Simon ben Kosiba, better known as Bar Kokhba (d. 135 CE), leader of the Jewish uprising against Rome during the Bar Kokhba Revolt (130–136 CE), which was crushed by the Roman governor of Judea Turnus Rufus, aka. Quintus Tineius Rufus (c. 90–post-132 CE). The Roman siege of Jerusalem under Hadrian and the razing of the Temple is discussed in Eusebius Pamphilus's Church History (4.6.1–6), in NPNFii (1:177–78); and esp. in Cassius Dio's Roman History (69.12). The story of Turnus Rufus's ploughing up of the Temple grounds is also mentioned in the Babylonian Talmud, tractate Ta'anitha (29a), and in Josephus Flavius (Wars of the Jews 6.10.1; 7.1–2).

5 In his "Note Book of Authors" (Numb 14:24), Mather recommends "Burroughs of Gracious Spirit"; Jeremiah Burroughs's The Excellency of a Gracious Spirit (1639).

Q. Tis said, That none save Caleb and Joshua, should come into the Land of Canaan. And yett wee read, That Eleazar, and some others did come into that Land. [Josh. 14.1. chap. 22.13.] This is objected by some, as a Passage Derogatory to the Truth of the Scripture. What can you say, to clear it? v. 24.

A. I say, Lett this Holy Book, bee read with the same Ingenuitie, that wee read other Authors; in whom nothing is more common, than to leave a Latitude for the Understanding of Things that are spoken with Restriction; which Latitude shall bee express'd and explain'd when they come to speak to the Particulars of those Things.

Caleb and Joshua, were the only Persons among the Chief Leaders that had the Priviledge to enter into Canaan, and it is to bee understood also exclusively of the Tribe of Levi. It is evident, that the Levites were not among the Murmurers; and it was Threatned only unto the Murmurers, That THEY should not see the Land. Wherefore, Eleazar and some others of the Priestly Tribe, were exempted from the Threatning. Briefly, the Levites were not comprised in the Number of the Congregation, taken half a Year ago. The Levites therefore are not comprehended in the heavy Sentence here denounced, any more than the Children under Twenty Years old, or the Wives of the Men that murmured. There might [be] some others, who had no Share in the Provocation.⁷

Q. The Glorious GOD sais here, My Servant Caleb, had another Spirit. Why is Joshua not so spoken of? v. 24.

A. Some think, that Caleb was at first, the more forward of the Two in speaking; Joshua's Dependence on Moses might make him say the less, that it might not be suspected, he spoke to gratify Moses. Others think, that Joshua might be a Penman to Moses in writing this History, & so suppressed what concerned himself. These Hints occur in Mr. Burroughs his Gracious Treatise of, A Gracious Spirit. But why may it not be enough to say, Joshua was one of so unquæstion'd and established a Character, there was no Need of saying any thing about him.⁸

⁷ Patrick, on Numb. 14:24, 29 (Numbers 251, 254). Ibn Ezra confirms as much, saying that "The Levites and the priests too did not fall under this oath [of exclusion], for there was no spy representing them. Moreover, they were not among those 'who were recorded in your various lists from the age of twenty up' (v. 29). Admittedly, there were next to no priests, but there were a lot of Levites" (JPS Migra'ot Gedolot 4:103).

⁸ The English Independent Jeremiah Burroughs (c. 1600–1646), tutored at Emmanuel College (Cambridge) by none less than Thomas Hooker, later founder of the Hartford, Connecticut, colony, authored many works, including The Excellency of a Gracious Spirit (1639), a

Q. The Lord sentences the Israelites to wander Forty Years in the Wilderness. In how many Dayes might their Journey to Canaan from Egypt, have been performed? v. 33.

A. When the Israelites were in their Journey from their Chaldaean Captivity, tis said in Ps. 107.7. The Lord led 'em in a Streight Way. But in their Journey from their Egyptian Captivity, it was a very Crooked, and Winding Way, wherein the Lord led 'em; the Cloudy Pillar, with a Crooked Way chastised the Crooked Heart of that People. Their Journey might have been performed in passing over, but Ninety Two Miles, from the Border of Egypt, unto the most Southern City of Canaan. For Pelusium, or, Sin, in the Land of Sinzin, the last City of Egypt, was distant but Ninety Two Miles, from Rhinocurura, or Nahalmizraim, the first City of Canaan, on the South of Simeons Tribe, call'd in the Scripture, The River of Egypt: (Isa. 27.12.) This appears, by the Itinerary of Antonine, the Emperour; And now, at the rate of Ten Miles a day, which might tho' by so great a Multitude, bee complied withal, it was but Nine Dayes Journey to arrive at the Land of Promise. Yett in how vast Wandrings, must they roll about; for forty Years together!⁹

| Q. An Observation on the Forty Years, assign'd for the Wandring of the Israelites in the Desert? v. 34. [24r]

A. 'Tis Dr. Gells Observation, That the merciful God in His Punishments usually does less than His Threatenings. Chronologers find the Wandring of the Israelites in the Wilderness, to fall short several Months of Forty Years.¹⁰

And the Holy People, who are commanded an Imitation of God, being directed, that they should not exceed Forty Stripes, for the greatest Fault, they still Remitted One of the Forty.

But in bestowing of Blessings, the merciful God, usually exceeds His Promises. Thus in the XXXV of Isaiah, when the Lord foretels the Miracles to be wrought by the Son of God, in the Dayes of His Flesh; we read not about the lengthy exegesis of Numb. 14:24 (ODNB). Mather refers to part 1, ch. 1, p. 4 of this sermon, which identifies Nicolai Serarius (1555–1609), a French Jesuit theologian and historian, who argues that Joshua was Moses' amanuensis in writing down the account. Serarius does so in his huge commentary Josue; ab utero ad ipsum usque tumulum, e Moysis Exodo, Levitico, Numeris, Deuteronomio (1610), tom. 1, lib. 1, cap. 4, Q. 3, p. 103 (B–D).

⁹ The distances are based on the Itinerarium Antonini (4th c. CE), an ancient Roman road-map, which recorded the distances between significant settlements throughout the Roman Empire (EB). Rhinocurura, aka. Rhinocolura, is a settlement on the Egyptian and Palestinian border. See BA (1:583–84), Livy (45.11), and Pliny (5.14.68).

Curing of Lepers, & the Casting out of Divels; Both of which were done very frequently.¹¹

Q. Upon that Passage; Ye shall know my Breach of Promise? v. 34.

A. Tis a Translation, by no means to be endured.¹²

I don't press for the Vulgat, or Pagnines Translation, Cognoscetis ultionem meam;¹³ nor Munsters, Irritationem meam;¹⁴ nor the Tigurin, Prohibitionem meam;¹⁵ nor Coverdales, — when I withdraw my Hand.¹⁶

I am content, that, Breach, be the Word. Lett it be, if you please, as Tremellius would have it; Abruptionem meam.¹⁷ Only then take Piscators Gloss upo n it; Ye shall know how great an Evil it is, when a Man breaks off from me. And then add, if you please, what will follow, Ye shall know how great an Evil it is, when I break myself off from any one.¹⁸

The last French Translation is much better than ours; *Vous connoistrez*¹⁹ que j'ai comme rompu le cours de mes benedictions sur vous.²⁰

11 In his gloss on Isa. 35:6 (BA 5:739), Mather refers to Pierre Allix's Reflexions sur les Cinq Livre de Moyse (1687), translated into English and published as Reflexions Upon the Books of the Holy Scripture (1688), vol. 2, ch. 10, pp. 237–38, 241–42. Here, the venerable Huguenot minister argues that Isaiah identifies four types of miracles by which the coming Messiah could be identified: healing the blind and the lame, raising the dead, turning water into wine, and casting out demons. For good measure, Christ “also conferr'd upon his Disciples a power of doing greater Miracles than himself ever did” (2:242).

12 Except for Mather's citation of the French translation, his source text is Gell's Essay (1659), p. 494(b-d).

13 Whereas Jerome's well-known Vulgate reads, “scietis ultionem meam” (“you will know my vengeance”), Sanctus Pagninus, Biblia Sacra ex Santis Pagnini tralatione (1542), on Numb. 14:34: “Cognoscetis ultionem meam,” p. 32^v (C) (sep. pag.): “You will recognize my vengeance.”

14 Sebastian Münster's Hebraica Biblia, Latina Planeq. (1546), fol. 292, reads, “cognoscetis irritationem meam” (“you will recognize my provocation”).

15 Tigurin Bible, aka. Biblia Sacrosancta Testamenti Veteris & Novi (1543), on Numb. 14:34 (p. 67^v): “prohibitionem meam” (“my prohibition”).

16 Miles Coverdale's translation in his famous Biblia. The Byble, that is the holy Scripture of the Olde and New Testament, faithfully translated in to Englysh (1535), p. lxij, “The iiij boke of Moses. The xiiii Chap.” reads, “when I withdrawe my hande” (according to the original spelling).

17 Immanuel Tremellius and Franciscus Junius, Biblia Sacra, sive, Libri Canonici (1593), p. 130, have “cognoscatis abruptionem meam” (“you will recognize my breaking off” [separation, divorce]), but also offer an alternate translation in the margin (note p), “abruptionem a me” (“breaking off by me”).

19 Mather's misspelling of “connaîtrez.”

20 “The last French Translation” is that of the revision of the French Bible de Genève (Geneva Bible) by the French Protestant theologian David Martin (1639–1721), pastor of a Reformed Walloon church in Utrecht, whose La Sainte Bible (1707) reads, “vous connaîtrez que j'ai comme

Q. We read, The Canaanites came and smote the Israelites, & discomfited them, even unto Hormah. Whereabouts was that Hormah? v. 45.

A. Indeed we read of a Place called Hormah; but it had not its Name until very long after This, and upon a very Contrary Occasion; [you have it, Num. 21.3.]

But Hormah in the Text now before us, is an Appellative, and no proper Name. This is in Part intimated by the /ח/ præfixed unto it;²¹ a Præfix which does not use to be before any proper Name. The English of the Word is, Utter Destruction; and so it should be rendred here. The pagan Victors, as it seems, push'd on their Conquest unto Extremity; even as Moses had foretold, they would.²²

²¹ The prefix /ח/ is "He."

²² Mather's source for this annotation is Commentarium in Sacram Scripturam una cum Nova de Verbo Ad Verbum, ex Heb. translatione. In Opera Omnia (1601), Tom. 1, p. 637, by Thomas Malvenda (1566–1628), a highly respected Spanish Dominican scholar (CE), whose prized commentary was also extracted in Matthew Poole's Synopsis Criticorum (1669–76). However, long before Malvenda argued that הַחֹרְמָה "ha-chormah" is not the name of a Canaanite town but signifies "utter destruction," Ibn Ezra stated that "Some think this is not a place name but a word meaning 'to destruction,' that is, they [Amalekites and Canaanites] dealt them [murmuring Israelites] such a shattering blow that they destroyed them" (JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot 4:107).

Q. Might a Stranger bring the same Sacrifices with an Israelite? v. 14.

A. No Stranger, but one that was become entirely subject unto the Law of Israel, might offer the Offerings here enumerated. Nevertheless, another Proselyte, who worshipped the True God, but was not circumcised, might bring a Burnt-Offering; but it was without a Meat-Offering, & a Drink-Offering; & no Peace-Offering, were accepted from him.¹

Q. With what Limitations was this Direction understood; One Law, and One Manner, shall be for you, and for the Stranger that sojourneth with you. v. 16.

A. This General Rule was made for the Encouragement of Strangers, to become Proselytes unto the Jewish Religion, & for the Engaging of the Jewes to be kind unto the Proselytes. The Proselytes were admitted unto an ἰσοτιμία, as Philo calls it, with them.² Yett they tell us, it was to be understood & practised with some Distinctions. For the Lawes of Moses concerned, either the Duties they owed unto God, and one another; or they concerned Magistracy, & Matrimony, & their Civil Polity. Those of the First Sort, belonged unto Proselytes, as well as unto Jewes; yett, as Mr. Selden shewes, with some Temperament. But in those of the Second Sort, they had not an æqual Priviledge; They were not admitted unto any sort of Command, civil or military; they might not marry with the Priests; & certain Marriages were permitted unto them, which were forbidden unto the Israelites.³

A. Dr. Outram, after a long Consideration of the Matter, comes to this Conclusion; That in Leviticus, the Lord requires a Young Bullock to be slain for a Sin-Offering; when the whole Congregation, tho' adhæring to the true Worship of God in every thing, were led ignorantly, to do something against some Negative Precept, that is, to practise what God had forbidden. [This appears to be the Import of the Words, in Lev. 4.13, 14.] But the Kid of the Goats here mentioned, for a Sin-Offering, together with a Young Bullock for a Burnt-Offering; was to be sacrificed, when all the People, forgetting the Holy Rites præscribed by Moses, (which often happened under Bad Kings,) fell by a common Error into Idolatrous Worship: which agrees very well, with what is said in the Two Verses foregoing, where he speaks of not observing the Holy Rites about Sacrifices.⁵

Q. Who is meant by the Sinner, which does presumptuously, or, acts with an High Hand? v. 30.

A. Grotius thinks, 'Tis the Atheistical Sinner, Qui præfractè negat esse Deum, aut Legem à Deo datam. But then, hee thinks, tis the Impenitent Sinner too; hee adds, Eodem Nomine appellatur, qui monitus in Legem committere pergit.

And for the Cutting off here denounced unto such a Sinner, Grotius, by comparing Deut. 13.13. and Josh. 22.31, 33. thinks, the Meaning to bee, That such a Sinner should not be carried unto the Judges, but bee kill'd by any Man that saw him, as Phinehas kill'd Zimri: And his Goods be made an Anathema.⁶

Q. But the further Emphasis of, Sinning with an High Hand? v. 30.

A. Dr. Denison, in a Sermon, thus paraphrases it; "Even Erecting with an High Hand, the Flag of Defiance against God, as the Metaphor imports."⁷

5 Patrick's muse (Numbers 272–73) is William Outram's De Sacrificiis Judæorum (1677), lib. 1, cap. 14, § 2, pp. 150–52.

6 Hugo Grotius, in his Annotationes ad Numeros (Opera 1:75), thinks it is the atheistic sinner, "who obstinately denies that there is a God or that the law was given by God" But then, he thinks, tis the "impenitent Sinner too"; hee adds, "[who] is called by the same name, who having been warned by the law continues to commit crimes." See also Maimonides's Liber מורה נבוכים [More Nebuchim] Doctor Perplexorum (1629), pars 3, cap. 41, pp. 465–67; Selden's De Jure Naturali & Gentium (1640), lib. 2, cap. 11, esp. pp. 257–60; and Selden's De Synedriis & Præfecturis Juridicis (1650), lib. 1, cap. 6, p. 101.

7 John Denison, D. D. (c. 1569–1629), was an Anglican clergyman, variously headmaster of a free school, vicar of three churches in Reading (Berkshire), and "one of His Maiesties Chaplains" (ODNB). Mather quotes from Denison's The Sinne Against the Holy Ghost Plainly described (1620), bound with Denison's collection Nine Sermons Preached by John Denison (London, 1624), p. 126. A copy of this collection was part of the Mather Family Libraries (Tuttle, "Libraries," p. 57).

Indeed many Translations render it, with an High Hand. And it is Dr. Gells Paraphrase; “As if no Man should Display an Ensign, erect a Hand of Impiety.”⁸

Q. That Sentence, For the Soul of a Man to bee cutt off, pronounced upon the Præsumptuous Offendor, what was the Meaning of it? v. 30.

A. Wonderfully various are the Opinions of the Learned in the Law, about this Matter.

Some of the Jewish Doctors reckon this Cherith to bee peculiar unto the Jewish Oeconomy.⁹ But [Gen. 17.14.] we find it a Punishment provided before the Days of Moses.

The Hebrew Expositors, all agree in this, that by this Excision, is meant, some Judgment immediately sent by God; but they agree not about the particular Kind of it.¹⁰

With R. Saadias, it signifies a Sudden Death; who expounds it, by those Words, [Psal. 55.23.] They shall not live out Half their Days.¹¹

Solomon Jarchi, understands it of Want of Children, & not having Posterity.¹²

Some of the Jewes think, Eternal Torments in another World, are here intended.

Others, that an untimely Death, to cast Men into those Torments, is likewise Included.¹³

8 Among the translators who render it “in manu excelsa” (“with an High Hand”) is Sanctus Pagninus (on Numb. 15:30), in Biblia Sacra ex Santis Pagnini tralatione (1542), p. 32*(D). See also Joannes Piscator’s Commentarii in Omnes Libros in Veteris Testamenti (1646), “Scholia in Cap. XV,” p. 343. Mather’s trusty source says as much in Robert Gell’s Essay toward the Amendment (1659), p. 501(e).

9 The Hebrew concept of כְּרִית or כְּרִיתָ [koreis] or [cherith] signifies “cutting off.”

10 In his Liber מורה נבוכים [More Nebuchim] Doctor Perplexorum (1629), pars 3, cap. 41, pp. 461–62, 464–65, Maimonides distinguishes between four categories of transgressors: “the first being that of the compelled transgressor; the second that of the inadvertent transgressor; the third that of the deliberate transgressor; the fourth that of him who transgresses in a high-handed manner.” However, only the latter is to be considered “a deliberate transgressor who acts with impudence and audacity and makes his transgression known to the public.” In effect, “He reviles the Lord” and “must indubitably be killed” (Guide 3.41.563, 565).

11 Mather refers to the Talmudic scholar and philosopher R. Sa’adiah ben Joseph Gaon (c. 882–942), in his commentary on Psalms כתאב אלתסבִי [Kitāb al-Tashbīl], aka. “Book of Praise” (Psal. 55:23). See H. Malter’s Saadia Gaon (1921), p. 320. See also Mather’s gloss on Psal. 55:23 (BA 4:517–18).

12 Solomon Jarchi, aka. Rashi, on Lev. 20:20, argues that “koreis” or “cutting off” signifies “the punishment of remaining childless.” So, too, “[If] he has children, he buries them; [if] he does not have children, he dies without children,” in Metsudah Chumash/Rashi: Vayikro (3:284).

13 The above positions are all presented by Nachmanides, on Numb. 15:31 (Commentary: Numbers 154–55): this scripture means, “their blood shall be upon them [Lev. 20:27], they shall bear their sin; they shall die childless [Lev. 20:20]; he hath uncovered his sister’s nakedness; he shall bear his iniquity [Lev. 20:17]. ... Now I have seen in the Pirkei Derech Eretz [the following

Maimonides carries it unto the Annihilation of the Soul, and a Perdition like that of a Beast.¹⁴

Some Christians understand it of a Capital Penalty, inflicted by the Magistrate.¹⁵

Others take it for an Ecclesiastical Excommunication.

Some Suppose it, an Immature Death; and some further suppose, Eternal Damnation.¹⁶

After all; Quare, Whether this Punishment must not bee differently expounded, according to the Different Subject-Matter, which it is applied unto. Where cutting off is threatned for of such an Offence, as was not punishable by the Jewish Law, it may mean some Divine Plague, inflicted by the Hand of God Himself. But where tis denounced for a Sin, which the Law took notice of, it may mean, a being dealt withal according to Law, whether by an Execution, or by an Excommunication.

text]: 'What is [the meaning of the expression], his iniquity shall be upon him? It teaches us that the soul is cut off, and [yet] its iniquity is upon it.' That is to say, the sin attaches to it [the soul] even after it is cut off, and it is punished in suffering forever, similar to [the verse], for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched [Isa. 66:24]." See also the Babylonian Talmud, tractate Shevu'oth (13a).

Q. How came they to bee Reubenites, that were Mutineers in the Rebellion against Moses? v. 1.

A. Reuben had been, Unstable as Water; as Water cannot hold itself, but as it is held in a Vessel, so Reuben could not contain himself within the Bounds of Chastity. His Curse therefore was, Thou shalt not excell: Whereupon came such a Dearth of eminent Persons in this Tribe, that neither King, Judge, Priest, nor Prophet, in all the Bible, descended thereof. Yea, few famous Men; only two that were Infamous, namely Dathan & Abiram, Generals of the Mutineers against Moses; haply in hope thus, because of their Extraction, to Recover the lost Birth-right unto their Tribe.

In this business there may bee also seen, the Infection of Company. The Levites of Kohath, & the Reubenites, were near Neighbours, on the Southside of the Tabernacle. Hereupon, it came to pass, that Korah, the Grandchild of Kohath, the Levite, conspired with Dathan & Abiram, against Moses; the Vicinity of their Habitation afforded them the Conveniency of Intercourse & Privacy in their Conspiracy. R. Solomon makes this Reflection upon it; *Wo to the Wicked, & Wo to his Neighbour!*¹

Q. How are we to understand this: Korah, – and Dathan & Abiram, – and On, – took Men? v. 1.

A. The Translators misplace the Word, Took, and the Word, Men, is not in the Original. By this Mistake, the Design of the Holy Spirit is overlook'd; which is, to putt a Difference between the principal Offendor, and those who were drawn into the Rebellion. Tis only Korah, that is the Nominative Case to, Took. This is Dr. Gells Criticism; And the Spanish Bible, and Munster's, & Pagnines, countenance it.²

1 Patrick on Numb. 16:2 (Numbers 288–89); R. Solomon (aka. Rashi): "אוי לרשע אוי לשכנו" ("Woe to the wicked, woe to his neighbor!"), in Metsudah Chumash/Rashi: 4:213), appears to be a quote from מדרש תנחומא [Midrash Tanchuma], Parashas Korach 4 (Metsudah Midrash Tanchuma: Bamidbar II:15).

2 Robert Gell, on Numb. 16.1, in his Essay toward the Amendment (1659), pp. 507d, 508c. The Spanish Bible treats this issue in La Biblia. Que es, Los Sacros Libros Del Vieio y Nuevo Testamento (1602), folio 48^v; Sebastian Münster, in Hebraica Biblia, Latina Planeq (1546), fol. 298 (note a); and Sanctus Pagninus, in Biblia Sacra ex Santis Pagnini tralatione (1542), fol. 33.

The Word, which we render, Took, imports a Schism, a Division, a Sedition. The Chaldee Paraphrase renders it therefore, Et divisus est Core. The Geneva Translation is, He went apart.³

It is remarkable, That the Schismatics are punished alike in the Nature, but not in the Degree of their Punishment. The Sin of Korah was not so heavy, as that of Dathan and Abiram. He was of the Tribe of Levi; They were not so. Their Children were swallowed up with them; so were not his. Of Korah came Samuel; and others that served the Sanctuary.⁴

Q. A Few Illustrations on the amazing History of Korah, fetch'd out of the Incomparable Witsius his Dissertation, De Seditone et Exitio Coræ? v. 1.⁵

A. The Reubenites are by Korah drawn into the Conspiracy, not only from the Advantage of their Scituation, but also from the Discontent arising among them on their being denied the Right of Primogeniture.

*Tam facile ex scintilla exigua magnum repente oritur Incendium!*⁶

It is a little surprising to see, how a People, that very lately in their Slavery, seem to have lost all Sense of Liberty, have an inordinate ambition of Liberty now siezing on them!⁷

Korah was as near akin to the Patriarch Levi, as Aaron.

The Flourishes of Josephus here describing the Outrages of the People, have in them something of a Græcanica solertia, in homine importunam sæpe eloquentiam ostentante.⁸

Moses would Speak and Act nothing till he had first addressed the glorious GOD with ardent and prostrate Supplications; and this in the View of the People. Quamvis precibus ad Jactantionem nunquam usus est, non tamen earundem ipsum puduit.⁹

3 Gell, in Essay toward the Amendment, p. 507e, quotes both the Chaldee Paraphrast and the Geneva version (1560).

4 Gell, Essay (508).

5 The following extracts are from Hermann Witsius's "Dissertatione I: De Seditone et Exitio Corae," in his Meletemata Leidensia (1703), pp. 249–73.

6 Witsius argues, in Meletemata Leidensia ("Dissertatione I," sec. 5, p. 253), that "so easily from a tiny spark arises a great fire of a sudden!"

7 Witsius ("Diss. I," sec. 6, p. 253).

8 Mather's Latin quote from Witsius ("Diss. I," sec. 10, p. 256) is slightly altered; Mather complains about Josephus's bowdlerization "as a Greek ingenuity in a man who often displays annoying eloquence." Josephus Flavius dressing up the story of Corah's rebellion, in Antiquities (4.2–3). It is unclear which of the numerous Latin editions of Josephus's De Antiquitatibus ac De Bello Iudaico Witsius here employed. Complete Latin translations of Josephus's Greek original were available in print at least as early as 1502.

9 Witsius ("Diss. I," sec. 12, p. 257): "Although he [Moses] never used prayers for boasting, nonetheless he was not embarrassed when he did so."

Why was the Offering of Incense the Point of Probation pitch'd upon, and not slaughtered Sacrifice? It was an easier Action, and sooner dispatch'd; and it was also the more worthy Part of the Sacerdotal Ministry: yea, and it was the Point, in which the Sons of Aaron miscarrying a little before had been dreadfully punished.¹⁰

Unto the Speech of Moses, then is added by Josephus, his mention of the Neglect which he had shewed of his own Family. His own Sons had nothing singular done for them. They took their Station among the common Levites. The Spirit of GOD elsewhere sett's a Remark on This; 1. Chron. XXIII.14. *As for Moses the Man of GOD, his Sons were (only) named of the Tribe of Levi.*¹¹

[26v] Dathan & Abiram say, we will not come up. R. Solomon has an elegant Hint upon it. It was an ominous Word, We will not |¹² Go up! No, Wretches, you shall not go up; your Portion will quickly be to *Go down into the Pitt!*¹³

The Occasion of Moses using that Expression, I have not taken one Ass from them, seems to be the Conspirators charging him with an affectation of Tyranny. The Manner of Kings was that, 1. Sam. VIII.16. He will take your Asses & putt them to his Work. Moses declares, that he never demanded the Tribute of one Ass from them.

Compare Samuels Vindication. 1. Sam. XII.3.¹⁴

Tostatus is at a mighty Loss, where they should find so ready their Two Hundred & Fifty Censers.¹⁵ My Witsius thinks, t'was easy to find them, thrown by among the Tribes of Israel, among which they had been used before the Priesthood became confined unto one Family. They might be the Reason to use these, because they were Monuments of their ancient Liberty.¹⁶

I may add, These Kind of Sacred Vessels were anciently very common in private Families. Cicero says, That in Sicily there was not an House without ¹² At the opening of MS [26v], Mather cancels already existing entry [3421.] but restores its substance several paragraphs later. The canceled passage reads, Q. How comes it, there is no mention of On, among ye Accomplices in Corahs Conspiracy? We find him no where but in the First Verse of the Story. What? Was he so Inconsiderable, that no further notice must be taken of him? v. 24.

A. Or, Lett us charitably hope, that he had forsaken ye Conspirators, as Moses wished all the People to do, on which Condition God promised that He would pardon them. []. See Appendix A.

¹⁴ Witsius (sec. 19, p. 261).

¹⁶ Witsius (sec. 21, p. 262).

them. Demosthenes affirms the same, of Greece; And Athenaeus, of Egypt. The Israelites might have enough of them from the Egyptians.¹⁷

The Fire for their Censers, doubtless They, as well as Aaron, took from the Altar of Burnt-Offering. But considering whence That came, & what a Testimony its coming from Heaven gave to the Aaronic Priesthood, it is a Wonder that it awakened no more Horror in them.¹⁸

The Piety of Moses and Aaron express'd, in their Essays to avert the Anger of GOD from the Congregation. Novum, prorsusque eximium incredibilis prope-modum pietatis exemplum.¹⁹

The Two hundred & fifty that were with Korah, standing with Censers before the Tabernacle, were consumed by Fire issuing forth from the Tabernacle, while they were offering their Incense.²⁰

What became of On, the Son of Pelet, who had been mentioned amongst Korah's accomplices? Tis thought by some, a Seasonable Repentance delivered him. Or, else the Lowness & Smallness of his Quality may be the Reason why there is no further Notice taken of him.²¹

This is very sure; The Sons of Korah so far withdrew from the Crime of their Father, that they did not perish with him.²²

There is a Problem, what became of Korah? was he consumed by the Fire of GOD? or was he swallowed up in the Earth, with Dathan and Abiram.²³

Witsius inclines unto the latter Opinion. The Israelites are bidden to depart from the Tents of Korah, as well as of Dathan & Abiram, that they may not be swallow'd up. There were only Two hundred & fifty devoured by the Fire: And so many there were without Korah in the Numbers; yea, tis expressly said, Num. XXVI.10. The Earth swallowed them up, together with Korah. It seems that Korah retired from the Tabernacle to his Tent, at the time when Moses with the Elders went with the Warnings to the Tents of Dathan and Abiram.²⁴

In his Oration against Gaius Verres, pro-praetor of Sicily (c. 74 BCE), Cicero expresses amazement about "how many beautifully wrought censers there were" in Sicily (Secondary Orations against Verres 2.4.46); Athenaeus, Deipnosophistae (11.40), cites Hellanicus's History and Manners of the Egyptians, which comments on the "brazen φιάλη" cups (censers) found in Egyptian houses; Demosthenes, Contra Timotheus (22, 32, 62–64), mentions the great value of these silver censers (bowls).

Q. The Lord saies of the Tabernacle, – where I will meet with you. With whom? v. 4.

A. With Moses, by whom He communicated His Mind unto the People. He mett neither with them, nor with Aaron, there, any other Way, but by Moses.

Indeed here Meeting with them, is nothing but the Lords declaring His Mind unto them all, by what was here done upon Aarons Rod.

And for this Reason, tis called, the Tabernacle of Meeting: (Not of Mens Meeting there, as is commonly supposed, by our Translating it, The Tabernacle of the Congregation;) but of Gods Meeting there with Men. For so the Lord Himself gives the Reason of the Name, here, and Exod. 29.42. and 30.36.¹

Q. The Blossoming of Aarons Rod? v. 8.²

A. An Almond Rod was of all the most properly taken. Here it miraculously Budded, and Flowred, and brought forth Almonds, in a Night. It is naturally of all Trees the most precocious. Its original Name implies a Speedy Efflorescence. [Which by the way gives us the Emphasis, of Jer. 1.11. What seest thou? and he said, A Rod of an Almond Tree. Then said the Lord unto me, – I will hasten the Word, to perform it.] It naturally flowers in February and shewes its Fruit in March. But here, Miracle vastly outdid Nature.³

We may now more easily apprehend the Expression in Ecclesiastes; Eccles. 12.5. When the Almond-tree shall flourish. That is, when the Head, which is the prime Part, and first sheweth itself in the World, shall grow white, like the Flowers of the Almond-tree: whose Fruit, as Athenæus tells us, was first called, καρηνον, or The Head, from some Resemblance, and covering Parts of it.⁴

How properly was the Priority here, confirmed by a Rod or Staff?

The Rods and Staffs of Princes, were the Badges of their Places; A kind of Sceptre in their Hands; a Sign, a Cognisance of their Dignity. In old Pictures, the

2 Mather extracts his annotations on this verse from Sir Thomas Browne's "Observations Upon several Plants mention'd in Scripture" (pp. 238–40, § 24), in Certain Miscellany Tracts (1684), in Works (3:218–80). The question why God chose the rod of Moses for some miracles and that of Aaron for others is explored in "Occasional Annotation, IV," in Bibliotheca Biblica (1728), 4:234–37.

3 Browne (Works 3:238–39).

4 Browne (Works 3:239); Athenæus's variously describes the καρηνον (head, bulb), virtues, and appearance of Almonds and Almond trees in his Deipnosophistae (2.38–43, 3.24).

Gods and Goddesses, ordinarily have the Staff of Divinity in their Hands. The Trojan and Græcian Princes were not without the like; which the Shoulders of Thersites felt from the Hand of Ulysses. Achilles in Homer, as by a desperate Oath, swears by his Woodden Sceptre, which should never bud nor bear Leaves again. That Oath of Achilles, illustrates and advances the Miracle of Aaron. And if it could be well made out, that Homer had seen the Books of Moses, in that Expression of Achilles, he might allude unto this Miracle.⁵

In this Miracle, the Leaves which come after the Flowers, and before the Almonds, (that middle Germination,) seem to be omitted.

In the Medals, which pass among us by the Name of the *Jerusalem-Shekel*s, it is judg'd by Sir Thomas Browne, that the Rod of Aaron is improperly laden with many Leaves. That which they show under the Name of the Samaritan Shekel, seems most conformable unto the Text, which describes the Fruit without Leaves.⁶

5 Browne (Works 3:239); Homer (Iliad 1.234–39) has Achilles swear a great oath: “by this staff here – that will never again put out leaves or shoots since it first left its stump in the mountains, nor will it again grow green, for the bronze has stripped it of leaves and bark, and now the sons of the Achæans that give judgment bear it in their hands, those who guard the laws that come from Zeus; and this shall be for you a mighty oath.” During the Trojan War, the Greek soldier Thersites exhorts the Argives to board their long ships and revenge Paris’s abduction of Helen (wife of Menelaus) whose ravishing face launched a thousand ships (Iliad 2.135ff).

Q. The Best of the Oyl, and the Best of the Wine? v. 12.

A. What we render, The Best, is in the Original, The Fatt. There is in these, a Lentor, & an Unctuousity, which may agreeably enough be called so. However, I don't quarrel with the Version, as Dr. Gell would have me.

But then, the other Words; they strictly signify, New Oyl, and, New Wine. And, the Gentleman aforesaid, would have the difference betwixt New and Old in these, preserved; otherwise, how shall we distinguish them in our English, when they differ in the Hebrew? As Prov. XXI.17.¹

Q. The Maintenance allowed unto the Priests, methinks, it was very liberal? v. 20.

A. Yes. Without any Share in the Land, their Portion was far Richer, than that of any other Persons whatsoever.

As they had yearly, the First-fruits of the whole Countrey, which was at least the Sixtieth Part of the Fruits it produced: And the Tenth Part of the Tithe given to the Levites: And all the Free-Will Offerings; Together with the Money which arose out of Persons and Things devoted unto God: And all the Firstlings of Cowes, and Sheep, and Goats: And the Redemption-Money for the First-lings of such Creatures as were unclean: So, they had all the Meat-Offerings, Offerings for Sin, and Trespass-Offerings; Together with the Breast and Shoulder of all Peace-Offerings, and the Skins of all Burnt-Offerings; And the Loaves made of the First Dough, and the Shew-bread; And [as Josephus and others expound, Deut. 18.3.] a considerable Part of every Beast, that was killed for private Use: Besides the Cities and Land about them, which were assigned unto the Levites.²

[28v] If all this be well weigh'd, there will appear a vast difference between the Priests, and the rest of the People. For the First-fruits alone, if they | were not less than the Sixtieth Part of the Product of the Countrey, might seem sufficient; especially if the Firstlings be added: The Priests not being the Sixtieth Part of the People, no, nor the Hundredth Part, as other learned Men, besides Bonfrerius, have computed it.³

Q. The Lawes, about the Sacrifice of the Red Heifer, seem to bee some of the most unaccountable, among all the Mosaic Institutions. Why a Female? Why a Young one? Why a Red one? Why not slain at the Door of the Tabernacle? Why not its Blood poured at the Foot of the Altar? Why none of it Eaten, but all Burned, without the Camp, that so a Water of Separation might bee made of its Ashes, for the Purification of the Unclean? And why, yett, if a clean Person touched either Water, or Ashes, or Flesh of this Creature, hee contracted thereby a New Pollution? These things have so amazed the Jewes, that R. Solomon saies more than once, they were, Absque ullâ Ratione;¹ and they declare that King Solomon himself did not know the Reason of them. Yea, they proceed unto such Fabulous Blasphemy, as to say, Eâ horâ quâ Moses ascendit in Altum, invenit Deum Sanctum Benedictum, studentem in illâ Sectione Legis, quæ est, De Vaccâ Rufâ.² And among our Christian Interpreters, the Ablest profess with Calvin, Nescire malo, quam Dubium aliquod asserere.³ and, Simeon De Muis, Tutius ac melius est

1 R. Solomon Jarchi, aka. Rashi, wonders about the rational foundation of certain ritual laws that seem arbitrary and “without any reason.” He concludes, God-given statutes are not to be questioned: “Therefore, the Torah referred to it as חֻקֵּה a statute,” signifying, “I [the Lord] have decreed it, and you are not permitted to question it” (Metsudah Chumash/Rashi 4:251). See also Tanchuma, Parashas Chukas 7 (Metsudah Midrash Tanchuma: Bamidbar II:103). See also ספר העקרים [Sefer Ha-Ikkarim] (1522), lib. 3, cap. 24, by the Spanish philosopher R. Joseph Albo (c. 1380–1440) of Soria, Castile (SEP). Albo explains that the Torah contains certain strictures, which express God’s inscrutable will. “They go by the name of ‘statutes,’ and embrace all those commandments whose reason is not known, such as the prohibition of swine’s flesh, or of wearing garments of wool and flax mixed, or of sowing diverse seeds, or so on, which are royal fiats, things which God willed after He commanded them” (Sefer Ha-Ikkarim: The Book of Principles [1946], vol. 3, ch. 24, p. 208). Likewise, R. Moses Maimonides famously tries to discern the rationale for certain divine statutes for which there seem to be no apparent reason (Guide 3.29–30.514–23; 3.31–33.523–34). See also my introduction, section 2.

2 Mather’s second-hand quotation (via Spencer’s De Legibus [1685], fol. 369) originates in Theodor Hackspan’s notations on his Hebrew/Latin edition of ספר נצחון Liber Nizachon Rabbi Lipmanni (1644), “De scriptorum Judaicorum in Theologia usu vario & multiplici Tractatus,” cap. 1, p. 260. The citation reads, “At that hour when Moses went up upon high, he found holy and blessed God give attention to that section of the law which concerns the red heifer.”

3 Via Spencer (369), Mather quotes from John Calvin’s “Appendix Alia De Censu Solvendo ex Exodi III.” Numer. XIX, 1. Primum Praeceptum, sec. 1, Opera Quae Supersunt Omnia (24:333). To the question, “Quid sibi vult rufus color in vaccâ?” (“What, then, is the meaning of the red colour?”), Calvin’s responds, “nescire malo, quàm dubium aliquod asserere” (“I prefer confessing my ignorance to advancing anything doubtful”), in Commentaries on the Four Last Books of Moses (2:39).

*fateri, istius statuti causam prorsus ignorari.*⁴ Doubtless, with the Help of your learned Spencer, you may give mee some Notable Illustrations of these perplexed Lawes? v. 2.⁵

A. I'll Try. But you must give mee Leave to advise with some others, besides that learned Man, and in some Things Dissent from him.

First; Lett us enquire, why a Female, an Heifer, was appointed for this wonderful Sacrifice; when a Male was generally præferred for Sacrifice; yea, a Male was opposed unto a, Corrupt Thing?

Now, you must know, That Authors enow have told us, of the Egyptian Superstition, which Herodotus particularly thus describes; They sacrifice male Beeves & Calves, τὰ δὲ θηλέας οὐ σφιν ἔξεστι θύειν, But it is not lawful for them to sacrifice the Females, for they are sacred unto Isis: And in another Place, Βοῦς τὰς θηλέας Αἰγύπτιοι πάντες ὁμοίως σέβονται, The Egyptians, do all of them worship female Beeves.⁶ And Porphyrie also refers to it, when hee saies, That among the Egyptians & Phœnicians, they would sooner meddle with Mans-Flesh, than with Cowes-flesh.⁷ Now, in Affront, & Contempt of that Egyptian Superstition, the Lord commands the Israelites, to Slay and Burn, the Creature to which they offered a Sacred Honour. To this Purpose you have a Passage in Thomas Aquinas, It was, forte ideo quia Vaccas in morem Ægypti coluerunt. Secundum illud Hosea, Vaccas Bethaven coluerunt.⁸ And another Passage in Josephus de Voisin, It was, Ut ita ab Idololatriâ Hominum Animi averterentur, dum ea sacrificarent quæ apud Idololatræ sacra errant, et in veneratione habebantur.⁹ Tis very certain, and such Authors as

4 Simeon De Muis, on Numb. 19, in Variorum Sacrorum Specimen Variis e Rabbinis contextum (1634), p. 441, echoes Calvin's diffidence, saying "It is safer and better to admit entirely to not knowing the reason for this statute."

5 The preceding and following paragraphs are synopsized from John Spencer's De Legibus Hebraeorum (1685), lib. 2, cap. 15, fols. 369–93.

6 Spencer (De Legibus [1685], lib. 2, cap. 15, sec. 2, fol. 373); Herodotus (2.41, lines 2–3, 5–6)

7 Porphyrius (De Abstinencia 2.11, lines 5–6): παρὰ γοῦν Αἰγυπτίοις καὶ Φοίνιξι θᾶπτον ἂν τις ἀνθρωπείων κρεῶν γεύσαιτο ἢ θηλείας βοός. Mather provides his own translation.

8 St. Thomas Aquinas here leans on Maimonides's explanation (Guide 3.26.506–10, 3.30–32.522–31) and comments on "Israel hath gone astray like a wonton heifer" (Hos. 4:16). St. Thomas believes that Hosea's words indicate that "this was, perhaps, because they worshipped heifers after the custom of Egypt. [Secondly, according to Hos. 10:5, they] have worshipped the kine of Bethaven" (Summa Theologica, pt. 1–2.Q. 102, art. 5, Reply Obj. 5 (1a-IIae 2:1072). Cotton Mather bought a duplicate copy of Aquinas's Summa Theologica (1614) from Harvard College, see C. S. Bringham, "Harvard College Duplicates, 1682" (p. 411).

9 Mather's second-hand quote (via Spencer 373) is from Liber de Lege Divina Secundum Statum Omnium temporum (1650), cap. 15, p. 247, by the RC priest Joseph de Voisin, a French Hebraist of Bordeaux, and author of several Hebraic studies, including Theologia Judaeorum (1647) and De Jubilæo (1655) (CBTEL). A study of the Mishnah, De Voisin's Liber de Lege Divina in the present context examines the Sixth Division (Tohoroth) on ritual cleanliness, sec. 4: Parah ("Red Heifer"), and cites Maimonides's Liber מורה נבוכים [More Nebuchim] Doctor Perplexorum (3.46.480–90) as evidence that the Zabian (pagan) cultic rites informed many Levitical Laws. De Voisin's Latin passage explains that the worship of the red heifer (Egypt

Origen, and Theodoret, as well as Jonathan and Maimonides, have noted it, That such Creatures, as the Egyptians Idolized, the Lord ordered His Israelites, either to Butcher them in Sacrifices, or to Banish them from all Sacred Uses whatsoever.¹⁰ Yea, Tacitus complained of the Jewes, Prophana illis omnia, quæ apud Nos Sacra.¹¹ And, old Manethon gives this report of Moses, as Josephus tells us, Hee commanded the Jewes in the first Place, that they should not Abstain from the Creatures that were most sacred among the Egyptians, πάντα τὲ θύειν καὶ ἀναλοῦν· but bring them under Sacrifice & Destruction.¹² From hence might arise Part of the Rage, with which the Egyptians usually treated the Jewes, in after-ages. Briefly, The Lord, would bring the Heifer to the same Level, with other Creatures, in Opposition to the Heifer-Worship of the Egyptians, among whom the Israelites had so long been conversant, that Philoponus truly calls them, τοῖς Αἰγυπτίων σεβασμασι συναναπεφυρμένον γένος· Ægyptiorum Cultibus et Idolis Aspersum et Commixtum Genus.¹³ Shall wee also say this further upon it? Plutarch informs us, that the Egyptians did sacrifice a Red Ox to Typhon; and now, that the Rites of Typhon might not run too much in the Minds of the People, the Lord would have a Creature of the Cow-kind, & not of the Ox-kind, sacrificed unto Himself. Indeed all the Mosaic Rites, did in some remarkable Circumstances, vary from the Egyptian.¹⁴ Yea, Tis not unobservable, That the Sacrifice of this Heifer, was a Purification for Sin; even, for the Sin of Heifer-Worship, which they had committed in Egypt, as also, for their Worship of that Hee-Calf in the Wilderness; It is a Note of Maimonides, That, Quanto peccatum aliquod fuit gravius, tanto vilioris

Isis) had a powerful hold on the Israelites. Thus the red heifer was completely burned outside the camp of the Israelites “so that the minds of men might be turned from idolatry, while they sacrificed that which is wrongfully deemed sacred and held in esteem among the idolaters.”

10 Origen (Contra Celsum 4.93), in ANF (4:538–39); Theodoretus Cyrrensis, “Sermo VII: De Sacrificiis,” in Opera Omnia, 4:584 (CD); Targum Jonathan ben Uzziel (Lev. 9:3–4), in Walton’s Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (4:194); Maimonides (Guide 3.30.522–23).

11 Tacitus (Historiarum 5.4) and Histories (5.4.234–35) complains that they “regard as profane all that we hold sacred,” adding that the Jews allow everything we abominate.

12 Josephus Flavius (Contra Apionem 1.239–240, lines 3–4) and Against Apion (1.26.618); Manetho, Ægyptiaca Fragmenta (Fragm. 54, lines 65–66).

13 Spencer (374) quotes a line from De opificio mundi (160, lines 15–16), by the Greek Christian grammarian and commentator Joannes Philoponus Alexandrinus (490–570 CE). The quotation is adapted in the bilingual edition In Cap. I. Geneseos, De Mundi Creatione Libri Septem (1630), lib. 4, cap. 1, p. 145, by the Belgian Jesuit of Antwerp Balthasar Corderius, aka. Cordier (1592–1650), professor of theology at the University of Vienna, Austria (CE). Philoponus argues that “a people sprinkled and mixed up with the worship and idols of the Egyptians.”

14 Plutarch (De Iside et Osiride 31.363b) explains, “The Egyptians, because of their belief that Typhon was of a red complexion, also dedicate to sacrifice such of their neat cattle as are of a red colour, but they conduct the examination of these so scrupulously that, if an animal has but one hair black or white, they think it wrong to sacrifice it; for they regard as suitable for sacrifice not what is dear to the gods but the reverse, namely, such animals as have incarnate in them souls of unholy and unrighteous men who have been transformed into other bodies. For this reason they invoke curses on the head of the victim and cut it off.” See also Herodotus (2.38) and Diodorus Siculus (1.88).

*speciei fuit ejus oblatio. Hinc pro errore Idololatriæ, Capra tantum, et pro cæteris peccatis Hominis alicujus privati, Agna et Capra offerenda fuit: quia femella vilior habetur mare in omnibus speciebus: nullum autem peccatum majus Idololatriâ, et nulla species vilior Caprâ.*¹⁵ It is likewise a Note of this Maimonides, That the Expiation bore a Character of the Transgressions. Aaron sinned about a Calf, and the Sacrifice for him, & his Children, was accordingly such a Calf: And whereas all the Sin-Offerings at their Three principal Festivals, were of Kids, hee adds, *Hujus Rei causa hæc mihi videtur esse, quod maximum peccatum et gravissima tum Temporis Rebellio esset, quod Hircis sacrificarent.*¹⁶ Thus the Israelites, that had sinned by Heifer-Worship in Egypt, must now sacrifice an Heifer.

[29v] | But then, if a Female, why an Heifer, a Calf, & not a Cow? The Hebrew Name, signifies one that is not gone beyond Three Years old; Lorin, and Ainsworth, as well as old Cyril, & abundance more, do mistake, when they assert a, Vacca Triennis, to bee herein required; And our English Translation, An Heifer, ha's indeed well corrected the most of the former Translations.¹⁷ Now this also was, to oppose the Institutions of the Gentiles; among whom generally, a Calf, was a Sacrifice peculiar to the Moon; as among the Egyptians, it was particularly sacred unto Isis. Jeroboams Conversation in Egypt, was that which therefore learnt him, his Calf-Worship; his Idols the Seventy, as well as Josephus, call δαμάλεις χρυσᾶς, and Hosæah [ch. 10.5.] remembers, The Calves of Beth aven.¹⁸ Tis not likely, that hee made the Cherubim, of the Jewish Temple, his Idols, to make his unhappy Superstition, and Separation, the more specious: Bochart ha's enough confuted That:¹⁹ God would have that Creature fall under Execration, 15 Maimonides's Liber מורה נבוכים [More Nebuchim] Doctor Perplexorum (3.46.486) notes that "the greater the sin that had been committed, the more defective was the species from which the sacrifice offered up for it was taken. Therefore only a she-goat is offered up for an act of idolatry committed inadvertently [Numb. 15:27], and other sins of a private individual require a ewe-lamb or a she-goat. For a female is in all species more defective than the male, and there is no sin greater than idolatry, and no kind more defective than a she-goat" (Guide 3.46.587–588).

16 Maimonides, in Doctor Perplexorum (3.46.487), adds, "[This] is the reason, in my opinion, that their greatest act of disobedience consisted at the time in sacrificing to the se'irim [i. e., 'he-goats' and 'devils']" (Guide 3.46.588). See also Lev. 17:7.

17 Spencer (lib. 2, cap. 15, sec. 1, fol. 370); the French Jesuit theologian and biblical commentator Joannes Lorinus, aka. Jean de Lorin (1559–1634), argues in his long commentary on Numb. 19:2, in Commentarii in Librum Numeri (1623), p. 698(D), that the red heifer must be three-years old; and so do Henry Ainsworth (Annotations upon the Five Bookes of Moses, p. 117, sep. pag.) and Cyrillus Alexandrinus (Expositio in Psalmos) [PG 069. 1176, line 29].

18 Both the LXX (3. Kings 12:28, line 2) and Josephus Flavius (Antiquitates 8.226, line 1) relate that Jeroboam made two "golden heifers" for his temples at Bethel and Dan (Antiquities 8.8.4) to keep the Ten Tribes of the N. kingdom from their pilgrimage to the Temple in Jerusalem, the capital of their rivals in Judah.

19 See Appendix A. Samuel Bochart, in Hieroicoicon (1663), pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 41, col. 410, line 33–58, insists that the red heifer must be younger than 3 years old. On the significance of sacrificial calves, see esp. pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 30, col. 290 ff.

as an Instrument of Expiation, among His People, that was an Object of Adoration among the Pagans.

But, why must the Heifer bee entirely Red? For, tis very clear, that the Qualification of /תְּמִימָה/ Perfect, here signifies, the Perfection of the Reddish; or as Josephus renders it, ξανθὴν, Yellow, Colour in it.²⁰ The Jewes took it so; & would therefore as Maimonides writes, pull out every Black or White Hair, that could bee found upon the Creature: with Superstition enough.²¹ And so saies Lyra, Vox, Integra, refertur ad Colorem Vaccae, quae debebat esse Rubea integraliter.²² Tho' learned Men oppose it, yett wee will subscribe to Munster, who also saies, Rufa Integra, here notes, Omninò Rufa, et quae nullos nigros habet pilos.²³ Well: Shall wee now say, that it was because the Red Colour, was the most common among that Sort of Cattel? So Pindar indeed more than once intimates.²⁴ But the Lord would not have mentioned any Colour at all, if hee had therein aimed only at the Attaineableness of the Offering. Or, shall wee say, that the Red Colour had a Singular Gratefulness therein, to Men, & therefore to God also? Indeed Homer, and Libanius intimate as much; and Mahomet, after his Manner, speaking of this Matter, saies, The Oblectation of the Eye was therein proposed.²⁵ But this is altogether of an Arbitrary Strain. The Jewes then think, that the Gold Colour of Aarons Calf, was herein referr'd unto; the Crime of which Calf, the Lord would 20 Spencer (371); Heb. תְּמִימָה [tamiym] signifies “complete, whole entire, sound” (Strong’s # 8549). Josephus Flavius (Antiquitates 4.79, lines 1–2) and Antiquities (4.4.6): After Miriam’s burial, Moses purified the Israelites by slaughtering “a heifer that had never been used to the plough or to husbandry, that was complete in all its parts, and entirely of a red colour, at a little distance from the camp, into a place perfectly clean” (italics added).

21 In his הלכות פרה אדומה רבי משה בן מיימון. Hilchot Parah Adumah: Tractatus de Vacca Rufa (1711), cap. 1, § (א), pp. 4, 5, Maimonides explains, “The Torah’s description of [this heifer] as ‘perfect’ means ‘perfectly red,’ not perfect in stature. Even if it is dwarf size, it is acceptable, as is the law regarding other sacrifices [Bechorot 45(b)]. If it had two white hairs or black hairs growing from one follicle or from two cavities and they are lying on top of each other, it is unacceptable” (Hilchot Parah Adumah 1.2), in Mishneh Torah (24.1), p. 200.

23 Spencer (372); Sebastian Münster, on Numb. 19:2, in Hebraica Biblia, Latina Planeg (1546), fol. 304, glosses, “Perfectly red [here means] entirely red, and without any black hair.”

24 Spencer (375). In the hall of Pelias, king of Iolcus, Jason (questing for the Golden Fleece) invokes Poseidon and swears, “I leave you the flocks, and the golden herds of cattle.” Later in their journey across the sea, Jason and his Argonauts arrived at the holy precinct of the Earth-Shaker, and there saw nestled “a heard of red Thracian bulls” (Pindar, Pythian. Ode 4.148, 205).

25 Spencer (376); Homer (Iliad 13.703–4) chants, how Aias (son of Oïleus) and Aias (son of Telamon) battled side by side – just like “two wine-dark oxen with one accord strain at the jointed plough.” Likewise, in his Progymnasmata (12.2.6, line 4), Libanius Antiochenes explains that the Phoenicians cherished the reddish color of heifers. Even the Archangel Gabriel, who appeared to the prophet Muhammad, reminds the faithful what the Israelites said to Moses when he commanded to sacrifice a cow: “[P]ray unto thy Lord, that he shew us of what colour it [the cow] ought to be. It must, said he [Moses], be of a bright, yellow colour, that it may delight the eyes of the beholders” ([Sura 2:69], in Du Ryer’s The Alcoran [1649], ch. 2, p. 6).

have to bee kept in perpetual Memory.²⁶ And may not wee Christians also think, that the Bloody Sufferings of the Messiah to come, were in this Colour also exhibited? Both Fathers and Moderns, have been, whole Thousands of them, thus perswaded. But, because Plutarch reports, (as well as Diodorus Siculus) that the Egyptians, did sacrifice Red Cattel, to Typhon, whom they esteemed Red, & upon whose account they hated the Red Colour, in Man & Beast, inasmuch as hee had killed their Osiris;²⁷ therefore Dr. Spencer thinks, that the Egyptian Rite, was considered in this Law of Israel: God would show, that a Red Heifer was of as much account with Him, as any other Creature of Sacrifice.²⁸ The Creature, which the Egyptians most Honoured, namely an Heifer, God would have to bee Destroy'd with Fire; and the Colour which the Egyptians most Abhorred, God chose to putt a Respect upon. Indeed, if I were satisfied, That the Original Story of Typhon, were not of later Date, than the Ante-Mosaic Ages, tho' I freely allow their Heifer-Worship to have been before, or, That the Divels, which had the Government of Egypt, did not in many Superstitions Ape the Institutions which God first gave unto His People, not withstanding the Antipathy which the Egyptians themselves, had unto Hebrew Customes; I should myself bee altogether of this Opinion. But because I am not so fully of that most learned Mans Judgment in that Point, I rather make you a Tender of the Two Conjectures, which immediately præceded This. Altho' doubtless, the Spencerian Account of these things, is well worthy to bee considered.

But, why must the Heifer bee one that never came under the Yoke? Of this, I need only to say, That it præserv'd the Reverence & Majesty of Heaven, to have that offered thereunto, which had never been putt unto any other Uses. (Hence the Ass on which our Lord Rode, & the Grave wherein our Lord lay, must bee such, as had never been used before.) Thus, among all the Ancient Nations, Creatures that were δεδαμασμενα, Tamed, were counted (as Chæremôn the Egyptian, speaks in Porphyrie) unfit for Sacrifice.²⁹ Thus, the Sacrificers in Homer promise to Pallas, Βουν ἀδμητην· Vaccam Indomitam.³⁰ And Virgil, Horace, Ovid,

Seneca, tell us, that the Romans made such their Sacrifices;³¹ Vitulas Injuges, does Macrobius, call them.³² Arnobius tells us, Minervæ Virgini; Virgo Cæditur Vitula, nullis unquam Stimulis, nullis operis exercitata conatu.³³ An Institution, doubtless, of what had been required by the Lord.

For my own Part, I do with all Thankfulness Enjoy and Improve, the Vast Reading, with which the Writings of Dr. Spencer, are on these Points adorned.³⁴ Nevertheless, I cannot go on, with any further Delibations from the Writings of that most Learned Man, until I first give you a more Evangelical Account of the whole Sacrifice before us.

I say then, a Red Heifer was called for; to repræsent the Bloody Passion of the Messiah to come; and perhaps also to repræsent His Humane Nature, derived from Adam, who was made out of Red Earth.³⁵

It must bee an Heifer, not only without Blemish; which was to note the Purity of the Messiah; but also, on which never came {a} Yoke, to note, the Freedome of the Messiah from the Bondage of Sin; & His refusing to submitt unto the Invention of Men in the Worship of God; & His Voluntariness in Suffering for us.³⁶

This Heifer must bee slain without the Camp. The Apostle does [in Heb. 13.10, 11, 12, 13, 14.] largely Expound & Apply this Action with Relation to the Messiah; who was carried forth to Golgotha, and slain without the City.³⁷ When the Jewes were settled in the Possession of the Promised Land, they would then carry out the Heifer, as the | Talmuds tell us, to bee offered upon the Top of Mount Olivet. The Mount, where you know, (it is L'Empereurs Reflection also) [30r] our Lord endured His Agony.³⁸ This was a Sacrifice more than ordinarily Piacular; and it is remarkable, in the Law of Sacrifices, That, Quo magis Immundæ essent, et quasi peccatis oneratæ, eò Longius à Sanctuaris et Præsentia Numinis

31 Mather, via Spencer (382), here leans on Bochart's Hierozaicon (1663), pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 33, col. 322; Vergil (Georgics 4.550–51), Horace (Epod 9.21–22), Ovid (Fasti 3.375–76), Lucius Aeneas Seneca, the Younger (Agamemnon 353–55).

32 Spencer (382); Macrobius (Saturnalia 3.5.5) speaks of “unyoked heifers,” i.e., heifers never before yoked.

33 Even Arnobius of Sicca (Adversus gentes 7.22.2) tells us, “To the virgin Minerva is slain a virgin calf, never forced by the goad to attempt any labour” (Against the Heathen 7.22), in ANF (6:526).

34 Mather's genuine admiration for John Spencer's vast learning (esp. in De Legibus Hebraeorum) does not render him uncritical of Spencer's heterodox thesis that Moses borrowed many of the Egyptian cultic rites and adapted them to his own purposes.

exularent. The Heifer was eminently a, Chattath, a Sin-Offering; & so to bee Burned without the Camp.³⁹

If you should bee inquisitive, why Eleazer the Son, & not Aaron the Father, must have the Ordering of this Matter; for so I understand the Text, that the Heifer must bee slain, in His (& His Successors) Presence, by some Hand, which Hee should assign: Dr. Spencer inclines to think, there was a Reason for it, In peculiari aliquâ sæculi illius circumstantiâ, quam vetustas jam oblitteravit: and hee does not much admire the Reason offered by Tostatus, Quia ista Immolatio non exat valdè Honorabiles et Excellens.⁴⁰ But perhaps, if you'll attentively consider the Agency & the Qualitie of the High-Priest, about the Death of the Messiah, you may see something of the Mystery, herein signified.

The Blood of the slain Heifer, was to bee Sprinkled Seven Times, towards the Tabernacle. Bochart observes, that Exodus, & Leviticus, mentions no Victims, but such wherein, Toties sacerdos spargit Sanguinem ad Altare circumcircuit.⁴¹ Compare Heb. 9.21. and 1. Pet. 1.2. And it is a Canon among the Jewes, Radix (i. e. Essentia) Sacrificij est in Aspersione Sanguinis.⁴² The Sacrificer, by Sprinkling towards the Tabernacle, declared that hee sacrificed unto none but the True God. But the Tabernacle was also a Type of Heaven and so wee are here taught, that our Access into Heaven, is only by the Blood of the Messiah. Seven, is a Number of Perfection, which the Great God chose, to bee Sacred unto Himself; and it was much used, in the mystical Dispensations of the Scriptures. Compare Naamans washing Seven Times. Moreover, As wee are Perfectly cleansed, by the Blood of the Messiah, so wee must have it Frequently applied, no less than Seven Times over, unto our Consciences.

For the Burning, of the Heifer, wee need say no more, than what wee do, when wee speak of the other Sacrifices. But, why must it bee burn't, with Cedar, Hyssop, and Scarlet, cast into the Fire? My Uncle, Mr. Samuel Mather, in his Discourses on the Types, ha's these Remarks upon it.⁴³

"Cedar is noted, for an excellent Kind of Timber, the Cheef of the Trees; and the Scripture doth sometimes apply it unto Christ, Cant. 5.15. Excellent as

39 Spencer (384 §1) glosses, "by this the more unclean, as if laden with sin, are thereby exiled further from the sanctuaries and protection of God's presence."

40 Spencer (384) comments, "In some special circumstances of that age, which the passage of time has now wiped out." The Spanish theologian Alphonsus Tostatus adds, on Numb. 19, in his Commentari in Primam Partem Numerorum (Opera [1728], tom. 5, Numb. 19, Quaestio VI, p. 415(A), "that this sacrifice does not come out very honorable and extraordinary."

41 Spencer (385); Bochart, Hieroicoicon (1663), pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 50, col. 574, lines 56–57, maintains that "the priest sprinkles the blood around the altar as often [as seven times]."

42 Bochart, Hieroicoicon (pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 50, col. 574, lines 64–65), adds that "the root purpose [i. e., essence] of the sacrifice is the sprinkling of the blood." See Maimonides, De Paschate (2.6), Hilchot Korban Pesach (2.6), in Mishneh Torah (30:26).

43 The two following paragraphs are nearly verbatim extracts from Samuel Mather's sermon "The Gospel of Legal Purgation," preached on Sept. 20. 1668, in Figures or Types (1705), pp. 309–10.

the Cedars. It is a durable Tree, not subject unto Putrefaction. Therefore some Interpret this Law, as a shadow of the perpetual efficacy of the Death of Christ, — who by his Offering, perfected forever, them that are sanctified.” {Heb. 10.4}

“As for Hyssop there must bee a Bunch thereof to sprinkle with. Hence David prayes, Psal. 51.7. Purge mee with Hyssop. Some Apply it thus; That the Bunch of Hyssop, wherewith they sprinkled the Blood, is the Word of Promise, by which Christ is applied to the Soul, or it signifies the Instrument of that Application; which is, Faith laying Hold on a Promise. This must bee cast into the Burning. It is by the Sufferings of Christ, that the Promises are made effectual, & that they have the Vertue of Cleansing us from our Sins. And then, for Scarlet, it is Red; and wee read of Scarlet Sins. Isa. 1.18. The Death and Blood of Jesus Christ, cleanseth us from all Sin. {1 Joh. 1.7.}” Thus *Hee.*⁴⁴ But lett us for a fuller Illustration of this Matter observe; That for the Quantity of the Materials thus thrown into the Fire, wee may safely take the Report of the Jewes, who, by the Pen of Maimonides tell us, *Sacerdos sumebat lignum Cedrinum, et Hyssopum, ad plamē Magnitudinem, et Lanam cocco Tinctam, ad pondus quinque siclorum.*⁴⁵ As for the Meaning, of these Materials, The Jewes themselves refer the Knowledge thereof, until the Coming of Elias; & Maimonides confesses, *Mihi ne in Hodiernum Diem ullius ex illis vera constat Ratio.*⁴⁶ But first; Lett it bee considered, That each of these Materials, did in the common Sense of Mankind, wear the Notes of Purification upon them. Besides, the Vertue of the Cedar this Way, Hyssop, is by Authors, as old a Chermon, in Porphyrie, magnified, for its Virtus Purgatrix, which made the Egyptians use it in their purifying Exercises.⁴⁷ The great Etymologist, calls it, Βοτάνην καθαρτικὴν Purgatricem; and Hesychius, Βοτάνην σμήχουσαν *Abstergentem.*⁴⁸ Austin, on the fifty first Psalm, calls it; Herbum Humilem Medicinalem, purgandis pulmonibus aptam; which I suppose, hee learnt out of ⁴⁴ I.e., Samuel Mather (309–10).

Dioscorides.⁴⁹ And then Wool, by the Beauty of a Red Colour made yett more fitt, for the service of Sacred Worship, every Body counted proper, ad corporis sordes abstergendas.⁵⁰ Nor are wee Ignorant, that such Materials, were therefore (and perhaps with some Imitation of the Mosaic Rites) used in Sacrifices, among the Ancient Pagans. Aldrovand saies, Nulla fuisse veterum sacrificia, in quibus arbores, earmuve partes, partem haud exiguam sibi non vendicarint.⁵¹ Ovid saies, Ara dabat fumos Herbis contenta.⁵²

And Sophocles

Ἦν μὲν γὰρ οἶος μαλλὸς
Sacro inerat ovium vellus.⁵³

Nevertheless, I think, wee may come yett a little nearer to the Matter. I say then, that the Sprinkling Instrument, (the Aspergillum) was formed after this fashion.⁵⁴ A Bunch of Hyssop (which by the Smallness of the Leaves, is very fitt for a Sprinkler) | was fastned unto a Cedar Handle, with a Scarlet String. Compare Lev. 14.4, 19. and you'll bee satisfied, that the Sprinkler used in their Lustrations, was made after such a Manner. Thus, the Apostle, in Heb. 9.19. mentions these Materials, in the famous Aspersions of Israel, tho' the Story in Exod. 24.7, 8. makes no mention, either of Cedar, or of Scarlet: because hee knew, the Sprinkler was by Law, thus to bee composed. Now, this Aspersory must bee thrown 49 St. Augustine's commentary on Psalm 50/51, v. 12 (Enarationes in Psalmos [PL 036. 0593]), reads, Hyssop is "a herb humble but healing, proper for purging the lungs" (Expositions on the Book of Psalms, Psal. 51, in NPNFi 8:194–95, sec. 12). Dioscorides Pedanius (De material medica 3.25.1–2) is Augustine's alleged muse. Andreas Christoph Zeller appears to have sipped from the same fountain, in his commentary on, and Latin translation of, Maimonides's הלכות מיימון פרה אדומה רבי משה בן מימון [Hilchot Parah Adumah Rabbi Moshe ben Maiimon] Tractatus de Vacca Rufa Latinitate donates & subijuncta ampliore huius ritus explicacione (1711), p. 395.

50 Spencer's citation (388) from Gerardus Joannes Vossius's De Theologia Gentili et Physiologia Christiana (1668), lib. 5, cap. 23, p. 51 (sep. pag.), reads, "until the vile body will be wiped clean."

51 Spencer (389). In his in Dendrologiae Naturalis scilicet Arborum Historiae Libri Duo (1667), lib. 1, p. 139 (A), the Bolognese naturalist, botanist, and entomologist Ulisse Aldrovandi, aka. Aldovrandi (1522–1605), illustrates how aspersion rituals were customary among the ancient pagans – just as much as they were among the Hebrews. Aldovrandi explains "that there had been no sacrifices of old among which trees, or their parts [branches] did not claim a small measure for themselves."

52 Ovid, Fasti (1.343), invokes the Golden Age, when the benevolence of the gods for mankind could still be won with simple oblations, and "the altar was content to smoke with herbs" like savine.

53 Likewise, the Greek tragedian Sophocles (Fragmenta 398, line 1) as quoted in Porphyrius's De Abstinencia (2.19, line 6) seems to long for the simplicity of the ancient gods whose favor could be carried with "the skins of sheep in sacrifice."

54 Maimonides's Hilchot Parah Adumah. Tractatus de Vacca Rufa Latinitate donates (1711), c. 11, § 1, pp. 117, 118 and Hilchot Parah Adumah (11.1), in Mishneh Torah (24.1:272), describes in detail how the "aspergillum," made from three stalks of hyssop, was to be bound and employed in the process of casting aspersions during the ritual sprinkling.

into the Fire, that no further Use might bee made of it, and that the cleansing Efficacy of all, may bee declared thus, to bee in the Sacrifice.⁵⁵

Well; Hee who did these things, was to bee Unclean until the Evening. Thus it was in the Sin-Offering. [Lev. 4. with Lev. 16.27, 28.] This does, as Mr. Mather expresses it, hold forth the Imperfection of all Legal Sacrifices, and the Iniquity that cleaves to our Holy Offerings.⁵⁶ But lett us carry the Matter a little further. All Creatures under the Law sett apart for the taking away of Uncleanness, brought a Cleanness indeed unto the Offerers, but the greatest Uncleanness unto themselves; like Water washing of the Dirty. Thus the Uncleannesses of the People, did seem transferr'd, unto the Red Heifer, and so a Sort of Uncleanness might seem contracted by the Person, who should now touch a Creature so Unclean.⁵⁷ I am sure, They were a Crue of Unclean Wretches, by whom the Messiah was crucified! But wee find, this Notion among the Pagans too; They Religiously Forbore to Touch a Victim offered for the Atoning of a Deity.

But there is one thing more still to bee enquired after. The Ashes of the Red Heifer, were præserved; that so, being upon Occasion mingled, with Water, it might by Aspersions, purify the ceremonially Unclean. Tis called, Num. 5.17. Holy Water. This was to signify the Sprinkling of the Blood, and Spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ upon us, for our Justification, and our Sanctification. Tostatus well observes, That the common Uncleannesses came upon Men too often, to bee every Time removed by a Sacrifice; & therefore the Lord appointed this more easy Way for those Uncleannesses; which had some Analogy to the Sprinkling of Blood, accompanying every Bloody Sacrifice.⁵⁸ The Heathen bestow'd upon the Initiated in their Mysteries, a Lustration of Water, in which there was Quenched a Fire-Brand fetch'd from the Altar; or otherwise magically præpared. The Holy-Water of Israel, must bee pure from all such Superstitions. When the Egyptians burned Red Creatures, & particularly Red Persons, whom they called, Homines Typhonios, as Manethon tells us, they scattered their Ashes in the Wind, with all Contempt. But the Israelites were not so to treat the Ashes of their καθαριματα. And now, so much for the Red Heifer.⁵⁹

Q. Well; but the Ashes of the Red Heifer, must not yett be thrown aside. Lett us have a further Illustration upon those Ashes?

A. Dr. Patrick thinks, Dr. Jackson, was not led by Fancy, but by a solid Judgment, when he considered these Ashes, as a notable Figure of the Everlasting Efficacy in the Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, which you know, is discoursed by the Apostle in the Ninth Chapter to the Hebrewes. If the frequent Occasion, for the Use of the Water of Purification, had not spent all the Ashes of the Heifer, now Slain and Burnt by Eleazar, they might have been præserted for this Purpose, without any Danger of Putrefaction, for a longer Time than the Law of Ceremonies lasted. For Ashes being well kept will never perish; and therefore are an Emblem of Immortality.⁶¹

Indeed, the frequent Use of these Ashes, might exhaust, the whole Stock of them, that was made at this Time; and make it necessary for the Priests to burn another Heifer. However, the Jewes tell us, this Red Heifer was killed but Nine Times, while their State lasted. First, by Eleazar here in the Wilderness; which was not repeated until after the Destruction of Solomons Temple, which was more than a Thousand Years. [Oh! Glorious Type, of the Power in the Blood of our Saviour, to purify us forever, without the Repetition of it continually!] The Second time, it was burnt by Ezra, after their Return from the Captivity of Babylon: And but seven times more, till the Destruction of the Second Temple. Since then they have not adventured, for to make these Ashes, but expect the Tenth making thereof by the King Messias. Poor Jewes! Tis done, Once for all, and you know it not!⁶²

Here was the Excellence of this Purification! The Ashes were not made by burning an Heifer, every time the People had Occasion for them: No, but the Ashes of this one Sacrifice (as we may call it) were sufficient for the Use of many Generations. Accordingly, the Apostle saith, Our Saviour, καθαρισμὸν ποιησάμενος, Having made a Purification of our Sins, sat down at Gods Right Hand: [Heb. 1.3.] which Purification there; doth not signify One Act, or Operation, but implies that by this One Act of Sacrificing Himself, He was consecrated for

Q. What Plant may be that, which we translate, Hyssop, in the Garden of the Sacred Scriptures? v. 6.

A. The /אֶזוֹב/ Ezob, so often mention'd in the Sacred Scriptures, differs from our, Hyssop, we may say, Toto Genere.⁶⁴ For that is a, Tree, whereas ours is an, Herb. Consider well, 1. King. IV.33.⁶⁵

The only thing that ha's moved our Translators, to render it, Hyssop, is the Similitude of the Sound, between that, an Ezob. Whereas, you will presently see, there is no Cogency in this Conjecture. For, by the Confusion of Tongues, tis come to pass, that Names of the like Sound, & perhaps derived from one another, in diverse Languages, are of a very different Signification. Thus, from /אֶרִיָּה/ A Lion, comes, Aries, a Ram. From, καπρος, a Boar, comes Caper, a Goat. From γην, a Goose, comes our Hen. From Vulpes, a Fox, comes our Wolf. From such a Similitude of Sound, our Translators chose, at Matth. XXIII.23. to render, Ανηθον, Anise, whereas it should be Dill.⁶⁶

⁶³ Patrick (Numbers 366–67). The Greek phrase from Heb. 1:3 signifies “having made [through himself] a cleansing.”

⁶⁵ This and the following paragraphs are extracted from Robert Gell’s exposition of Numb. 19:6, in An Essay toward the Amendment (1659), p. 518c.

⁶⁶ Gell’s objection is right on target, for the mere homonymic similarity between the sound of the Hebrew noun אֶרִיָּה [‘aryeh], “lion” (Strong’s # 0738) and the Latin “aries” (ram) is as unreliable as that of the Greek noun καπρος (boar) giving rise to the Latin “caper” (“he-goat”). The same is true for the Greek γην (tame goose) and the noun “hen.” According to the OED, the Old English feminine noun henn, corresponds “to Old Low German henna* (Middle Dutch henne, Dutch hen), Old High German henna (German henne) < West Germanic hannja*, derivative of hano, Old English hana cock” (modern High German: Hahn). Gell’s criticism – which Mather here follows – takes to task the ancient belief that because the language of Adam and Eve in Paradise prevailed among their fallen offspring until the time of Nimrod and the confusion of tongues at Babel, Noah’s offspring and therefore all mankind after the Flood spoke the same language. Only after God confounded their language to prevent the Babylonians from completing their design did the several languages begin to change. Based on this conception, the attempt to trace the evolution of disparate languages through homonyms is perfectly rational. Ironically, Mather debates the ancient story of Babel and the confusion of tongues (Gen. 11:6–7) in BA 1:806–24 (see also BA 1:728–29), but is clearly undecided. Significantly, in his lengthy discourse on Gen. ch. 10, the dispersion of Noah’s sons giving rise to traceable geographical place names derived from the names of Noah’s offspring (BA 1:693–804), Mather still follows the time-honored path, especially as outlined in Samuel Bochart’s Geographia Sacra (1646). In adopting Robert Gell’s critique of the inaccuracies of the translators of the King James Bible, Mather embraces philological trends emerging in the early Enlightenment period. Though still several steps removed from our present etymological conception of the Indo-European language tree, Mather’s Biblia Americana demonstrates his broad-mindedness to give the moderns fair quarter.

Dr. Gell will by all means have the, Ezob, to be Rosemary. This is a woody Substance, and answers the Genus, of a Tree. And there could be nothing more agreeable, to make an Aspergillum, or, a Sin-Water-stick, than a small Handful of this, consisting of three Stalks, four Inches long, tied unto a Cedar-handle of a Foot & half long.

This Plant growes best by a Wall. And so should be rendred, 1. King. IV.33. It growes by the Wall; not, out of the Wall.⁶⁷

I conclude with the Words of Georgius Venetus. *Inter plantas, Rosmarinus nobilissima est, et magis quam existimatur, excellens, quamvis Multitudine et Frequentiâ vilescat. Est enim semper virens, nulli nocens, et multis infirmitatibus inimica, — et tantò in majora mala prævalet, quantò majori gaudet tutelâ, et favore cælesti, à quo omnis virtus consovetur.*⁶⁸

Q. A Remark or two further, on the Water of Separation? v. 12.

A. It was designed chiefly, if not only, to purify from that Great Pollution which arose from Touching the Body of the Dead.

The Person thus defiled, was reputed Unclean for Seven Days. And so was he who touched the Bone or the Grave of a Dead Man.

Upon the Third Day he was to Begin his Purification, by being sprinkled with it; and on the Seventh he was again sprinkled; and then he was clean.

The House likewise, or Tent, wherein a Person died; was under a legal Uncleaness, and must be purified by Sprinkling.⁶⁹

Every Vessel, in the House, that was open and without a Covering, was defiled, and was made clean by the Sprinkling of this Water; Because the Air in the House, which it might be supposed, was tainted by the Dead Body, came freely into such a Vessel.

Aquinas is of Opinion, That this Law was for the Prevention of Idolatry; For the old Heathens thought, that if a Mouse, or a Lizard, or any such Creature which was dedicated unto their Idols, fell into a Vessel, or into Water, they thereby became very Acceptable to their Gods. He says, The Superstition

continued until his Days; when it was usual with some Women, to leave their Vessels uncovered, on Purpose in Observance of the Nocturnal Deities, which they called, Jana's. To abolish such a Superstition, he thinks, that God required all Vessels left uncovered where the Dead lay, should be polluted, & unacceptable to God, and unfitt for to be employ'd in any Uses.⁷⁰

Q. How came the Water of the Rock now to fail the Israelites? v. 2.

A. In their last Station before this, the Israelites were at Ezron-Geber. The Water that had follow'd them in all their Journeyes thither, there fell into the Red-Sea, and so was it swallowed up. And they were now to Return towards Canaan, by Places, where Water might be procured without a Miracle. For, being on the Edge of the Land of Edom, when Aaron died in the next Removal, we read expressly, that they presently after came to a Land of Rivers of Water. [Deut. 10.7.] Yea, we find in the next Chapter to this, that they came to Oboth, a name that signifies Bottles, where probably they mett with Water, with which they filled their Bottles. Then they came to Ije-abarim, or, Heaps of Fords. Then to the Brook Zered. Then to the River Arnon. Thence to Beer, where they dug a famous Well.¹

Q. Why do the Israelites, at Kadesh, complain of it, That it was no Place of Seed, and Figs, and Vines, and Pomegranates? v. 5.

A. Wherever they encamped, they were Fed by Manna. The Complaint here arose not so much from any Inconvenience they now suffered in the Place, as from the Prejudice which the Place gave them of the like Barrenness in the Land of Promise, whereof this Kadesh was the Porch. Accordingly, when they came hither first, about Thirty Eight Years before, they argued at such a rate as This; *Does the first Entrance of the Land of Promise now promise no better? There is little Hope of the Land itself, if the Beginnings bee such as these. It is convenient, that we send Spies, to bring us Word whether the Land bee worth our Pains in going any further after it.*²

And now, after so long a Time returning back to that very Place, they fall into the same Distrust, the same Complaint.³

For this Kadesh, will after all appear to bee the same with Kadesh Barnea. Tho' this Kadesh bee in the Desart of Zin, and Kadesh Barnea bee in the Desart of Paran, yett it bee Remembred, that the Spies, departing from Kadesh Barnea, are said, to go out of the Desart of Zin. [Num. 13.21.] Paran was the general Name of that horrible Desart; Zin was only one Part of it.

³ See Numb. 14:3–4.

It will be easy to avoid Confusion, in the Encampments of Israel, by reducing Deut. 10.6, 7. to its true Sense, and into Agreement with Num. 33.31, to 41.

That Kadesh, to which they came in the Fortieth Year, (called also, Meribah, Num. 20.13.) is the same with Kadesh barnea, is clear; because Meribah, in Kadesh, is assigned for the Southern Border of the Land, Ezek. 47.19. which Border of old was Kadesh barnea. Num. 34.4. Josh. 15.3.⁴

Wherefore tis not well done in the Maps, to make a Double Kadesh, in the Southern Parts of Canaan.

But I perceive some are for having Two Kadesh'es, in Two several Places.⁵

Q. What might be the Sin of Moses and Aaron, in the Matter of the Smitten Rock? v. 11.

A. Whether God pointed Moses to a Rock, which was then in their Sight, (as He did at Horeb, Exod. 17.5, 6.) or left him to chuse any stony Place, is not certain.

It is a meer fancy of some of the Jewes, that because God here ordered their Speaking to the Rock, Moses offended God in Smiting of it. For, to what Purpose was he to take the Rod, if he was not now to Smite the Rock, as he had formerly done?⁶

R. Gedaliah in Schalschelet Hakkabala, saies, That he had gathered no less than Eight & Twenty different Opinions, in various Writers, about this Matter. But he preferred this before any of them; That whereas God bad{e} Moses gather the Edah together, that is, the Assembly of the People, he gathered the Kahal, that is, the Congregation of Princes and Elders, whose Faith needed no Confirmation.⁷

Abarbanel has also collected many Opinions, of the Jewish Doctors, about this Matter.⁸

But Dr. Patrick prefers a plainer Account, which none of them take notice of: That the Water now ceasing, at the same Time that Miriam died, Moses was very sad, both for her Death, & perhaps for the Ceasing of the Water. And being unexpectedly assaulted by the People, who should have had more of Reverence for him, in a Time of Mourning especially; it putt him into a greater Commotion of Indignation, than was usual with him. This gave him such Disturbance of Mind, & so disordered his Thoughts, that when God had him, take the Rod, and speak to the Rock, he fell into some Doubt, whether God would really grant them again, the Favour which He had formerly granted them; either because they were so wretched a People, | that it was not fitt, God should be any further favourable to them; or, because perhaps, he thought, Water might otherwise be procured for them. Doubtless, it was because of this Doubting, that upon the first Smiting of the Rock, no Water came forth: God might order that Circumstance, for his further Trial: And hereupon his Diffidence might increase into still a greater Unbeleef, and a firmer Perswasion, that they should have no Water at all. His Anger at such a Rebellious Generation, it is likely, made him the more Distrustful, that God would do nothing for them. For both of these are mentioned by the Divine Writers, who touch upon this History; That he did not Beleeve, and that thro' Provocation of Spirit, he spoke unadvisedly with his Lips: [Psal. 106.32, 33.] which was, when he spoke those Words, Must we fetch you Water out of this Rock? That is, Is that a *likely Matter?*⁹

Dr. Lightfoot ha's another Conjecture; That Moses and Aaron, began to Distrust Gods Promise of entring into the Promised Land, at the End of Forty Years; Imagining, that if they brought Water again out of the Rock, it must follow them, as long as the other had follow'd them. He makes this Sense of their Words;

"What, Yee Rebels; Must we bring Water out of a Rock, as we did at Horeb? Are all our Hopes of getting out of the Wilderness, come to this? Whenever fetch't you Water out of a Rock but once, and that was because yee were to stay a long Time in the Wilderness. Now that is gone, must we fetch Water out of another Rock? O Yee Rebels, Have yee brought it unto this pass, by your Murmurs, that we must have a New Stay in the Wilderness? Are we to begin our Abode here again, when we thought, we had been at the End of our Travels? At this rate, we shall never gett out."

Whereupon, he presently smote the Rock, twice, in a Fume, & with Expressions of Diffidence & Impatience, which did not suitably Realize and Reverence, the Holiness of the Lord.¹⁰ proportionate with the sin." See also Abarbanel's Selected Commentaries Bamidbar/Numbers (212–37).

⁹ Simon Patrick, on Numb. 20:12 (Numbers 383–84, 385).

¹⁰ Mather, via Patrick (Numbers 385), cites John Lightfoot comments in A Chronicle of the Times (on Numb. 20), in The Works (1684) 1:35–36.

It is no improbable Conjecture of a Jewish Doctor; That the Divine Glory not now appearing upon this Rock; as it appeared upon that at Horeb, (which perhaps they expected,) this might give some Occasion to their Unbelief.¹¹

We will Add, tho' it be only for the Curiosity of it, a Jewish Account of the Matter?

You have it in Munster.

The Sin of Moses was, *Quod Israelitæ voluerunt habere aquam de Petrâ unâ; Moses autem ex aliâ educere voluit, dicens. Nunquid de Petrâ istâ educemus vobis aquas? Undè populus cogitare cepit, quòd Deus ex unâ posset educere Aquam, et non ex Aliâ. Et hujus peccati Aharon quoque fuit particeps, quòd in illo periculo tacuit, et Mosen Fratrem non redarguit, dicendo; Non refert de quâ Petrâ elicueris Aquam, quum potentia Domini equalis sit in omnibus locis.*¹²

In fine, I'll conclude with the Words of Monsr. Saurin. "A dreadful Example, to all those, whose Calling requires them to deliver the Commands of GOD unto the rest of Mankind! Paul alludes thereto, perhaps, in those Remarkable Words: I keep under my Body, lest that by any Means, when I have preached unto others, I myself should be a Castaway."¹³

Q. We read here, about, The King of Edom; what King? v. 14.

A. When the Israelites came out of Egypt, Moses then speaks of Edom, as governed by Dukes. Not long after, it seems, their Posterity became Kings. And now, they were still under Kingly Government. This King, to whom the Messengers are now sent by Moses, our Dr. Usher takes to have been Hadar, the last of those mentioned by Moses; [Gen. 36.39.] who, for his Inhumanity to the Children of Israel, was quickly after punished with Death, and the Kingdome turned again into the Government by Dukes. For Moses (as he thinks) writing the Book of Genesis in the latter End of his Life, or then adding what was necessary, to

¹² Sebastian Münster, in his Hebraica Biblia, Latina Planeq (1546), fol. 306 (note a), comments on the ensuing quarrel: "That the Israelites wanted to have water from one rock; Moses, however, wanted to have it come from a different rock, saying, 'Sure we will not get water from that rock?' Whence the people began to ponder that God could have water come from one rock and not from another. And in his sin Aaron was also a participant, because in that danger he said nothing, and he did not help his brother Moses, by saying, 'It does not matter from which rock you extract water, when the power of the Lord is equal in all place.'"

Q. It is here said, That King Arad the Canaanite, [In the Original, it is, The Canaanite King Arad; and why may not we take it, King of Arad, since we find a City of such a Name, Josh. 12.14. and Judg. 1.16.] heard that Israel came by the Way of the Spies. What Spies? v. 1.²

A. Many suppose them to be the Spies, which were sent by the King, to bring him Intelligence, which Way the Israelites marched. For, it was Thirty Eight Years since the Spies, that were sent by Moses, went that Way; and it is probable, they went so secretly, that it was not known which Way they went. But there is no Necessity of taking the Hebrew Word Atharim, to signify, Spies; It may as well be the Name of a Place, as the LXX understood it, by whom it is translated Αθαρεϊμ.³ And if the Scituation would agree to it, one might probably conjecture, the Place to be so called from the Spies, that went from thence by the Order of Moses, to survey the Countrey.⁴

Q. What is meant, when it is here said, The Israelites utterly destroy'd the Canaanites, and their Cities? v. 3.

A. It means, That they utterly Devoted them unto Destruction; They did not now actually Destroy them; they were yett Remaining, when Joshua came to Canaan, who executed this Cherem or Curse upon them. Had it now been executed, they must have entred into the Land of Canaan at this Time, from whence we cannot imagine, that they would have Returned, for to march further about, before they gott into it, but have gone on to prosecute their Victory, by subduing the Countrey, as they had begun.⁵

Q. This Light Bread? v. 5.

A. Tho', Light, may signify, what is [of little Esteem;] yett the Term applied unto Bread, rather heightens the Estimation of it, than depreciates & undervalues it. This is observed by Dr. Gell, as well as by Cajetan. Therefore, The Tigurin

Q. What were the Fiery Serpents, which the Lord sent upon murmuring Israel? v. 6.

A. Fortunius Licetus, an Author by Bartholinus called, Fortunatissimus in Mysterijs Veterum Indagandis, ha's a very singular Opinion about those Fiery Serpents: That they were a Venemous and Malignant Sort of, Dracunculi, thro' the Vengeance of Heaven, generated in the Bodies of the froward Israelites, which Animals thus generated, cruelly eroded, and so inflamed, & so tormented, the Bodies, wherein they had their Generation.⁸ For this Opinion wee have the Authority of Plutarch, who sais, Lib. 8. Sympos. Quæst. 9. Maris Rubri Incole, affectionibus novis, et nunquam auditis tentati sunt; nam Dracunculi quidam parvi, crura et brachia edentes, eruperunt, qui, si tangebantur, statim emergebant, atque musculis infixi, minimè tolerabiles Inflammationes pariebant.⁹ Thus also, Actuarius tells us, of these Dracunculi bred in the Bodies of Men throughout the Regions

⁸ Mather quotes directly from Thomas Bartholinus's De Morbis Biblicis Miscellanea Medica. Editio secunda correctior (1680), cap. 6, p. 25; the distinguished Danish physician of body and soul dubs his Genoese colleague Fortunius Licetus, “the luckiest who tracks down the ancient mysteries.” The Italian physician and natural philosopher of Genoa Fortunius Licetus, aka. Fortunio Liceto (1577–1657), discusses Moses' fiery serpents, in his De Spontaneo Viventium Ortu (1618), lib. 3, cap. 51, esp. p. 243; Gerard Johannes Vossius, in his De Theologia Gentili et Physiologia Christiana (1641), lib. 4, cap. 56, p. 1499, similarly invokes the expertise of Licetus.

10 Via Bartholinus (De Morbis 25) – whom Mather puts to good use in his medical handbook Angel of Bethesda (1972) – Mather refers to De Methodo Medendi (lib 4, cap. 16), a Latin translation of a Greek original in Opera Omnia Actuarii collecta prodierunt libri sex (1556), by Joannes Zacharias Actuarius (c. 1275–c. 1328) (DGRBM), a renowned Byzantine physician and author of several medical works. This collection summarizes the best medical knowledge of the time, and De Methodo Medendi (Opera, lib. 4) focuses on pathology and therapeutics. For a helpful assessments of Actuarius, see P. Pioreschi's History of Medicine (2004), 4:91–95; and A. Hohlweg, "John Actuarius' De Methodo Medendi."

11 The father of ancient medicine, Claudius Galenus mentions the prevalence in Arabia of this vermicular disease [Lat. filaria medinensis, i. e., "guinea worms"] in his De locis affectis libri vi (lib. 6, cap. 3), in Claudii Galeni opera omni (8:392–93).

12 Bartholinus (De Morbis 25) likewise refers to the Byzantine physician Aetius Amidenus (fl. 5th–6th c. CE), author of several significant medical treatises. The work in question is Aetii Medici Graeci Contractae ex Veteribus Medicinae Tetrabiblos (1542), Quartae, sermo 2, cap. 85: "De brachorum ac crurum dracunculis, Leoniae" (pp. 815–16), in which Aetius describes the "Dracunculi" (guinea worms) prevalent among children in Ethiopia, India, and countries below the equator.

13 The Dutch traveler and assistant to the archbishop of Portuguese Goa, Jan Huyghen van Linschoten (1563–1611), recorded his valuable observations about the geography, flora and fauna, and the customs of the indigenous peoples of Arabia and India in his Itinerario, Voyage ofte Schipvaert, van Jan Huygen van Linschoten naer Oost ofte Portugaels Indien (1596). English, Latin, and German translations appeared in short order (EB). Bartholinus (De Morbis 26) draws on van Linschoten's description of the widespread guinea-worm infestations among the people in the Persian Gulf (Itinerario, ch. 6, p. 12): "There is in Ormus a sickness or common Plague of Wormes, which growe in their legges. ... These wormes are like unto Lute strings, and about two or thrée fadomes longe, which they must plucke out and winde them aboute a Straw or a Pin, everie day some part thereof, as longe as they feele them creepe: and when they hold still, letting it rest in that sort till the next daye, they binde it fast and annoynt the hole, and the swelling from whence it commeth forth, with fresh Butter, and so in ten or twelve dayes they winde them out without any let, in the meane time they must sit still with their legges, for if it should breake, they should not without great paine get it out of their legge, as I have seen some men doe" (John Huighen van Linschoten, his Discours [1598], bk. 1, p. 16). See also A. Saldanha's "The Itineraries of Geography."

14 Galen and Aetius (in Bartholinus's De Morbis 26).

15 Aetius (Tetrabiblos, Quartae, sermo 2, cap. 85, p. 815, last line) mentions that this disease is caused by parasites and is "non dissimilis lumbricis latis ventris" ("not unlike extensive stomach worms [tapeworms]" found chiefly in children in Ethiopia and India.

Conjecture. However, it being but a Conjecture, I shall say no more on't: as being indeed myself not satisfied with it; I rather take up with the Common Opinion.¹⁶

Q. Wherein lay the Vertue of the Brasen Serpent? Some Jewish Acknowledgments about it, may be very grateful unto Christianity? v. 8.

A. Aben-Ezra takes notice, that some superstitious People, fancied that the Serpent thus erected in the Wilderness, was a Sort of a Talisman, made for to receive I know not what, Influences from the Stars. "But, God forbid," saith he, "God forbid, that we should have any such Thought. This was made by the Divine Order, the Reason of which, lett us not scrupulously search."¹⁷ They thought, you see, there was in it something extraordinary. Jonathan in his Paraphrase here declares it; He shall be healed, if he direct his Heart, unto the Name of the WORD OF THE LORD.¹⁸

Yea, the Jewes generally have so much Understanding, as to say, That the meer beholding of the Serpent, cured them not, but that they were to look up

¹⁷ Patrick (Numbers 406); Abraham Ibn Ezra comments on the superstitious views of fellow believers: "Many err. They say that this [Moses' brazen serpent] was an image that had the capability of receiving powers from on high. Far be it, far be it [for one to believe such a thing], for this thing was made by God's command. We should not investigate why Moses was commanded to make the form of a snake" (Commentary: Numbers 4:169). R. Abba tells a somewhat different story, which was told him by his own teacher: "There was a man in the land of Israel whom they used to call "Plucked Hair" (Merutah). They told of him: Once he went up to the top of a mountain to gather wood and he saw a serpent that was sleeping. And though the serpent did not see him, the hair of his head immediately fell out. And unto his dying day no hair ever grew on his head. Therefore they called him Merutah" (Mekhilta De-Rabbi Ishmael 1:225). Be that as it may, iconic serpent deities, both good and evil, are well known in the religion of Egypt. For instance, evil Αποφίς (Apophis), representing chaos and destruction, served as "the nemesis of the sun god [Re]," who himself was protected by Mehen, a coiled serpent god, who accompanied "Re on his nightly journey through the underworld." In the funerary iconography of King Tutankhamun, Mehen encircles the sun god Re, suggesting both a cycle of death and rebirth (R. Wilkinson, Complete Gods, pp. 220, 223). As similar iconographic depiction can be found on the famous headstone of Susanna Jayne (1776), in Marblehead, Massachusetts. Death, personified as a skeleton, is crowned with the laurel of victory, carries the scythe of the grim reaper, and is encircled by a serpent swallowing its own tail. A symbol of eternity, death holds sun and moon in its skeletal hands. Winged souls (resurrection) in the upper corner and bats (wicked spirits) in the lower corners suggest that death conquers all. See A. I. Ludwig, Graven Images (78) and BA (1:1065–66).

unto God, when they beheld it, and expect a Cure from Him.¹⁹ So the Author of, The Book of Wisdome. [Ch. 16.7.] He that turned himself toward it, was not healed by the Thing which he saw, but by the {e} that art the Saviour of all. And therefore he calls it, in the foregoing Verse, A Sign of Salvation, to putt them in Remembrance of the Commandment of the Law.²⁰

Q. Is it not much, that the Sight of a Serpent, should cure the Sting of a Serpent? v. 9.²¹

A. The Jewes, (as Nachmanides,) think, this to have been a considerable Addition unto the Miracle. For they who are bitten by venomous Beasts, (according to the Præscriptions of the Physicians) must not see the Image of the Beast, by whom they are bitten. But this was commanded by God, that the Israelites might know, both their Malady and their Medicine came from God.²²

Naturalists do particularly tell us, That the Sight of Brass is hurtful to those who are bitten with Serpents; yett from hence the Israelites now received their Cure. As the Sight of Christ crucified, naturally filled His Crucifiers only with Anguish, when they look'd on Him whom they had pierced, & knew Him to be the Messiah; but (as Dr. Patrick notes) by the Grace of God, it became their only Salvation, thro' Faith in Him.²³

19 Nachmanides's comment is to the same effect: God “commanded that the cure be worked precisely through both the image and the name that would have killed them in the ordinary course of nature – to demonstrate that it is God who ‘deals death and gives life’ (1 Sam. 2:6)” (JPS Miqra’ot Gedolot 4:155). So, too, R. Bachya ben Asher explains that “instead of an antidote to the snake and what it looks like[,] the people had to look at an even more deadly looking snake. Red copper, the material Moses’ snake was made of[,] symbolises the planet Mars associated with war and death. In this instance by looking at ‘death’ the people were cured. In other words, there occurred what our sages describe as a ‘miracle within a miracle’” (Torah Commentary 6:2177–78).

20 Patrick (Numbers 407); Mather here quotes at second hand from the apocryphal Wisdom of Solomon (16:6, 7) as printed in the first edition of the KJV (1611). Although no author is mentioned, tradition ascribes the apocryphal (or deuterocanonical) book to King Solomon, who is the implied speaker in Wisd. Sol. 9:7–8. One of Mather’s favorite sources, Jacques Saurin’s Dissertation Historical, Critical (1723), Diss. LXIII, p. 587–88, offers much the same, but Patrick is clearly the source for both.

21 In his “Note Book of Authors” (Numb. 21:9), Mather references “Ursin. Advers. Sacr.” This work, most likely by the German Lutheran theologian and superintendent of the Lutheran church Johann Heinrich Ursinus (1608–1687), remains unidentified.

22 Mather preached a series of sermons on the topic, beginning on April 18, 1725, and subsequently published as Zalmonah: The Gospel of the Brasen Serpent, In the Mosaic History (1725). Nachmanides on Numb. 21:9 (JPS Miqra’ot Gedolot 4:155), but see the full discussion in Ramban’s Commentary (4:235–36). The same rationale is offered by R. Bachya ben Asher (Torah Commentary 6:2177).

23 Patrick (Numbers 408). In his Religio Medici (1643), part 1, sec. 19, Sir Thomas Browne rejects the ancient idea of sympathetic healing, which was believed to be effected by like attracts like, because in this instant it would cast aspersions on Moses’ miraculous cure: “Thus having perused the Archidoxes and read the secret Sympathies of things, he [devil] would dissuade my

Q. What can you see observable, in the Plague of Serpents upon Israel, & the Cure of that Plague? v. 9.

A. Abundance of Things. But unto mee, tis particularly observable, That the Stings of the Fiery Serpents were the last visible Means, that God used for the cutting off of the Generation, against which Hee had sworn in His Wrath. For wee now hear no more of them, til they bee passed over the River Zared, but only that they Removed unto Oboth, unto Ije Abarim, & so over the River. And the Miracle done in the Matter of the Brazen Serpent was the last Miracle done by Moses, as long as hee lived: His First, and His Last Miracle, were about Serpents.²⁴

Another observable?

Aben-Ezra notes, That a sinful Tongue is called, A Serpent; (Eccl. 10.11.) And the Israelites for sinning with their Tongues, were agreeably chastised with Serpents.²⁵ Compare, Psal. 140.9.

The Jerusalem-Interpreter has another Stroke upon it, that is much more Fanciful. The Serpent had been cursed with a Confinement unto Dust for his Food; And yett he murmured not. The Israelites murmured tho' they had Manna for their Food. Whereupon the Almighty said, *Lett the Serpent then take Vengeance on them!*²⁶

Q. What, then, are there any winged Serpents? v. 9.

A. Yes. Wee find, that Serpentes Alata, are mentioned by Cicero, & by Josephus, as flying out of Libya, into Egypt;²⁷ and by Herodotus, by Mela, by Lucan, by belief from the miracle of the Brazen Serpent, make me conceit that Image worked by Sympathy, and was but an Aegyptian trick to cure their Diseases without a miracle" (Works 1:32).

²⁴ Exod. 7:10–12; Numb. 21:9.

²⁶ Targum Hierosolymitanum (Numb. 21:6), in Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (4:279) and J. W. Etheridge, The Targums (2:410).

Solinus, and by Ammianus, as flying thither out of Arabia; and by Ælian, as flying thither out of, both Places.²⁸ Bochart from the Eldest of these Writers, proves, That the form of these Flying Serpents, was οἷα περ τῶν υἱδρῶν, Qualis Hydrorum.²⁹ It was then, the Serpent Hydrus, most probably, that infested the Israelites. That Serpent, tho' bred in marishy Places, when the Heat of the Summer ha's dried them (as it was now about the latter End of August,) becomes the Chersydrus; and then he stings with more Venome, & more Danger, than ever.³⁰

Q. Why were the Serpents called Fiery, Flying Serpents? v. 9.

A. I'll recite you a Curiosity of Dr. Tennison,³¹ Tis his Conjecture, That the Seraphim and Urim, were Images, or Symbols of Ministring Angels, in the form of Fiery, Flying Serpents; as Cherubim were such Images, with the Faces of Oxen; So the Word Saraph is used; Num. 21.6, 8. Deut. 8.15. In Egypt, Arabia, and Lybia, and other Places, where are Fiery Flying Serpents. Isaiah mentions such Creatures. Isa. 14.29. And Abarbanel saith of such Flying Serpents, they were Reddish, after the Colour of Brass. If that were their Natural Colour, great Addition might be made unto it, by the swift Motion of their Wings, & the Vibration of their Tails, in the bright Atmospheres of Arabia & Egypt. And so they were called Fiery, not only because of the Heat of their Venom, causing extraordinary Inflammations in the Body, bitten by them, but also because they appeared such, when they flew in the Air.³²

unawares, and do them a mischief." But Moses combated this plague in the same manner as the Egyptians did: "he made baskets, like unto arks, of sedge, and filled them with ibes [ibis], and carried them along with them; which animal is the greatest enemy to serpents imaginable, for they [serpents] fly from them when they come near them."

28 Herodotus saw with his own eyes "the bones and backbones of serpents past all telling for numbers" in a narrow mountain pass in Arabia, where (according to "a story") "winged serpents fly from Arabia into Egypt" in the spring but are obstructed by "the ibis birds" which kill and eat them. Much the same is mentioned in Mela's Description of the World (3.82); Lucanus's De Bello Civili sive Pharsalia (6.670–80); Solinus's De Mirabilibus Mundi (27, 30); Ammianus Marcellinus's Rerum Gestarum Libri Qui Supersunt (22.15.25–27); and Claudius Aelian's De natura animalium (22.38). A modern archaeological view of the matter is presented in K. Radner, "The Winged Snakes of Arabia and the Fossil Site of Makhtesh Ramon in the Negev."

29 Bochart here quotes Herodotus (Historiae 2.76, line 11): Τοῦ δὲ ὄφιοις ἡ μορφή οἷα τῶν υἱδρῶν· Πτεῖλα δὲ οὐ πτερωτὰ φορεῖ, ἀλλὰ τοῖσι τῆς νυκτερίδος πτεροῖσι μάλιστα καὶ ἐμφερέστατα. ("The form of the snakes is that of the water snake, but their wings are not feathered but are pretty much like the wings of the bat." Mather's Latin rendition reads, "like the water snake.")

30 Bochart (Hieroicoicon, pars. 2, lib. 3, cap. 13, cols. 422, 423). "Chersydrus" or "water snake." That merry old England was not without its "flying serpents" can be seen in the anonymous The Flying Serpent, or Strange News out of Essex (1669).

31 See Appendix A.

32 Patrick (Numbers 410) mines the previously quoted Of Idolatry: A Discourse (1678), ch. 13, pp. 351–52, by the later ABC Thomas Tenison (1636–1715), who also supplies Patrick with the reference to Abarbanel's commentary on the Torah (fol. 305), as quoted in Exercitationes Sacrae De Æneo Serpente, Ex Num. XXI. 4–10 (1675), Exerc. 2, cap. 2. Sec. 11 (not paginated),

Q. Whence could Moses bee supply'd with Brass, to make the Brazen-Serpent? v. 9.

A. Many Wayes. But some learned Men, have thought of One Way above the rest. – Among the Stations of Israel, there was one known by the Name of Dizahab. See Deut. 1.2. The Name carries Gold, in the Signification of it: and indeed there was both Gold & Silver found in the Mountains thereabouts. Now as for the Brazen-Serpent; it was indeed, a Coper-Serpent; for Brass is an Artificial thing, of a later Invention, made with the Calamy-Stone: And hence, by the way, whenever you find Brass, or Brazen, in the Scripture, it should bee translated, Coper. But it is Judged by some, That the Coper for the Serpent, was dug in that Station of Israel; Coper, Gold & Silver, are to bee expected from the same Mines.³³

Q. A little more, if you please, on the Place, where the Coper-Serpent was erected? v. 9.³⁴

A. The Israelites removing from that Place, pitched in Oboth. [Num. 21.10.] It is evident from hence, That they were now at Punon. [Num. 33.43.] This was a Place of Idumæa, famous for Coper-Mines. The Ancients often mention it, under the Names of, Phæno, and Phennen, and Fenon, and, Metallo-fenon; and hence come the Phænesia, or, Phennesia Metalla.³⁵ Thus Eusebius tells us, That Sylvanus, the Bishop, and near forty more, had their Heads cutt off, κατὰ τὰ ἐν φαίνοι χαλκού μεταλλὰ: Adæris Metalla, quæ in Phæno.³⁶ And in the Epistle of Athana- but paginated in the second edition (Leipzig, 1686), p. 37, by Georgius Moebius (1616–97), aka. Georg Möbius, D. D., Lutheran professor of theology at the University of Leipzig. However, Mather's immediate source here is neither Patrick nor Tenison (then bishop of Lincoln), but John Shower (see below), whose A Discourse of Tempting Christ (1694), sec. 4, pp. 16–25, is the work in question. Truth to be told, such circuitous handling of primary sources at the nth remove was common practice in Mather's day. Pierre-Daniel Huet, Alnetanae Quaestiones (1690), lib. 2, cap. 12, sec. 25, pp. 225–26, and Huet's huge Demonstratio Evangelica (1690), prop. IV, cap. 8, sec. 19, esp. pp. 129–30, offer much on the topic of the Mosaic copper serpent to the same effect.

33 Samuel Bochart, Hieroicoicon (pars 2, lib. 3, cap. 13, col. 427 lines 42ff).

34 See also Mather's Zalmonah (1725), p. 5.

35 See also Mather's Threefold Paradise (p. 97).

36 Bochart's clipping from Eusebius Pamphilus (Historia ecclesiastica (8.13.5, lines 3–4) relates that Silvanus, bishop of Gaza, was martyred in c. 305 CE, during the Maximian persecutions in Palestine. The Greek excerpt from Eusebius's Church History (8.13.5) explains that Silvanus was beheaded, κατὰ τὰ ἐν Φαίνοί χαλκού μέταλλα "at the copper mines of Phæno," a hamlet in Arabia Petraea, near Petra, at the S extremity of the Dead Sea (NPNFii 1:334).

sius, Ad Solitarios, we read of Eutychius, condemned unto the Mines of Phæno.³⁷ Epiphanius writes of Meletius and many others, banished, & condemned unto the Phænesian Mines.³⁸ Theodoret speaks of some condemned unto those very Mines; and expressly saies, ἐστὶ δὲ ταῦτα τοῦ χαλκοῦ, That they were Coper-Mines.³⁹ But Jerom yett more expressly, saies, Fenon, castra Filiorum Israelis in Deserto, — nunc viculus in Deserto, ubi aris Metalla Damnatorum supplicijs effodiuntur.⁴⁰

Probably hence came the Coper, whereof Moses made the Serpent. And Bochart thinks that there was this Mystery in it, That the Body assumed by our Saviour, was not brought from another Quarter, but form'd there where He was manifest in Flesh.⁴¹

[HH7:]

Q. You said, you took up with the Common Opinion about the Serpents, that vexed the People in the Wilderness. Yett no doubt, you have some further Uncommon Curiositie about them, which you'l please to communicate? v. 9.⁴²

A. The Wisdome of the Divine Providence, appeared, in taking this Way, to Rivet into the People, the Sense of the first Evil done to Mankind, by the Divel, when the Serpent beguiled our First Parents. And it might bee of Use also, to rectify the Error of some of the Jewes, derived from Heathen Idolaters, of the Gods appearing in the Form of Serpents; For, as my Friend, Mr. Shower, observes, 37 St. Athanasius Alexandrinus (Historia Arianorum, cap. 60, sec. 1, line 1–4) tells the story of Eutychius, “a Sub-deacon, a man who had served the Church honourably,” whom the Manichean followers of Sebastianus “scourged on the back with the leather whip, till he was at the point of death” and then sent to his execution to the mines – “not simply to any mine, but to that of Phaeno, where even a condemned murderer is hardly able to live a few days” (Historia Arianorum, pt. 7, cap. 60), in NPNF (4:292).

38 St. Epiphanius Constantiensis (Panarion 3.143, lines 14–22) relates similar stories of martyrdom under heinous torture, especially that of Meletius, a military leader in Galatia under Roman Emperor Antoninus Pius (138–161 CE).

39 Theodoretus Cyrrensis (Historia ecclesiastica, lib. 4, cap. 19, p. 258, lines 16–17): ἐστὶ δὲ ταῦτα τοῦ χαλκοῦ.

40 St. Jerome, in Liber de Situ et Nominibus Locorum Hebraicorum Incipit Liber. De Genesi [PL 023. 0897C], more expressly says, “Fenon [is] the camp of the sons of Israel in the desert – now a small village in the desert – where copper is excavated as a punishment of the damned.”

41 Bochart, Hieroicoicon (pars 2, lib. 3, cap. 13, cols. 427, lines 42–col. 428, line 16) supplies Mather with all the references to the Church Fathers in the preceding paragraph.

42 Bochart (Hieroicoicon, pars 2, lib. 3, cap. 1–14, pp. 348–440) is probably the most exhaustive source on this topic, for he also examines all the other types of serpents and amphibians (real and imagined) mentioned in the Bible. Mather's source for his annotation on v. 9, including his references to secondary sources, is A Discourse of Tempting Christ (1694), sec. 4, pp. 16–25, by John Shower (1657–1715), a notable English nonconformist clergyman, pastor at Curriers' Hall (London) and lecturer at Salters' Hall (ODNB). In the following paragraph, Mather refers to “Mr. Shower,” as “my Friend,” a toned-down endearment from Mather's excited “my worthy Friend,” in the holograph manuscript.

the Babylonians worshipped a Great Dragon, and in Egypt & Phœnicia, they sacrificed unto Dragons, calling them, Ἀγαθοδαίμονας.⁴³ Æsculapius, the God of the Physicians was worshipped under that Form; to his Image, a Dragon is usually annexed. The superstitious Romans, placed the Head of a Dragon, at the Entrance into their Houses, imagining thereby to conciliate the favour of the Gods. And Alexander the Great is represented as begotten by a Serpent, which they likewise feigned of other Great Men among the Gentiles.⁴⁴ “In the earliest Ages, & inhabited Countreys of the World (saith Dr. Tennison) the Creatures on Earth principally Reverenced, were Oxen, and Serpents. Serpents were lately worship’d in America as appears from Acosta & others, and of old they were Sacred in Egypt: wee see no Table of Isis, or Osiris, or Bacchus, without a Serpent. [And among how many other Nations, read Pignorius, De mensâ Isiaca.]⁴⁵ The Reasons, why Serpents were thus Honoured might bee, partly because they could twine themselves into all figures; partly because of the mighty Energy of their Venom; & because of their mighty Bulk; & because they live to a great Age; are of a quick Sight; & Renew their Youth, by putting off their Skin: Lastly, By reason that the Heathen, were overpowred by the Craft, Malice, & Pride of the Divel, who deluded Man in that Shape, & would as it were redeem the Loss, hee sustained, in the Curse of that Creature, by turning it into a venerable Idol. If the Seraphim (or Good Angels ministring in the World) had not appeared in some such Form, it would bee difficult, to give an Account of the Temptation of Adam and Eve, by a Dæmon in the Shape of a Serpent. That Serpent is ridiculously painted in the form of a creeping one before the Fall: It is impossible to conceive our First Parents so stupid, as to have entred into a Dialogue with such a Creature, without any astonishment. But being used unto the Shecinah of the Logos & to the Appearance of ministring Angels, shewing themselves in some such winged Form, it is easy to conceive, upon the Supposition, how they might entertain some familiar Discourse with a Creature, assuming that Image, in a very splendid & glorious Manner.⁴⁶ The Text assures us, the Form is now changed by Gods Curse, most probably from that of a splendid, fiery Saraph, to that of a mean creeping Serpent; not moving aloft in the Air, but licking the Dust. And a Part of the Punishment of Adam & Eve, may confirm this.⁴⁷ For it is said, God guarded Paradise against them, by a Cherub, & a flaming Sword, which was esteemed by the Jewes a Second Angel;⁴⁸ and may bee aptly imagined, a Saraph, or flaming Angel in the form of a Fiery Flying Serpent whose Body vibrated in the Air, with Lustre, & may bee fitly described, by the Image of such a Sword. Tertullian saith that the Serpent from the Beginning was one that sacrilegiously usurped the Divine Image.⁴⁹ This sounds, as if the Divel in Serpentine Form had represented Part of the Shecinah of the Logos, & that Eve conceived him to have been an Angel appertaining unto his glorious Presence, & a Minister of His Pleasure, & one that was come forth from Him.”⁵⁰

Dr. Patrick saies, He knows not whence Justin Martyr concluded this Brasen Serpent for to have been made in the Form of a Cross, unless we conceive it was made with Wings at the Bottom of its Neck, which might give it that Figure.⁵¹ But his Observation in another Place is very considerable; That there must needs be a Mystery in it, that God, who forbad all Manner of Images, should now command one to be made; of which, he saith, one of the Jewes confessed, he could never hear a Reason from their Doctors. How should they understand it until they beleve in a Crucified Christ?⁵²

This Lifting up of the Brasen Serpent, was a thing so publick; and so well known to all the Neighbour Nations, that the Fame of it, in all Likelihood went into India; where they still sett up an Idol, in form of a wreathed Serpent, upon a Perch, Six or Seven foot High, which they solemnly worship; and carrying it

Q. Of the Israelites being infested by Fiery Serpents in the Wilderness, ha'd pagan Antiquitie any Remembrances? v. 9.⁵⁴

A. Some. Herodotus mentions the fiery Flying Serpents in Arabia.⁵⁵ But besides this; Many magical Rites, afterwards taken up among the Heathen, were Derivations from, and Imitations of, some Sacred Observances in Religion, enjoined by God upon His People. Among the Instances hereof, lett the Brasen Serpent pass for one; from whence foolish Pagans afterwards fetched their, Τέλεσματα, their Talismans; or, Images of Things, to avert Mischief by those Things; the same that are by Roman Authors called, Averrunci and by Hebrew Doctors called, Scuta Davidis.⁵⁶ The Mistake of, Leunclavius, that the Invention of Talismans, was not until the Time of Apollonius Tyanaeus, was occasioned by the Words of Justin Martyr, who calls them, τα του Απολλωνιου τέλεσματα, which only imports, that they were præpared, and employed, not that they were Invented by that famous Conjuror.⁵⁷ These Telesmatical Images among the Pagans, 53 Patrick (Numbers 410); John Baptista Tavernier, The Six Voyages (1678), part. 2, bk. 1, ch. 3, p. 28.

54 The following paragraph was grandfathered by the learned English theologian and rabbinic scholar John Selden, in his De Diis Syris Syntagma (1629), syntagma 1, cap. 2, pp. 116–17, in the amplified and emended edition by the distinguished Dutch Renaissance scholar, poet, and editor of ancient texts, Daniel Heinsius (1580–1655). (EB).

55 Herodotus (2.74–75) relates that near Thebes (Egypt) there are sacred, albeit harmless, horned serpents, sacred to Zeus, and buried in his temple when they die. In Arabia, near the city of Buto, Herodotus saw the skeletal remains and backbones of winged serpents “past all telling for numbers; there were heaps of backbones, great heaps and lesser” strewn about everywhere. According to one story, Herodotus remarks, these “winged serpents fly from Arabia into Egypt” every spring, but “the ibis birds meet the serpents at this pass [and] will not suffer the snakes to come through, but kill them.” That is why the Egyptians hold the ibis sacred.

56 The ancient Roman deity Averruncus, according to Aulus Gellius (Attic Nights 5.12.14), could ward off evil if an appropriate sacrifice was offered to placate him. Hence the Shield of David to turn away harm befalling harvests. See also Mather's Zalmonah (1725), pp. 28–29.

57 In his expanded edition of Selden's De Diis Syris Syntagma (1629), synt. 1, cap. 2, pp. 116–17, Heinsius refers to the German orientalist and commentator on things Turkish, Johannes Leunclavius, aka. Hans Lewenklaue, Löwenklau, Leonclavius (1541–1594), whose Historiae Musulmanae Turcorum, De Monumentis Ipsorum Exscriptae, libri XVIII (1591), was, in its time, a standard handbook on the mighty Ottoman Empire. Curiously, this work was deemed sufficiently dangerous that it was placed on the R. C. Index Librorum Prohibitorum et Expurgandorum Novissimus (1657), lib. 1, p. 632. Be that as it may, in its present context, Mather's excerpt (via Selden 116–17), refers to Leunclavius's Pandectes Historiae Turcicae, appended to Leunclavius's Annales Sultanorum Othmanidarum (1588), Pandect 130, p. 334, where the author claims that these images were not in use until the time of Apollonius Tyanaeus (15–100 CE), a contemporary of Jesus of Nazareth and Greek Neopythagorean. It is the Graeco-Roman philosopher Lucius Flavius Philostratus of Athens (c. 170–c. 245 CE), who praises Apollonius as a great occultist miracle worker, but denies that the Tyanean was a wizard (Life of Apollonius

Q. The Gospel of the Brasen Serpent? v. 9.

A. Lett us first consider the Malady; and then the Remedy.⁵⁹

The Malady, inflicted on the Israelites, was, A Being stung with Fiery Serpents, for their Ingratitude.

Satan is the Old Serpent. [Rev. 12.9.] His appearing first in that Shape to manage his Temptations upon our First Parents; makes the Continuance of the Resemblance for him, very Agreeable.⁶⁰

And the Divels may very fitly bee called, Fiery Serpents. Of such wee read, Isa. 14.29. & 30.6. From the Hebrew Word, Saraph, here used for them, some derive the Greek Word Prester, (called also Dipsas, and Causon,) wherewith hee that is bitten is Tormented with a Burning Heat and Thirst, that never can bee quenched. The ancient Physicians, as you find in Dioscorides, gave over their Bites, as Incureable. They were likewise from their Colour termed Fiery Serpents; They had a Shining, & a Glist'ring Aspect. The Divels are Serpents of the most Venomous and Terrible Kind. [Compare, Rev. 12.9. the Great Red Dragon.] They are indeed, the Debased Seraphim.⁶¹

Now, Sin is the Sting of the Serpent. [1. Cor. 15.56.] Hence, the Temptations of Satan, are called, Fiery Darts. [Eph. 6.16.]

And Sin, the Sting of the Serpent, is a Painful, and a Deadly Poison. Tho' perhaps, the Poison may seem sweet at first: [Job. 20.12, 13, 14.] It will at length putt the Conscience, into a Terrible Anguish.⁶²

1.1–2). According to Mather (via Selden 116–17), this mistake occurred because of a misunderstood passage in Pseudo-Justinus Martyr, Quaestiones et responsiones ad orthodoxos (Morel page 405, sec. D, lines 1–9), Ἀπόκρισις κδ' (Responso 24): τὰ τοῦ Ἀπολλωνίου τελέσματα. On Leunclavius, see also Pierre Bayle's Dictionnaire Historique et Critique (1741), 3:49–50, and N. Berman, German Literature (86–88).

58 Mather and his contemporaries still attributed similarities between Mosaic and pagan rites to the devil who aped God's decrees to mislead his followers.

59 Again, Mather obliges his uncle Samuel Mather, whose serialized sermon The Gospel of the Occasional Types, on 1 Cor. 10:11 (preached between October 3, 1667 and May 7 & 21, 1668), supplies the typological explication of the brazen serpent as an occasional type of the Christ as healer, in The Figures & Types (1705), pp. 127–64.

60 Samuel Mather (Figures 146).

61 S. Mather (146) refers at second hand to Dioscorides Pedanius's De materia medica (6.38, 40) as quoted in Henry Ainsworth's gloss on Numb. 21:6, in Annotations upon the Five Bookes of Moses (1627), p. 133 (sep. pag.).

62 S. Mather (147).

The Occasion of the Lords Inflicting Misery on the People, by the Fiery Serpents, was, their Sleighting the Manna, wherewith Hee had Fed them from Heaven. God lett's loose the Fiery Serpents of Hell, to sting the Souls of Men, partly with Lusts, & partly with Fears; Tis for their Contempt of the Lord Jesus Christ, & of His Gospel-Mercies.⁶³

The Remedy in this Case, was the Brazen Serpent: wherein our Lord Jesus Christ is to bee notably mett withal. [Joh. 3.14, 15.]

It was made of Brass, (or, Coper,) a Metal of inferior Value, tho' Strong and Bright; and in the Form of a Serpent, tho' it were not a Real Serpent. Tho' the Lord Jesus Christ bee Strong and Bright: [Rev. 1.15, 16. Heb. 1.3.] Yett Hee was for His outward Appearance, Despised in the World. [1. Cor. 1.23, 24.] Yea, Hee appeared in the Likeness of Sinful Flesh, tho' it were not Really Sinful Flesh. [Rom. 8.3.] Hee had no Sin. [Heb. 4.15. 2. Cor. 5.21.] Yett Hee was dealt withal, as a Sinner. Hee fell under the Curse due to Sin; the Curse belong'd unto the Serpent. [Gal. 3.13.]⁶⁴

The Brasen Serpent, was a Cure provided by God, in meer Sovereign Grace, for ungrateful, ungodly, unworthy Rebels; when some of them were so stung to Death, as to bee ready to perish, for their Contempt of Manna, and others were already Dead and Gone, Past all Recovery. In like Manner, God gives His Christ unto us; of His Meer, Free, and Rich Grace, even when wee were Enemies unto Him; and it was done without and against all Merit in us; when a great Part of Mankind, is perished in Sin, especially for their sinful Contempt of the Gospel. [Joh. 3.16.]

The Serpent must bee lifted up, upon a Pole, that all might see it, at whatever Distance. Compare, Joh. 3.14. and Joh. 12.32, 33. and Gal. 3.1. and Eph. 2.17.⁶⁵

[35v] And the Serpent must bee looked at, by all that | hoped for any Benefit from it. Compare, Joh. 3.15. and Isa. 45.22. and Isa. 65.1.

It is observable, that the Syriac Word used by our Saviour in the III of John, signifies, both to lift up, and to crucify.⁶⁶

The Serpent, in this Way gave Healing to the Stung, that had Recourse unto it. Moses, and his Law could not Heal them. Compare now, Mal. 4.2. and Psal. 103.3. and Act. 4.12.

Finally; The Brazen Serpent retained its Vertue, only while Instituted by God, for that End. And therefore, when the Sacred Stamp of Institution was taken off, wee read of no more Miracles wrought by it, but Hezekiah broke it in Peeces.

Now this Part of the History cannot bee applied unto our Lord Jesus Christ, any otherwise than Thus; The same Things, in the Ordinances of God, which are useful while Instituted by God, become Abominable, when the Stamp of the Divine Institution upon them ceases. Wee may carry this, unto the Hierarchy of the Old Testament; and the Garments of their Ministry; and the Festivals of Israel.⁶⁷

We will carry on the Parallel with the Addition of a Stroke or two from the learned Bochart.⁶⁸

Brass is a very Sounding Metal. (1. Cor. 13.1.) saies Claudian, – Ære sonoro. The Sound of Christ crucified, is gone forth into all the World. (Rom. 10.18.)⁶⁹

And tho' the Israelites had the Remedy at hand, yett they were not so foolish & foolhardy as to provoke the Serpents to sting them. Thus, tho' we have a Remedy for our Sin, laid up in the Lord Jesus Christ, yett we must not of our own Accord, fall into Sin or throw ourselves into Temptations to Sin, upon that Præsumption.⁷⁰

Q. Is there any thing remarkable in the Jewish Writings, to countenance our making the Messiah, the Antitype of the Brasen-Serpent? v. 9.⁷¹

A. There is a famous Text, Isa. 14.29. Out of the Serpents Root shall come forth a Cockatrice, and his Fruit shall be a Fiery flying Serpent. K. Uzziah had been a sore Scourge to the Philistines, upon his Abdication, and in the dayes of Jotham and Ahaz; the Philistines revived, & became very troublesome unto the Jewes. But upon the Succession of Hezekiah to the Throne, the Prophet foretels, that the Philistines would have no Cause to rejoice, for their Deliverance from Uzziah, for from the Root of Uzziah, there would proceed Hezekiah, who should now act the Part of a more terrible Serpent upon them, than his Predecessors.⁷²

⁶⁷ S. Mather (149).

⁷⁰ Bochart (Hieroicoicon, col. 416)

⁷² Isa. 14:28–29, 15:2; 2 Chron. 26:6, 28:18–19; 2 Kings 18:8. Also see his annotations on Isa. 14:29, in BA (5:654).

It is no new thing, for a King to be resembled unto a Serpent. Among the Egyptians particularly, who were near Neighbours unto the Philistines, we find in Ælian, That their Kings in their Diadems wore painted Asps, to signify their Power. For, saies he, of those that have been bitten by Asps, ου μνημονευεται ουδεις εξαντης γεγονεναι του κακου.⁷³ It is not remembred, that ever any one escaped. Read much more in Horus to this Purpose.⁷⁴

Now, the Basilisk in the Text before us, ha's been thought a Picture of the Messiah as well as of Hezekiah. Jonathans Paraphrase upon it therefore is, De Filijs Filiorum Jesse exhibit Messias. In that Paraphrase, the Name of Jesse is putt for /שנח/ Nachash, which signifies, a Serpent. Kimchi observes, That this was indeed one of Jesses proper Names. Thus, 2. Sam. 17.25. Abigail, the Daughter of Nahash, is indeed, the Daughter of Jesse.⁷⁵

Upon the whole, the Descent of the Messiah from Jesse, is here intimated; and there is therewithal intimated, His being the Antitype of the Mosaic Serpent.⁷⁶

Q. A Remark on, The Pole, whereon the Brasen Serpent was exhibited? v. 9.

A. Dr. Gell observes, That it should not be rendred, A Pole, as it is by our Translators, Nor A Mast, as it is by Diodati. But, a Banner, or Ensign, as most of our old English Translations have it, and the Low-Dutch, and Luthers. Thus, with Arias Montanus, it is, Varillum; And in the Spanish, tis, Vandera.⁷⁷

73 Claudius Aelianus, De natura animalium (6.38, lines 1–2): ου μνημονεύεται ουδεις εξαντης γεγονεναι του κακου.

74 Bochart (col. 406, line 74–col. 407, line 3); Horapollo (aka. Horus Apollo), presumably one of the last Egyptian priests, flourished during Zeno's reign (474–91 CE) and translated hieroglyphs into Greek. The first edition was published by Alduys Manutius (1449–1515), in Venice (1505). Via Bochart, Mather refers to Hieroglyphica (translatio Philippi), lib. 1, sec. 59, lines 1–2: Βασιλέα δὲ κράτιστον δηλοῦντες, ὅφιν ζωγραφοῦσι κοσμοειδῶς ἐσχηματισμένον, οὗ τὴν οὐρὰν ἐν τῷ στόματι ποιοῦσι, τὸ δὲ ὄνομα τοῦ βασιλέως ἐν μέσῳ τῷ εἰλίγματι γράφουσιν, αἰνιττόμενοι γράφειν τὸν βασιλέα τοῦ κόσμου κρατεῖν· τὸ δὲ ὄνομα τοῦ ὄφeos παρ' Αἰγυπτίοις ἐστὶ μεῖσι. "To denote a very powerful king, they depict a serpent in the form of a circle, whose tail they place in his mouth, and they write the name of the king in the middle of the coil, intimating that the king governs the world. The serpent's name among the Egyptians is Meisi" (Hieroglyphics of Horapollo Nilous, p. 80).

75 Targum Jonathan (Isa. 11:1), in Walton, Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (3:32): "From the son of Jesse's son sprouts forth the Messiah"; or more poetically, "Out of the root of Jesse shall come forth the Messiah." David Kimchi (Mikraoth Gedoloth: Isaiah 1:106). Mather provides a similar gloss in his commentary on 2 Sam. 17:25 (BA 3:377).

76 Bochart (col. 407).

77 The Swiss Reformed theologian Giovanni (John) Diodati (1576–1649), in his Pious Annotations, upon the Holy Bible (1643), p. 99 (on Numb. 21:8), writes, "The serpent was a figure of Christ who was sent into the world in the likeness of sinfull flesh: Rom. 8.3. the pole was a figure of the Crosse, upon which he was raised, and the looking upon the serpent represented Faith in our Saviour, John 3.14, 15." Wycliffe (c. 1395) has the copper serpent set "for a signe" (1395); Tyndale (1530) "for a sygne"; Coverdale (1535) as "a token"; The Geneva Bible (1560) on Briefly, There was an Eye to the Third of Genesis and the fifteenth.

Perhaps, when we come to write of Hezekiahs Nehushtan, this Matter will be more fully explained.⁷⁸ 1537.

Q. Wee read here, concerning, The Book of the Wars of the Lord, mentioning what was done at the Red-Sea, & at the Brooks of Arnon. What Book was that? v. 14.

A. Why may it not bee, The Book of Judges? A Book, which recounts the warly Enterprizes, of those, whom the Spirit of the Lord, Raised & Moved thereunto.

Compare the Twenty sixth Verse of this Chapter, and then you'll say, that in Judg. 11.15, 16, 17. you find the very Passage, unto which this Text refers.⁷⁹

But how could this bee written then by Moses, who was Dead long before, this Book of the Wars of the Lord, was written? It may bee answered, That the Pentateuch, long after the Death of Moses, underwent Interpolations from the Pens of Inspired Persons. Ezra, Revising this Book, might add this, of what was done at the Red-Sea, & at the Brooks of Arnon.⁸⁰

Yea, In the Original, it runs in the future Tense; It shall bee said. How if it should bee a Prophecy of Moses, that afterwards this Matter should bee commemorated among the People of God; and that when there should bee a Rehearsal of the Jewish Wars, this Matter should bee inserted in it?⁸¹

Numb. 21:8, 9, renders it "a signe"; the Dutch Biblia Statenvertaling (1637), has "een stange" ("a pole," "stake") and offers alternatives in the margins: "stake, sperre, and, tot een teecken ... eene banier" ("stake," "spear," "a stick," and "as a banner"); Martin Luther's Biblia (1534) avoids the issue altogether and has Moses make a snake "zum zeichen" ("as a sign"), without further specifying if the copper serpent was placed on anything at all. Arias Montanus renders it "varillum" ("standard") in his interlinear Biblia Hebraica (1613), fol. 484; finally, the Spanish La Biblia. Que es, Los Sacros Libros (1502), fol. 50^r, as translated from the Hebrew and Greek, opts for "la vanderá" ("banner").

⁷⁹ Mather's efforts to "recover" the "Book of the Wars of the Lord" as a "draft" of sorts of the book of Judges is telling.

Q. Some further Thoughts, if you please, upon the Quotation here, from The Book of the Wars of the Lord? v. 14.

A. Moses (as Dr. Patrick thinks) here makes an Allegation, from an Authentick Record, in those Countreyes, containing the History of all the Wars that had been in those Parts; which are here called, The Wars of the LORD, because He is the great Governour of the World (as Abarbinel interprets it,) From whom and by whom are all things; who putteth down one, & setteth up another (as the Psalmist speaks) at His Good Pleasure.⁸² This Book, he thinks, (and so thinks Nachmanides,) was written by some of the Wise Men of those Nations, who looking upon this Conquest made by Sihon, as a very memorable thing, inserted it in their Annals; which (after the Way of those Countreyes) he thinks written in a |
[36v] poetical Manner. Moses justifies what he writes, concerning this Conquest, out of their own Books; which he quotes, as the Apostle does one of the Greek Poets.⁸³

The Meaning of the Words here quoted, is, That the King of the Amorites took all these Places, by a sudden & furious Invasion; which Moses therefore punctually recites, to show, that the Countrey of the Moabites, now reached no further than Arnon; All the Brooks, or Torrents, and all the Effusions of Water, as far as Arnon (i. e. all the Countrey about them,) being taken from them by the Amorites, in whose Possession it now was, and probably had been a long Time. And therefore the Israelites, took nothing from the Moabites, when they conquered this Countrey; nor from the Ammonites neither, Part of whose Countrey the Amorites also had gott from them [Deut. 3.11.] and the Israelites took from ⁸² Abarbanel (JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot 4:156–57). Ibn Ezra's frank explanation seems very modern here. The Book of the Wars of the Lord, he argues, "was a separate book in which all the wars of the Lord for the benefit of those who fear him were recorded. It may have existed as far back as the time of Abraham, for many writings have been lost and are no longer extant, such as 'The History of Nathan' (1 Chron. 29:29), 'The Chronicle of Iddo' (2 Chron. 12:15), 'The Annals of the Kings of Israel' (1 Kings 14:19), and the 3,000 proverbs and 1,005 of Solomon (see 1 Kings 5:12)," in JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot (4:156).

⁸³ Patrick (Numbers 413); Nachmanides, in JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot (4:156–57), offers an intriguing intertextual explanation: "There were sages in those generations who recorded the stories of the great wars. It is the same in every generation. The authors of these books were referred to as moshelim ('bards'; see v. 27), for they were the creators of the meshalim – that is, the figures of speech – in which the events of these wars (which seemed so miraculous to them) were ascribed to the Lord (and in truth the miracles were of course His). Sihon's mighty deeds against Moab seemed equally miraculous to them and they wrote them down (see vv. 26–28), using such poetic phrases as Waheb in Suphah, 'come to Heshbon' (v. 27), and the like. ... When Sihon captured the cities of Moab, the bards recorded all this in a book that they called The Wars of the Lord, saying that Sihon brought a storm of destruction upon Waheb." The NT was not without its intertextual references to pagan sources. For instance, St. Paul (1 Cor. 13) is to have paraphrased an aphorism of the Greek elegiac poet Tyrtæus of Sparta (7th c. BCE), best known for his elegies about the Second Messenian War (c. 660 BCE) (EB), and popularized in the Greek schools in Apostolic times.

the Amorites, when they conquered Sihon, and Og, and it fell to the Share of the Gadites. [Josh. 13.25.]⁸⁴

Q. What may be the true Meaning of that Clause; What he did in the Red-Sea?

A. It should be thus translated; He came (some such Word must be understood,) against Vaheb (a King of the Moabites,) and overthrew him in Suphah, (a Place in the Frontiers of Moab. Deut. 1.1.) What follows; And in the Brooks of Arnon, should be translated, And with – q.d. In the same Manner he smote the Brooks of Arnon; on which he fell as a Tempest carrying all before him.

The next Passage, And at the Streams of the Brook, ha's a good Account given of it, by Nachman, who hereby understands either a Cliff, from whence the Torrents flowed, (as Aschdod and, Happisgah, [Deut. 3.17.] are the Hills, from whence the Springs gushed;) or the Valley thro' which the Torrents ran, where they made a great broad Water, which is here called, An Effusion of Torrents, as R. Levi ben Gershom interprets the Hebrew Words.⁸⁵

Q. Why is that Passage introduced, For the Border of the Children of Ammon was strong? v. 24.

A. 'Tis not mentioned, as the Reason why the Israelites did not sett upon their Countrey, (for they were expressly forbidden to do it, Deut. 2.19.) but why Sihon had conquered none of the Ammonite Countrey beyond Jabbok (as he did all from Arnon thither,) because their Frontiers, on that Side of their Countrey, were very strong, by the Fortifications, which it is likely, they had made upon the River.⁸⁶

Q. What may be the Intention, of what Moses here quotes, as being spoken in Proverbs? v. 27.

A. In the Hebrew, the Words are, Wherefore the Proverbialists (that is, the Poets, whose Composures in those Dayes, were very sententious,) say, – The

Song seems to have been composed by some of the Amorites, upon the Victory that Sihon obtained over the Moabites; particularly, upon the taking of Heshbon, which, it may be supposed, he besieged immediately upon the Routing of their Army. Moses would insert this in his History, as an Evidence, that this Countrey belonged unto the Amorites, when the Israelites conquered it. Thus elsewhere, he quotes a common Saying about Nimrod, for to Justify what he writes of his Greatness. [Gen. 10.9.]⁸⁷

Come into Heshbon, – q.d. Lett us fall to repair the Ruines, which have been made in it by the War, that it may become the Royal City of our Countrey.⁸⁸

For there is a Fire gone out of Heshbon. – The Poet now rises into a Rapture, and prophesies the Conquest of the whole Countrey, by the Army of Sihon marching out of Heshbon. Desolations by War, are still compared unto Fire, which consumes all it comes anear.

It hath consumed Ar of Moab. He speaks, as if he already saw the Thing done, which he foretold; tho' it never came to pass. They did not conquer Ar, (the Capital City of Moab;) it was in the Possession of Moab, in Moses's Time, – [Deut. 2.9, 18, 29.]⁸⁹

Q. That Passage, we have shott at them; Heshbon is perished. Even unto Dibon? v. 30.

A. The Hebrew Words, may be as well translated; Their Light is perished, (or, taken away) from Heshbon unto Dibon. That is, Their Glory is gone, from one End of the Countrey to the other.⁹⁰

⁸⁷ According to this interpretation, Moses was not above quoting from the heroic songs of the Israelites's enemies.

Q. We read about, The Elders of Midian; what, then was the Title of Elders given to the principal Men in other Countreyes, as well as among the Israelites? v. 4.

A. Yes; The Same that are called, The Elders of Moab, are therefore also in the next Verse called, The Princes of Moab.

It is evident, this was the ancient Language among the Egyptians; [Gen. 50.7.] and it is very likely, it was the ancient Language of Phœnicia, and the Countreyes thereabouts; & perhaps in much remote Parts. For it is a known Story, That when the Phœnicians fled before Joshua, & forsook the Land of Canaan, they fixed in Africk; where they left this Name of Elders among the Carthaginians.¹

Q. What sort of a Man, may we take Balaam to have been? v. 5.

A. The Jewes are generally of the Opinion, That he had formerly been a Better Man, than he was Now; yea, they take him, as Jerom tells us, to have been the same, that in the Book of Job, is called, Elihu.²

Dr. Patrick thinks, That Balaam (who by the Apostle Peter is called, A Prophet,³ and appears as one in the Sacred History:) while he continued in the Service of the True God, he blessed & cursed no other Way, but by Prayer to God, & by Imprecations in His Name. Which was imitated by other great Men; particularly by Cambyses, in his Speech to the Persians, recorded by Herodotus in his Thalia: If you do what I require, then lett your Land bring forth plentifully, & your Wives & your Flocks be fruitful, & yourselves enjoy your Liberty; but if you do not, I imprecate the quite contrary things, to these to fall upon you.⁴ But when ² Patrick (Numbers 433). 2 Pet. 2:15; The great scholar of the Mishnah, R. Akiba ben Joseph, glosses on Job 32:2, "Elihu is Balaam the son of Barachel, who came to curse Israel but blessed them. Nevertheless the Lord your God would not hearken to Balaam [the Buzite]" (Deut. 23:5). [He was called] 'the Buzite,' for his prophecy was despised (BZZ)," in Jerusalem Talmud, tractate Sotah (5.6, 1:2a). St. Jerome (on Job 32:2) follows suit, in Commentarii in Librum Job [PL 026. 0721–0722D], arguing that Balaam descended from Buz (son of Nahor, the brother of Abram [Gen. 22:21]) and can be identified with Elihu (son of Barachel the Buzite), one of Job's inquisitors, in Job (32:6). See also St. Jerome's Hebrew Questions on Genesis (pp. 181–82).

Balaam degenerated into a False Prophet, and became a Diviner, then he used Spells and Incantations and Ceremonies, that were the Invention of wicked Spirits; which the Jewes fancy, that Pharaohs Magicians used for the Stopping of the Israelites at the Red-Sea.⁵

It is thought, that Balaam had at first, Familiarity with God, & His Holy Angels; but he abused the Honour that God putt upon him, in making him a Prophet, by Employing it to serve his vile Coveteousness. And God here upon gave him up, to the Delusion of Evil Spirits, of whom he learn'd Enchantments.

And yett here God was pleased again Himself to appear unto him, for the Good of His People Israel, and over-rule his bad Inclinations; Insomuch that Moses tells us, at last, he did not go as he had done, to seek Inchantments; but for the Present gave him up unto the Conduct of the Spirit of God.⁶

Q. A further Consideration upon that Quæstion; what is to be thought of Balaam? v. 5.

A. Monsr. Jurieu observes, That we may discover in Balaam all the Characters of a very Ill Man, yea, perhaps of one falling into the Unpardonable Sin; But not, of a False Prophet; or an Idolater.⁷

Unto the Messengers of Balak, he professes to have no Correspondence, but with the Lord JEHOVAH.

Yea, He appeals to GOD, and with the Language of a True Prophet, reflects an House full of Silver & of Gold.⁸

His adherence to the Number Seven, in the Sacrifices offered by him, shows his Regard unto the GOD of Israel, who had sanctified that Number. Whereas, Virgil, Ovid, Horace, Tibullus, & others, give us the Number Three, for sacred, among the Pagans. And Aristotle celebrates the Number Three, as used in Sanctifications, & the Worship of the Gods.⁹

therefore binds his soldiers with a mighty oath never to allow the Medes to regain supremacy over Persia: "If you do this, may the earth bear you its fruits, may your women and your flocks and herds be fruitful, and may you live for all time as free men! But if you do not recover the power to yourselves, nor make any effort to do so, I pray upon you the contrary of these good things and that, besides, the end of every man in Persia may be such [gangrene] as has now overtaken me" (The History 3.65.241).

9 Jurieu (49, § 3), citing Numb. 23:4, insists that Balaam at the time was true to the God of Israel, because he did things by sevens ("He built 7 Altars, and upon them Sacrificed 7 Oxen, and 7 Sheep, and that to the true God, and not to the Idols"). Pagans, however, sacrificed in threes as evidenced in Virgil's Eclogue (8.75): "In an uneven number heaven delights"; Aeneid (6.229): Corynaeus, gathering the bones of his dead mates in an urn, cleansed them "with pure water [and] thrice encircled his comrades." Ovid has an old hag, honoring Tacita ("the mother of the public Lares" [line 615]) "with three fingers" as the witch "puts three lumps of incense

Yea, we find GOD putting Words into his Mouth. And when did the Spirit of Prophecy utter more glorious Things, than thro' the Mouth of Balaam? It is true, that in the Book of Joshua, this Wretch is called, Chesem, a Southsayer, which Word is never taken in a good Sense. But it is no Wonder, if the Holy Spirit putt such a Mark of Infamy, upon a Person who made so ill an Use of the Gift of Prophecy, by Serving with it the Designs of a Filthy Lucre, as do the Southsayers.¹⁰

And whereas we read, Num. XXIV.1. He went not as at other times to seek for Enchantments: The Real Truth is, not that having sacrificed unto the True GOD, with an Intention to prosecute His Commands, he went aside for the Consulting of Divels. But he knew, That GOD seldom disclosed His Intentions unto the Prophets in Publick; the Revelations required Solitude & Secrecy. On this account Balaam, after the Sacrifices, retired, that he might receive Direction from GOD. In this Retirement indeed, he left nothing untried, that he might obtain from GOD, an Answer suitable to his Desires. He might intermix also some Superstitions with his Prayers. | Tho' his main Intention was to consult GOD in private, yett the whole Action was criminal, because the End was evil, and there were Superstitions accompanying of it. Moses might very well, call his Devotions, by the Name of Enchantments, because they were used for such Purposes as Enchantments are generally used for; even the Affliction of the Neighbours.¹¹ [39v]

Monsr. Jurieu, is of the Opinion, That Shem living till about fourscore Years before the going of the Family of Israel into Egypt, it is probable, that GOD for a long time did præserve Reminders of His Holy Religion, in the Countrey where that Patriarch lived. Neither is it improbable, that the Spirit of Prophecy might continue a considerable while in the Eastern Countreys, & have something of a Church præserted there. The Grace of GOD left not the Nations, but by Degrees; and the Holy Spirit withdrew not from the other Nations, to reside in a peculiar Manner with Israel, until that People was grown into such under the threshold" of a house before she utters her incantations (Fasti 2.573); likewise, in his Metamorphoses, Ovid has Medea cast her spells and rejuvenate Jason's old father Aeson, whose "worn-out body" lay in front of the altar: "Thrice she purified the old man with fire, thrice with water, thrice with sulphur" (7.261). Horace (Epistles 1.1.37) addresses his patron Maecenas and promises that he will be able to overcome his avarice, "if with cleansing rites you read the booklet [of charms] thrice." Tibullus (Elegies 1.2.56) tells Delia how the sorceress Medea gave him "a charm" to deceive her husband: "chaunt it thrice and spit thrice when the spell is done." Finally, our peripatetic Aristotle knowingly relates of the Pythagoreans who believe "the universe and all that is in it is determined by the number three, since beginning and middle and end give the number of the universe, and the number they give is the triad. And so, having taken these three from nature as (so to speak) laws of it, we make further use of the number three in the worship of Gods" (De Coelo 1.1.268a, lines 10–15).

Perhaps Balaam was the last of the True Prophets that lived among those Nations, which did not belong to the People of Israel; and he might close the Prophecy of the Church before Moses, as Malachi did the Prophecy of the Church before the Coming of our SAVIOUR.¹²

Q. Curse me this People. What was the Opinion that lay at the bottom of the Proposal? v. 6.

A. It seems, they had an Opinion in those Dayes, which prevailed much in after-times, That some Men had a Power, by the Help of their Gods, to blast, not only particular Persons, but whole Armies, & render them incapable of effecting their Designs.

This, tis said, they did, sometimes only by bare Words of Imprecation, whereof there was a Sett-Form among some People, which Æschines calls, διοριζομένην ἄραν, The Determinate Curse.¹³ And sometimes they also offered Sacrifices, & used Ceremonies with solemn Charms; as Plutarch tells us in the Life of Crassus, that Attejus, the Tribune of the People, made a Fire at the Gate, out of which Crassus was to march into the War against the Parthians; into which, he threw certain things to make a Fume, & offered Sacrifices to the most angry Gods, with horrid Imprecations; which, he saies, according to ancient Tradition, had such a Power, that no Man, who was loaded with them, could avoid being undone.¹⁴

Q. Why was the Anger of God kindled against Balaam, for going with the Princes of Moab; whereas it is expressly said, That God came to him at Night, and said, If the Men come to call thee, Rise up, and Go with them? v. 20, 22.

A. Wee know that the King of Moab sent for Balaam to come & curse Israel, but God would not permitt him to go. Upon a second Importunity, God suffered it; yett with a Proviso, The Word, that I say unto thee, That thou shalt do. Now it appears that Balaam, who is elsewhere called, A Lover of the Wages of

In his Life of Crassus (16.3–5), Plutarch relates the story of the Roman general Marcus Licinius Crassus (115–53 BCE), whom the Roman tribune Ateius tried to inhibit with a ritual omen from going to war against the Parthians, with whom the Roman Republic had established a peace treaty.

Q. Upon Gods coming & speaking to Balaam, What Remark to be made? v. 22.

A. It may be Remark'd, (& is by Dr. Patrick,) That all Nations, of whom we have any Knowledge, have been possessed with this Opinion, That God was wont frequently to appear unto Men; especially, Cum recentes à Deo essent, (as Seneca speaks, in Ep. XC,) when they were newly come out of His Hand; and that He was pleased also to Reveal His Mind & Will unto them, as long as there was any Goodness left among them.²⁰ Tis admirably express'd by Catullus,

*Præsentes namque antè domos invisere castas
Sæpius, et sese mortali ostendere catu
Cælicolæ, nondum sprete pietate, solebant.*²¹

Indeed, no Account can be given, how it came into the Head of Homer and the other Poets, to bring in the Gods appearing so oft, as they do, upon every Occasion, if God had not been wont, in ancient time, so to manifest Himself. As Dr. Jackson ha's observed, If they had never heard nor read of such a Thing, all the Witts in the World, could not have thought of bringing in the Gods, in a visible Shape upon the Stage, or interlacing their Poems, with their frequent Apparitions.²²

Q. When Balaams Ass first spoke Articulately to him, wee have no Intimation at all, of his being Affrighted at it? v. 26.

A. Some give this Account; Hee was a Wizzard, who could, by his Magical Invocations ordinarily sett mischievous Divels upon his Enemies, to confound them with many sorts of Disasters. Accordingly, when his Ass first spoke to him, wee have no Intimation of his being Affrighted at it. Why? Hee had been so Familiar with Demons, that hee Thought, it might bee one of Them, who now Addressed him.²³

Q. Is there any thing, that occurs in Pagan Antiquity, like the Speaking of an Ass? v. 26.

A. 'Tis observeable, That Josephus, the Jewish Historian, was mighty careful, in his History to mince those Matters, which might look paradoxal unto the Heathen, and so to Qualify Things, that they might pass among the Heathen underided. But in the Relation of Balaam, hee uses no Dissimulation; hee durst plainly say, The Dumb Ass forbad the Madness of the Prophet. The Speaking of an religion was despised, often the heavenly ones [heroum] were wont to visit pious homes of heroes, and show themselves to mortal man."

Ass, was indeed a strange Thing; but why not an Ass, as well as an Ox? This often happened in the Roman State; and once especially, Livy reports, that unto the Terror, of the Consul Domitius, an Oxe uttered those Words, Roma, Cave Tibi. (Lib. 35.)²⁴

Q. Perhaps Balaams Ass, may be a Subject affording some Remarkables unto us? v. 26.

A. No doubt of it.²⁵

It is wonderful to see an Angel doing here by an Ass, as the Divel once did by the Serpent.

When tis said, The Lord opened the Mouth of the Ass, we must understand, That tho' an Angel formed the Words, yett the Organs of the Asses Mouth, were præternaturally used in the Pronunciation of them. Otherwise we might as well say, That an House speaks, when an Angel speaks in the House.²⁶

The Jewes observe a Mystery in Balaams giving Three Strokes to the Ass, when he was going to Curse & Blast the People, whose Præservation in their Blessedness was brought about, by their keeping Three Feasts in the Year unto the Lord.²⁷

²⁴ Josephus (Antiquities 4.6.3) is ambiguous, for although he has Balaam's she-ass "by the will of God" make "use of the voice of a man," the Jewish historian appears to imply that the voice came from an angel who stood in front of the mule: "And when he [Balaam] was disturbed by reason of the voice of the ass, which was that of a man, the angel plainly appeared to him. ..." (Works 91). Such phenomena of speaking animals were no uncommon phenomena, it seems, even aside from Aesop's fables, for the Roman historian Livy, too, relates the prodigy of a loquacious ox, which warned Roman Consul Gnaeus Domitius (d. 104 BCE), "Rome, for thyself beware" (Ab urbe condita 35.21). And if Sextus Propertius can be trusted, then Arion, the winged stallion of Adrastus, was endowed with human speech as well (Elegies 2.34.1–94). Should we then be surprised that Thomas Hobbes ridicules this OT prodigy in his customary sardonic manner, in his Leviathan (1651), part 3, cap. 37, p. 233?

It is a good Stroke of R. Solomon, upon Balaam, saies Balaam, I would there were a Sword in my Hand, for now I would kill thee. Saies my Rabbi, *Ibat, ut ore suo gentem Intergram perderet, et Armis opus habuit ad hanc Asinam interimendam*²⁸ He was going to Destroy a People, & was not Able to Destroy an Ass. And the Hierosolymitan Paraphrast, indeed putts these Words into the Mouth of the Ass; *Wo to thee, O Wicked Balaam; who hast no Knowledge nor Wisdome in thee! Behold, I am an unclean Beast, & I am to Dy in this World, & never to come into the World to come. Yett with all thy Learning and Wisdome, thou art not able to bring a Curse upon me. How then wilt thou curse the Children of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, for whom the World was made?*²⁹

Rabba also upon the Book of Numbers, ha's this Note, upon the Lords opening the Mouth of the Ass; It was, Ut Balaamum doceret, os et linguam penes se esse, adeoque os Balaami, si quæreretur Israeli maledicere. Balaam hence might learn, That his Cursing Mouth, was in the Hand of the Lord.³⁰

The Speech of the Ass, Am not I thine Ass, upon which thou hast Ridden, ever since I was thine, unto this Day? is in that Clause of it, ever since I was Thine, scarce translated exactly from the Hebrew. The Hebrew is, Ex quo Tu es,³¹ That is to say, ever since Thou wast a Rider. From whence Rabba gathers, That Balaam was not an old Man, for his Ass was older than he. Or at least; many of the Ancient Versions, read it, In thy Youth. We may add, That Pliny allows an Ass to live unto the Age of Thirty.³²

(Metsudah Chumash/Rashi Bamidbar 4:309). Midrash Tanchuma is Rashi's source in the following: "By making these three separate appearances [to stop Balaam's ass], the angel was indicating to Bilom [Balaam] that the merit of the [three] Patriarchs would protect Yisroel [from being harmed by him]." The obstreperous ass reproached Balaam, "'What have I done to you, that you have hit me these three times?' [Numb. 22:29]. The donkey hinted to him, 'You seek to uproot a people who celebrate three Pilgrimage Festivals during the year?'" (Metsudah Tanchuma: Bamidbar II, cap. 9, p. 190).

28 Bochart (col. 194, lines 18–19); Rashi, Mather's R. Solomon, says, "This man is en route to kill an entire nation verbally [through a potent curse], yet, for this donkey, he requires weapons of war!" (Metsudah Chumash/Rashi Bamidbar 4:310). As before, Rashi's source, is Metsudah Tanchuma: Bamidbar II (cap. 9, p. 191).

29 Bochart (col. 194, lines 34–58) quotes from the Targum Hierosolymitanus in Hebrew (Numb. 22:30), but provides his own Latin translation, which Mather here renders into English (Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta 4:284). See also Etheridge's translation of the Jerusalem Targum, in The Targums (2:421).

30 Bochart (col. 193, lines 51–54) probably quotes from R. Rabba b. bar Hana's commentary on Numbers (sec. 20): It was "to teach Balaam that he had at his disposal a mouth and tongue, just as the mouth of Balaam, if he wanted to curse Israel."

31 Numb. 22:30: Heb. מְעוֹדְךָ "all your life" denotes "from the day he was born" (Metsudah: Midrash Tanchuma Bamidbar II, p. 192, note 11).

32 Bochart (col. 194, line 61–col. 195, line 14). To the question of Balaam's age, R. Hanina answers that Balaam was "thirty-three or thirty-four years old." His interlocutor rejoined, that he knows for a fact from "Balaam's Chronicle, in which it is stated, 'Balaam the lame was thirty years old when Phinehas the Robber killed him'" (Talmud, tractate Sanhedrin 106b).

The Lord said unto Balaam, Thy Way is perplexed, or Intricate; So Bochart renders it. And he explains the obscure Hebrew Word /טד/ from the Arabic, of the like Importance; which signifies, To fall into those Troubles, (like deep Mire,) from whence one cannot extricate ones Self.³³

| As for the Speaking of the Ass, Bochart amasses Instances, not only in the [40v] Ancient & Fabulous Poets, agreeable to it; as Bacchus's Ass particularly; and Phrixus's Ram, (which might probably be taken from the Story of Isaac;) and Achilles's famous Horse, Xanthus (in Homer) and Europa's Bull: but also in Real Histories.³⁴

Eusebius writes, that a Sheep spoke in Egypt, under the Reign of Bocchoris. Consult Suidas in Ἀρνίον And, Ælian.³⁵

Julius Obsequens relates, That when C. Marius, and C. Flaccus were Consuls, a Dog spoke at Ariminum.³⁶ Both Valerius and Livy relate that an Ox, said, Whatever the trustworthiness of this chronicle, Numb. 31:6–8 merely states that Balaam, son of Beor, was slain in the annihilation of the Midianites. For the life-expectancy of an ass, see Pliny (Naturalis historia 8.68.168).

33 Bochart (col. 196, lines 10–40) discusses the Arabic root at some detail.

34 Bochart (col. 197). Garrulous donkeys seem to be popular mouthpieces for the ancient gods, for in Astronomica (2.23), by the Roman writer Gaius Julius Hyginus (c. 64 BCE–17 CE) (EB), we learn that in the Zodiac of Cancer, Liber (Libra) is depicted with two stars (asses), one of which carried him to the temple of the Dodonaean Jove, whereupon Liber (in gratitude) endowed the ass with “a human voice.” The ass was sacred to Dionysius (Bacchus). Apollonius Rhodius (Argonautica 1.253–60, 763–67; 2.1140–55; 3.190–93) tells the story of how a ram with a golden fleece rescued Phrixus and his sister Helle (offspring of King Athamas of Boeotia and Nephele, a cloud nymph) from certain death at the hands of their stepmother Ino (queen of Thebes). Alas, for the kindly ram, which Phrixus sacrificed to Zeus and bestowed its golden fleece upon King Aetes of Colchis, who hung the treasure in a tree – which prize, of course, launched Jason and his Argonauts on their quest. Homer (Iliad 19.404–17) has the white-armed goddess Hera give Xanthus, Achilles's fleet-footed horse, the power of speech and prophesy his master's death. So, too, the bucolic poet Joannes Moschus of Syracuse, Sicily (fl. 150 BCE), has the Olympian Zeus, in the guise of a bodacious bull, abduct bathing Europa (Europa 153).

35 Instead of asses, rams, or bulls, Eusebius Pamphilus (Demonstratio evangelica 1.10) tells the story of a voluble lamb. Eusebius excerpts the tale from Manetho's Aegyptiaca (Fragment 64, line 3; 65, line 2) – as extant in Syncellus (Ecloga chronographica 82, line 27) – which chronicles the prodigy of a prophetic lamb in the reign of the Egyptian Bocchoris of Saïs (24th dynasty c. 720–c. 715 BCE), when “a lamb spoke” (ἄρνιον ἐφθέγγετο). To Eusebius, the lamb presages Christ as the sacrificial oblation. The story is also mentioned in Suidas (Lexicon alphab. letter tau, entry 723): ἄρνιον (lamb). From Claudius Aelianus (De natura animalium 12.3), we learn that the Egyptians tell the legend of a lamb in the days of famous Bocchoris “born with eight feet and two tails, and that it spoke. They say also that this Lamb had two heads and four horns.” No telling how many lives it had.

36 The Roman author Julius Obsequens (fl. 4th c. CE?) is remembered for his Julii Obsequentis ab anno urbis conditae quingentesimo quinto prodigiorum liber, a collection of 505 prodigies he had gleaned mostly from Livy's Roman History. First published in Venice (1508), Obsequens's Liber de prodigiis enjoyed great popularity and was reprinted in many subsequent editions. Bochart mentions “Arimini canis locutus” (“a dog speaks at Ariminum”) during the consulships of the Roman statesmen Gaius Marius (c. 104–100 BCE) and Gaius Valerius Flaccus (c. 104 BCE), in which the prodigy of the speaking canine occurred in the Roman city

*Cave Tibi, Roma.*³⁷ Livy saies also, That an Ox was heard speaking in Sicily, and another at Privernum. And another, In Agro Romano; Another, In Agro Campano. Plutarch in his Marcellus, relates the Speaking of an Ox; And elsewhere, he mentions the Speech uttered by Porus's Elephant. Julius Obsequens ha's diverse Exemples of Speaking Oxen.³⁸ And Virgil mentioning the Prodigies at the Death of Cæsar, saies, L.i. Georg.

– Pecudesque Loquntæ

Infandum. –³⁹

And Pliny saies, L. 8. c. 4. *Est frequens in prodigijs priscorum Bovem loquntum; quo nunciato Senatum sub dio haberi solitum.*⁴⁰ Bochart thinks it very unreasonable, to look upon all these as Fictions; but hee adds, *Hac in parte planum est Diabolum se præstitisse Dei simiam.*⁴¹

It may not be amiss, to conclude these Illustrations, with the remarkable Prayer of Zuinglius,⁴²

Ariminum (modern Rimini), in NE Italy. The matter-of-fact one-liner appears in Julii Obsequentis De Prodigijs Liber (1679), p. 54, # CIII ("Prodigy 103").

37 The story of a prophetic ox, ominously uttering, "Rome, for thyself beware," definitely gains credence, it seems, upon multiple repetitions in Valerius Maximus (Factorum et dictorum memorabilium 1.6.5) and in Livy's Ab urbe condita (35.21). In fact, Livy's Ab urbe condita – though otherwise more than trustworthy – seems full of prodigious wonders, the least of which are chatty bovines, in Sicily (24.10), in Privernum (27.11), in a Roman field (28.11), and in a field in Campania (41.13). Not to be left out is Plutarch, who relates the miracle of an ox who "had uttered human speech" (Plutarchi vitae parallelæ: Marcellus 28.2), and Life of Marcellus (5:514). Elsewhere, speaking of the Battle of the Hydaspes, Pseudo-Plutarchus (De fluviis 1.4. 1–13) relates how Alexander the Great, in his campaign against the giant Indian king Porus (326 BCE), encountered Porus's trusty elephant who defended his injured master not only by intelligently shielding him with his huge body and tusks but also by uttering human speech. No wonder, the Macedonian conqueror was impressed and treated both beast and master royally (Life of Alexander 60.12–15).

38 Julius Obsequens mentions several Italian bovines communicating in Latin, in his De Prodigijs Liber (1679), XXXIV, p. 18 (one in Sicily); XXXVIII, p. 21 (in Privernum); XLI, p. 23 (in a Roman field); LXIII, p. 30 (near the Tiber); LXIII, LXVI, pp. 36, 37 (two in Campania); LXXIV, p. 41 (in Frosinone); LXXXV, p. 45 (in Numantia); LXXXVI, p. 46 (in Amiterno), and for good measure, a loquacious dog, in CIII, p. 54 (in Ariminum). Credat Cottonus Maderus, non ego!

39 Let's not forget the portent of speaking animals at the death of Caesar, in Vergil's Georgics (1.478–79) "pecudesque locutæ, / infandum!" ("and beasts – O portent, terrible! – [spake as men].")

40 Pliny (Naturalis historia 8.70.183) adds to the pile of wonders: "It frequently occurs among the prodigies of old times that an ox spoke, and when this was reported it was customary for a meeting of the senate to be held in the open air." (Not much seems to have changed since).

41 Bochart (Hierozoicon, lib. 2, cap. 14, col. 198, lines 52–53) is persuaded that "in this part it is plain that the devil showed himself like the ape of God." Well, there it is.

42 Finally, Mather closes his collection of prodigies with his translation of a shortened, conflated quotation from the epistle Ad Matthaeum Alberum de coena dominica epistola (16 Nov. 1524), by the Swiss Reformer Huldrych Zwinglius (1484–1531), to the Lutheran divine Mattheus Alberus (1495–1570), of Reutlingen: "Deum ergo [O]ptimum [M]aximum precor, ut

Deum O. M. precor, ut vias nostras dirigat, et sicubi simus Bileami, in morem veritati pertinaciter obluctaturi &c “I beseech Almighty God, to direct our Ways; and if Balaam-like, we shall willfully withstand the Truth, to send His Holy Angels, who with the Dint of his Drawn Sword, may dash this Ass (our Blindness & Boldness,) to the Wall, that we may feel our Feet (our carnal Affections) to be crush’d, and ourselves kept from speaking ought amiss of the God of Heaven.”⁴³

vias nostras dirigat; ac sicubi simus Bilaam [Numb. 22:24] in morem veritati pertinaciter obluctaturi, angelum suum opponat, qui machaerae suae minis hunc asinum – inscitiam et audaciam dico nostrum, si saltem ex audacia gloriaeque cupiditate quicquam nobis his agitur – sic ad maceriam adfligat, ut fractum pedem, hoc est: impurum illotumque carnis sensum auferamus, ne ultra blasphemus nomen domini dei nostri” (Huldreich Zwinglis sämtliche Werke 3:342).

⁴³ Mather’s own translation (above) may suffice here – though much the same prayer quoted from Zwingli’s epistle, allegorizing the story of Balaam’s headstrong ass, appears in the Annotations upon the Old and New Testament (1662), 1:377 (on Numb. 22:32), by the Anglican clergyman John Trapp (1601–69), vicar of Weston-upon-Avon, Gloucestershire.

Q. Why Seven Altars erected by Balaam? v. 1.

A. Why may we not say, That here might be some Conformity to the Superstition of the Heathen, who worshipping the Sun (principally meant by Baal,) offered also unto all the Seven Planets?¹

But it is Fortunatus Scaccus's Conjecture, (I know not, whether more lucky or no,) That as Moses erected Twelve Pillars, according to the Number of the Children of Israel, when he entred them into the Covenant of God; [Exod. 24.4.] So Balaam ordered Seven Altars to be erected, according to the Number of the principal Houses of Moab.²

Q. They offered on every Altar a Bullock and a Ram; The Quæstion is, To whom? v. 1.

A. It may be, Balak supplicated Baal; and Balaam, tho' with superstitious Usages, like those employ'd by the Worshippers of Baal (in one of whose High Places they were now offering,) might make his Prayer unto the Lord. It may also be supposed, That Balaam telling Balak, he could not effect any thing without the Lord, the God of Israel, perswaded him to join with him, at present in his Worship, that they might prevail with Him, to withdraw His Presence from the ¹ The use of biblical numerology does not appear to be a reliable heuristic technique, especially when the same numbers can accrue multiple significations, both positive and negative. In his excerpt from Pierre Jurieu's Critical History of the Doctrines (1705), vol. 1, part 1, ch. 5, p. 49 § 3 (see annot. on Numb. 22:5, above), Mather appears to signal that Balaam's practice of sacrificing in sevens (7 oxen, 7 sheep, on 7 altars etc.) purports that Balaam served the true God of Israel at some point in time. However, Mather's present query, based on the conjecture of Fortunatus Scacchus, is here turned against Balaam. Similar conflicting interpretations of Balaam's character can be found among post-Reformation divines, in Poole's Synopsis Criticorum (1:741–42) and Works (7:433–44), as well as among the classic rabbinic commentators. For instance, whereas both Ibn Ezra and Nachmanides acknowledge "profound mysteries" suggesting that a perfect number of seven offerings on seven altars is pleasing to God, Nachmanides adds that Balaam wanted to ensure that God would remain steadfast to him: "That is why he [Balaam] made the same offering to each of the seven lower sefirot" (kingship, strength, kindness, beauty, splendor, victory, and foundation). Perhaps inspired by this kabbalistic reading, Abarbanel adds his own astrological interpretation: "The seven altars were an attempt to harness the power of the seven planets," in JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot (4:173–74).

Israelites. There is no Reason to think, That Balaam would go to enquire of the Lord, after he had sacrificed unto other Gods.³

Q. What may bee the Reach of that Phrase, diverse times here occurring, The Lord putt a Word in Balaams Mouth? v. 5, 12, 16.

A. 'Tis very probable, that Balaam, as Cajaphas afterwards, did not understand the Genuine Force & Sense, of the Prophecies, which his Mouth uttered.⁴ However, 'tis very certain, his Heart was not Holily affected, with what was expressed by his Mouth. And, perhaps, This may bee intimated, by that Phrase, of, Putting a Word into Balaams MOUTH; a Phrase never used about the Inspiration of any Holy Prophets. Possibly, our Lord might have some Eye particularly to these Prophecies of Balaam, when Hee mentions those Castawayes, who at the Day of Judgment shall say, Math. 7.22. *Have wee not prophesy'd in thy Name?*⁵

Q. Why does Balaam single [out] that Proportion, rather than any other, for his Comparison; who can count the Number of the Fourth Part of Israel? v. 10.

A. Israel in the Wilderness, was divided, you know, into Four Squadrons. Balaam was now looking upon One of the Squadrons, which was, The Fourth Part of Israel.⁶

[3748:]

Q. How may that Passage be taken, Lett my last End, be like His? v. 10.

A. Lett my Posterity, (or those that come after me,) be like unto his Descendents. [Compare Psal. 109.13. and Dan. 11.4.]⁷

Tho' the Common Gloss, must not be excluded.⁸

³ Patrick, on Numb. 23:2 (Numbers 457).

⁴ In a case of unconscious irony, High Priest Caiaphas uttered a prophecy which, unbeknownst to him, was applicable to Christ (John 11:49–52).

⁵ For a similar argument, see Jacques Saurin, Dissertations Historical, Critical (1723), Diss. LXV, pp. 599–600.

⁶ Patrick (Numbers 463).

⁸ The “common gloss” suggests – in the words of Nachmanides – that Balaam wished his death to be like that of the righteous among the Israelites, who are to receive eternal life in Paradise. Bekhor Shor takes Balaam’s dying wish as evidence that the Israelites in Moses’ time did belief in life after death for the righteous: “This proves that the idea that Jews have a place in the World to Come, in Paradise, is found in the Torah. Balaam was speaking here through the Holy Spirit – if (God forbid) the Jews got no reward after death, why would he [Balaam] care whether he died of the death of the upright or the wicked?” (JPS Miqra’ot Gedolot 4:176).

Q. How may we understand that Passage; And the LORD mett Balaam? v. 16.

A. This is never said before. It had hitherto been only said, That God mett him; namely, by His Angel, as the Jewes interpret it. But now, the LORD mett him; That is, there was a glorious Appearance of the SCHECHINAH to him; (tho' not in such Lustre, perhaps, as when it appeared unto Moses,) which so amazed him, that after this he never went so much as to enquire what he should say or do. For, tho' he doubted perhaps of what the Angel said, yett now he was fully assured, the Israelites must be blessed.⁹

Q. The Antinomians in our Dayes, use to say, That God sees no Sin in Beleevers, whatsoever Sins they commit: which Assertion, tho' there bee a true Evangelical Sense, wherein wee may glorify Free-Grace by mentaining of it; yett cannot bee mentained in so licentious a Sense, as they Express it; and Apply it. However, their Defense for it, is in the Words of Balaam, Hee hath not Beheld Iniquity in Jacob, nor seen Perverseness in Israel. What can you say, to rescue these Words, from the Iniquity and Perverseness of the Antinomians? v. 21.¹⁰

A. Mr. Gataker hath industriously vindicated this Text; & after a critical Search into it, hee tells us, it is in the Original Word for Word thus, Hee hath not beheld wrong against Jacob, nor hath Hee seen Grievance against Israel. That is, Hee did not with any Approbation, look upon the Wrongs, which others did unto His People. But without having any recourse to that Interpretation, we

The same proof is offered in Judah ha-Levi's כוזרי Liber Cosri Continens Colloquium seu Disputationem De Religione [Buxtorf's Latin translation] (1660), pars 1, sec. 115, pp. 69–72; and H. Hirschfeld's English translation Judah Hallevis Kitab al Khazari (1906), part 1, esp. pp. 80–81.

⁹ Patrick (Numbers 466). Nachmanides (Numb. 23:4) comes to a similar conclusion (JPS Migra'ot Gedolot 4:174).

¹⁰ Although applicable to many other Antinomians in the seventeenth century, Mather appears to single out the followers of Anne Hutchinson (1591–1643), who in the early days of the Massachusetts colony nearly caused the collapse of the emerging New England Way and almost sent John Cotton, Mather's grandfather, packing. For Mather's treatment of Antinomianism (that the moral law is no longer binding on the elect), see his "Hydra Decapitata: Or, The First Synod of New-England, quelling a Storm of Antinomian Opinions," in Magnalia Christi Americana (1702), bk. 7, ch. 3, pp. 14–21. That Antinomianism – as Mather and his peers saw it – was an ongoing threat to New England's covenant theology, can be seen in Mather's Pillar of Gratitude (1700), pp. 22–23; Seasonable Testimony (1702); The Man of God Furnished (1708), esp. Essay V, pp. 103–14; (2nd ed. 1721, pp. 50–62); The Old Paths Restored (1711, 1712); and Diary (1:429–30; 572–73). To date, the best documentary history of the subject is D. D. Hall's The Antinomian Controversy, 1636–1638 (2nd ed. 1990). A. Schrager-Lang's Prophetic Woman (1989) is one of the best studies of Anne Hutchinson's role in the Antinomian crisis. On the same topic, see E. LaPlante's American Jezebel (2004) and M. P. Winship's Times and Trials (2005).

may consider, that the Words, which we translate, Iniquity, and, Perverseness, do emphatically mean, Idolatry; Balaam accordingly gives this as the Reason, why God had Bless'd, and he could not Curse, the Israelites; Because they were free from Idolatry; unto which, unless they could be seduced, there was no Hope of their being delivered unto the Power of their Enemies.¹¹

Q. How may those Words be taken, Surely there is no Enchantment against Jacob? v. 23.

A. It may be read, In Jacob. 'Tis a Gloss that Munster, helps us to; Tho' Jacob came out of Egypt, a Country full of Enchantment & of Divination, yett there are no such things found in Jacob; The inspired Prophets of the Lord alone shall tell Jacob, what God ha's wrought.¹²

¹² Sebastian Münster, Hebraica Biblia, Latina Planeq (1546), on Numb. 23:23, fol. 313 (note e): "Non est augurium in Iacob, &c. hunc habet sensum: Licet Iacob ex Aegypto ascenderit, quae plena est augurijs & divinationibus, haec tamen non sunt in Iacob, sed isto tempore dicitur eis à prophetis quid dominus operetur, & in future operaturus sit."

Q. The Sense of, He went not as at other times, to seek Enchantments? v. 1.

A. Monsr. Saurin chuses to read the Words with such a Paraphrase as This. Now Balaam having seen, that the Lord was resolved to bless Israel, he did not go forth at this time to meet; — that is, to meet GOD. It is said before, That he went to meet GOD. But this time, he went to seek Enchantments. He lift up his Eyes, & saw Israel abiding in his Tents, according to their Tribes. He went now, probably, to pronounce Infernal Curses against that People; But, the Spirit of GOD exercising that Power, which He has over the Minds of the Prophets, caused him to fall into a Trance; during which time, he was compelled unto the Pronouncing the Blessings, which he had himself the utmost Aversion for.¹

Q. Be a little critical, if you please, upon, The Trees of Lignaloës? v. 6.²

A. Ahalim, the Word used here, the LXX, the Vulgar Latin, the Syriac, and the Arabic, render, Tents; and such is the Signification of it, in other Scriptures; and Balaam in the preceding Verse admires the Tents of Jacob; and the Word planted, which follows here, may be rendred, pitched; and there grow no Aloes-tree in Mesopotamia, where Balaam lived, or in Moab, where Balaam was now uttering his Prophecies.³

Indeed, no ancient Author speaks of, The Wood of Aloes; Actius, Dioscorides, Paul Ægineta, Serapion, and certain modern Arabians, are the first that mention'd

² The following paragraphs are excerpted from the anonymously published Essay for a New Translation of the Bible (1701–1702), part 2, ch. 8, pp. 153–58, by the obscure Anglican minister Hugh Ross, whose work is an embellished translation of Projet d'une Nouvelle Version Française de la Bible (1696), by the French Huguenot theologian in exile Charles Le Cène, aka. Le Cèsne (c. 1647–1703) (ODNB). The French Oratorian Richard Simon offers useful comments on the difficulties of how such a project should be undertaken, in his magnificent Histoire Critique Du Vieux Testament (1685), lib. 3, caps. 1–4, pp. 352–71). Mather also put Hugh Ross's Essay to good use in BA (1:1076). That not everyone was pleased with Le Cène's Projet can be seen in Considerations Theologiques et Critiques sur le Projet D'une Nouvelle Version Française de la Bible (1698), by the Jacques Gousset, professor of theology at Groningen.

it, and give that Word the Name of Agalloah, or Xylaloes, that is, The Wood of Aloes, because it resembles the Aloes in Colour; or perhaps, because they could find no Word nearer the Arabic Word, Agagluyen, or the Indian or Arabic Word, Ahala. However what we now call, The Wood of Aloes, comes only from the Indies.⁴

The LXX, Vulgar Latin, Geneva-Version, and others, render Ahalim, only Aloes, in Prov. 7.17. and Psal. 45.9. and Cant. 4.14. But the Author⁵ of the late Essay for a New Translation, observes, That it is a manifest Mistake, and clearly destroyes the Sense of the Texts. For as Junius, Tremelius, Piscator, and J.H. Ursin observe, Aloes is of an ungrateful Smell, & cannot enter among the Perfumes which are mentioned in those Places;⁶ and Cornelius à Lapide is grossly mistaken, when he cites Dioscorides, to prove its Flowers have a very sweet Smell; for that Author saies no such thing.⁷ He only observes, after Pliny, that it is a most excellent Purgative, rather fortifying of the Stomach, than offending of it.⁸ Its true t'was used of old, in Embalming of Dead Bodies; but as Mathioli observes, after Mesuae, t'was to præserve them, not perfume them.⁹ | [42v]

4 Hugh Ross, in his Essay for a New Translation (part 2, ch. 8, p. 154) refers to the as yet unidentified Actius, to the previously quoted Dioscorides Pedanus (De materia medica 3.3, 3.22, 4.137, 4.170), and to the Alexandrian obstetrician and medical doctor Paul Aegineta (c. 630–70 CE), who is mostly remembered for his medical handbook Opus De Re Medica (1532). The latter work influenced several Byzantine and Arabic medical treatises, was translated into several European languages, and reprinted throughout the 16th and 17th c. Aegineta describes the medicinal virtues of aloes and its applications in his Opus De Re Medica (1532), lib. 7, cap. 3, p. 6; 7.4.73; 7.17.134. See also The Seven Books of Aegineta (vol. 3, bk. 7, cap. 3, p. 34). (P.E. Porman). Often mistaken for the 9th-century Arabic writer on medicine Yahya ibn Sarafyun, Serapion the Younger, aka. Joannes Serapionis Arabis (fl. c. 12th c. CE) is remembered for his De Simplicibus Medicinis opus praeclarum & ingens (1531). His discussion of the origin and medicinal virtues of aloes appears in De Simplicibus Medicinis (1531), sec. 201, pp. 136–38. 8 Pliny (Naturalis historia 27. 5.14, 16) relates that the aloe "has an oppressive smell, and a bitter taste. The most valued kind is imported from India, but it also grows in the province of Asia. This kind is used only for wounds, the fleshly gathered leaves, or the juice, having a wonderful power of uniting." It is chiefly used "to relax the bowels, for it is almost the only laxative that is also a stomach tonic, no ill effects whatever resulting from its use."

9 Mather (via Hugh Ross) refers to Commentarii Secundo Aucti in Libros Sex Pedacii Dioscoridis Anazarbei De Medica Materia (1558), lib. 3, cap. 26, pp. 365–67, by the Italian physician, naturalist, and herbalist Pietro Andrea Gregorio Mattioli, aka. Matthioli of Sienna (1501–77),

Wherefore Junius, Tremelius, Buxtorf, and Piscator, abandon that Signification of the Words Ahalim, and Ahaloth; (which Words may intimate, that there was both a Male and Female of this Perfume.) Nevertheless they have succeeded no better, in translating them, Santal; a Wood unknown to the ancient Hebrewes.¹⁰

As for the Indian, Agalloch, or, Wood of Aloes, none of it growes near Judæa, or Arabia. And, tho' Solomons Fleet might bring some of it, from Taprobane, yett the Book of Psalms, the Proverbs, & the Canticles, may seem composed, before the Setting out of that Fleet. And even in the, Indies, one Pound of that Wood, costs as much as three hundred Weight of the best Frankincense, because, as Garsias observes, the Place where it growes, is, horribly full of Tygres.¹¹ Nor is it likely, that in Solomons Time, they would have mixt it, with Myrrhe and Cinnamon; for the Agalloch is too odoriferous, to need any Mixture with it.¹²

There is yett another Wood, which is called, The Wood of Aloes of Syria; or, of Rhodes, and of Candia; called otherwise, Aspalatha; which is a little Shrub, covered with Prickles, of the Wood of which, Perfumers, having taken off its Bark, make Use, to give a Consistency unto their Perfumes, which otherwise would bee too Thin and Liquid. Cassiodorus observes, That it is of a very sweet Smell, and that in his Time, they burnt it before the Altars, instead of Frankincense. Levinus Lemnius saies, That it resembles very much the Agalloch, or, Wood of Aloes of India. All which Considerations render it probable, that Ahalim, and Ahaloth, should be rendred, The Wood of the Syrian Aloes.¹³ physician to Holy Roman Emperor of Austria Maximilian II (1527–76). Matthiolus acknowledges the oft-reprinted De Re Medica Libri Tres (1553), by Johannes Mesuae, aka. Mesuë, aka. Ar Yûchanna ibn-Mâsawayh (d. 857), a highly respected Persian Christian physician, and points out that this aloë was used not only as a medicinal ointment to dress wounds, but also as an unguent to embalm and preserve bodies.

The Dutch physician Levinus Lemnius (1505–68), in his famous Herbarum atque arborum quae in Bibliis (1566), cap. 21, pp. 55–56, insists that the "lignum aloës" ("wood of aloës"), which is called "Agalochum," is also called "lignum Rhodium" ("wood of Rhodes") and "asphalatum."

Q. What may be the import of that Passage, His Seed shall be in many Waters? v. 7.

A. Or, By many Waters. That is, In a Ground well watered; & consequently bringing forth a plentiful Crop. [Isa. 32.20.]¹⁴

But there are those who refer these Clauses, to a Numerous Posterity; Procreation of Children, being express'd by the Metaphors of Waters, and Fountains, and Cisterns;¹⁵

And both the LXX, and Onkelos, interpret this of one particular Person, that should arise of their Seed. The former thus; There shall come a Man out of his Seed, who shall Rule many Nations: The latter thus; There shall be a great King, who shall be anointed of his Children, & shall have Dominion over many People. Which the Hierusalem Targum saies expressly, is, Christ.¹⁶

Q. What is the Meaning of that Passage, in the Prophecy of Balaam, concerning Israel; His King shall bee Higher than Agag? v. 7.

A. A most Remarkable Prædiction of Agag, by Name, the King of the Amalekites! It foretels the Destruction of Agag by Saul. Saul was the First King that ever Israel had; and hee overcame Agag, the King of the Amalekites.¹⁷

Q. A Paraphrase of Mr. Whiston, on the Prophecy of Balaam? v. 15.¹⁸

A. Who can that Person be, that Balaam expected himself to See, & to Behold, a long Time after he was Dead; but that great Redeemer, whom Job expected, also to see out of his own Flesh, at the End of the World.

The Noble Prophecy, is by Mr. Whiston, thus Paraphrased.

¹⁴ This and the following paragraphs are from Patrick (Numbers 482–83).

"I shall See that Great and Divine Person, whom God will send to be the Savior and Patron of Israel, the Messias, but not until the Latter End of the World. For He shall certainly come, as the great Shiloh, the Sent of God, out of the Posterity of Jacob; as a Star, and as a Scepter; as a Glorious and Potent King and Conqueror. He shall not only bring all the Parts of the Countrey of Moab, and Edom, and Seir under His Subjection, and the Subjection of His own People Israel; but He shall have an universal Dominion over all Mankind, & have Power to Rule all His Enemies, wherever they are, with a Rod of Iron, & to dash them all in Pieces like a Potters Vessel.¹⁹ This great Seed of Israel, shall at the Last, in the Upshott of Things, have a compleat Dominion; and He shall in particular overthrow that Grand Mother of Idolatry, the Great City of Rome, with its Tyrannical Empire, which will then be the Grand Opposite Monarchy, to His universal Kingdome. As for Amalek, that once most famous Nation, it shall at last be also utterly destroy'd, and its Land given to the Children of Israel: which will also most certainly be the Final Fate of the Kenites also. Tis true, in Ages long Future, thou thyself, O Israel, wilt be carried captive into Assyria; which will be a sore & most heavy Affliction. Nay, after that time, the Romans from Italy, shall Conquer and Afflict, not only the Assyrians, who carry them captive, but the captive Jewes themselves, & those also, who shall be returned from the same Captivity. But then, at the last of all, to make Way for that universal Dominion of the King of the Jewes, in the End of the World, of which I before spake, this Roman Empire, with its Metropolis, shall be utterly destroy'd; and so no Kingdome in the World, shall be able to hinder the Spreading, or to oppose | the Authority of this Great Kingdome of the Jewes, or of the Messias, the Everlasting King of that Nation."²⁰

[The Time, when they came from the Coast of Chittim, or Italy, and afflicted and subdued Assyria, was in the Reign of Trajan; as their Afflicting the Hebrewes, was in the Reigns of Vespasian, & Adrian, & others.]²¹

¹⁹ Psal. 2:9.

²⁰ Mather's extract is from The Accomplishment of Scripture Prophecies (1708), Sermon VIII, sec. 16, pp. 217–18, by his erstwhile friend and fellow millenarian William Whiston and protégé of Sir Isaac Newton.

²¹ Whiston, Accomplishment (1708), p. 220, acknowledges Samuel Bochart's Geographia Sacra: Phaleg (1646), pars 2, lib. 3, cap. 5, pp. 178–83, as his source for the discussion of "Chittim." Chittim is biblically associated with the territories of Italy and Greece. Roman Emperor Marcus Ulpius Traianus (54–117 CE) conquered the Parthian Empire and annexed Armenia and Mesopotamia just before his death in 117 CE. His predecessor, Titus Flavius Caesar Vespasianus Augustus (9–79 CE), subjugated Judea in 66 CE, before being chosen Caesar in 69 CE. Publius Aelius Hadrianus Augustus (76–138 CE) quashed the Bar Kokhba uprising in Judea (132–36 CE).

Q. Of whom is that Prophecy to be understood; There shall come a Star out of Jacob? v. 17.

A. A Star, be sure, denotes a Great Person; and being understood of Christ, it denotes His Heavenly Original. Now both Onkelos and Jonathan, and the Hierusalem-Targum, take the Messiah to be here meant;²² and so doth R. Moses Haddarsan, and Bereschith Rabba; and a great many Christian Interpreters.²³ Particularly Eusebius, and Cyril of Alexandria; who confutes Julians Exposition of these Words, as belonging to David, and his Successors;²⁴ and replies, That if Balaam had spoken of David, and the Kings of Israel, he would have said, There shall come Stars out of Jacob: whereas he speaks of but one alone οἶον ἐν ἄστροις ἐκπρεπῇ, As very Illustrious among the Stars; which, it is evident, can be none but Christ. Unto which, Dr. Patrick thinks worthy to be added, the Words of a later Writer of the Jewish Nation, one R. Isaac, in his, Illuminatio Fidei, | sett forth [43v] not long ago, by the learned Wagenseil; That this cannot be understood of David,

or any other King of Israel; because none of them ever have Reigned over all the Earth (i. e. over all the Children of Seth;) but he concludes, it is meant of the Messiah, who is compared unto a Star, because of the Perennity of His Kingdome, & the Splendor of His Dominion, and His great Acts throughout the World.²⁵

We may observe, That as long ago, as the Time of the Emperour Adrian, this was understood by the Generality of the Jewes, to be a Prophecy of the Messiah. For then they applied this Prophecy, unto a False Messiah, whose Name was, Cocab, or, A Star.²⁶

[1798:]

Q. When tis said, Hee shall Destroy all the Children of Sheth, who are meant, by, The Children of Sheth? v. 17.

A. Some think, the Moabites are here called so, because one of their Progenitors, famous in his Time, was called, Sheth.

But I find one, who takes it Appellatively; The Children that are now Behind mee. Filios Sedis, seu postica partis. Hee means, The Ammonites, which were now Behind him, when hee had his Face towards the Tents of Israel.²⁷

David was the Star, by whom, as a Type, these things were gloriously accomplished; Hee was The Light of Israel. But that hee may bee acknowledged for no more than a Type, his Dying Words, foretel yett another, & a brighter Star to come. See 2. Sam. 23.4.

Some have putt a Mystical Sense on The Sons of the Toyl. —²⁸

25 Patrick refers to the Lithuanian R. Isaac ben Abraham of Troki (c. 1525–c. 1586), ספר חזקוני אמונה אשר חבר יצחק בן אברהם [Sefer Hizzuk Emunah] Liber Munimen Fidei, a polemic against Christian attacks on Judaism. Mather, via Patrick (Numbers 24:17), points to R. Isaac's gloss (lib. 1, cap. 6, pp. 72–73; cap. 11, pp. 80–81), in Wagenseil's Tela Ignea Satanae (1681) 2:71–72, 80–81. R. Isaac's rare work is among several such works (including Libellus Toldos Jeschu), which the Lutheran Hebraist at Altdorf Johann Christoph Wagenseil targets in his anti-Semitic Tela Ignea Satane. Hoc est: Arcani, & horribiles Judaeorum adversus Christum Deum (1681). The explication of a “star out of Jacob, and a scepter rises out of Israel” (Numb. 24:17) appears in Tela Ignea Satanae (1681) 1:276–77; 2:71–72, 80–81. On R. Isaac ben Abraham, see S. Schreiner's article, “Isaiah 53 in the Sefer Hizzuk Emunah (“Faith Strengthened”) of Rabbi Isaac ben Abraham of Troki” (418–49).

26 Patrick (Numbers 488–89) relates that according to R. David Ganz' ספר צמח דוד Sefer Tzemach David: Chronologia Sacra-Profana. (1644), the famous Jewish philosopher R. Akiba applied Balaam's prophecy (Numb. 24:17) to Simon Bar-Kokhba (Aramaic: “Son of a Star”), who led a bloody revolt against the Roman occupiers (132–135 CE). The Hebrew noun כּוֹכַב [kowkab] (Mather's Cocab) suggests “star [of Messiah]” (Strong's # 3556). Patrick's source appears to be Henry Ainsworth's gloss on Numb. 24:17, in Annotations upon the Five Bookes of Moses (1627), pp. 158–59 (sep. pag.). See also Mather's annotations on Deut. 28:49 and 28:62.

27 Mather leans on the gloss of Junius and Tremellius, in Biblia Sacra, sive, Libri Canonici (1593), on Numb. 24:17 (note 20), but provides his own translation. More literally, “the children of the seat, which [are] now behind.” See also Jacob Alting's “Parallelismi Vaticiniorum Veteris Testamenti Quae citantur in Novo” (Sec. III: Matt. 2: v. 2, 9 & Numb. 24:v. 15–23; fol. 8, col. 2), in Opera Omnia (vol. 2, fol. 8 sep. pag.).

28 Mather deploys a double-typological interpretation of Balaam's prophecy: In its first

[2822.]

Q. But a farther Touch upon this Prophecy?

A. An eminent Hebrician renders it, A Sceptre, shall Unwall all the Children of Seth: That is, Break down the Partition-Wall between Jewes, and Gentiles.²⁹

Q. What might be the Intent of Balaam in that Exclamation, Alas, who shall live, when God doth this? v. 23.

A. It hath been commonly carried, as if the Time for the Accomplishment of the Things foretold by Balaam, would be so lamentable, there would be no Living in them. I now rather take it, The Time would be so Desireable, that the Prophet wishes, hee might live to see God do this. Vitam sibi tam diu prorogari optat, ut Diem Christi Incarnati videre possit: So Zehner, in his Adagia Sacra, understands it.³⁰

Balaam had a little before complained, v. 17. That the Time of the Messiahs Coming was yett far off, that he could not hope to live to see Him. He now seems again to Bewayl it. Compare Luk. 10.24.

Constantine in his Oration, recited by Eusebius, brings a Verse of the Erythraean Sibyl, wishing to this Purpose;

Εἶθε με γηραλέον ζωντά τ' εἴχε νηδυμος ἰσχύς.³¹

And he brings Virgil as thus translating it,

*O mihi tam longæ maneat pars ultima Vitæ.*³²

instance (or smaller type), it refers to King David as the “Star,” but in its larger fulfillment to Christ. In this manner, Mather develops a double fulfillment of the OT prophetic type and NT antitype, a heuristic device that allows him to argue for multiple fulfillments. He lays the theoretic groundwork for this type of exegesis in his “A Golden Key to open the Sacred Prophecies,” in Threefold Paradise (pp. 162–93). See also J. Stievermann’s Prophecy, Piety (part V).

²⁹ Mather’s allegorical reading (Numb. 24:17) appears to echo Richard Baxter’s allegorization of the Calling of the Jews (Rom. ch. 11), in The Glorious Kingdom of Christ (1691).

³¹ Zehner (Adagia Sacra, p. 19) adapts the Greek passage from the Erythraean Sibyls, extant in Constantini imperatoris oratio ad coetum sanctorum (20.10., line 18) of Eusebius Pamphilus, who recorded the address of Roman Emperor Flavius Valerius Aurelius Constantinus Augustus (272–337 CE) to the “holy assembly” of the bishops at the Council of Nicaea (325 CE) (CE). Returning the Greek diacritics (which Mather customarily omits), the adapted passage reads, Εἶθε με γηραλέον ζωντά τ' εἴχε νηδυμος ἰσχύς “Would that, upon me living, aged, sweet strength was pouring.” A similar version of the Erythraean Sibyl appears in a similar version in Anthologiae Graecae Appendix, Oracula (Epigram 264, line 54).

³² Zehner’s quote (p. 19) from Vergil’s Eclogue (4.53) translates, “O that then the last days of a long life may still linger for me.”

Like this was the pious Wish of Mantuani about the Reformation of the Church;
O utinam me fata dies patiantur in illos
*Vivere, et hos nostra gentis spectare triumphos.*³³

Q. How were the Circumstances of the Kenites, mentioned in Balaams Prophecy accomplished? v. 21, 22.

A. By their Nesting in a Rock, besides the local Position of their Dwelling, we may understand their Confœderacy & Association, with the Jewes, in the true Religion; for they were Proselytes. Hence also, they shared with the Jewes in the same Success, the Assyrian carried them Captive into Babylon; and when the Jewes Returned from that Captivity, these were also Restored with them. See 1. Chron. 12.55. And we may conceive these Kenites, to be the Same, with the Abstemious Family of the Reckabites.³⁴

Q. What was the Prædiction of, Ships coming from the Coasts of Chittim, to afflict Ashur? v. 24.

A. It wonderfully foretels the Conquest of Alexander. By the Coasts of Chittim, are to be understood, the Coasts of Greece, from whence, Alexanders Army was Transported into Asia: For, Alexander came out of the Land of Chittim: [1. Mac. 1.1.] and Perseus, is called, King of the Chittims, or Macedonians. [Chap. 8.5.]³⁵

³⁴ The ancient nomadic tribe of the Kenites lived in Palestine during the time of Abraham and Moses (Gen. 15:19; Judg. 1:16; Exod. 18:12ff) and may have given rise to the Medianite priest Jethro, Moses’ father-in-law (Numb. 4:29). Balaam (Numb. 24:21–22) also mentions the Kenites who were united with the tribe of Judah (1 Sam. 30:29; 27:10) and were renowned for their art of bronze and iron smithery (JE).

Q. Upon the Occasion of that Word, Israel abode in Shittim; one would enquire, what might be the true Shittim-Wood, whereof we read so often in the Pentateuch? v. 1.¹

A. We have generally kept the Word in the Original. Fagius having observed, That the Jewish Doctors take this Tree, some for the Cedar, some for the Wild-Pine, & others for the Box-tree, concludes only with saying, That the Opinion of Aben-Ezra is most probable, who thinks, that this Kind of Tree, did grow near to Mount Sinai. Hiskani saies almost the same; adding, That in the Desarts, there were whole Forrests of these Trees, of which the Israelites made their Tabernacles; according to what is here said, Israel abode in Shittim; that is, according to him, In Tents made of that Wood. But this is too general to give us any Satisfaction.²

The LXX are more particular, when they translate Sittah, the Box-tree; Isa. 41.19. But since they translate Sittim, the Mastick-tree; Mic. 6.5. and, Incorruptible Wood, in all other Places, they also leave us at an Uncertainty.³

After all, there is now not any other Tree, in all the Desart of Arabia, but the Acacia, from which the Arabians take the Gum, which we call, Gum Arabick, as Balon, who travel'd that Countrey, relates. Jerom seems to have come the nearest unto the true Signification of the Word, when he observes, That the Hebrew Sittah, is a sort of a Tree, which growes in the Desart, resembling the White-Thorn, or Brier, both in Leaves and Colour; but withal so large, that it

1 As in his commentary on Numb. 24:6, Mather here mines Hugh Ross's two-part Essay for a New Translation of the Bible (1701–1702), an embellished translation of Charles Le Cène's Projet d'une Nouvelle Version Française de la Bible (1696). See also Mather's conjecture (Gen. 6:14) that Noah's ark was built from "Shittim Wood" (BA 1:602) as explained in Mather's letter to John Woodward of the Royal Society, and abridged in "An Extract of several Letters from Cotton Mather, D.D.," in Philosophical Transactions 29 (1714–16) 63.

2 Hugh Ross, Essay for a New Translation (part 2, ch. 8, sec. 2, pp. 149–50); Paulus Fagius's gloss on Exod. 25:5, appears in his Targum. Hoc est Paraphrasis Onkeli Chaldaica in Sacra Biblia (1546), on Exod. 25, voce "Ligna Schittin" (fol. P^{3v}). Abraham Ibn Ezra, on Exod. 25:5, in Commentary on the Pentateuch: Exodus (pp. 534, 335, 336) is not entirely satisfied with the ancient tradition that "Jacob planted acacia trees [Shittim-wood] in Egypt" and that Moses had it carried out again during the Israelites' exodus. Ibn Ezra therefore speculates that when Moses had the Tabernacle constructed he used the wood of "a forest of acacia trees next to Mount Sinai." However, during their long residence at the foot of the mountain, "they cut the entire forest down." Rabbi Chizkiyahu ben Rabbi Manoach, aka. Hiskani, aka. Chizkuni, furnishes a similar explanation (Parashat T'rumah 25:5): "there were forests in the desert in which these [acacia] trees grew. This is why the Israelites were described as dwelling at Shittim [Numbers 25:1]. The wood of these trees is light in weight and pleasant to look at" (Chizkuni Torah Commentary 2:575).

3 Ross, Essay (151).

can furnish the greatest Planks, & surpasses all other Wood, in Strength, Beauty, and Lightness. But he is deceived, in saying, That this Tree is only to be found in Arabia, since it is common in Egypt, and in Europe too; tho' it have not all the same Qualities.⁴

However, the Author of the late Essay for a New Translation, will have it no longer doubted, that this Tree, is the Acacia. Hottinger observes, the Word, Shittah, and Shittim, evidently comes from the Word, Shet, which signifies among the Arabians, That which is long.⁵ Whence the Rabbi's call a Line or Verse of a Book, Sittah, because of its Length, as tis remark'd by Schindler.⁶ And the Hebrew Schotet, signifies, a Staff, or a Rod, or a Scourge; [Josh. 23.13.] And the Greek Word, Acacia, comes from the Verb, Acazo, which signifies, To sharpen; because the Acacia is covered round with sharp and large Prickles.⁷

Nor was there any Wood more proper, for making the Ark, and a great Part of the Materials of the Tabernacle; which were to be very durable. Tis affirmed, by Theophrastus, and Matthiolus, and Prosper Alpinus, & others, that the black Acacia, is so very solid, that it almost never corrupts; & they employ it therefore to make the Sides and Ribs of Ships.⁸

There not being any other Trees in the Desert, it is probable, that Moses, being so well supplied at hand, would not send any further a field, for Materials, to make the Sacred Buildings.

⁷ Ross, Essay for a New Translation (part 2, ch. 8. p. 151).

⁸ Ross, Essay (151–52); Theophrastus, Enquiry into Plants (4.2.8), distinguishes between the white and black acacia (ἄκανθα), the former being soft and decays quickly; the latter considerably stronger, less likely to decay, is therefore used in shipbuilding. The Italian physician and naturalist Petrus Andreas Matthiolus of Siena (1501–1577) provides an illustrated disquisition on acacia trees and their many uses, in his Commentarii Secundo Aucti in Libros Sex Pedacii Dioscoridis Anazarbei de Medica Materia (1558), lib. 1, cap. 115, pp. 129–30, an annotated edition on Pedanius Dioscorides's De Materia Medica (c. 65 CE), an influential book on natural history, herbalism, and botany composed during the first century CE. Likewise, the Venetian physician and botanist Prosper Alpinus, aka. Prospero Alpini (1553–1617), who spent three years in Egypt, is best known for his oft-reprinted De Plantis Aegypti Liber (Venetiis, 1592). My reference is to the annotated edition Prosperi Alpini De Plantis Aegypti Liber. Cum Observationibus & Notis Ioannis Veslingii (1640), cap. 4: "De Acacia" (pp. 9–14) by Johannes Veslingius, aka. Johann Vesling (1589–1649), a German anatomist, botanist, and professor of anatomy and surgery at Padua.

And probably, the last Camp of Israel, in the Land of Moab, was called, Shittim, or, Abel-Shittim, or Nahal Shittim, or, the Valley of Shittim, because it was full of Acacia.⁹

Q. The Daughters of Moab, called the People unto the Sacrifices of their Gods: How do the Jewish Doctors tell the Story? v. 2.

A. The ordinary Charms unto Idolatry were Good Victuals and Bad Women. The Feasts upon the Sacrifices among the Heathen, were very magnificent; being accompanied with Musick, and with Dancing, and sometimes with pompous Processions, which inticed youthful Minds to partake of them. Here, the Israelites casting their Eyes upon the Daughters of Moab, (which doubtless on this Occasion appeared in the richest Ornaments,) were smitten with their Beauty, & courted them. The Ladies would not yield unto them, except upon Condition, that they would first worship their Gods: whereupon (as the Jewish Doctors tell the Story) pulling a little Image of Peor, out of their Bosom, they presented it unto the Israelites to kiss it, & desired them to eat of the Sacrifices that had been offered unto them.¹⁰

It has been indeed observed by the Writers of the Church; That Women have been the most dangerous Seducers of Men, from the True Religion; being, from the Beginning, the Spreaders of the old Hæresies. For, Simon Magus advanced his Hæresies, Helena Meretricis adjutus auxilio. Nicolaus of Antioch also, Choros duxit femineos. The famous Marcion sent before him some Roman Ladies, to præpare his Way. Apelles, (and Montanus,) and Arius, and Donatus, all took the same Course, as tis related by Jerom, in his Book, Adversus Pelagianos.¹¹

⁹ Ross (Essay 152–53).

¹¹ Patrick (Numbers 500); St. Jerome derides the errors of the following heretics: Simon Magus, the magician who was reproached by St. Peter [Acts 8:9–24] for advocating proverbial “simony,” is to have been in league with Helen, an alleged prostitute of Tyre; Nicolas of Antioch, one of the seven first diacons accused of being a Gnostic, allegedly preached that adultery and eating food sacrificed to idols are adiaphora; Marcion of Sinope was an early Christian bishop who denied Christ's duality and argued that not the God of the Hebrew Bible, but Jesus Christ was the only true deity; Apelles, a Marcionite, was charged with making common cause with Philumene, an Alexandrian prostitute and visionary; the schismatic Montanus (2nd c. CE) is to have lead Priscilla, Maximilla, and their followers into preaching poverty and an imminent judgment day; Arius of Alexandria (c. 250–336 CE) rejected the emerging doctrine of the Trinity and insisted on the superiority of God above the Christ; the N African schismatic bishop Donatus Magnus of Carthage (d. c. 355 CE) rigorously excluded lapsed (but repentant) Christians who under persecution had compromised Christian beliefs; finally, the Pelagians

Q. The Lord said unto Moses, Take all the Heads of the People, & Hang them up. How must we understand it? v. 4.

A. The plain Meaning seems to be, That he should cause to be Apprehended the Rulers of Thousands and Hundreds, & other principal Persons in their Tribes, who had been guilty of this foul Idolatry; and by their Execution putt a stop to the Peoples Leudness, when they saw these Great Men made publick Examples.

Yett a great many famous Doctors and Writers, take the Word, Otham, (Them, who were to be hanged up,) to refer, not unto the Heads of the People, but unto such as had joined themselves unto Baal-Peor; and they interpret the foregoing Words, as if he had been bidden, to take unto him (for his Assistance,) the Heads of the People, to carry on that Execution.¹²

A Thousand Persons underwent this Capital Execution. This Reconciles Paul and Moses. Paul speaks of this Crime, as issuing in the death of Twenty three thousand; [1. Cor. X.8.] Moses makes them amount unto Twenty four thousand.¹³

The Greatness of this Plague appears from the Difference found in the Numbring of the Tribe of Simeon; in the Second Chapter of this Book, and in (disciples of the monk Pelagius [c. 354–c. 440]) against whom St. Jerome directs his letter to Ctesiphon, rejected the doctrine of the imputation of original sin and held that human volition is able to embrace good without the help of grace (ABD, CE, HBD, ODCC). In Mather's day, this belief was also imbibed by Edward Lord Herbert of Cherbury, in his De Religione Gentilium (1663), ch. 1. Be that all as it may, Mather's second-hand passage from Patrick (Numbers 500) is a partial excerpt and translation from St. Jerome's "Epistola CXXXIII. Ad Ctesiphontem. Adversus Pelagium," in Epistola Secundum Ordinem Temporum [PL 022. 1153], and reads in translation, "It was with the help of the harlot Helena that Simon Magus founded his sect. Bands of women accompanied Nicolas of Antioch that deviser of all uncleanness. Marcion sent a woman before him to Rome to prepare men's minds to fall into his snares. Apelles possessed in Philumena an associate in his false doctrines. Montanus, that mouthpiece of an unclean spirit, used two rich and high born ladies Prisca and Maximilla first to bribe and then to pervert many churches. Leaving ancient history I will pass to times nearer to our own. Arius intent on leading the world astray began by misleading the Emperor's sister. The resources of Lucilla helped Donatus to defile with his polluting baptism many unhappy persons throughout Africa" (Letter CXXXIII. To Ctesiphon"), in NPNFii (6:275).

12 Patrick, on Numb. 25:4 (Numbers 502–03). This is also the position of Ibn Ezra (JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot 4:190).

13 Patrick, on Numb. 25:9 (Numbers 508). According to Rashi (Numb. 25:5), "each of the Israelite judges executed two men, and there were eighty eight thousand Israelite judges" [Sanhedrin 18a] (Metsudah Chumash Rashi Bamidbar 4:344). However, Nachmanides raises a reasonable objection about the number of executed idolaters: "I do not understand how the guilty – God forbid – could amount to more than 150,000, over a quarter of all the Israelites. Even a single capital case cannot be tried without a Sanhedrin of 23 members. But even if each group of 23 could kill two men (rather than each individual judge), this would still be an enormous slaughter, and there is no trace of such a massacre in the census of ch. 26. ... To say that Moses asked each 'man' (singular) to slay 'his men' (plural) simply means that each court was to judge its own tribe (or its own unit of 1,000)," in JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot (190–91)

the Twenty Sixth. In the former they make Fifty nine thousand, & three hundred; In the latter, no more than, Twenty two thousand, & two hundred.¹⁴

Q. The Action done by Phinehas, in slaying of Zimri, can it bee vindicated? v. 11.¹⁵

A. Why not? The Crime of Zimri was extraordinary; It was a Capital Crime, & complicated, Idolatry, and Adultery: It was perpetrated in the very Sight of the Chief Magistrate, & his Council, & the General Assembly of Israel; Tis not unlikely, that Phinehas had their Concurrence, for the Striking of these Criminals with Death. Hee was a great Man, who committed this Rebellion; one doubtless, who thought himself too great for to bee meddled with; and there seems to have been a Peece of Sedition intended in it; If the Rebels had not been Dispatch'd with a Quick Stroke, who can tell, what it might have come to? Briefly, This Blade, thus bringing in his Midianitish Whore, at this Juncture, in this Manner, made himself a Midianite; the Israelites now being at War with the Midianites, and all in a Ferment, thro' a War that Heaven, was on the account of the Midianites making on them, I see not, why any private Israelite might not have killed such a Renegado.¹⁶

One ingeniously saies upon it, Zimri, and Cosbi, were more Beasts, than any that Phinehas ever sacrificed; & the Shedding of their Blood, was as Acceptable a Sacrifice as ever he made.¹⁷

Q. We find, A Covenant of Everlasting Priesthood, here made with Phinehas; And yett after some Successions, we find, the Priesthood came into the Line of Ithamar; and God sett aside the Line of Phinehas for some Years, till the Sons of Eli became so wicked, that in the Dayes of Solomon, it was restored unto that Line again? v. 13.

¹⁴ Patrick, on Numb. 25:8, 9 (Numbers 508).

¹⁵ In his "Note Book of Authors" (Numb. 25:11), Mather identifies "MSS. no. 7. p. 10" as a source to be consulted.

¹⁶ See Jacques Saurin, Dissertations, Historical, Critical, Theological and Moral (1723), Diss. LXV, pp. 615, 616.

A. We know not what Sin it was, that provoked God against the Line of Phinehas. The Jewish Doctors, are some of them, so bold as to say, it was because Phinehas would not absolve Jephthah from his Vow. But it is more probable, that the Successors of that great Man, had committed the Offence: for his Posterity held the Priesthood for four Generations; as Josephus & others, (mentioned by Selden) make Account.¹⁸

Aegidius Camartus in his Book, De Rebus Eliae, and, Cornelius Bertramus, in his Book, De R. P. Jud.: imagine, That in those confused Times, none of the Priests were found fitt, for to Administer the Affayrs of the Nation, but Eli alone: and therefore he was appointed by God unto it. [1. Sam. 2.30.] But L'Empereur thinks, That there was also some Offence committed in the Race of Phinehas, which was the Cause of their Losing their Dignity.¹⁹ The Promise of God, had not been interrupted, but for some Disobedience in them. But yett, so constant was God unto His Promise, that He præserv'd his Line, in a continued Succession of Twelve Persons, from Phinehas to Azariah, who executed the Priests Office in the Temple, that Solomon built in Jerusalem. [1. Chron. 6.4–10.] From which Time, to the Captivity in Babylon, there were Nine more. And after the End of the Captivity, unto the Time of Antiochus Eupator, the Jewes reckon Fifteen more; the last of which, Onias, was killed by Lysias. And after him were Eight of 18 Patrick (Numbers 510–11). Mather refers to the puzzling question that although God had made a “covenant of an everlasting priesthood” with Phinehas and his offspring to be high priests forever, his offspring were passed over for this priestly office for several generations (1 Chron. 24:1–6). According to the tradition of Midrash Rabbah, Phinehas did not absolve Jephthah, the Gileadite, from a vow that inadvertently required the sacrifice of his daughter (Judg. 11:30–40). Phinehas, though in Gilead at the time, was too proud to come to Jephthah’s aid. “Phineas said: ‘He [Jephthah] needs me, and I am to go to him! Moreover, I am a High Priest and the son of a High Priest, shall I then go to an ignoramus?’ While Jephthah said: ‘Am I, the chief of Israel’s leaders, to go to Phinehas!’ Between the two of them the maiden perished.” Their punishment? Jephthah died piecemeal by losing one limb after another, whereas Phinehas “was deprived of the divine afflatus” (Genesis Rabbah LX:3). Josephus Flavius (Antiquities 5.7.10). The profoundly learned English Hebraist John Selden, in his De Successione in Pontifacum Ebraeorum (1636), lib. 1, caps. 2–3, pp. 115–26, combs numerous rabbinic and Arabic sources to explain the shift from the line of Phinehas to that of Ithamar.

19 Aegidius Camartus, aka. Gilles Camart (1571–1624), a French Franciscan, who authored Elias Thesbites sive De Rebus Eliae Prophetæ (1631), ch. 3, secs. 2–5, pp. 72–85, feels that during these early times, before the priestly institutions were fully worked out, none of the offices were filled by truly qualified persons. Constantinus L’Empereur maintains that God punished the disobedience of Eli’s sons Hophni and Phinehas (1 Sam. 1:3, 2:12–34; 4:17–18) by removing the priesthood from the House of Eli in Solomon’s day and by elevating Zadok, of the House of Eleazer, to the high priesthood (1 Kings 2:26–35). L’Empereur discusses the circumstances of Phineas’s disobedience and the devolving of the priesthood to the family of Eleazer, in his Annotaciones (pp. 411–18), appended to Bonaventura Cornelius Bertramus, De Republica Ebraeorum (1641). Bertramus outlines the succession of the high priesthood and their assistants in ch. 15 (esp. pp. 239–71), as does Selden, De Successione in Pontifacum Ebraeorum (1636), lib. 1, caps. 4–7 and 11, esp. pp. 129, 134–35, 138, 141, 145, 152–53, 172–79.

²⁰ Chronology: From the Babylonian Captivity (c. 605–538 BCE) to young King Antiochus Eupator (164–162 BCE), offspring of Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–164 BCE). During the internecine warfare of the period, Lysias, Antiochus Eupator's guardian, murdered the rightful High Priest Onias III (c. 190–c. 172 BCE), and Onias's brother, Menelaus, took over the priestly office. Conflicting versions of this internecine family feud exist, but Mather (and his sources) follows Josephus's account in Antiquities (12.9.6–7). King Herod the Great (c. BCE 73–4 BCE) had Aristobulus, the son of Alexander Jannaeus (by Alexandra) and brother of Herod the Great's wife Mariamne, drowned (35 BCE) during a failed plot against Herod (ABD). See Josephus Flavius (Antiquities 15.2.5–3.3).

Q. The Observation of the New Moons, among the old Jewes, calls for some Illustration? v. 11.¹

A. The Neomenia among the Hebrewes, were either Common, at the Beginning of every Month, or Special, at the Beginning of the Seventh; Briefly, They were either Menstrual, or Annual.² And Ribera seems to assign a Good Reason for them; Neomenia solemnitas fiebat, quodd prout Rerum & Terris nascentium primitias, sibi Deus offerri voluit, ita etiam voluit Temporis primitias; atque ideo primos quosque mensium Dies elegit.³

The former Sort of New-Moon Holiday, wee find in great Request among the Israelites. We will first consider These.

Tis very certain, that the Observation of New Moons among the Pagans was very Ancient. Homer, tis thought, lived in the Dayes of David; now Herodotus relates, that Homer, ταῖς νομηνίαις προσπορευόμενος πρὸς τὰς οἰκίας τὰς

1 The following extracts are from John Spencer's De Legibus Hebraeorum (1685), lib. 3, diss. 4, cap. 1, sec. 3, fols. 722–36, and compare the Israelites' sacrificial rituals during the celebrations of the new moon (neomenia) to those of the nations. Spencer posits that Moses and the Israelites adopted these celebrations from the lunar festivities of their pagan neighbors. To rebut this claim, Mather argues that Spencer is "putting the cart before the horse." It was Moses, Mather argues, who first introduced these rituals, which were then copied by envious pagans.

2 Ibn Ezra and Abarbanel appear to disagree on how often these neomenia are to be observed. Ibn Ezra, for one, argues that according to Moses Gikatilla [Sephardic grammarian (11th c.) of Cordova] "your' [Numb. 28:11] new moon must refer specifically to the new moon of Nisan, the only month of which we are told, 'This month shall mark for you the beginning of the months' (Exod. 12:2). Only later will we be told that this shall also be the monthly burnt offering 'for each new moon of the year' (v. 13). And his explanation is correct. One might argue that our phrase refers to 'new moons' in the plural. But we see (from 1 Sam. 20:5) that hodesh by itself means 'new moon.' So the rosh hodesh of our verse must mean the 'chief,' most important new moons – those of Nisan. He is therefore quite correct." Abarbanel, however, disagrees, insisting that "All the new moons of the year" are meant here. "Had it said merely 'on the new moon' it could have been interpreted as referring to the special new moon, the new moon of Nisan" (JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot 4:212).

3 Not included in Spencer, the interpolated passage (which appears in the left-hand margin of the "Biblia Americana" ms.) is Mather's conflated quotation from De Templo, & de iis quae ad Templum pertinent (1593), lib. 5, cap. 2, pp. 295, 296, by the distinguished Spanish Jesuit Francisco Ribera (1537–1591), professor of theology at the University of Salamanca (CE). Ribera explains the sacrificial rituals at the solemn occasion of the new moon as follows: "The festival of the new moon was established, because just as the first-fruits of things grow on the land, God wanted them to be offered to himself, so he wanted the first-fruits of the season, and thereby he chose all the first days of the months."

*Primum Novilunium, quartaque, et septima, Sacra dies.*⁵

And Euripides calls these Holidayes, ζαθέους σελήνας, Divinas Lunas; affirming that the Trojans, who were elder than either of the former Poets, observed them Twelve Times in a Year. [Compare the LXX, at Exod. 40.2.]⁶

The Testimonies of this Usage among the ancient Gentiles, you shall find in Meursius, in Petit, in Doughtie; unto all which, you may subjoin that of Isidore, *Apud Veteres, omnium mensium principia colebantur, sicut et apud Hebraeos.*⁷ Being Ignorant of Astronomy, their Measuring of Times, by Moons, was managed with some Festivities. Even at this Day, Travellers find the Heathen doing so.⁸

The Jewes of old, Reckoned & Observed their New Moons, not from the Time of the Moons Conjunction with the Sun, But the Time of the Moons first Appearance after the Change. Philo saies, Νουμηνία ἄρχεται φωτίζειν αἰσθητῶ φέγγει σελήνην [ὁ] ἥλιος, ἡ κάλλος ἀναφαίνει· *At the New Moon, the Sun begins to illustrate the Moon with sensible Splendor, and shee discovers her beauty to Spectators.*⁹

4 Spencer (lib. 3, diss. 4, cap. 1, sec. 1, fol. 716); Vita Homeri, Vita Herodotea (463–64): Mather mistranscribes the following phrase from Spencer as ἑκτίας τὰς εὐδαιμονεστάτας, which should read οἰκίας τὰς εὐδαιμονεστάτας (here silently corrected). According to Archbishop James Ussher's Annals of the World (1658), pp. 34–35, 39, Homer lived in the 10th-century BCE; King David in the 11th c. BCE. See also BA (1:334, note 170).

5 Spencer (716). Believed to have flourished c. 700 BCE (EB), Hesiod explains that the observation of certain days in the week were instituted by the gods: πρῶτον ἐνῆ, τετράς τε, καὶ ἐβδόμη, ἱερὸν ἡμαρ· “to begin with, the first, the fourth, and the seventh, a holy day” (Opera et dies 770).

6 Spencer (717); see Euripides (Helena 114 and the chorus in Troïades 1075): “Sacred Moons.”

7 Joannes Meursius, in his Graecae Feriatae. Sive, De Festis Graecorum, Libri VI (1619), lib. 5, pp. 210–14 (voce: Νουμηνία), provides a detailed list of classical Greek sources which mention the celebration of the new moon. Samuel Petitus, in Leges Atticae Collegit, Digessit, et Libro Commentario Illustravit (1635), lib. 1, pp. 85–88 (“Mensium Kalendis sacra facito”), explains the function of this celebration and the role of the magistrates. Joannes Doughtieo, aka John Doughty, in his Analecta Sacra: sive Excursus Philologici, pars posterior (1660), pars 2, Excursus 87, pp. 249–43, views the neomenic festivities from the vantage point of Col. 2:16. And Isidore Hispalensis Episcopi, aka. St. Isidore of Seville, comments on the festivities for each month of the year, in his Etymologiarum sive Originum Libri XX, lib. 5, cap. 33 [PL 082. 00219–00220]. The Latin quotation from the latter work (cap. 33, § 13, col. 220) explains that “among the ancients, the beginnings of all the months are worshipped, just as among the Hebrews.”

8 In his Itinerarium ad Regiones sub Aequinoctiali Plaga Constitutas (1631), lib. 9, esp. pp. 149–50, the Italian Renaissance humanist Alexander Geraldinus, aka. Alessandro Amelia (1455–1524), and later bishop of Vulturara e Montecorvino (S. Italy) and Santo Domingo (West Indies), describes the lunar celebrations among the aborigines of the Caribbean. See also Johann Heinrich Hottinger, Historia Orientalis (1651), lib. 1, cap. 8, pp. 162–203, who details the observation of the new moon among the Sabeans, Nabateans, and Arabs; and Pierre-Daniel Huet, Demonstratio Evangelica (1690), prop. IV, cap. 7, pp. 99–104, who does so among the ancient Thracians, Germans, Gauls, British, Spanish, and American peoples.

9 Philo Judaeus, De specialibus legibus (2.141, lines 2–4).

The Words of Scaliger are full to this Purpose. In Pandectis Digestorum Talmudicorum, capite Ros haschana, omnino scriptorum est antiquitus, Neomenias ἀπὸ τῆς φάσεως indici solitas. And elsewhere, *Certè major pars priscorum Judaeorum in eà sententiā est, quòd sanctificabant Neomeniam, /על פי הדאיה/ Secundum visionem.*¹⁰

The Words of Maimonides are to the like Purpose, *Hæc est constitutio Mosis in monte Sinai, quòd quandiū duraret Sanhedrin, Neomenias constituerent, secundum Lunæ φασιν.*¹¹ And the Words of an Ancient Writer, preserved by Clemens Alexandrinus, are to the like, *The Jewes keep not their New Moons, ἐὰν μὴ σελήγη φανῇ if the Moon appear not.*¹² But indeed, there is a whole Army of Writers; to testify it. Palestine was advantaged with a clear Air; And Spies were to wait upon an Hill, for the Sight of the Moon, which being obtained, they gave a Signal, and the Sanhedrim issued out their Orders accordingly. If the Sky were so cloudy, that no Moon could bee seen, they took Leave to pitch upon the End of the Thirtieth Day, from the former. Persons were liable to much Fallacy in this Matter. Hence the Poet,

*Qualem primo qui surgere mense,
Aut videt, aut vidisse putat, per Nubila Lunam.*¹³

Scaliger therefore tells us, That the Jewes kept a double Festival, for their New Moons; Nam non solum Diem visionis, quæ dicitur, /חֹדֶשׁ /vel הַלְבָנָה/ Renovatio Lunæ, sed etiam ἔτην καὶ νέαν antecedentis diei observabant; eamque vetus lingua Bibliorum /כֶּסֶא/ vocat. The Double Feast mentioned in the Scripture [1. Sam. 20.24, 25, 26, 27.] is thus accounted for.¹⁴

10 Spencer (lib. 3, diss. 4, cap. 1, sec. 2, fol. 718); the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew passages from the illustrious scholar Joseph Justus Scaliger, Opus De Emendatione Temporum (1629), lib. 2, p. 102: "De Periodo Iudaeorum Alexandria"; and from Isagogicorum chronologiae canonum libri tres (1658), lib. 3, cap. 6, p. 232, read as follows: "In the Digest of the Talmudic laws, under the heading 'Rosh hashana' [New Year], there is mentioned that in ancient times, the neomenia were wholly revealed by prophecy." And elsewhere, "certainly the greater part of the ancient Jews is of the opinion that they were honoring the new moon as holy /חֹדֶשׁ /vel הַלְבָנָה/ after its visible appearance."

11 Mather (via Spencer 718) cites from Maimonides's tract on the sanctification of the new moon, in Hilchot Kiddush HaChodesh, which discusses the methods of the astronomical calculations of the new month, in Sefer Zemanim (The Book of Seasons). The passage reads, "This concept is a halachah [law] communicated to Moses on Mount Sinai. When there is a Sanhedrin, the monthly calendar is established according to the sighting of the moon" (Mishneh Torah 9.2:474).

12 Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 6.5.41.3, line 1), in ANF (2:489).

13 Spencer (721). In his Aeneid (6.453–54), Vergil has Aeneas recognize Phoenician Dido's "dim form amid the shadows – 'even as, in the early month, one sees or fancies he has seen the moon rise amid the clouds.'"

14 In his Isagogicorum chronologiae canonum libri tres (1658), lib. 3, p. 231, Joseph Justus Scaliger speaks of a double festival among the Jews: "In fact they were not only observing the day of [the moon's] appearance, which is called /חֹדֶשׁ הַלְבָנָה/ the renewal of the moon, but also the previous and the new during the preceding day; and the old language of the Bible calls it /כֶּסֶא/ [full moon]."

The Practice of the Gentiles was in this Point conformable to That of the Jewes. All the World, agrees, That the Græcians did like the Jewes, herein. That the Romans did so, is evident from that of Macrobius, Priscis Temporibus, pontifici minori hanc provinciam delegatam fuisse, ut Novæ Lunæ primum observaret Aspectum, visamque Regi Sacrorum nunciaret.¹⁵ That the Arabians did so, is evident from that of Selden, out of Alfraganus, Voluerunt Arabes à vesperâ Diem auspicari, quoniam à phasi Lunari incipiunt numerare dies mensium.¹⁶ The Mahometans at this day, therefore celebrate their New Moons, from the first View of the Horns thereof. The Eastern Indians do the like.¹⁷

The Antemosaic Patriarchs, do seem to have worshipped God (no doubt, from some Institution of His) with special Devotions, at the Beginning of every Month, when the New Moon appeared. For, as Hospinian remarks, In Sacris Literis expressè demonstrari non potest, à quo et quandò hæ feriæ institutæ fuerint.¹⁸ New Moons therefore are not mentioned, among the Israelitish Festivities, in the Twenty Third Chapter of Leviticus. Indeed wee find the Lord Appointing what Sacrifices Hee would have to bee offered on that Solemnity, in the Levitic Lawes; but the Solemnity itself seems to have been Appointed & Observed before those Lawes. Hence also, the Scripture seems alwayes to distinguish the New Moons, from the Feasts which the Law required. [Consider, 2. Chron. 2.4. & 31.3. Ezr. 3.5. Isa. 1.13, 14. Neh. 10.33. and Col. 2.16.] And my Dr. Spencer, upon whose Collections I do much subsist, in these Matters, thinks, that the Remarkable New Moon of the First Month, is called, in Psal. 81.3. A Time Appointed, in Distinction from the rest throughout the Year.¹⁹ Or, if wee should acknowledge, That there is an Express Institution, [Num. 10.10.] for the Celebration of the New Moons, yett the Time for it, whether at the Appearance, or at the Conjunction, is left wholly uninstituted. Tho' the Talmuds tell us, the former was

¹⁶ Spencer (719); John Selden, De Anno Civili Veterum Judæorum (1683), cap. 3, p. 14, cites from the famous Arab astronomer Abu al-Abbas al-Farghani, aka. Alfraganus (c. 820–post 861) (ODMA). Selden probably relied on the dual language edition Muhammedis Filii Ketiri Ferganensis, Qui vulgo Alfraganus dicitur, Elementa Astronomica, Arabicè & Latine (1669), translated and published by Jacob Golius (1596–1667), a distinguished Dutch mathematician and Orientalist. According to Selden, "the Arabs wanted to take the signal for the day from the evening, since they begin to number the days of the months from the lunar phase." On Mather's views on Islam and Orientalism, see M. A. Isani, "Cotton Mather and the Orient" (1970).

unquæstionably Traditio Mosis è Monte Sinai, and Abarbanel confirms what they say, yett the Scripture seems wholly silent about it.²⁰

But now, the Gentiles, depraved, and perverted unto very Idolatrous Purposes, a Rite, which doubtless had the Divine Countenance upon it, in its first Original. They designed a Special Honour, to that Noble and Useful Creature, the Moon, at the monthly New Exhibition of it. Hence likewise, they wore Ornaments of Respect unto the Creature, which they thus made an Idol. The Ornaments on Zeba and Zalmunna, [Judg. 8.21, 26.] the LXX render, μηνίσκους, Lunulas, little Moons; It seems to have been the Custome of the Midianites, to honour the Moon, with such Ornaments.²¹ The Figure of a New Moon, was therefore stamp'd on the Egyptian Apis. And the Arabians have a Zeal to bee called, as the Nubian Geographer tells us, Filii Hilal, the Sons of the New Moon.²² From whom, the Mahometans at this Day, tho' Haters of Images, yett use those of the New Moon, with much Devotion.²³ Marinus reports | concerning his Pro- [48v]
clus, Then when the Stars and Moon appeared, ὑπολυσάμενος αὐτόθι ἃ ἦν αὐτῷ ὑποδήματα, τὴν θεὸν ἡσπάζετο. Pulling off what shooes hee had on, hee saluted the Goddess. The Superstition of Proclus, will tell us, what was practised among the ancient Gentiles.²⁴ They thus expressed their Joy, for their Goddess Restored unto them; they applied unto this Purpose, an Humour, like that of the Egyptians, who, as wee learn from Jamblicus, of their Mysteries, Rejoiced while the Moon was in the Increase, and Lamented when shee was in the Wane: or, like that which Tacitus reported of the Roman Souldiers, qui prout obscurior aut

20 According to Spencer (723), the Babylonian Talmud mentions that according to the “tradition of Moses from Mount Sinai,” the new moon was celebrated at the first appearance of it (cf. Shabbath 86b, Pesachim 3a, and Rosh HaShana 20a). This tradition is confirmed by Don Isaac Abarbanel, who adds that the Israelites could tell apart the different signals of the sounds of the trumpets, whether calling for collective action in war or for the festivals of the new moon, because the bugle sounds “were accompanied by blasts of the ram’s horn” (JPS Miqra’ot Gedolot 4:67).

21 Spencer (sec. 4, fol. 724). Two Midianite kings, Zebah and Zalmunna invaded Israel but were routed by Gideon (Judg. ch. 8). In his gloss on Judg. 8:21, Mather explains that this ancient custom of wearing ornamental moons probably came from the Phoenician “Worshippers of Astarte; that is, the Moon” and from them spread to the Arabs, Turks, and to India (BA 3:179).

23 Spencer (724) and Scaliger’s Isagogicorum chronologiae canonum libri tres (1658), lib. 3, p. 245.

24 Spencer (724–25); De Vita Procli, in Procli Successoris Platonici in Platonis Theologiam Libri Sex (1618), fol. Cⁱ, lines 39–40, by the Hellenic philosopher Marinus Neapolitanus of Samaria (5th c. CE), student of the Greek Neoplatonist philosopher Proclus Lycaeus Atheniensis (412–85 CE), and his successor at the Athenian academy. The abbreviated quotation can also be found in our modern edition of Marinus (Vita Procli sive de felicitate, lines 281–82).

*splendidior iret Luna, mærebant aut lætabantur.*²⁵ Yea, they carried on the Superstition, to an Imagination, That a Feast of the New Moon, was a Good Omen for all the Month. [Consider, Jer. 44.17.] Thus the old Græcians, would, at the New Moon, hold a Feast, unto her, under the Name of Hecate, as a Goddess, averting Evils from them. And hence, it was their Manner, to begin their more notable and important Businesses, at the Change of the Moon. Tacitus testifies of the old Germans, *Agendis rebus, hoc auspicatissimum Initium credunt.*²⁶ Cotovicus testifies the like of the modern Turks; and there are too many Christians that herein do imitate them.²⁷ Yea, The Superstition proceeded so far, as to bee a Companion and Occasion, of many Diabolical Rites, and Magical Incantations, and Abominations, and Idolatries. Chrysostom reproves the Observers of New Moons in this Time, for the Expectations of Prosperity, which they thence entertained. It may bee, the Galatians, whom the Apostle reprehended, for their being Observers of Dayes and Months, were touch'd with the like Expectations.²⁸ Τὸ θύειν κατὰ μῆνας, Monthly Sacrifices, are therefore mentioned by Geminus, in his Elements of Astronomy, as the Customes of the Idolatrous.²⁹

The particular Cæremonies used at the New Moons among the Hebrewes, were not a little Imitated and Æmulated among the Gentiles.

The Sacrifices, which the Jewes offered at their New Moons, were Numerous; even much beyond those of the weekly Sabbaths. [Num. 28.11, 12, 13, 14.] The Greeks also offered Sacrifices, at their New Moons. Tis a Passage in one of Libanius's Declamations, ταῖς Νουμηνίαις νόμῳ μὲν πόλεως ἐθύομεν. Their Sacrifices were called, Ἐπιμήνια, their Sacrificers were called, Ἐπιμήνιοι.³⁰ And that the Romans

25 Mather probably refers to Thomas Gale's edition of Iamblicus's De Mysteriis Liber (1678), sec. 1, cap. 17 and sec. 8, cap. 4, pp. 29 and 153–54. Tacitus (Annalium 1.28) testifies to the superstition of the Roman soldiers, who raised a clamor with their brazen instruments "with joy or sorrow, as the moon brightened or grew dark."

26 Tacitus (De Origine et Situ Germanorum, cap. 11) explains that when important decisions were to be made among the old Germanic peoples, their chiefs assembled, at new or full moon, which they believed "the most auspicious season for the transaction of business."

27 Spencer (725); Johannes Cotovicus, aka. Johannes van Cootwijk (d. 1629), was a Dutch doctor of Civil and Canon Law at Utrecht, and Knight of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem. His highly prized Itinerarium Hierosolymitanum et Syriacum (1619), which contains rare maps of the Holy Land, was reprinted several times. Mather refers to Itinerarium (lib. 4, cap. 6, esp. p. 445), which here records Cotovicus's experience as a traveler through the Ottoman Empire in 1598–99.

28 Joannes Chrysostom, In Kalendas [PG 048. 0954, lines 41–45]; Gal. 4:10.

29 Spencer (lib. 3, Diss. 4, cap. 1, sec. 5, fol. 726); the Greek astronomer and mathematician Geminus Rhodius (fl. 1st c. BCE) speaks of the monthly sacrifices among the ancients in his Elementa astronomiae (ch. 8, sec. 7, lines 1–4). The Ἐπιμήνια were "monthly offerings" (Herodotus 8.41); those who made such supplications, the Ἐπιμήνιοι were the priests or "monthly officers" (LSJ).

30 Spencer (727); the quotation from Libanius (Declamation 30, subdiv. 1, sec. 17, lines 10–11), which reads, "we were sacrificing at the times of the new moon by the law of the city," and is at second hand from Samuel Petitus's Leges Atticae (1635), lib. 1, tit. 1, p. 85. Their sacrifices were called "monthly" and their sacrificers, "monthly officers."

did the like, is evident from that of Macrobius, Romæ Kalendis omnibus Pontifex Romanus, rem divinam Iunoni facit.³¹ Yea, they were many and mighty Sacrifices, which the Gentiles there offered. Æmylius, as Plutarch tells us, Ut primum renitescere Lunam conspexit, ei Juvenas undecim immolavit.³² Clearchus, (whom the Oracle pronounced, Deorum cultorem optimum) did then σπουδαίως θύειν.³³ And Proclus did, τὰς νομηνίας λαμπρῶς ἐπιτέλειν.³⁴

The Jewes particularly sacrificed a Goat at their New Moons; The Gentiles did so too; but they propounded the Figure of the Moon itself, to bee considered, in the Horns of that Animal.³⁵ Suidas therefore, (ad vocem Ἀνάστατοι) saies also, That they sacrificed an Ox, whose Horns were κατὰ μίμησιν τῆς πρωτοφυῶς σελήνης.³⁶ And Horace has a Passage of that Importance; Fronte curvatos imitatus Ignes.³⁷ Grotius thinks, that the special Intimation, of the Sacrifices were required, by being לַיהוָה / To the Lord [Num. 28.15.] might bee, to mind them, that they were not now to sacrifice unto the Moon, as the Degenerate Pagans did, which hee had out of Maimonides.³⁸

Moreover, the Jewes had their Solemn and Publick Prayers at the New Moons. Horace therefore brings in Fuscus Aristius, who was, by Nation a Roman, but by Religion a Jew, thus discoursing with him.³⁹

Hor. Certè, nescio quid secretò velle loqui Te Aiebas mecum. Fusc. Memini benè, sed meliore Tempore dicam. Hodìe Tricesima Sabbata. Vin' Tu Curtis Judeis, 31 Adapted from Macrobius (Saturnalia 1.15.19), the passage reads, “At Rome, on every Kalends, the Roman pontiff sacrifices to Juno.”

32 Spencer quotes from the bilingual Greek and Latin edition of Plutarch's Opera Omnia. 2 vols. (Lutetiae Parisiorum, 1624). Plutarch relates that the Roman general Lucius Aemilius Paullus Macedonicus (c. 229–160 BCE) (EB) tried to curry favor from the goddess Luna, for “Aemilius at the first appearance of the moon sacrificed eleven heifers” and many more besides during the day to Hercules (Plutarch's Life of Aemilius 17.10, in Parallel Lives 6:401).

33 In his De Abstinencia (2.16, line 28), Porphyrus calls the Spartan general Clearchus (c. 450–401 BCE) “the greatest supporter of the gods” and has him “diligently sacrifice” to them, especially by bedecking with garlands Hermes, Hecate, and the other statues of his ancestral deities.

34 Spencer (727); in his Vita Procli sive de felicitate (lines 473–74), Marinus Neapolitanus (Samaria) relates that the Greek Neoplatonist philosopher Proclus of Athens (412–85 CE), τὰς νομηνίας λαμπρῶς ἐπετέλει, “celebrated the New Moon in great solemnity” (Life of Proclus 19).

35 Spencer (727–28).

36 Suda (Lexicon, alphabetic letter alpha, entry 2082, line 15) confirms at entry Ἀνάστατοι (i. e., “upsets,” “destroys”) that the pagans sacrificed an ox whose horns were “mimicking the first rise of the [crescent] moon.”

37 Horace (Odes 4.2, line 56) has his panegyrist promise Augustus that Caesar's sacrifice of bulls and cows will be complemented by one of his own, a young calf on whose “forehead it has a bright crescent like that of the moon.”

38 Spencer (728); Hugo Grotius (Annotationes ad Numeros [Numb. 28:15], in Opera Omnia 1.1:80), although he acknowledges Maimonides as his muse, does not identify the exact source, which is Maimonides, Liber מורה נבוכים [More Nebuchim] Doctor Perplexorum (1629), pars 3, cap. 46, p. 488 (Guide 3.46.590).

39 Horace (Satires, bk. 1, Eclg 1.9, lines 67–72).

oppedere? Hor. Nulla mihi, inquam, Religio est. Fusc. At mi: sum paulò infirmior, Unus Multorum. Ignosces, aliàs loquar. —⁴⁰

Fuscus was of a more Infirm, or Tender Conscience; whereas, Horace had no Regard at all to any Jewish Rites. Horace meets him, near Vesta's Temple, Quartâ jam parte Diei, præteritâ, at Nine a clock.⁴¹ Fuscus was then going to, the Proseucha, which Philo saies was, on t'other side of Tiber; going thus to celebrate the Tricesima Sabbata, or the Feast of the New Moons, with the Devotions then before him, would not now stay to talk of tedious & profane Matters, with Horace, an Epicurean Gentile. The Jewes then, it seems, made their Prayers, for an Happy Month; and their Peace-Offerings, were therewithal to the like Purpose then presented.⁴² [Compare 1. Sam. 20.5.]⁴³ Balsamon saies, They did then, γονυκλιτεῖν ὡς ἂν τὸ μηνιαῖον διάστημα ἐντυχῶς διέλθωσι. *Genuflectere, ut Totum mensem feliciter transigerent.*⁴⁴ The Gentiles now also did the like. Demosthenes remarks it, That at the New Moons, ἕκαστος τοῖς θεοῖς εὔξεται *Every one made his Prayers to the Gods, for the Welfare of the City, and his own.*⁴⁵ Horace ha's that Expression, ⁴⁰ In Satire (1.9), Horace engages in a banter with an unwelcome acquaintance, whom he tries to shake off, when Aristius Fuscus, a Roman Jew, hurries by to attend to the Passover celebration before sundown: Horace.: "Surely you said there was something you wanted to tell me in private." Fuscus: "I mind it well, but I'll tell you at a better time. To-day is the thirtieth Sabbath. Would you affront the circumcised Jews?" Horace: "I have no scruples." Fuscus: "But I have. I'm a somewhat weaker brother, one of the many. You will pardon me; I'll talk another day." The "thirtieth Sabbath" (April 15) is observed on the 30th week starting from the Jewish New Year (Sept. 1).

⁴¹ More literally, "the fourth part of the day," which is the ninth hour before the night (9 PM).

⁴³ Spencer (729); on the preparations for the Passover, see Buxtorf's Synagoga Judaica (1680), cap. 17, pp. 383–404.

⁴⁵ Mather's adapted passage from Demosthenes's oration 25 (In Aristogitonem 1, sec. 99, lines 5–6) asserts that the ancient Athenians ascended to the Acropolis on the first day of every month and craved a blessing for their city and themselves.

*Cælo supinas si tuleris manus,
Nascente Lunâ.*⁴⁶

Whereupon the Scholiast saies, *Solent rusticæ mulieres, in initio prima Lunæ, voce cælo effundere preces.*⁴⁷ Lucian refers to this Practice, when hee joques upon Empedocles; ἐν ταῖς νομηγίαις πρὸς τὴν σελήνην τρεῖς ἐγγανὼν προσεύχεσθαι. In Noviluniis; *Ter ad Lunam inhians, vota facere.*⁴⁸ Ἱερομηγίαι, therefore in Dion, signify, *Supplications.*⁴⁹ Among the Romans, At the Kalends of all the Months, from March to December, Junoni (that is, to the Moon) *Die Kalendarum supplicarunt.*⁵⁰

Furthermore the Jewes, did signalize their New Moons, with the Sounding of Cornets, or Trumpets. [Num. IV. 9, 10.] The, Curtis Judæis oppedere, mentioned by Horace, is thus expounded by Selden.⁵¹ *Oppedere, est planè προσπέρδεν vel καταπέρδεν (vocabulum apud, Aristophanem obvium), id est, ventris crepitu, sive sonorus emissio, sive petulantius simulato, Judæos, buccinis Arietinis, Neomeniam pro more celebrantes, Contumeliosius et Ludibrio habere.*⁵² The Gentiles did the same; as Geuffræus tells us, The Turks do at this Day; And Huet reports of some other Nations.⁵³

46 Horace (Ode 3.23) exhorts Phidyle, a rustic maiden, that “If you raise your upturned hands to the sky when the moon is born anew,” the gods will bless your crops with fruitfulness.

47 Whereupon the Roman grammarian and scholiast Helenius Acron (3rd c. CE) offers the following gloss in Opera Q. Horatii Flacci Venusini, grammaticorum antiquiss. Heleni Acronis, et Porphyrii commentarii illustrata (1555), voce “nascente Lunæ” (Carmina 3.23): “At the beginning of the first moon, country women are accustomed to pour out prayers to heaven with their voice.” See also F. Hauthal’s Acronis et Porphyrii Commentarii (1864), 1:348.

48 Lucianus (Icaromenippus 13, lines 24–25) has Menippus reveal to his credulous interlocutor a dreamlike conversation with the sooty philosopher Empedocles, whom he had met in his imaginary flight to the moon and to whom he promised for his kindness “on the first of every month to open my mouth at the moon three times and make a prayer” in honor of the great philosopher who now resides in the moon.

49 In his Historiæ Romanæ (43.42.2, line 5; 48.33.3, line 4 etc.), Cassius Dio explains that “sacrifices” (thanksgivings) were offered during the “sacred month.”

50 Macrobius (Saturnalia 1.15.18) adds that the Romans “offer supplication” to the goddess Juno “on every Kalends” (the first of the month) from March to December.

51 Spencer (730); in Horace’s satire (Sermones 1.9.70), Aristius Fuscus, who is hurrying to the Passover Seder, objects to being detained in an unwelcome conversation, asking, would you “affront the circumcised Jews?”

52 John Selden, in his De Anno Civili Veterum Judæorum (1683), cap. 21, pp. 114–15, expounds on this passage in Horace: “to affront [lit. fart at], is plainly (vocabulary found in the works of Aristophanes, obviously), that is, by a noise of the stomach, whether noisily emitted or copied cheekily, that Jews, celebrating the new moon day by their custom with the horns of a ram, behave insultingly and mockingly.”

53 Mather refers to the celebration of the New Moon among the Ottoman Turks, as described in De Turcarum Caeremonis, Religione, Natura, & Moribus, in Aulæ Turcicae, Othomannicque Imperii Descriptio (1577), lib. 2, pp. 53–54, by the French traveler, historian, and Chevalier de Saint-Jean-de-Jérusalem, Antonius Geuff(f)raeus, aka. Antoine Geuffroy (1500–99) (CERL). This popular work about the Ottoman Turks and the Islamic religion was first published in Basel (1573) and translated into other European languages. Pierre-Daniel Huet, Demonstratio Evangelica (1690), prop. IV, cap. 7, sec. 6, pp. 102–04, provides a detailed list of peoples who worshipped the goddess Luna among the ancients and moderns.

Yea, the Jewes at their New Moons, did putt off all Sorrow & Sadness, and give themselves to Dancing, Feasting, & all sorts of Jollitie. [Compare Num. 10.10. and Hos. 2.11. and 1. Sam. 20.5.] Thus when tis said, in Hos. 2.7. A Month shall consume them, /שִׁחִי/ Tis by Aquila rendred νουμηνία· q.d. They shall bee brought unto such a low and mean Estate, that | the Feast of one New Moon, would consume all they have.⁵⁴ Buxtorf affirms, that the Jewes to this very day are thus disposed.⁵⁵ Nor have the Gentiles come behind them. [Compare, Jer. 44.17. where, what wee render, It was well with us, is rendred, by Pagnin, and by Tremelius, Hilares eramus.]⁵⁶ Horace therefore calls for this,

Da Lunæ properè Novæ,

*Da Noctis mediæ, poculum.*⁵⁷

The New Moons are called, ἑορτώδεις ἡμέραι, in Demosthenes; that is, Feasting Dayes.⁵⁸ And in Plautus, the Epulæ menstruales are spoken of.⁵⁹ Synesius tells us, of the Playes then used.⁶⁰ A Canon of a Council at Trulla, forbids them.⁶¹ Tis a Stroke in Plutarchs Invectives against Usurers, That they made the New Moon, which was the most Sacred of all Dayes, to bee the most Sorrowful, ἀποφράδα καὶ στύγιον.⁶² And Libanius could say, Scis quàm Lætus esses, quandò te Novilunijs deducebamus ad Templā.⁶³

Upon the whole, memorable are the Words of Elias the Karaite, quoted by Selden; Nullibi reperimus in Scripturâ Præceptum hoc, peculiare fuisse Terræ

54 The Hebrew noun /שִׁחִי/ [chodesh] (Strong's # 2320) signifies "the new moon, month, the first day of the month," and "the lunar month," which in Aquila of Sinope's literalist LXX translation is rendered νουμηνία; i. e., "new moon" (Origenes, Hexaplorum Origenis quæ supersunt. Opera Omnia [PG 16.3.2928], on Hosea 2:11).

55 Johannes Buxtorf (the elder), Synagoga Judaica (1680), cap. 17, esp. pp. 397–99.

56 Pagninus, Biblia Sacra ex Santis Pagnini tralatione (1542), fol. 170; Tremellius and Junius (Biblia Sacra (1593), on Jer. 44:17 (note g): "eramus hilares" ("we were cheerful").

57 Mather slightly alters the lines in Horace's Carmina (Ode 3.19, lines 9–10, 12): "Prepare a toast to the new month, to midnight, a cup."

58 The Greek phrase, ascribed to the great Athenian orator Demosthenes (384–322 BCE), appears in Lexicon in decem oratores Atticos (159, lines 6–7), by Valerius Harpocration Alexandrinus (2nd c. CE), purported tutor of Roman Emperor Lucius Verus (130–69 CE) (OCD).

59 The Roman comic poet Titus Maccius Plautus (Plautus: Captivi, act 3, scene 1, line 483) jokes that an impromptu slapstick story he dished up gained him "free board for a month."

60 Synesius (Calvetii encomium, sec. 13, line 25–26) speaks of καθ' ἑκάστην ἑορμηνίαν, or the great festivals "during the time of the sacred months."

61 De Sexta Synodo: Canones Concilii sexti in Trullo (Canon 62), in Guilielmus Beveregius, ΣΥΝΟΔΙΚΟΝ sive Pandectæ Canonum SS. Apostolorum (1672), tom. 1, div. 1, pp. 230–32.

62 Spencer, De Legibus (1685), lib. 3, diss. 4, cap. 1, sec. 6, fol. 733; Plutarch, in De vitando aere alieno (828a, lines 8, 9) complains that greedy usurers make the high holidays "unlucky and Stygian." Mather shortens his second-hand quote from Spencer.

63 And a Latin translation from Libanius Antiochenus's Declamationes 1–51 (Declamatio 40) is added for good measure, reading, "you know how happy you were, when we were leading you down to the temples during the new moons."

*Israelitica; sed verò manavit à seculis vetustissimis, adeoque à Tempore Noachi, et Abrahæ Patris nostri, (quibus pax) mos ille sanctificandi Lunam, quocunque locorum.*⁶⁴

But there was a further Sort of New-Moon Holiday, kept among the Israelites; the first New-Moon in the Year, or, the first Day of the first Month in the Year, they observed, with a more than ordinary Festivité. They began Tisri, with Sacrifices, that had the Jubilation of Trumpetts, to sett them off. Vociferations, and Acclamations then accompanied their Sacrifices: They were called, in Psal. 27.6. Sacrificia Vociferationis. Herein also the Gentiles did follow the Jewes; as Casaubon, and Montague, at large will satisfy you.⁶⁵ Yea, Maffæus, Trigautius, and others report the like Usages, among the Chinois of later Ages;⁶⁶ and Selden, of the Persians; and Paulus Venetus, of the Tartarians.⁶⁷

But so much may suffice for our present Entertainment.

⁶⁵ Spencer (cap. 2, fol. 736); Mather refers to the annotation of the great Isaac Casaubon, in his classic edition of Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores VI. Cum integris Notis Isaaci Casauboni (1671), tom. 1, p. 541 (note 5), which glosses the joyous festivities of the neomenia at the Roman New Year. The eirenic Richard Montagu, aka. Montacutius (1577–1641), Anglican bishop of Hereford and, later, of Norwich, in De Originibus Ecclesiasticis Commentationum Tomus Primus (1636), tom. 1, pars prior, pp. 127–29, secs. 134–35, a major work on Patristics, supplies Mather with additional references to the Roman new-moon celebrations in the Julian calendar as discussed in Ovid, Prudentius, Pliny, Lucianus, Herodianus, and others.

⁶⁷ John Selden contributes his discussion of religious rites and celebrations among the Persians, in his Uxor Hebraica (1646), lib. 2, cap. 22, pp. 229–32. And (at long last), Mather's quest for the new moon among the ancients and moderns arrives at his journey's end (before lunacy overtakes us): the descriptions of the famous Venetian traveler to the Orient and Asia, Marcus Paulus Venetus, better known as Marco Polo (c. 1254–1324), whose De regionibus Orientalibus Libri III (1671), lib. 2, cap. 15, pp. 73–74, describes the neomenia and related festivities of the Great Khan among the Mongols (Tartars).

Q. A Remark upon the Sin-Offering, said here to be, Unto the Lord? v. 15.

A. It is a Remark of Grotius; That The Law appointing at this Time a Goat for a Sin-Offering, speaks expressly, That it shall be, An Offering unto the Lord. It was to putt them in Mind of the Right Object of Worship, when they were in danger to offer Sacrifices unto the Moon, after the Manner of the Heathens. This is the more to be regarded, because a Goat being appointed for an Offering on two other Solemnities, and for a Sin-Offering, it is not said, (tho' certainly so meant) unto the Lord; Because there was nothing at those Times to lead their Sacrifices unto a Wrong Object, as there was upon the New Moons; when the Heathens offered a Goat unto the Moon; it being a Creature, whose Horns are Sharp, resembling those of a New Moon. Maimonides Remarks on this Occasion; That tho' Burnt-Offerings, being wholly consumed, might properly be said, unto the Lord; whereas the Sin-Offerings were eaten by the Priests; yett the Sin-Offering here is peculiarly said for to be, unto the Lord; lest this Goat should seem to be a Sacrifice unto the Moon, after the Manner of the Egyptians.⁶⁸

Q. What Reason, do the Jewes assign, for the Daily Diminution of the Offering, in the Feast of Tabernacles: on the first Day 13 Young Bullocks, on the Second, 12, on the Third, 11, and so forward? v. 13.

A. The Jewes tell us, The whole Number of Bullocks to be offered, being Seventy, according to the Languages of the Seventy Nations, into which they divide the World, and for whom they suppose these Sacrifices to be performed;¹ this Daily Diminution of them, was to signify a Diminution of those Nations, until all things were brought under the Government of the Messias.²

¹ Mather appears to lean on Ainsworth's Christological reading, in Annotations upon the Five Bookes of Moses (1626–27), on Numb. 29:13, 17 (Numbers 181–82). According to פרקי רבי אליעזר [Pirkê de Rabbi Elieser] Capitula R. Elieser (1644), cap. 24, p. 55, God descended with seventy angels upon Nimrod's Babel and changed the people's common speech into seventy languages and separated them into seventy nations, a tradition also maintained by a rabbi of the Talmud (Shabbath 88b). See also Pirkê de Rabbi Elieser (2004), ch. 24, p. 177 (note 6).

² The rabbinic commentators differ widely on this point. Rashi (Bamidbar – Pinchas 29:18) glosses, “There were seventy festival bulls, representing the seventy nations, which were progressively diminishing, symbolizing their destruction. During the time of the Sanctuary [Temple], [however,] These sacrifices shielded them from suffering” (Metsudah Chumash/Rashi 4:394); Midrash Tanchuma Bamidbar II (Pinchos 16, pp. 295–87) offers much the same; Chizkuni (Pinchas 29:17, 32) believes that if the number of sacrifices for “the communal mussaph offerings” had not diminished during the seven-day celebration, the people who had to pay for the sacrifices “might have resented” the expense; the total of seventy bullocks offered during “the seven days of Sukkot” “corresponded to the fifty two Sabbath days in the year, seven days of Passover, one day of Shavuot, one day of the New Year, one day of Atonement, and eight days of Sukkot/Shmini Atzeret” (Chizkuni, Torah Commentary 4:1019). Yet another reading is offered by Abarbanel (Numb. 28:18), “The 70 bulls represent the 70 years of life. But note further that a total of 28 animals is offered every day, making four sevens, representing the seventh-day Sabbath, the festivals of the seventh month, the seventh-year sabbatical, and the jubilees year that follows seven sabbatical cycles” (JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot 4:215–16). Mather's Christological interpretation is, perhaps, the ineluctable conclusion of Abarbanel's reading. The English Baptist John Gill (1697–1771) follows on his heels, in his erudite gloss on Numb. 29:13–34 (Exposition 1:846).

Q. A Vow made by a Wife, Her Husband may establish it, or her Husband may make it void. v. 13.

A. Maimonides, in his More Nevochim, ha's a notable Discourse, to show how Reasonable this is. He observes, That as the Law prohibited certain Meats, thus there were pious People, who sometimes did vow to forbear some that were not prohibited; that so they might learn Contentment with a little, or Continenence, & give a Check to an immoderate Appetite. From whence, there was a Saying among the Doctors, That Vowes are the Hedge of Separation, that is to say, a great Guard unto an Holy Life. But since, thro' the Vehemence of their Passions, many Women are prone to act unadvisedly, if Vowes were wholly in their Power, great Inconveniencies, Dissensions, and Confusions might arise in Families, while the same Sort of Meat was lawful to the Husband, but unlawful to the Wife; lawful to the Mother, but unlawful to the Daughter. For this Reason, saies he, this Authority was given to the Governours of Families, in all things to order them, as they said would be for their Advantage or Detriment.¹

It followes, Then he shall bear her Iniquity. Paulus Fagius thinks, the Meaning is, That if the First Day he heard of her Vow, he did not disannul it, but attempted the next Day, or the Third Day after, to do so, he should bear the Blame of the Vowes not being made good.²

Q. Something, if you please, upon the Death of Balaam, slain with the Sword? v. 8.

A. Balaam had seen such a mighty Success of his wicked Council, that præsuming the Israelites were forsaken of their God, he adventured to go along with the Midianites unto this Battel;¹ Hoping, he might curse the Israelites, now that Iniquity (i. e. Idolatry) was found among them; which he could not do, while they were free from it. Thus he perished by his own Devices; and was so far from having his Wish, To Dy the Death of the Righteous (that is, To live long,) that, as the Jewes tell us, He was slain in the Thirty fourth Year of his Age.² The Doctors, in the Gemara of the Sanhedrim, ask, what he did there? To which R. Johanan makes Answer, He went to receive his Reward, for the Death of the Twenty four thousand Israelites which he had procured.³ And thus, saith another, it happened unto him, according to the Proverb, *The Camel went to desire Horns, and they cutt off his Ears.*⁴

| Q. The Severe Injunction for such an Universal Slaughter? v. 17. [52v]

A. It seems to have been a Kind of Self-Defence; A Destroying of Adversaries that were Idolaters, lest they should be drawn by them into the Snares that would bring Destruction on themselves.⁵

² Numb. 23:10. When asked how old Balaam was at his death, R. Hanina answered, "It is not actually stated, but since it is written, 'Bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days' [Psal. 55:23] [it follows that] he was thirty-three or thirty-four years old." The interlocutor responded, "Thou hast said correctly, I personally have seen Balaam's Chronicle, in which it is stated, 'Balaam the lame was thirty years old when Phinehas the Robber killed him'" (Babylonian Talmud, tractate Sanhedrin 106b).

⁴ Whether or not this wily "ship of the desert" had one or two humps, this proverb is quoted by Mar Zutra b. Tobiah (Sanhedrin 106a).

women, and children, in a defenceless condition, making an exception only of that part of the captives whose sexual predicament invited the passions of man to indulge in the gratification of criminal desires ...[Numb. 31:18ff]. But this is only a single specimen of the murdering temper of this meek man of God!" (Principles, 3rd ed. [1806], ch. 21, p. 200). In this particular chapter Palmer may have had in mind the heretical tract De Tribus Impostoribus, an attack on the three monotheistic religions, of uncertain origin and anonymous authorship. See Abraham Anderson's translation The Treatise of the Three Impostors (1997).

Q. In the first Verse of the Chapter, the Children of Reuben are first mentioned, because Reuben was the First-born of Jacob. Whereas, in the rest of the Chapter, the Children of Gad are constantly first mentioned: and, why so? v. 1.

A. Because, as the Hebrewes conjecture, the Children of Gad, were the first Movers of the Matter, that is here prosecuted.¹

And in the two first Verses, there is no mention of the Children of Menasseh (half of which had their Portion in the Countrey here siezed upon,) because they did not move in this Matter, nor were any Contrivers of it; but had a Lott assigned them here, because these Countreyes were too much for the other Two Tribes alone, and they of Menasseh had much cattle also.²

3758.

Q. How comes Caleb, to be called, The Kenezite? v. 12.

A. Some take Pains to prove, that it was because his Fathers Name was Kenaz. They urge, that Othniel was Calebs Brother: (Josh. 15.17.) his younger Brother: (Judg. 1.13. & 3.9.) and Othniels Father was Kenaz. Their Father then must have Two Names, Kenaz and Jephunneh.

But then, tis very strange, that Caleb is no where called, The Son of Kenaz, but constantly, The Son of Jephunneh; even where Othniel is just before called, The Son of Kenaz: (1. Chron. 4.13, 15.) Nor is Othniel any where called, The Son of Jephunneh, but alwayes of Kenaz.

And the Marriage of Othniel to the Daughter of Caleb, would have been utterly unlawful by the Law of Moses; if they two had been Brothers.

Others therefore think it more probable, That Othniel was one of Calebs Brothers younger Sons; (for Uncles & Nephewes are often called Brethren, as Abraham and Lot were.) But yett it were absurd for us to think, that Caleb was called, a Kenezite, because his younger Brothers Name was Kenaz.

1 Patrick (Numbers 605). Ibn Ezra concurs, and Nachmanides adds, "The Reubenites came first in v. 1, as they should have – Reuben was Jacob's first-born and also the son of his chief wife. ... [Yet] the Gadites always come first. It was they who came up with the plan to ask for this land as their holding, and they who first broached it to Moses. They were bolder than the Reubenites – [Deut. 33:20] – and so were not afraid of staying by themselves amid the non-Israelite inhabitants of this region" (JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot 4:231, 232).

2 Patrick on Numb. 32:2 (Numbers 606).

It is more probable therefore, that Kenaz was a common Ancestor, both of Othniel, and Caleb; and that Othniel's Father took also his Name from him. Accordingly, we find Jephunneh too, called, A Kenezite. [Josh. 14.14.]³

Q. It is imposed upon the Reubenites and Gadites, To go armed before the Lord, to War? v. 20.

A. To go before the Lord, was to go before the Ark, which they still carried with them into the War.

And it is to be observed, That these two Tribes, Reuben and Gad, always lay encamped before the Sanctuary. When the Camp removed, they still marched Immediately before it. All that is required of them here, is, To hold their usual Place: which they did accordingly. [Josh. 4.12, 13.]⁴

Q. The Forty Two Stations, and Removes, of Israel, in the Wilderness, was there any Mystery in them? v. 3.¹

A. The Church of Israel, being delivered from the Egyptian Oppression, soon fell into a sad Apostasy; & their first Apostasy, lay in the Idolatry of the Golden Calf, pretending to Represent the God who Delivered them; and Aaron, the High-Priest, was deeply guilty in this Idolatry.² In like Manner, the Christian Church, being delivered from the Pagan Persecution, quickly were guilty of the Pagan Idolatry; which they disguised, under Honour, to God, & Christ, and Saints, by whom they had been delivered from their Paganism: And a most noted Priest among them, (Hee of Rome,) was deep in this Idolatrous Degeneracy.

Now, the Forty Two Encampings of Israel in the Wilderness, were so many Delays of their Entering into Canaan. Thus the Church must continue in the Wilderness, Forty two Months; which are so many Stops, e're the Appearance of the Hundred & Forty four Thousand, on Mount Zion, in that Rest which remains for the People of God.

The Taking off the Cloud, which was upon the Tabernacle, still was a Direction, for a New Motion of the Congregation towards the Promised Land. In like sort, from Time to Time, when the Cloud of Antichristian Darkness, was in any Measure taken off, there was a New Essay of Reformation, in the Christian Church.

But in the last Part of Israels Peregrination, some few of the Tribes, did Begin to enter into the Promise Land; or, lay their Claim unto it before the Rest. The Two Tribes, and an Half did so. However, they must not yett enter into a state of Rest; they still must go up to War, along with their Brethren. This was answered by the Churches, concerned in that Half-Reformation, of the former Century; but such of them, as go to take Rest, Splendor & Grandeur to themselves, their Sin will find them out.³

1 In his "Note Book of Authors" (Numb. 33:2), Mather records "Bedles Journal. p. 1-". This work and its author remain unidentified.

2 See Appendix A.

3 Mather's allegorical gloss on the numerological significance of the Israelites' forty-two removes in the wilderness is noteworthy; it appears to lean on David Chytraeus's "Allegoria XLII. Mansionum, exponens, quibus gradibus Christianus, relictis vicijis, duce Christo, perveniat ad perfectam pietatem, Autore D. Ieronymo," in In Numeros (1572), pp. 505–50. The Lutheran Chytraeus himself acknowledges as his own muse St. Jerome's allegorization of Psal. 77 (LXX), in Breviarium In Psalmos [PL 026. 1044–1054], and Christ's declaration (Matth. 13:35), "I will open my mouth in parables" (KJV, Psal. 78:2). Numb. 32:23.

Q. Why no mention here, of the Encampment at Kadesh-barnea? v. 3.

A. We find it expressly asserted, Deut. I.46. They abode in Kadesh many days. It is likely, they made several Movements, during their Stay in the Neighbourhood of Kadesh. And so their Encampment at Kadesh, may comprehend under it, the Removes mention'd under several Names hereabouts.⁴

Q. Tis possible, that the Names, of the Times, of the Stations of the erratic Church, may afford unto us, Mysteries of some further Curiositie? v. 3.

A. Tis possible, that wee may bee too curious, in our Pursuit of those Mysteries, and our Speculations may bee too fine and nice, for more Judicious Considerers.

Nevertheless, t'wil really add unto the Glories of this miraculous Book, our Bible, if wee can discover notable, Figurative, & Prophetical Hints, in the most unobserved Passages of it.

The very Letters of the Words used in the sacred Oracles, considered as Numerals, do sometimes offer most Remarkable Hints unto us; and argue, that the Providence of God, ha's extended itself unto the minutest Matter in the World.⁵

When the 430 Years of Israel's Bondage are out, Israel first arrives at Rameses. The very Name of Rameses contains, 430, the Number of the Years then & there expired. [As do the Letters, of the Hebrew Word, Shekel, first used, when the Cave was purchased, whereby the Patriarch took Possession of the Land, which at the End of the 430 Years, his Children were to bee brought forth unto.]⁶

From Rameses, they came to Succoth; or, Tabernacles. The Name contains 480, the Number of Years, from the Tabernacle to the Temple.

4 R. Chizkuni's gloss (Parshat Massey 33:1) may have some bearing here: "whenever a paragraph commences with the word: אלה ["these were" (Numb. 33:1)] the reason is to tell the reader that what follows is not connected to what was written previously. What this means here in practical terms is that only the journeys listed from here on in, but not עטרות and דבון, of which the Torah wrote in Numbers 32,2 and the locations mentioned there, are included in what follows" (Torah Commentary 4:1036). Abarbanel adds (Numb. 33:2), "No one should be disturbed by the differences between some of these names and those found elsewhere; it is not unusual for a city to be called by more than one name. As for the places here that have not previously been mentioned at all, they are likely places where nothing special happened, because the Israelites camped there only for a day or two" (JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot 4:238).

5 Calculating the value and significance of words based on the value of their individual alphabetic letters (gematria) was a widespread means to arrive at the hidden, mystical sense in sacred writ among the ancients, esp. the Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans.

6 The ancient Hebrew numerological calculation (gematria) supplies the following values for Rameses רַעַמְסֵס [Ra'mecce] (Numb. 33:3, 5): ר (200) + ע (70) + מ (40) + ס (60) + ס (60) = 430. This value suggests to Mather and his peers the number of years the Israelites remained in Egypt from Jacob's arrival to their Exodus from the city of Rameses in the Nile Delta (Exod. 12:40). Mather offers a similar chronology in the introduction to Genesis (BA 1:283). For Shekel שֶׁקֶל [sheqel] (Gen. 23:16), the values are (from right to left) 300+100+30=430. Significantly, the Hebrew term used in Abraham's purchase of the cave of Machpelah (Gen. 23:9) reads כֶּסֶף [keceph] and suggests "silver, money," but also in a wider sense "shekels" (Strong's # 3701).

From Succoth, they came to Etham. It signifies, I shall bee cutt off. So the Temple was, in 441 Years, which is the Number of the Letters in Etham. It also signifies, I shall bee perfected. This was their Third Station. Quære, whether our Saviour alludes not hereunto, when Hee saies, On the Third Day I shall bee perfected. The Glory of the Lord was exhibited, at Etham, in the Pillar, of Cloud.

Abundance of these Curiosities might bee observed.

| We will add,⁷ one more at least, that shall be unexceptionable?

The Wandring of Israel in the Wilderness Forty Years, foreshadowed the Removeable State of the Church, from one Kingdome and Countrey to another; many Places, wherein the Beautiful Tents of the Church, were once pitched, are now horribly Desolate.

And from their Fighting out their Way at last into Canaan, we must expect, That the nearer the World is to an End, Religion will meet with so many more, and those more dangerous Enemies. But the Warfare is follow'd with the Sabbatical Year.⁸

Q. What Use do the Jewes make, of the Record, here made by Moses, of the Israelitish Travels, thro' the Wilderness.

A. The Use they make of it, is; To keep up their Spirits, under their present long Captivity, wherein they now are languishing, & have long been wandering uncertainly, from Mountain to Mountain, from Kingdome to Kingdome, from Banishment to Banishment (as they themselves do speak) until their Messiah come to Redeem them.

This He may do, when their Eyes are open to see, what one of their Ancient Rabbins (Moses Hadarschan) ha's told them, as he is quoted by Paulus Fagius, That the Redeemer was born before him who reduced Israel into this last Captivity.⁹

Q. An Allegorical Remark upon Punon? v. 42.

A. Among the Journeyes of the Israelites, thro' the Wilderness, they pitched once at Punon, or Pinon; old Ambrose will tell you, The Name signifies, oris

⁷ See Appendix A.

⁸ Whatever the original source which jogged Mather's heuristic intent, his numerological hankering (gematria) for the mystical sense of even the most mundane and accidental events mentioned in Holy Writ bears witness to his ability to combine the medieval mysticism of, say St. Jerome's "Allegoria XLII," in Breviarium In Psalmos [PL 026. 1044–1054], with the cutting-edge Newtonian science of his own day whenever and wherever appropriate. See also David Chytraeus's In Numeros (1572), pp. 505–50, and Mather's "An Appendix" at the end of the present chapter (below).

parsimoniam; To be sparing in Speech. He adds a good Admonition; Curemus igitur et nos nostram hic habere stationem.¹⁰

Q. A Remark upon, Abel-Shittim? v. 49.

A. It is probably the Place that is elsewhere called, Shittim. [Num. XXV.1. Jos. II.1. & III.1.] Or, Shittim was the Place; and Abel-Shittim the Plain adjoining to it. We read [Joel. III.18.] about The Valley of Shittim. However, the Word, Abel, signifies, Mourning, And therefore some think, this Place to be called so, in regard of the great Lamentation here made by the Israelites, on behalf of the Great Number of their Brethren; who died here for their Moabitish Idolatries.¹¹

Q. Upon that Passage; They encamped by Jordan, from Beth Jesimoth, even unto Abel-Shittim, what Remark? v. 49.

A. From hence the Jewes confirm an Opinion Received among them. They tell us, in the Talmuds over & over again, From Beth-Jeshimoth to Abel-Shittim, were Twelve Miles. And they conclude, That the Tents of the Israelites in the Wilderness, contained a Square of Twelve Miles.¹² The Targum of Jonathan, on Num. 2.2. saies, The Encamping of Israel, was Twelve Miles in Length, and Twelve Miles in Breadth.¹³ The Gemarists have a Tradition upon it; It is forbidden to a Scholar, to Teach a Tradition before his Master, Yea, not to do it, until hee bee Twelve Miles distant from him, according to the Space of the Encamping of Israel.¹⁴

But the best Commentary upon the Itinerary, which Moses ha's given us of the Wilderness, will be a Plain MAP of the Countrey. This accordingly is now laid before you.

[55r] | Fold out MAP OF THE HOLY LAND¹⁵

¹⁰ St. Ambrose, in his De Mansionibus Filiorum Israel (XXXVI mansion PHINON 36, col. 36C) [PL 017. 0036C], adds, "Let us take care, therefore, that we also hold our station here."

¹¹ See Patrick (Numbers 635).

¹³ Targum Jonathan ben Uzziel, Numb. 2:2–3, in Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (4:237), and J. W. Etheridge (The Targums 2:342–43).

¹⁴ Perhaps an allusions to the Babylonian Talmud, tractate Sotah (46b).

¹⁵ Apparently cut from a copy of an English Bible, the Map of the Holy Land, titled "The Forty Years of Travels of the Children of Israel out of Egypt" (c. 1688), is based on a map by the distinguished Dutch engraver and mapmaker Nicoleas Visscher I (1618–79) and is inserted at this point in the holograph manuscript of the "Biblia Americana." This map of the Holy Land appeared in many different versions and translations, and was to be inserted in the Bible at the end of Numbers, ch. 33. Mather must have appreciated the detail of Visscher's map, for he inserted yet another copy, this time a Latin version, from Visscher's Terra Sancta Sive Promissionis, olim Palestina (1659), between Josh, chs. 13 and 14 (BA 3:124).

An Appendix, to the ILLUSTRATIONS on the Stations in the Thirty third Chapter of NUMBERS.

A Religious Gentlewoman,¹⁶ desirous to Read the Thirty third Chapter in the Book of Numbers, with more Profit than it is commonly readd withal, desired me to Interpret the Names of the Places and Stations there mentioned; with some Instructions raised from them. When I sett about it, I consider, That tho' I cannot say, the History was written upon the Design of Directly giving these Instructions, or, that such Fancies as those of an Everard, are always the Doctrines which are delivered us, in the Signification of the Names that occur in the Bible:¹⁷ Yett it is for the Honour of the Sacred Scripture, and for the Glory of the Holy Spirit, who ha's His Deep Things in every Part thereof, to make every Line & Word in the BIBLE as useful to the Intentions of PIETY as may be. If such an Use as I am now going upon, may serve a little to furnish us with Allusive Expressions for the Embellishment of our Language, and may pass for a Sort of Serious Witticisms, yett it will also be of an higher Tendency, to be an Occasion for such Sentiments of Piety as the BIBLE is always a Friend unto. If I mistake not, there are such Allusions here and there to be found among the Elegancies of the BIBLE itself, as may countenance the Essay, which I now proceed upon. And, if a like Essay were made on the Names of Persons and Places, in the Books of Genesis, and Joshua, and the Chronicles, where would be the Harm of it? The Reviving of such Pious Thoughts in the Mind of a Reader, when he comes athwart those Names, would be no disservice to that Holiness for which these Oracles are calculated.

Behold, A Specimen of such an Undertaking!

RAMESES. Trembling or Trouble brought unto an End. [Jacob arriving here found it so.] Or, A Thing broken in Sunder of a Moth.

¹⁶ Any number of studious gentlewomen may be intended here. Apart from his religious instructions of his daughters, esp. Katharine ("Katy"), Mather's second wife, Elizabeth Hubbard Mather, may be a likely candidate, for he singles her out for pious instructions (D 2:112, 132, 210 etc.). See also Mather's funeral sermon for his daughter Katy, Victorina (1717), and K. Silverman, Life and Times (pp. 266–68, 291–92).

When shall I see the True Rameses, and all my Trembling & Trouble brought unto an End? Verily, This Rameses is not in the Egypt of This World. It is in the Goshen, which is the Inheritance of the Saints in Light.

In the mean time, and while I am here, methinks, the Sense of my Frailty, makes me an Inhabitant of a Rameses; I feel myself ready to be Broken in Sunder of a Moth continually.

SUCCOTH. Tents, or, Tabernacles.

The finest & strongest Habitations here, are but Succoth; no better than Tents; meer Tabernacles.

Yea, All the Bodies I see, are but so many Succoth. What must the Men of Succoth look for?

ETHAM. Strong.

I have read of a Strong City, where my GOD will show His marvellous Loving-kindness to His Chosen; [After they have left their Succoth!] Oh! when shall I come to that Etham!

PIHAHIROTH. The Mouth of the Furious [or, Burning] Mountains. To have to do with some Folks, is to stand at Phihahiroth; even, the Mouth of some Furious Mountains. Oh! For the Meekness and Wisdom, to be used before such Vulcano's!

MIGDOL. A Towre.

When I fly to the Scriptures, or to the Mercies, of the Glorious GOD, I am in a Migdol; The Strong Towre which the Righteous run unto.

MARAH. Bitterness.

How often am I brought unto the Waters of Marah, in Bitter Circumstances! A Glorious CHRIST well-applied, will Sweeten them.

ELIM. Valiant Ones.

When I see what Oppositions the Truth and Cause of CHRIST meets withal, I wish myself at Elim, among the Valiant Ones, that will be the Defenders of it.

The Wilderness of SIN. Or, Cold.

When I feel how cold I am in my Devotions, and in all right Affections, I can't but bewayl myself as in a Wilderness of Sin.

How does the Love of many wax cold in this rueful Wilderness!

DOPHKAH. A knocking. Or, An Impulse.

Under the Word of GOD, sometimes I am in a Dophkah; under the Knocking of the Hammer that breaks the Rock to Peeces.

But it will not be my Safety, to be too much a Dweller in Dophkah, and be too much under the Power of meer Impulse, as a Rule for my Proceedings.

ALUSH. A Mixture.

My Condition, I may call it that of an Alush, for the Mixture in it.

REPHIDIM. Lodgings.

In the Heavenly World only, do I look to find my Rephidim; The Lodgings wherein alone I can propose to ly down with Comfort, are There.

[56v] | Wilderness of SINAI. Or, A Bramble-bush.

The GOD of Glory that appeared in the Bush of Sinai, will not suffer the Burning-Bush to be consumed. But they shall be horribly Torn that will be pulling at it.

KIBROTH HATTA AVAH.¹⁸ The Graves of Lust.

How is this miserable World filled with Kibroth Hattaavah! The Graves of Lust are daily devouring of Mankind. The Graves insatiably still cry, Give! Give! And we, with Madness in our Hearts, do give ourselves unto them.

HAZAROTH. Palaces, or, Court-Yards.

When I am in Churches, where the Pure Worship of GOD our SAVIOUR is maintained, methinks, I am at Hazaroth; Here are Palaces. The Goings of God our King are here. Yea, These are the Court-Yards of Heaven.

RITHMAH. A Noise; or, A Sound.

Some Disputations and Conferences I hear, wherein I am at Rithmah; I can hear nothing but a Noise at them.

And there are Preachers of Rithmah; with whom, a Sound is the main thing, that we can take any notice of.

RIMMON PAREZ. Advancement with a Breach. [Or, A Division of a Pome-granate.]

I should be lothe to have my Station at Rimmon Parez; and be Advanced unto any Dignity or Employment, with a Breach made on the Occasion of it.

LIBNAH. White, [as the Moon:] or, Brittle.

Should the Children of Men be never so white, and even like the Moon walking in her Brightness, they will still be found at Libnah, and be but Brittle Things.

RISSAH. The Dropping of an House.

The Infirmities of Age, quickly bring us to Rissah; we shall quickly feel the Dropping of an House upon us.

KEHELATHAH. A Congregation.

To them who slothfully spend their Time elsewhere, when they should be at the House of GOD, it may be said, They had better be at Kehelathah; more Good might they gett in the Congregation of the Faithful.

Mount SHAPHER. The Mount of Delight.

When I am waiting on the glorious GOD in His Institutions, I am on Mount Shapher; Tis a Mount of Delight unto me: Tis good to be here!

HARADAH. Fear & Trembling.

In my Pilgrimage, how often am I at Haradah? How must I fear always! How must I pass the Time of my Sojourning here in Fear! How must I work about my own Salvation with Fear & Trembling!

MAKHELOTH. Assemblies called together.

¹⁸ See also Mather's thoughts on the same subject in his medical handbook Angel of Bethesda (1972), cap. XXI, pp. 116–20.

What precious & pleasant Things are to be found sometimes in Makheloth; In Assemblies which GOD calls together! Especially in Instituted Churches of Christians, called out of this World!

TAHATH. A Descent; or, A Terror.

When I come to Tahath, I wish that it may be no Tahath; And that my Descent into the Grave may be no Terror to me.

TARAH. A Delay, or, An Hindrance.

For good Purposes, tis pitty to be ever kept in Tarah; and meet with what shall Delay and Hinder a Progress.

How many Procrastinators, and slothful Dwellers at Tarah, are to be seen among us!

MITHCAH. Sweetness.

When we pass from Creatures, to CHRIST and Heaven, we leave Moriah and come to Mithcab: Nothing but Sweetness here!

HASHMONAH. The Hastening of a Gift; or, – of a Reckoning.

In giving my Heart, and my Self, unto the Good One, and unto that which is Good, I desire to be at Hashmonah, and hasten my Gift.

They who Sin, especially in some Sort of Crimes, will find themselves at Hashmonah; There will be an Hastening of the Reckoning upon them.

MOSEROTH. Discipline, and Instruction; or, Bonds.

How gladly would I dwell at Moseroth, under the Discipline and Instruction of my SAVIOUR! Yea, I cheerfully come to the Moseroth of my SAVIOUR; cheerfully take His Bonds upon me; and I would not Imagine such a Vain Thing, as to Break His Bonds asunder.

BENE-JAAKAN. Sons of Sorrow; or, – of Labour.

Where am I, and where should all Sinners, like me, be, but at Bene-Jaakan; among the Sons of Sorrow?

There are some Works (which I am not altogether a Stranger to) wrought at Bene-Jaakan; and found only among the Sons of Labour.

| HOR-HAGIDGAD. The Hill of Felicity.

When I am raised unto some Enjoyments, especially those of Religion and those of Erudition, where am I, but gott upon Hor-hagidgad; An Hill of Felicity!

JOTBATHAH. His Goodness.

Travellers to a Better World, must be found at Jotbathah; and Goodness must be conspicuous in them.

EBRONAH. A Passing along.

This World is a Transitory World; I am in it, but at Ebronah; Tis but a Passing along to an Eternal World.

EZION-GABER. A Tree (or, Staff) of a strong Man.

A strong Argument brings a Man to an Ezion-gaber; Tis the Staff of a strong Man; and it will make all fly & fall before it.

Wilderness of ZIN; Thorns, which is KADESH; Holiness.

The Afflictions which I meet withal, render my State, A Wilderness of Zin; for the Thorns which I am torn withal. Oh! May I find myself at Kadesh among them; and may I be made Partaker of more Holiness, by the Things which are not Joyous, but Grievous to me!

HOR. An Hill for Showing.

One can't but wish to be upon that Hor, the Mount that will show to us, the Things, with the View whereof our Minds would be most highly gratified.

Aaron dies upon Mount Hor. At our Death indeed there will be a Showing of wonderful Things unto us!

ZALMONAH. [Where the Brasen Serpent was erected.] A Likeness, or, A Gift of a Shadow.¹⁹

It mightily contributes unto the Reception of Truth, to take a Step now & then unto, Zalmonah, and exhibit it in a Similitude.

When there is nothing but the Good of This World given to us, we are but at Zalmonah; Tis but a Gift of a Shadow, that we are putt off withal.

PUNON. A precious Stone.

When some sort of Good Thoughts are brought unto me, methinks, I am at Punon; I am arrived unto a precious Stone: The Jewel enriches me & gratifies me wonderfully.

OBOOTH. Desires. Or, Dragons.

While I am in this World, I am in Oboth; in the undesireable Seat of Desires. I don't possess, I don't enjoy, what I would have. That is all elsewhere. Yea, In Piety too, I am gott little further than Oboth, and can pretend unto little more than Pia Desideria.²⁰

I wish, I had not Cause to complain, that I am in a Place of Dragons.

JIEABARIM. Heaps of such as are passing over.

What are all the Burying-Places that we see, but Jieabarim; or, Heaps of People passed over into Eternity!

DIBON-GAD. An Abundance of Understanding.

He that studies the Oracles of GOD, but above all, He that acquaints Himself with the Mystery of CHRIST, Covered and Reveled in them, will arrive to Dibon-gad; They find an Abundance of Understanding, even All the Treasures thereof, to be there mett withal.

ALMON-DIBLATHAIM. An hidden Cluster of Figs.

There are those, whose Worth is not known: They are an Almon-Diblathaim: There is an Hidden Cluster of Good Fruits in them.

Mountains of ABARIM. Such as were to be passed over.

¹⁹ See also Mather's homily Zalmonah (1725).

There are High Mysteries, which cannot be called, The Mountains of Abarim: There is no Passing over them.

NEBO. Prophecy.

Some are always at Nebo; and employ their whole Studies on the Prophecies.

BETH-JESHIMOTH. An House of Solitariness.

There are those, whose Retirement buries them at Beth-Jeshimoth, A Solitary Habitation.

ABEL SHITTIM. A Mourning for Declensions.

When we see, what a Declining there is, from the Primitive Piety, and Principles, and Practices, where can we place ourselves, but at an Abel-Shittim, and in a Mourning for Declensions!

What? Must we do This, at the End of our Journey? Consider it.

Q. What Remarkable, in the Account of the Names of the Persons, who were the Heads of the Tribes, by whom the Land of Canaan was to be divided? v. 19.

A. The Tribes are not mentioned in such Order, as they were at their First Numbring, or at their Second. Yett a most particular Direction of God, may be noted in here placing of them. For they are sett down exactly, according to the Scituation, which they had afterwards in the Land of Canaan, as if Moses fore-saw, who should be next Neighbours to one another. They are sett down, just as their Lotts afterwards fell unto them. An Evidence that Moses was guided by a Divine Spirit in all his Writings!¹

Q. The Gospel of the Cities of Refuge? v. 12.¹

A. The Gospel of a pursued Man-slayer flying to a City of Refuge, & finding Safety there, seems to be this; A Soul finding Safety in a Blessed JESUS, when under apprehension of the Divine Revenger. That which leads one to this Thought, is that Expression, Heb. VI.18. Fled for REFUGE, to lay hold upon the Hope sett before us.

The Jews inform us, The Senate of Israel, every Spring exerted their Cares about the Wayes leading to the Cities of Refuge; To sue, that no Hill, nor Dale, nor Stone of Stumbling, might be any Obstacle in those Wayes; that every Brook in the Wayes, might have a Convenient Bridge over it; and that, at the Partition of the Wayes there should be a Pillar sett up, with, REFUGE, REFUGE, written upon it, for the directing of any one, that might be in hazard of missing the Wayes. All this, is a little Shadow, of the Cares, which the Ministers of the Gospel should use, to direct & assist the Motions of Distressed Souls, towards their only Saviour.

The Distresses, upon a Soul, awakened unto a Sense, being obnoxious to the Revenues of God, are like those upon a pursued Man-slayer. His Conscience distresses him, and therein does the Office of an Avenger of Blood. Without such a Distressed Soul, there will be no Flight unto the only Saviour.²

But now, the Blessed JESUS appears as the Refuge, to which the Distressed Soul makes a Flight. Faith is the Flight. Compare, Isa. IV.6.³

The Cities of Refuge were upon Hills; upon mountainous Places; that so the Distressed Person running thither, might as much, & as soon as could be, have them in his View to comfort him. The Promises of the Gospel are so many Mountains. Our Blessed JESUS now stands upon those Mountains; and from thence, His lovely Voice unto us, is that; Isa. XLV.22. Look unto me, & be saved: And He adds, Run unto me, that you may find Refuge and Safety in me.

But then, a City of Refuge will tell us, what a Saviour or Blessed JESUS will be unto the Distressed Souls of Men.

² See Samuel Mather's Figures or Types (1705), p. 326. This allegorical reading speaks volumes, for it turns the Hebrew Bible into a Christian document per se.

³ See also BA (5:586).

[59v] | He that Runs may Read such things as these.

First. A City of Refuge was a Place of Safety, to the Man that made his Flight unto it. Soul, make thy Flight unto the only Saviour; Thou shalt find Safety there. See, Jude. 1.

Again; Strangers as well as Natives were welcome to a City of Refuge. Both Jews and Gentiles are welcome in the only Saviour. See, Eph. II.17.

Thirdly. The Death of the High-Priest, restored the Man-slayer in the City of Refuge unto perfect Liberty. Oh! the glorious Liberty, which the Death of our JESUS, [our High-Priest becoming our Sacrifice!] ha's procured for us! Consider, Heb. II.14, 15.

Briefly. All Sinners are liable to Death. And they have no way to escape a Death under the Revenges of God, but by Running to the Blessed JESUS. Yea, but then they ought to Run, & make all the Haste imaginable; & say to their Saviour, Lord, I fly to thee as my Eternal Refuge. [Psal. CXIX.60.] The Cities of Refuge were so scituated; that no Man was above Half a Day's Journey from one or other of them. A Flight unto the only Saviour, should not be neglect so much as Half a Day by any Man in the World.⁴

[60r] | Q. A Good Thought, upon the Law, That the Manslayer should be confined unto one of the Cities of Refuge? v. 13.⁵

A. It happened, that in the Dayes of Mr. Cotton, a Gentleman belonging to his Church here in the American Boston, left the Church, and went and lived in a Plantation, which did not maintain the Institutions of our Glorious Lord. This Gentleman, by some unhappy Sort of Chance-Medley, did happen to kill an Indian. On that Occasion the venerable old Man wrote unto him a Letter full of wise and grave Admonitions, which I happen at this Instance to be entertain'd withal. In one of his Admonitions, I find an Illustration, which indeed I thought worth Transcribing and Præserving. It runs in these Terms.

"In the Law, it was appointed, that he who slew a Man unawares, should fly to a City of Refuge, (which was a City of Priests,) and there abide. Num. 35.25 to 28. Which did argue (tho' it were a Judicial Law) that such a Man as had been left of God to Manslaughter, (though unawares) had not walked so close with God, and with his Ordinances, as was meet, and therefore God left him to do

⁴ See Patrick, on Numb. 35:6–15 (Numbers 651–57).

⁵ Mather's "Note Book of Authors" (Numb. 35:15) recommends "Fullers Pisgah-Sight. p. 58–." On Numb. 35:16, Mather lists "MSS. no. 8. p. 31." Thomas Fuller's historical geography A Pisgah-Sight of Palestine (1650), bk. 2, p. 58, briefly discusses the locations and functions of the cities of refuge in ancient Israel, which allowed a person who accidentally killed his neighbor to seek refuge from reprisal by the dead person's family (Lex Talionis).

such a Mischief, and now (upon Peril of his Life) required him to live among the Priests all his Dayes, that he might grow more spiritual, by living among them. We know, the Law is abrogated; yett surely the Equity still continueth, both in the Cause of the | Mischief, & in the Cure. We beleeve, this Evil fell upon you, [60v] and by you upon the poor Pagan; because your Heart sate loose from the Ordinances of the Lord. And now, we beleeve that if God give you to clear yourself from Guilt of Innocent Blood, the Lord then calleth you with a strong Hand, to live in the Fellowship of His Ordinances, and not to wander still like a Lamb in a large Place, or like a Sheep without a Shepherd.”

Thus, my Grandfather.⁶

Q. We read, The Murderer shall be putt to Death, by the Mouth of Witnesses. Who were accounted competent Witnesses? v. 30.

A. According to the Hebrew Doctors, there were Ten Sorts of Persons incapable to be Witnesses; viz, Women, Servants, Minors, Fools, the Deaf & Dumb, the Blind, Impious and Audacious People, Near Relations, and those that had been convicted of bearing False Witness.⁷

Q. And what if there were but One Witness?

A. It is an established Rule in the Civil Law; Ubi Numerus Testium non adjicitur, sufficiunt Duo.⁸

Yett where there was but One Witness, or not two, who both together saw the Man killed, so that he who was accused of the Murder could not be putt to Death, he was thrown into a very strait Prison, and there fed with Bread and

Water of Affliction, till his Bowels were sorely pinched, if we may beleieve the Jewish Doctors, mentioned by Selden.⁹

9 Patrick, on Numb. 35:12 (Numbers 670). According to Hilchot Rotze'ah Ush'mirat Nefesh (4.8), "a person [who] kills people, but the witnesses did not observe his act together – instead one saw him after the other did: a person killed in the presence of witnesses, but a warning was not given; or the witnesses to a murder contradicted each other with regard to the fine points of the testimony, but not with regard to the fundamental questions. All those murderers should be forced to enter a kipah [i. e., 'a small arch-shaped room the size of a person's body (Sanhedrin 81b)']'. There they are fed parched bread and small amounts of water until their digestive tract contracts. Then they are fed barley until their bellies burst because of the extent of the sickness [and they die]" (Mishneh Torah 19:532). John Selden, in his De Iure Naturali & Gentium (1640), lib. 4, cap. 1, p. 467. In his "Note Book of Authors" on Numbers, Mather recommends the same guides for consultation that he also listed on Exodus and Leviticus – with one exception; he adds one more to this list: "Attersol"; i. e., William Attersoll (d. 1640), an English Puritan clergyman and rector of Isfield, Sussex (d. 1640), whose A Commentarie upon the Fourth Booke of Moses, called Numbers. Containing, The Foundation of the Church and Common-wealth of the Israelites (1618), is perhaps his most noteworthy of several commentaries and books he published (ODNB). See V. Larminie, "Attersoll, William (d. 1640)."

Q. On the Design of the Book of Deuteronomy? v. 1.

A. It is called by the learned Jews, A Book of Rebukes.²

3764.

Q. In our Translation tis here said of Israel, They were now over against the Red-Sea. Is the Translation to be approved of? v. 1.

A. There is no Word in the Hebrew Text, for, Sea; It should be read, over against Suph; which was a Place in the Countrey of Moab; [See Num. 21.14.] over against which they now lay encamped; but they were so far distant from the Red Sea, that here can be no Respect unto it.³

And the Paran that followes, means not the Wilderness of Paran, frequently mentioned in the foregoing Book; but a Place also in the Countrey of Moab.⁴

Q. The Meaning of the Recapitulation of Places here? v. 1.

1 B. S. Childs provides a helpful modern survey of the principal historical, textual, and interpretive issues of the fifth book of the Pentateuch, in Introduction (1979), pp. 202–25. See also M. Weinfeld's The Anchor Bible Deuteronomy (1991).

2 The Hebrew title of this Mosaic book דְּבָרִים [devarim] from דָּבַר [dabar] (Strong's # 1697) is derived from the first words of the opening line of the book and suggests "speech, word, speaking." Rashi glosses, לְפִי שֶׁהֵן דְּבָרֵי תוֹכַחזוֹת "Because these are the words of admonishment"; hence "'Devorim' always denotes admonishment" (Chumash/Rashi Devarim 5:1, note 1). The Targums Jonathan ben Uzziel and Hierosolymitanum, sec. 44, cap. 1 (Walton, Biblia Sacra Polyglotta 4:315) are more outspoken, calling it "Sefer Haddebarim" (the book of reproofs), in Etheridge, The Targums (2:557). The Greek title Deuteronomy, however, is derived from Δευτερονόμιον, which signifies "Second Law" (also "Secondary Law") and refers to the repetition of the Ten Commandments (Deut. 5:6–21; cf. Exod. 20:2–17) and the Deuteronomic code (Deut. 12:1–26:16). Matthew Poole's Synopsis Criticorum (1:751) and Works (8a:11–16), and Robert Gell's An Essay toward the Amendment (1659), pp. 587–758, highlight the historical and textual problems of this fifth book of the Torah, and inform the works of Simon Patrick, Cotton Mather, and their peers.

3 Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (1:712–13, 4:315). Ironically, the Syriac and Persic translators – perhaps better versed in the geography of the region – transliterate the Hebrew designation סוּף "Suph" (1:712; 4:315), whereas all others, including Textus Hebraeo-Samaritanus and Targum Onkelos (1:713), erroneously render the term as "Red Sea." Interestingly, neither Targum Jonathan ben Uzziel nor Targum Hierosolymitanum uses either designations (4:315).

4 Patrick (Deuteronomy 5) and Gell (Essay 589–90). These geographical (dis-)locations also raised a lengthy debate among Reformation and post-Reformation divines as highlighted in Poole (Synopsis 1:751–52) and Works (8a:14–16). Pierre-Daniel Huet's Demonstratio Evangelica (1690), prop. IV, cap. 14, sec. 2, p. 175, also adds much valuable information on the different interpretative positions, as does Hermann Witsius, Miscellanea Sacra (1692), lib. 1, cap. 14, sec. 46, pp. 128–30.

A. The Chaldee Paraphrast opens the Business.⁵ Here is the Argument of the whole Book. Moses reproves Israel, for the Sins committed in each of the Places mentioned. In all these Places, they remarkably Tempted God. He interprets Dizahab, for the Place and Crime of the Golden Calf; the Name signifying, Sufficientiam Auri.⁶

Q. The Fortieth Year, the Eleventh Month, the First Day of the Month; when fell it out? v. 3.

A. Moses was to Dy, before the Year was out; And the Speech, which begins at the Sixth Verse of this Chapter, & concludes, at the Fortieth Verse of the Fourth Chapter, Dr. Usher thinks, he made unto the People, on the Twentieth Day of February, and on the Sabbath-Day.⁸

Q. Why did Moses begin to declare this Law? v. 5.

A. To revive what any one had forgotten, & explain what any one had not understood.

Thus Maimonides expounds these Words, in Seder Zeraim.

“In the End of the fortieth Year, in the beginning of the Month Shebat, Moses called the People together, saying; The Time of my Death drawes near; if any one therefore have forgott any thing that I have delivered, lett him come &

5 Targum Onkelos, in Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (1:713).

6 “An abundance of gold.” Midrash Devarim Rabbah, as quoted in Rabbi Bachya ben Asher's commentary, offers an intriguing annotation. According to this midrash, the words דיִזָּהָב [Dizabab] suggest that “the word זָהָב is an acrostic of the 6 days in which G'd created the world, the four directions of the globe, and the Ten Commandments. Moses meant that if the comments of the Israelites had been restricted to these three subjects they would not have been guilty of any misdemeanour, they would have been as pure as gold” (Torah Commentary 7:2350).

7 Mather's primary source is Robert Gell's Essay (1659), pp. 589e–590b. The Latin quotation “Sufficientiam Auri” (“an abundance of gold” or “enough gold”), i.e., καταχρύσεια or “gold-mines” (LXX), appears in Sebastian Münster's Hebraica Biblia, latina planeq (1546), fol. 345, and is by Jacobus Bonfrerius (Pentateuchus Moysis Commentario [1625], fol. 906B) given as the Latin translation of the Hebrew phrase דִּזְהָבִי [Dizabab], which is also the name of a place near the border of Moab (Strong's # 1774). Mather probably refers to Rupertus Meldenius, aka. Petrus Meiderlinus, aka. Peter Meyderlin (1582–1651), a Lutheran theologian at the University of Tübingen and advocate of the Augsburg Confession (BBK), rather than to the Benedictine theologian abbot Rupertus Tuitensis, aka. Rupert of Deutz (c. 1075–1129). In either case, it is unclear which work Mather has in mind.

8 Patrick (Numbers 7) and Archbishop James Ussher's Annals of the World (1658), p. 24, calculate that Moses gave his penultimate speech “upon the 5 day of the 11 month [sic] (Feb. 20. falling upon our Saturday) in the 40 year [sic] after their departure out of Egypt, in the plain of Moab.”

receive it; or if any thing seem dubious, lett him come that I may explain it. And so they say in Siphri; If any one hath | forgotten any Constitution, lett him come & hear it the Second time; if he need to have any thing unfolded, lett him come & hear the Explication of it." For which he quotes this Verse.⁹ [1v]

Q. On that, The Lord God make you a thousand times more, as ye are? v. 11.

A. One observes, The Promise to Abraham, was of a Twofold Seed. One, that it should be as the Dust; Gen. XIII.16. or the Sand, Gen. XXII.17. The other, that it should be as the Stars of Heaven; Gen. XV.5. and, XXII. 17. – The former, is fulfilled, in Israel, concerning the Flesh; the latter, in Israel according to the Promise.

Of the latter, says Dr. Gell, is this Prayer of Moses. And it runs thus, *The Lord God of your Fathers add, besides you, as it were you, [or such as you,] a thousand, such as you are.*¹⁰

Q. Your Cumbrance, & your Burden, & your Strife. What may be the nicest Sense of the several Words? v. 12.

A. The last Word, may signify, Suits at Law, as the two former may signify other Differences; which arose between one Man and another, about such things as are mention'd in the Twenty first, & the Twenty Second, & the Twenty Third Chapters of Exodus.

The First Word, which we translate, Cumbrance, according to Hottinger, signifies, Tædiosam litigantium serrat; the Tedious Pleadings of those that manage Causes before a Judge; as, by Bills, and Answers, and Rejoinders, &c.¹¹

Q. Hear the Causes between your Brethren. What special Inference do the Jewes make, from the Manner of Expression? v. 16.¹²

¹¹ Patrick (Deuteronomy 12); Heinrich Hottinger, in Smegma Orientale (1658), lib. 1, cap. 6, p. 94, insists that the Hebrew word טָרַח [torach], signifying "burden," "cumbrance," and "trouble" (Strong's # 2960), is a synecdoche denoting "a wearisome burden of litigants."

¹² In his "Note Book of Authors" (Deut. 1:17), Mather recommends "Brady's Sermons Vol. 2," an exposition of Deut. 1:17, on why judges must be objective without favoring the

A. The Jewes infer, That it was not lawful, to hear any Man, when his Adversary was Absent; but both Parties were to be present. And they were also to be heard speak for themselves, if they pleased. This was Part of the Oath, which Solon ordered all the Athenian Judges to take; Ἀκροασομαι τοῦ τε κατηγοροῦ καὶ τοῦ ἀπολογουμένου ὁμοίως ἀμφοῖν. *I will hear the Accuser & the Defender, both alike.*¹³

Q. Incourage him. Why must Moses encourage Joshua? v. 38.

A. It intimates, That Joshua might be afraid of being excluded from the Service of leading Israel, as well as his Master.¹⁴ rich or poor, the mighty or the powerless, by Nicholas Brady (1659–1726), English poet, Anglican minister of Richmond (Surrey), and Chaplain in Ordinary to Queen Anne. Simply titled “A Sermon. Deut. 1. Ch. 17. V [sic],” the homily was delivered at the Assizes held at Kingston upon Thames (March 7, 1703) and subsequently published in a two-volume collection of Brady’s Fifteen Sermons Preach’d on several Occasions (1706) 2:391–409. See J. Sambrook “Brady, Nicholas (1659–1726).”

¹⁴ Patrick (Deuteronomy 25). In a parallel passage (Deut. 3:28), R. Judah ben Bathyra explains that “one should encourage only those who are already courageous and stimulate only those who are already on the alert” (Midrash Rabbah: Numbers VII:6).

Q. Why must not Israel, go to take Possession of Edom? v. 5.

A. I'll translate you, a Passage which the Jewes have, in Bereschith Rabba, on Gen. 25.28. Isaac loved Esau, because his Venison was in his Mouth. Tis to this Purpose.

"It is a great Thing to Honour ones Parents. For the Sake of that Honour, that Esau paid unto his Father, the Israelites might not extirpate the Edomites. God gave them a Longævity in this World; yea, the coming of Salvation to us, by the King Messiah, ha's been for their Sakes delayed; even that they might first have the Reward of the Honour, which Esau rendred unto his Father. Moses tells the Israelites, you have compassed this Mountain long enough. Why, Because Esau compassed a Mountain in Hunting for his Father."¹

Q. The Israelites; How did they spend their Time, while they were in the Wilderness? v. 15.

A. It seems here intimated, That a very great deal of the Time, in the Thirty Eight Years of their Peregrination, might be spent, in their Burying of their Dead, and their Mourning over them.

A very melancholy Account!²

Q. The City that is by the River; called, Josh. XIII.9. The City that is in the Midst of the River; what City? V. 36.³

1 Mather's second-hand reference to "Bereschith Rabba, on Gen. 25:28" is misleading, for the reference to this Torah text that "Isaac loved Essau, because he [Isaac] did eat of his Venison" (Gen., 25:28) appears in Midrash Rabbah (i. e., Bereshith Rabba) LXIII:10. Mather's cited passage is perhaps based on the explanation of R. Hanina, in Soncino Midrash Rabbah (Deut. I:15, 17), but this venerable rabbi appears not to offer any Messianic interpretation either. The latter is perhaps hinted at in Midrash Rabbah (Gen. LXVI:7 or LXXVIII:14). Rashi seems to be more forthcoming in his gloss on Deut. 2:5: "A Midrashic explanation: Until the day comes when there will be footsteps upon the Mount of Olives, as it is said, 'And his feet shall stand' [Zech. 14:4]" (Metsudah Chumash/Rashi 5:342). R. Bachya ben Asher's messianic reading is even more explicit: "A Midrashic approach mentioned by Rashi: the word וַי [ad] is understood as indicating a time in history, i. e., until the day comes when the Lord's 'feet' are described as standing on the Mount of Olives ushering in the redemption and the destruction of Edom and all it stands for [Zech. Ch. 14]" (Torah Commentary 7:2366).

2 Patrick (Deuteronomy 36). Mather alludes to the tradition that the generation of Israelites who left Egypt died off during their forty-year sojourn through the desert, for only their offspring were allowed to settle in the Holy Land.

3 In his "Note Book of Authors and Texts" (Deut. 2:30), Mather lists as an informative guide, "Franzius Interp. p. 420"; i. e., "Oraculum XXVI Sacrum," in Wolfgang Franzius, Tractatus

A. While some take it for a distinct City from Aroer; others take it for the same; which consisted of Two Parts; one lying on the Bank of the River Arnon; the other, In the River; that is, on a Spott of Ground surrounded by the River, or on a little Island made by the Arnon. This Opinion seems to be countenanced, from the very Name of Aroer; which seems to come from the Word /עִיר/ that signifies, A City, doubled; and so to import, that Aroer was a Double City, or as it were, Two Cities joined.

In 2. Sam. XXIV.5. we read, They pitched in Aroer, on the Right Side of the City, that lies in the Midst of the River of Gad. This last Clause may explain, on which side or Part of Aroer they pitched. The River of Gad was probably no other than the River Arnon; which rose in the Eastern Borders of Gad, and ran along the same for a considerable Way, till it came to the South Border of the Tribe of Reuben.⁴

Theologicus Novus & Perspicuus, De Interpretatione de Sacrarum Scripturarum Maxime Legitima (1619), pp. 420–29.

⁴ In his Pentateuchus Moysis Commentario Illustratus (1625), fol. 916 (Deut. 2:36), Jacobus Bonfrerius – referring to Adrichomius's Theatrum Terrae Sanctae et Biblicarum Historiarum (1590), a descriptive map of Palestine by the Dutch RC theologian Christian Kruik van Adrichem (1533–85) – insists that the towns of Aroer (Deut. 3:12, 4:48; Josh. 13:9) and Ar (Numb. 21:14–15, Deut. 2:18) are two separate settlements, the former being at the time under Amorite rule, the latter under the dominion of the Moabites. Thomas Malvenda (Commentaria [1601], fol. 748) and Franciscus Vatablus (Biblia Sacra [1584], fol. 108) concur, emphasizing that Aroer is located “on the brink” of the river Arnon, whereas Ar is located “in the valley” or “torrent” [Mather's “in the Midst”] of the river Arnon. See also Poole (Synopsis Criticorum 1:760) and Works (8a:54–55). The ABD (1:321, 399–400) greatly complicates matters, but also speaks of separate strongholds.

Q. The Story of the Giant OG, what Footsteps have you of it, in Pagan Antiquity? v. 1.

A. Doubtless you have heard of an horrible Serpent, called, Python, which crept out of the filthy & slimy Matter, left by Deucalions Flood; employ'd by Juno, to persecute Latona, after Jupiter had sett his Affections on her, and at length Destroy'd by Apollo, whereupon the Words Jō Pean, were frequently heard in the Air. Perhaps, you may as easily suppose Pythagoras turn'd into a Cock or a Frog, as conceive OG turned into this horrid Serpent. But there is an Ingenious Gentleman, whose Name is Dickinson, that ha's offered us very fine Sentiments upon it.¹

You must know, that Python, is the very same with Typhon; to Justify which, besides the common Use of such Anagrams, among the most Ancient, both Jewes, and Greeks, wee have also, the Intimations of Homer, in his Hymn to Apollo, declaring Typho killed by Apollo, which Typho, sais hee because the Sun

[ἔπυσε] did putrefy him. Ἐξ οὗ νῦν Πυθὼ κικλήσκεται: – Hee is therefore now called, Pytho.²

Well; consider now the Name of, Typho; Hesychius and Eustathius will assure you that it signifies, A Burner. And what is OG? גוג from גוג Adussit? OG, was a Giant that of old fought against the God of Heaven; and Hell, is called, The Congregation of the Giants. Accordingly, the Pagan Authors, make Typhon a Theomachous Giant, whom then – Tenebrosa in Tartara mittunt.

Yea, I suspect, their Fable of Typhon cast into the Lake Serbonis, or the River Orontes, was formed from that Passage in Job. 26.5. Gigantes gemunt sub Aquis.³

Add, The Enemies to the People of God, (such as OG was,) are still distinguished in the Scriptures of God, by the Characters of Serpents; accordingly Strabo tells us, Typho was called, sometimes a Serpent, sometimes a Dragon. But inasmuch as the Name for a Serpent is Pethen, פתן/ among the Hebrewes; thus Typhon, becomes Python among the Heathen. And whereas, the Hebrewes, among whom the same Word שחן/ is both for a Serpent, & for Divination, used

2 Mather's second-hand Greek citation from Dickinson's Delphi Phoenicizantes (cap. 1, p. 4) originates in Hymni Homerici, In Apollinem (hymn 3, line 372) and here summarizes the myth of Typh(a)on and Pytho, which survives in several versions in Hesiod's Theogony, Pindar's Olympian Odes, Homer's Iliad, and Ovid's Metamorphoses. In the version cited by Dickinson, the giant Typhaon (monstrous offspring of vengeful Hera), endowed with a serpentine coiling body, consorts with Pytho, a female dragon. The brace mets out death and destruction to anyone approaching their lair near Delphi, until divine Apollo Phoebus (with Helios's help) kills Pytho by having her body putrefy. Alas, surviving Typhaon – not long in lamenting his loss – fathers canine offspring upon Echidna, an Ophidian nymph (Hymn 3, To Apollo, lines 335–70; Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.501; 7.408). This meandering myth probably accounts for the merging of the monsters Typhon and Pytho. Be that as it may, the Greek passage reminds us that “the place [where it happened] is now called Pytho” (Hymn 3, To Apollo, line 372).

3 Dickinson, Delphi Phoenicizantes (cap. 2, pp. 7, 8, 9) probably refers to Hesychius Alexandrinus, Lexicon (T–Ω), alphab. letter tau, entry 1694, line 1, and to Eustathius Thessalonicensis, Commentarii ad Homeri Iliadem (1:243, lines 12–13), but in either case, Dickinson's etymological derivation is tenuous. In his efforts to associate the monstrous Τυφών (Typhon) with the Hebrew גוג ['Owg], i. e., the Amorite giant Og, king of Bashan, Dickinson (pp. 7–8) argues that the Greek designation τυφειν actually signifies καίειν, which in Latin means urere (“to burn”). Likewise, in Dickinson's etymology the Hebrew name גוג ['Owg], suggesting “long-necked” (Strong's # 5747), derives from גוג, which in Latin means adussit, ustulavit (“scorch, burn, singe, char,” etc.). That is why, Dickinson's Og – last of the antediluvian nephilim of the race of Rephaim – is here associated with the Greek Titans, the immortal generation of primeval giants, whom Zeus and his fellow Olympians (in Hesiod's version of the myth) vanquished by confining them to Tartarus (Hell). This locale, which Prov. 21:16 calls קהל רפאים [qahal rapha'im], or “congregation of the shades [dead],” is by Ovid called “tenebrosa in Tartara missa [mittunt]” or “sent to the dark land of death” (Metamorphoses 1:113) to which abode the Theomachous, or god-battling, Saturn/Typhon is banished, unleashing the second, or Silver Age, of mankind. If that tenuous link between pagan and Hebrew myths does not hold, Dickinson hopes, then surely the similarity will do between Job 26:5 (“where the giants groan under the water”) and the fable of Typhon whom Zeus cast into Lake Serbonis, at Mt. Casius (near the border between Palestine and Egypt), or submerged in the waters of the Orontes River, in Syria, might do (Apollonius Rhodius 2.1210–15; and Herodotus 3.6).

Serpents for their Auguries, tis no Wonder that the Heathen made so much of their Pythian Oracles.⁴

More closely yett. OG was hee that would have hindred Joshua, in his Passage to Shiloh, where the Ark was to bee lodg'd in the Tabernacle; and in like Manner, they tell us, that Pytho would have stop'd Apollo in his Passage to Delphos: hence Typho was also called Βέβων and Σμὺ, which according to Plutarch, signify, Detention or Inhibition.⁵

Homer tells us, (Iliad. 2.) the Land where the Gods gave Battel, to a Typhon, was Ἐν Ἀρίμοις, In Arimis;⁶ now turn to Strabo, and hee will tell us, τοὺς Σύρους Ἀρίμους δέχονται, Arimorum Nomine Syros intelligunt.⁷ You know, Aram the Son of Shem, was the Father of the Syrians; and Syria was called, The Land of Aram. Orontes also, the River, called as well Ophites, as likewise Typhon, is in 4 Dickinson (Delphi, cap. 2, pp. 9–10); Strabo (Geographica 16.2.7) relates the old story of how the Orontes River used to be called the Typhon, because in mythical times, Typhon was “a dragon” who, when struck by lightning, “fled in search of a descent [or] underground.” In this quest, “he not only cut the earth with furrows and formed the bed of the river, but also descended underground and caused the fountain to break forth to the surface.” Dickinson’s linguistic derivation of the Greek Πυθών (Python) from the Hebrew יִתְּנָה [pethen], from the root meaning “to twist” like a contorting asp or adder (Strong’s # 6620), is based on the belief still current in Mather’s time that all languages – Greek included – derived from Hebrew, the original language of Paradise, but was divided into seventy two languages after Babel (see also BA 1:728–29, 806–16). The Hebrew שָׁחָה [nāchāsh], signifying “snake” and “serpent” is here linked with the Chaldaic שַׁחַשׁ [nachash] “incantation” and “augury” (Strong’s ## 5175, 5172, 5173) and is by Dickinson associated with the Pythian Oracles of Delphi, in which Apollo’s priestess Pythia, sitting on her tripod and inhaling sulphurous vapors from a subterraneous fissure, uttered her divine revelations. See Plutarch’s De Pythiae Oraculis (397cd, 406d) and De Defectu Oraculorum (435a). Mather has much to say on the ancient oracles in his commentary on Gen. 10:1 (BA 1:693–96). Before the development of modern philology, wordsmithery (like that of in Dickinson) was quite standard. The common belief was that the language of paradise passed through the cauldron of Babel and yielded an infinite variety of homonyms that could be put to good use in yoking languages and ancient myths with those of the Hebrews. See also Edward Brerewood, Enquiries Touching the Diversity of Languages, and Religions through the chiefe parts of the world (1614). M. Olender, The Languages of Paradise (1992).

5 Dickinson (Delphi, cap. 2, pp. 10–11); the story of the conquest of Canaan, its division among the twelve tribes, and the resistance of Og, king of Bashan (Josh. 12:4–6, 18:1, 16), is here fortuitously linked with the one in Plutarch’s De Iside et Osiride (371c, line 1–4), in which Manetho, the priestly historian, is quoted as saying that the evil Egyptian god Σήθ (Seth) is also called Τυφών (Typhon), denoting “the overmastering” and “overpowering,” but also Βέβων (Bebon), which signifies “restraint” or “hindrance.” Alas, the Egyptian Seth, aka. Typhon, aka. Bebon, is also known as Σμύ (Smu) – all names indicating “some forcible and preventive check or opposition or reversal” (De Iside et Osiride 376b, lines 1–3). The same ideas appear in Theophilus Gale’s Court of the Gentiles (1672), part I, bk. 2, ch. 4, pp. 50–51.

6 Dickinson (Delphi, cap. 2, p. 12) quotes Homer’s Iliad (2.783) in support of his argument that Typhon’s haunts are in the eponymous region of Typhoeus, among the Syrian Arimi, a people in Mysia and Lydia (LCD).

7 Strabo (Geographica 13.4.6, line 28) explain that some historians “understand that the Syrians are Arimi” and are now identified with the Aramaeans.

Cælo-Syria.⁸ Behold, the very Countrey of OG designated! Homer intimates, the Seat of these Transactions, to have been ὕδη; but where shall wee find this Hyda?⁹ Learned Men have sought it so long, that at last, they have said it was in Cimmeria; as much as to say, No Man knew where.¹⁰ Whereas indeed ὕδη ha's been but the long Mistake of Scribes, for Ἰουδα; or more probably, for Ἰοδα, which in Homers dayes, was the Attic Way of Writing.¹¹ And when Homer sais, Twas Χώρα ἐνὶ δρυόεντι, i. e. In Regione quercubus abundanti; they who remember the Oaks of Bashan, the Region whereof OG was the King, will bee further satisfied: and yett further, when they remember, that according to the Poets, They, by whom Typhon was combated, came out of Egypt.¹²

Wee'l proceed; you forgett not the Remark, which the Bible putts upon OGs great Bedstead of Iron.¹³ And what, think you, is meant by Homers Τυφώος εὐνά; Typhonis Cubilia?¹⁴ Virgil did not understand Homer, (whom hee often translates) when hee makes a Sepulchre of that Bed, and renders ἐν Ἀρίμοις, Inarime. Æn. L. ix.715.

Tum Sonitu prochyta alta tremit, Durumque cubile,

*Inarime, Jovis imperijs imposta Typhæo.*¹⁵

The true Story of OG, and of Typhon, came to bee at length, extremely disguised; and then Typhon came Ethically, to signify, Vain-glory; and Elementally, the Fiery Spirit of the Creation; and, so they disposed of him, in I know not what Burning

⁹ ὕδη or rather Ἰδῆ, i. e., Hyde (Homer, Iliad 20.385; Scholia in Iliadem, 385a2 line of scholion 1).

¹⁰ Mather (via Dickinson) appears to pun on Chimera, a thing or creature which only exists in the imagination.

¹² Dickinson (Delphi, cap. 2, p. 16); Eustathius Thessalonicensis (Commentarii ad Homeri Iliadem 1:543, line 19): Χώρα ἐνὶ δρυόεντι "in a country rich in oaks." Og, the Amorite king of Bashan, at whose sizable bedstead the Israelites marveled (Deut. 3:11). The oft-mentioned Egyptian Typhon, source of all evil and nemesis of Isis and Osiris, looms large in the Greek and Egyptian myths recorded in Plutarch's Iside et Osiride (356c) and in Samuel Bochart's Geographia Sacra (1712), pars 1, lib. 4, cap. 32, col. 292; pars 2, lib. 1, cap. 28, cols. 527–28. Mather here associates Typhon with the giant Og.

¹³ Dickinson (Delphi, cap. 2, pp. 17–18); Deut. 3:11.

¹⁵ Employing a back-formation of Homer's (Iliad 2.783) εἰν Ἀρίμοις "[the country] of the Arimi," so Mather vaguely hints, Virgil (Aeneid 9.715–16) intones how the isle of Prochyta (Inarime's bed), off the shore of Campania, is rocked by the turbulent seas: "then at the sound lofty Prochyta trembles, and Inarime's rugged bed, laid by Jove's command above Typhoeus." See Frederick Ahl's Virgil. Aeneid (p. 418, annot. line 715).

Mountains. But, I tell you, t'was nothing but OG, in the Original; and when you consider, what I may elsewhere intimate, concerning Joshua, the true Apollo; and the Way wherein the Persons, and Actions, of the Bible, came to be the Themes of Poesy among the Gentiles, you'l subscribe, to my Conjecture.¹⁶

Q. Upon Rabbah? v. 11.

A. The Word imports Great and Populous. It is applied unto some other Cities. And hence for Distinction it is here called, Rabbah of the Children of Ammon.

Stephanus tells us, it was once called, Ammana. But we have greater Certainty, that in After-Ages it was called, Philadelphia; from Ptolomeus Philadelphus, who having made himself the Master of these Parts, and liking the Situation of this Place, Repaired | and Beautified it, and called it Philadelphia. It never occurs under this Name in the Scriptures.¹⁷ [3v]

The City seems to have consisted of Two Parts; One whereof was more peculiarly called, Rabbah; The other, The City of Waters; as better watered than the other, and more pleasant; For which Cause the King seems to have had his Palace here; on which account it is also called, 2. Sam. XII.26, 27. The Royal City. The Waters, whence this Part of Rabbah took its Name of, The City of Waters, are thought to be those of the River Jabbok. Indeed Eusebius tells us, This River or Brook, runs between Philadelphia and.¹⁸

Q. About the Magnitude of the Giant OG, what can be gathered, from the Dimensions here assigned unto his Iron Bedstead; That Nine Cubits was the Length thereof, and Four Cubits the Breadth thereof, after the Cubit of a Man? v. 11.

16 Dickinson's Delphi (cap. 3, p. 20ff); Mather refers to his commentary on Josh. 1:1, in which he identifies the biblical hero as "the Apollo of the Ancients!" (BA 3:83). The "Burning Mountain" is the Italian volcano Mt. Aetna – if Ovid's Fasti (4.491–92) and Metamorphoses (5.346–55) are consulted. The link between the Amorite giant Og with the fabulous Typhoeus is also rehearsed in Gerard Vossius's compendium De Theologia Gentili (1641), lib. 1, cap. 30, pp. 189–90. For an intriguing analysis of Og, king of Bashan, in the context of extra-canonical texts, see A. Hessayon's "Og King of Bashan, Enoch and the Books of Enoch" (2006). See Appendix A.

17 Mather's primary source is Edward Wells's three-volume Historical Geography of the Old Testament (1711–12), vol. 2, ch. 3, § xii, pp. 175, 176, for this and the next paragraph. Wells apparently drew on Samuel Bochart's preface "Authoris in quatuor Libros Phaleg Praefatio" to Bochart's Geographia Sacra, seu Phaleg et Canaan (1707), pars 1, Praefatio, p. 42; see also pars 2, lib. 1, cap. 5, col. 360, lines 1–20. Bochart consults Ethnica (epitome), p. 665, lines 8–13, by the famous Greek grammarian Stephanus Byzantius (fl. 6th c. CE) of Constantinople. Stephanus explains that the Ammonite city of Ammana (modern Amman in Jordan), was renamed Philadelphia by the Macedonian king of Egypt Ptolemaeus II Philadelphus (308–246 BCE) (KP).

18 Wells (vol. 2, ch. 3, p. 176); the Roman theologian and historian Eusebius Pamphilus supplies this geographical detail in his Onomasticon (p. 102, lines 19–22), a lexical-geography of the place-names of the Holy Scriptures.

A. No less a Man than Schickard, pretends, by Rules of Geometry, That the Giant OG, was as Tall, as Four ordinary Men; and by consequence, that he required as many Cloathes as would serve Sixteen other Men; and that he could not be much lighter than Sixty other Men.¹⁹

I will not give myself, nor you, the Trouble of examining Schickard's Rules, by which he determines these Proportions for the Terrible Giant. For if we are not content with the Allowance of this Magnitude for him, The Jewes (who aggravate the Matter, as if the Giant had been growing ever since, unto this day,) will come in, and face you down, That he was Five Hundred Cubits high. Baal Turim, on the very Text now before us, particularly affirm, That Moses, being Twelve Cubits in Heighth, leap'd unto the Heighth of Ten Cubits more, holding in his Hand a Weapon Ten Cubits long, and yett was able to wound this Giant, no higher than his Ankle. The Talmud gives you the Story more at large, in the last Chapter of Beracoth. Pardon me, that I divert you, with a little of the Talmud.²⁰

Q. Why is it said about OG's Bedstead of Iron, That it was in Rabbath of the Children of Ammon? You know, some do make this Passage, a considerable 19 Wilhelm Schickard, Sr. (1592–1635), a distinguished Lutheran theologian and professor of Hebrew and astronomy at the University of Tübingen (Germany), published several works on rabbinic commentaries. Here, Mather extracts a passage from Schickard's בחנית הפירשים [Bechinath Happeruschim] Hoc est Examinis Commentationum Rabbinicarum in Mosen Prodrumus (1625), Disputatio Sexta, cap. VI, sec. 2, pp. 120–21, in which Schickard (responding to Christopher Oertlin) argues that it is evident from the Targum Onkelos that the measurement of Og's gigantic size is based on the Babylonian cubit.

20 Let's not be put off by Mather's tongue-in-cheek skepticism but see what Schickard offers: some imagined the giant Og, king of Bashan, to be 504 cubits tall, which (at the rate of 1 Babylonian cubit equaling c. 50 cm) amounts to c. 252 meters (c. 827 feet). To be fair, Schickard does point out that the tall tales told by the ancient rabbis must allow for hyperboles. Be that as it may, R. Yaakov ben Raash, aka. Jacob ben Asher (c. 1270–c. 1340) elucidates in his eponymous Baal HaTurim Chumash that “Moses, who stood twice five cubits tall, and jumped ten cubits with his ten-cubit-long weapon ... struck Og on his ankle, which measured ten cubits” (5:1841). Much the same is told by R. Simeon b. Lakish, in the Soncino Babylonian Talmud, tractate Berachoth (54b), except he adds that Moses “killed him.” Skeletal remains of dinosaurs – a species of animals nowhere mentioned in the Bible – inflamed the imagination of the ancients just as much as they do today. The story told by Abba Saul illustrates this point: “I was once a grave-digger,” he began. “On one occasion, when pursuing a deer, I entered the thigh-bone of a corpse, and pursued it for three parasangs [c. 3.5 miles/5.6 km] but did neither reach the deer nor the end of the thigh-bone. When I returned I was told that it was the thigh-bone of Og, King of Bashan” (Babylonian Talmud, tractate Niddah (24b). Ever the rational philosopher, Maimonides concedes that “The Torah speaks in exaggerated language – that is, hyperbole,” and brings Og back down to earth – to a mere “six cubits or a little more” (Guide 2.47.407, 408). Lest we sneer at the gullibility of the ancients, see A. Mayor's First Fossil Hunters (2000) and her Fossil Legends of the First Americans (2005), as well as P. Semonin's American Monster (2000) and D. B. Weishampel's Dinosaur Papers 1676–1906 (2003). Cotton Mather makes no bones about it in his glosses on the giant nephilim (BA 1:581–99).

Objection against Moses being the Author of this Book; For, say they, How could this Bedstead come to the Children of Ammon, in the Dayes of Moses? v. 11.²¹

A. As if OG, fearing the worst, might not send his Bed, and his best Furniture, unto the Ammonites; knowing that they would be in Safety there, because the Israelites were forbidden to make War upon the Ammonites. Or, Moses having made a Conquest of the Countrey, might sell this Bed, among other Goods then taken from the Enemy, to the Children of Ammon, who præserv'd it in their Capital City. Huetius ha's offered these thoughts unto us; and they are very Reasonable. Masius ha's another Conjecture, which ha's in it nothing of Unreasonableness or of Improbability; That when the Ammonites drove out the monstrous People of that Neighbourhood, [Deut. 2.21.] OG might possibly escape; and so it is here said, He was left of the Remnant of the Giants; But flying hither to the Amorites, he was made their King, because of his goodly Presence, & his mighty Valour. But the Ammonites kept his Bedstead, and show'd it as a Monument of that illustrious Victory, which they gott over the Rephaim, or, as they called them, the Zamzummim, of that Countrey.²²

Q. Why is the Measure, as well as the Matter, of Ogs Bedstead, so punctually mentioned? v. 11.²³

A. An Iron Bedsted, was no unusual thing in the Dayes of old, tho' much later than Og. Thucydides tells us, That when the Thebans took Platea, they made Beds of the Brass and Iron they found there, which they dedicated unto Juno. And Beds of Silver and Gold, are mentioned by diverse Authors, as Huetius observes, in his Demonstratio Evangelica.²⁴ But we may now argue the Stature of Og. For a Bedstead, according to the common Custome, is made a Third Part longer than the Person that lies in it; and thus, as Maimonides computes, Og must be Six Cubits high; which is a more sober Account, than what the Jewes do ordinarily ²⁴ Huet, Demonstratio Evangelica (1690), prop. IV, cap. 14, sec. 7, p. 177, refers to the iron bedsteads mentioned in Thucydides, History of the Peloponnesian War (3.68.4), and to Quintus Curtius Rufus, in his Life of Alexander (8.8.9; 9.7.15). The latter deplores how certain upstarts "now sleep on silver couches," but admires Alexander for setting up "a hundred golden couches" to feast the ambassadors and petty kings of the barbarian nations.

A. Mount Moriah, on which the Temple was to be built.²⁸

Q. Some Account of Lebanon? v. 25.

A. This Mountain is by the Greeks called, Libanus. It extends from the Neighbourhood of Sidon westward, to the Neighbourhood of Damascus eastward.²⁹

It consists of Two principal Ridges or Ranges, whereof the one is by the Greeks called, Libanus, the other, Antilibanus. They are not only Opposits, but also parallel to one another, and exactly Resembling; But which of the Ridges was called, Libanus, and which Antilibanus, Writers have not agreed. Ptolomy, and the LXX, make that Part of Mount Lebanon, which lies next unto the Holy Land, Antilibanus.³⁰ But it appears from Le Bruyn, and Maundril, that the Inhabitants in our Dayes will have the more Northern of the Ridges to be Antilibanus.³¹

25 Maimonides (Liber מורה נבוכים [More Nebuchim] Doctor Perplexorum [1629], lib. 2, cap. 47, p. 325), adds in his chapter on the hyperboles and metaphors of the prophets that Og's size should be measured according to the saying "'after the cubit of a man,' [which] means according to the cubit of an individual from among ... the rest of men – and not according to the cubit of Og. For all individuals have mostly proportionate members; accordingly it says that the length of Og was twice that of other men or a little more. This is doubtless anomalous for the individuals of the species, but is by no means impossible" (Guide 2.47.407–08).

26 Homer (Odyssey 11.577) and Scholia in Iliadem (scholia vetera), Book of Iliad (15.9, of scholion 1): ἐπ' ἐννεά κείτο πέλεθρα. i. e., "over nine plethora" (c. 900 feet) – not too bad either – for Tityos, the son of Gaea. Pierre-Daniel Huet's Alnetanae Quaestiones (1690), lib. 2, cap. 12, pp. 179–84 and, for good measure, the "Gigantomachia" of the Flemish physician Joannes Goropius Becanus (1519–72), in his Origines Antwerpianae (1569), lib. 2, pp. 137–226, esp. pp. 207–12, will satisfy anyone who is looking for more gargantuan among the ancients.

27 Rabbi Sh'muel ben Meir (Rasbam), in his commentary on Deut. 3:11, identifies Og's iron bedstead as "his crib when he was still growing up" (Hachut Hameshulash 6:1475); and Rashi, Metsudah Chumash Rashi: Devarim (5:47, note 241). 31 Via Wells's Historical Geography (2:259 ff), Mather refers to A Voyage to the Levant: or Travels in the Principal Parts of Asia Minor (1702), an English translation of Reizen van Cornelis de

A Part of this Mountain, which a modern Traveller finds Barren and Desolate, by its exceeding Height proves a Conservatory for Abundance of Snow; which, Thawing in the Heat of the Summer, affords a supply of Water, to the Rivers and Fountains, in the Valleys below. In the Winter, the Snow before Sunrise, will be almost as hard as Ice, & make Travelling very Tiresome. And yett one must make Haste; For, anon the Heat of the Sun melts it, and then one runs a great Risk; The too long Stay of the Curious ha's cost them their Lives; and they have been drown'd in the Water of the Snow, which is on all Sides like so many Mountains. Le Bruyn tells us, on the Top of this, Mountain, there was nothing to be seen, but the Sky and Mountains of Snow; which is in so great Plenty, that many of the Cedars are almost covered with it; and were it not for the Wind, they would be quite buried under it.³²

The Cedars, those Noble Trees, Maundril tells us, grow amongst the Snow, near the highest Part of the Mountain. Some of them are very old; and of a prodigious Magnitude. One which he measured, was Twelve Yards and Six Inches, in Girt, and Thirty Seven Yards in the Spread of its Boughs. At about five or Six Yards, from the Ground, it was divided into Five Limbs, each of which was æqual to a considerable Tree. Le Bruyn had the Curiosity to measure Two of the Cedars, whereof the one was Fifty Seven Spans about, the other Forty Seven.³³

When the Trees are almost all over covered with Snow, yett they are always green. The little Leaves of the Branches shoot upwards; while the Fruit much like to a Pine-Apple, hangs downwards.³⁴

There is a very deep Rupture in the Side of Libanus, running at least Seven Hours Travel up directly into the Mountain. It is on both Sides exceeding Steep and High, clothed with Fragrant Greens | from Top to Bottom; and refreshed every where with Fountains falling down from the Rocks in pleasant Cascades. These delicate Streams uniting at the Bottom, they make a rapid and mighty Torrent, the agreeable Murmuring whereof is heard over all this Place, & adds much to the Pleasure of it. To these Waters there seems a Reference in Cant. IV.15. A Well of Living Waters, and Streams from Lebanon.³⁵

The North-East Part of this Mountain, adjoining to the Holy Land, is in the Scripture distinguished by the Name of Hermon. The Sidonians called it, Sinon; and the Amorites called it, Shenir. In Deut. IV.48. instead of Sinon, it is called, Sion; very different from the Zion, at Jerusalem. And in Josh. It is probable, that this Mount Hermon, is the same that is called, Mount Hor, [Num. XXXIV.7, 8. compared with Josh. XIII.5.]

There was indeed another Mount Hermon, on the West of the River Jordan, and not far from Mount Tabor. [Whereof, see Psal. LXXXIX.12. CXXXIII.3.]³⁸

Q. Which shall hear of all these Statutes.] A little before, we read of both Statutes, and Judgments; where Statutes may mean, the Lawes which concern'd the Worship of God, and Judgments, those which concerned their Dealing with one another. But now, we have none but Statutes mentioned? v. 6.¹

A. Abarbinel hence infers, That even those Lawes, which depended wholly on the Will and Pleasure of God, & for which they could give no Reason, would procure them very great Honour, if they were carefully observed. For the Nations, beholding how wonderfully they prospered, would be apt to impute their Prosperity, unto the extraordinary Præscriptions, which they followed: Just, saith he, as a Physician who cures desperate Maladies, by some despicable Remedies (as they seem to others) is highly applauded for his profound Knowledge.²

But Maimonides, takes the Word Statutes, to comprehend all the Lawes of God, & undertake to show, that all the Six hundred & thirteen Præcepts, have a wise End in them, for the Benefit of those that observe them; either to beget some wholesome Opinion, or pull out a perverse one; either to institute some good Order, or take away some Iniquity.³

Q. Moses tells the Israelites, That their keeping the Statutes of God, would bee their Wisdom, in the Sight of the Nations, who would hear of the said Statutes,

1 For this and the following two paragraphs, Patrick (Deuteronomy 59–60) is Mather's primary source. The italicized phrase with a closing bracket is from Deut. 4:6.

2 The rational or suprarational foundation of the Mosaic Law was hotly debated among medieval and early modern rabbis, especially those who attacked Maimonides for asserting that the divine origin of the Laws is recognizable not in their unintelligibility but in their usefulness either for redressing an injustice or for correcting an unhealthy practice (Guide 3.31.524). Isaac Abravanel's defense of Maimonides's 613 Principles of the Law and their rational basis – especially as attacked by R. Chasdai Crescas in his Or ha-Shem and by R. Joseph Albo in his ספר העקרims [Sefer ha-Ikkarim] – can be found in Guilielmus Vorstius's Latin translation of Abravanel's ספר ראש אמנה [Sefer Rosh Amanah] Liber De Capite Fidei (1638), cap. 22, pp. 104–07; and in M. M. Kellner's modern translation Principles of Faith (Rosh Amanah), ch. 22, pp. 190–93.

3 Maimonides, Liber מורה נבוכים [More Nebuchim] Doctor Perplexorum (1629), lib. 3, cap. 31, pp. 429–30; and his elucidation of the 613 precepts, in The Commandments (2 vols.). Much the same support on the rational foundation of the Laws admired by the Israelites' neighbors appears in Rashi, Metsudah Chumash/Rashi (5:57), R. Bachya ben Asher, Torah Commentary (7:2388), as indeed in Ramban (Commentary 5:52–53). See also Smolinski, "Eager Imitators" (304, note 18).

& say, Surely this great Nation is a Wise People. What Accomplishment had this Prædiction? v. 6.⁴

A. It is well-known, That from the Israelites, there were communicated unto the Gentile-World a great Part of that Learning, and that Worship, & all the Light that there was among them. As the Greek Alphabet, was taken from the Hebrew, and the Græcians themselves confess, that they had their Letters from the Phœnicians: thus the Statutes of Israel also were carried unto the Sight of the Nations. If you ask, How? The Jewes had their Commerce with the Neighbour-Nations, Chaldeans, Phœnicians, Egyptians, and others; especially in the Dayes of King Solomon; who thereupon espoused not a few of the Jewish Usages and Opinions. And Greece trading much with these Nations, the Greek Authors came to have many Footsteps of their Traditions them.⁵

Yea, the Divine Providence did so Disperse the Hebrewes all the World over, especially by the Assyrian and the Babylonian Captivitie, (& afterwards by the Mischiefs of Pompey) as also, in the Times of the Maccabees, when some of them freely left their Countrey, to make Proselytes in Egypt, that, carrying the Holy Writings with them, the main Passages thereof must needs bee imparted unto the World.⁶

4 In his "Note Book of Authors and Texts" (Deut. 4:9), Mather lists "MSS. Pat. no. 23. Sermon. 35. Sermon. 36." Although these manuscript sermons remain unidentified, Mather's abbreviation "Pat.," likely for "Pater" (father), may refer to Increase Mather's sermons in manuscript or Cotton Mather's sermon notes taken down in short-hand when his father delivered his discourse. The pious conviction that Moses and the Torah were the source from which pagan philosophers derived their wisdom was still current until the eighteenth century. Mather could draw on many works to substantiate this widespread belief: among them Theophilus Gale's huge The Court of the Gentiles: Part II. Of Philosophie (1672), esp. bk. 2, chs. 1–2, pp. 88–112 (sep. pagination); Gerard Vossius's learned De Theologia Gentili (1641), and John Selden's De Jure Naturali & Gentium (1640), bk. 1, ch. 2, pp. 12–37.

5 Mather's source for this and the following paragraphs is John Edwards's A Discourse Concerning the Authority (1693), vol. 1, ch. 8, p. 275 ff. The argument that the biblical Patriarchs passed on their ancient wisdom, along with the Hebrew alphabet, to the Phœnicians, and from them to the Greeks and throughout the Mediterranean world, was supported by the best of scholars in Mather's day. See esp. Brian Walton's disquisition "Prolegomena I: De linguarum natura, origine, divisione, numero mutationibus, & usu," in Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (1657), vol. 6, pp. 1–6 (sep. pag.); Gale's Court of the Gentiles: Part I (1672), bk. 1, chs. 10–12, pp. 50–85.

6 Mather alludes to Roman Consul Gnaeus Pompeius Magnus (106–48 BCE), whose intervention in the civil war raging in the Hasmonean dynasty between King and High Priest of Judea Aristobulus II (66–63 BCE) and his brother Hyrcanus II (63–40 BCE), who succeeded him, led to the destruction of Jerusalem (63 BCE) and the assumption of the high priesthood and kingship of the latter. According to Josephus (Antiquities 14.3–4), Pompey and his men entered the Holy of Holies of the Temple, but respected the sacred vessels and treasures, and restored Hyrcanus to his priestly and dynastic office. On the topic of the Jewish diaspora, the distinguished Huguenot scholar-theologian Jacques Basnage, FRS (1653–1723), published in his Dutch exile an acclaimed multi-volume work in French, Histoire de Juifs (1706–15). Translated by Thomas Taylor and published in English as The History of the Jews (1708), the original French edition was continuously expanded with various supplements until Basnage's death. The dispersion of the Jews in pre- and post-Christian times is covered in bks. 6 and 7 (pp. 465–744) and details their state in the various European kingdoms until the late 17th century. Mather incorporates a large extract of Basnage's work in his "Appendix to the Book of, The Acts," in BA (vol. 8). For helpful discussions of Basnage's history, see L. A. Segal's "Jacques Basnage" (1983), G. Cerny's essay collection Theology (1987), and J. M. Elukin's "Jacques Basnage" (1992).

Moreover, The Writings of Moses, were translated into Greek, in the Time of the Persian Monarchy, if not before it (as Eusebius reports out of Megasthenes, one well-skill'd in History, who lived with Seleucus.) For there was a Greek Translation of a considerable Part of the Old Testament, before the Time of Alexander the Great; as is testified by Clemens of Alexandria.⁷ And accordingly, Demetrius Phalereus, Library-keeper to King Ptolomie, Sirnamed Philadelphus,⁸ in an Epistle to him, cited by Eusebius, affirms, that before the Septuagint-Version, many Things were translated out of the Bible. But by this, & by what followed, the Knowledge of the Sacred Scriptures, was to admiration spread among the Gentiles.⁹

Finally; what most makes for the Illustration of the Text before us, is this: The Wise Men among the Pagans, were very Inquisitive after the Wisdom of the Israelites. Of Pythagoras, we are told by Laertius, That hee left his Countrey, being desirous to learn the Mysteries of the Barbarians; – and of Chaldaea, in particular. Origen, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Porphyry, also testify of this Philosopher, that hee went into Chaldaea, & conversed with the Jewes then in their Captivitie.¹⁰

7 Mather's source is John Edwards, Discourse (1:276–77); Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio evangelica 9.6.410d–411a) quotes at second hand from Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromata 1.15, in ANF 2:316–17) a passage from Indica (lib. 3), by the Greek ethnographer Megasthenes (c. 350–290 BCE), ambassador to India of the Macedonian Seleucus I Nicator (c. 358–281 BCE), founder of the Seleucid dynasty after the death of Alexander the Great. According to Megasthenes, "all that has been said about nature among the ancients is said also among the philosophers outside Greece, partly among the Indians by the Brachmans, and partly in Syria by those who are called Jews." From a copy of Aristeeas's famous narrative of the Hebrew Scriptures' translation into Greek (Septuaginta), as Eusebius explains in his Praeparatio (8.2–5.350a–355b), we learn that Demetrius Phalereus (c. 350–c. 280 BCE), Athenian orator and sometime librarian in Alexandria of King Ptolemy II Philadelphus of Egypt (309–246 BCE), supervised the translation of the Septuagint; yet that "others before Demetrius, and prior to the supremacy of Alexander and of the Persians, have translated both the narrative of the Exodus of our fellow countrymen the Hebrews from Egypt, and the fame of all that happened to them, and their conquest of the land, and the exposition of the whole Law." Accordingly, both Pythagoras (and Plato after him) "borrowed much" and "transferred many of our precepts into his own system of doctrines. 'For what is Plato,'" ask the Pythagorean Numenius, "but Moses speaking in Attic Greek?" (Eusebius, Praeparatio 9.6.410c–411a; Clemens Alexandrinus, Stromata 1.22, in ANF 2:334–35).

8 Surnamed; Mather's follows Edwards's spelling.

10 Edwards, Discourse (1:277–78). Diogenes Laertius (Lives of the Eminent Philosophers 8.1.2–3) cites the Attic orator Antiphon of Rhamnus (480–411 BCE), On Men of Outstanding Merit, that Pythagoras learned "the Egyptian language," was initiated into "all the mysteries and rites not only of Greece but also of foreign countries," and hobnobbed with "the Chaldeans and Magi." Origen (Against Celsus 1.15) cites the Greek historian and grammarian Hermippus of

Ludovicus Vives, will have him acquainted with the Prophet Jeremiah in Egypt; and Mr. Selden holds, that hee was acquainted with Ezekiel, & learn'd from him the Tetragrammaton, and other Matters.¹¹

Austin tells us, 't'was beleev'd, that Plato, was the Prophet Jeremiahs Auditor in Egypt, & read the Oracles of the Bible there. Indeed the Works of that Philosopher, do evidently prove him to have been a Student of the Inspired Compo-sures; and the Ancients think, That tho' hee had Imbibed the Sentiments of the Jewes, yett hee forbears mentioning their Name, only because their Name was grown odious to other Nations, and might have caused his Books to find the less Entertainment in the World. Nevertheless, hee seems to hint, that hee had his Notions from the Jewes, when hee speaks of Σύριοις, and Φοινίκιοις μυθοι: for the [5v] Syrians, the Phœnicians, and the Jewes, generally | passed, the one for the other.¹²

Lett Laertius and Diodorus, and some of the Christian Fathers, as Eusebius and Cyril, inform you, how many of the other Philosophers, travelled into those Regions, for Instruction; where they perused the Mosaic Records, which were of great Account among them.¹³

Smyrna (c. 250 BCE), in Fragmenta (22), as extant in Josephus (Apion 1.22; Complete Works 614), that Pythagoras derived his philosophy "from the Jewish people" (ANF 4:402). Both Clemens of Alexandria (Stromata 5.4–5), in ANF (2:449–51) and Porphyrius of Tyre (Vita Pythagorae 1) pinpoint an Egyptian and Chaldaean influence on Pythagoras.

11 John Edwards, Discourse (1:278–79, see also 1:229–31); Juan Luis Vives, aka. Joannes Ludovicus Vives (c. 1492–1540) was a Spanish scholar and humanist of Valencia, taught at Louvain (Flanders) and Corpus Christi (Oxford) under Henry VIII, and published numerous works on philosophy, theology, and education (SEP). Edwards probably has in mind Vives's De Veritate Fidei Christianae Libri V (1543), lib. 3, cap. 11, pp. 243B–44B, that from Pythagoras on down the Greeks acquired their philosophy from Egypt: "Non Pythagoras & Eudoxus & Plato, & reliqui Graeci philosophi, qui Ægyptum institutionis gratia penetrarunt: non iidem ipsi Ægyptiorum numinum sacerdotes." John Selden, De Jura Naturali et Gentium (1640), lib. 1, cap. 2, pp. 17–19, is persuaded that Pythagoras was familiar with the teachings of Jeremiah (Hieremias) in Jerusalem and Egypt, and with those of Ezechiel in Babylonia. This apologetic argument is rife in St. Augustine's City of God (8.11), in NPNFi (2:151–52) and On Christian Doctrine (2.28), in NPNFi (2:549).

12 John Edwards, Discourse (1:278–79). In his De Doctrina Christiana (2.43), St. Augustine claims that "Plato made a journey into Egypt at the time when Jeremiah the prophet was there" (On Christian Doctrine 2.28.43), in NPNFi (2:549). However, after checking his chronology, St. Augustine retracted his error (Retractions 2.4) and confessed in his City of God (8.11) that "Plato was born about a hundred years after the time in which Jeremiah prophesied, and, as he lived eighty-one years, there are found to have been about seventy years from his death to that time when Ptolemy, king of Egypt, requested the prophetic scriptures of the Hebrew people to be sent to him from Judea" to have them translated into Greek. Thus "Plato could neither have seen Jeremiah, who was dead so long before, nor have read those same scriptures which had not yet been translated into the Greek language, of which he was a master." Unless Plato studied the Hebrew Scriptures through an interpreter, Augustine admits, he could not have known about Jeremiah's prophecies (NPNFi 2:151).

13 Edwards, Discourse (1:280); Diogenes Laertius states that the famous philosophers among the Greeks – such as Solon, Democritus, and Heraclitus sojourned into Egypt and Babylon (Lives of the Philosophers 1.2.40; 9.7.34; 9.1); Diodorus Siculus (1.96; 4.25); Eusebius

Yea, the Jewes being Renowned for the Glories & Effects of an High Religion among them; the learned Men among foreign People, were desirous to know their Lawes, and their Wayes; and whole Nations were forward in the Imitation of them. This was the Thing prophetically Intimated in the Words, of Moses, which, this Morning, wee have been Illustrating.¹⁴

For yett a further Illustration, upon this Passage, lett it be observed; This Nation did abound and flourish in all Manner of Prosperity, while they Religiously continued in the Worship of God. Their Lawes were fitted admirably to unite them unto God, & one another; & consequently to make them appear a Wise People, in the Eyes of other People.¹⁵

And accordingly the Writers among other People, have highly magnified Moses; yea, their Lawgivers have transcribed several of his Lawes into their Constitutions. The old Attick Lawes, & the Lawes of the Twelve Tables, do demonstrate it.

The Oracle reported by Porphyrie, in Eusebius his Præparatio Evangelica, (L. 9. c. 10.) thus extols this Nation.

Μουνοι Χαλδαιοι σοφίαν λαχον, ηδ' αρ' Εβραιοι

Αυτο γενεθλον Ανακτα σεβαζομενοι Θεον αγνωσ.¹⁶

The Chaldæans and the Hebrewes (who came from Chaldaea,) are the only wise People, who worship God, the Eternal King, in a pure Manner.

And the Oracle of Apollo Clarius recorded by Macrobius, (L. 1. c. 18.) is no less remarkable;

Φραζεο τον παντων υπατον Θεον εμμεν Ιαω.¹⁷

Acknowledge Jao (so they pronounced the Name Jehovah,) to be the Highest God of all. For tho' Macrobius fancied the Sun here to be called Ιαω, (no body can tell ¹⁴ Edwards, Discourse (1:281).

¹⁵ Patrick (Deuteronomy 60–61) is Mather's muses for this and the following paragraphs to the end of his commentary on Deut. 4:6.

Q. It is said, Yee saw no Manner of Similitude, on the Day that the Lord spake unto you: what might be the special Intention of such a Dispensation? v. 15.

A. You know, That the Determinate Figure of any thing, determines it for to be that one thing, and nothing else. As, a Star, a Tree, a Man; If you see the Figure of a Tree, then tis a Tree, you know, and not a Star. Now, the Great God is Al-Sufficient; He is All that is excellent; All Glories belong unto Him. If God had appeared in any one Determinate Figure, the People might perhaps have imagined, That the Excellency of that One Thing were in Him, and of nothing else. The Infinite God would have His Peoples thoughts of Him, to be more unlimited than so; He would have no one Figure to sett Limits unto Him. If I don't mis-remember it, I have heretofore mett with an Hint unto this Purpose, in a French Discourse of Monsieur Abbady, about, The Knowledge of ones Self.²⁰

Q. The Sun, the Moon, and the Stars, and all the Host of Heaven the Worship whereof is here forbidden, [And Gisbertus Cuperus, by the way, ha's demonstrated, That there was not any God, or Goddess among the ancient Gentiles, but what had a Respect unto the Sun or the Moon.] it is here said, The Lord thy God ha's divided them unto all Nations under the whole Heaven: what is the Sense of these Words? v. 19.²¹

²¹ This and the following paragraphs are from Patrick, on Deut. 4:19 (Deuteronomy 68, 69, 70). Gisbert Cuper (1644–1716), Dutch historian, professor of classical literature at Deventer, Utrecht, and Leiden, and member of the Republic of Letters, published his Harpocrates seu Explicatio Imagunculae Argenteae Antiquissimae (Amsterdam, 1676; Utrecht, 1687), a study of the origin of the Egyptian deity Harpocrates, the figure of a young boy, holding a finger to his lips. Associated with the Egyptian child god Horus (offspring of Isis and Osiris) and representing the rising sun, Harpocrates is a Hellenist appropriation of the Egyptian deity. An elaborate analogy between Egyptian, Syrian, and Greek deities – all based on classical texts, statuary, and ancient coins – Cuper's Harpocrates focuses on the worship of the celestial bodies. Mather here alludes to Cuper's discussion on pp. 87–89, 108–17. On this subject, see also Edward Lord Herbert of Cherbury's De Religione Gentilium, errorumque apud eos causis (1663), esp. caps. 4–9.

A. Very plain; That all Nations under the whole Heaven, have the Benefit of the Sun, Moon, & Stars; and therefore we are to worship that LORD of them all, who ha's made them to be Ministers unto us.

There was no Reason, that R. Salomon, who saw this, yett should fall into the vain Fancy of the Generality of the Jewes, That God having distributed the Nations of the World, under the Government of several Stars, which Stars are under the Government of Angels, the Jewes are left under the Government of God alone, and not subject unto any Planet.²²

But some great Men have taken this to be the true Meaning of the Words; That God for their Sins, had given the Nations up to the Impiety of worshipping the Host of Heaven.

But Chalak, which we render, Divide, signifies also, to Blandish. q. d. God places these great Luminaries in the Heavens, to invite & allure all Nations, to admire and adore Him, the Creator of them.²³

Q. That Passage, Hee brought thee out, in His Sight, with His mighty Power, out of Egypt: what Mystery may bee contained in it? v. 37.

A. Behold the mystery of the Trinity! It had been said, Two Verses before, Jehovah is Elohim; And here wee have the Elohim.

God the Father, is the, Hee, here bringing His People out of their Captivity. But with whose Concurrence?

Here is the Concurrence of His Presence. This Name, (namely, Panim,) is the Name of the Messiah: who is elsewhere in Deuteronomy called, The Presence of God; and in Isaiah, The Angel of His Presence. Hee is our great Pan.

But then, here is also the Concurrence of His Power. Now, Power, is the usual Epithit, for the Spirit of God.²⁴

22 Mather, via Patrick's Deuteronomy (69–70), refers to R. Salomon Jarchi (Rashi), Commentarius Hebraicus in Pentateuchum Mosis (1710), p. 1329, where Rashi appears to claim that God made the stars available to the nations not only as lights but also as deities “in order to banish them from the world” (Metsudah Chumash/Rashi 5:60–61). Much the same appears in Poole's Synopsis Criticorum (1:766) and Works (8a:83–84).

23 Patrick (Deuteronomy 70). The Hebrew infinitive כָּלַךְ [chalaq] signifies “to divide, share, plunder, allot, assign” (Strong's # 2505).

24 Mather's Trinitarian interpretation – not found in any of the major commentaries of the period – may have been prompted by the rise of Arianism among English Deists. His major work on the topic “Goliathus Detruncatus” (The Trinity of Persons, in the One most Blessed and Glorious God. . . . In an American Letter to the Learned Mr. William Whiston) was a response to William Whiston's anti-Trinitarian publications (Diary 2:230). Although having made plans to have this work published in London, Mather also toyed with the idea of sending copies to “Cambridge [i. e., Harvard], to be perused by the principal Members of the Colledge there” to strengthen them in the embattled doctrine (Diary 2:247). “Goliathus Detruncatus” (c. 1713) never saw the light of print, for Mather's manuscript, sent to his English friend and correspondent Dr. John Edwards (1637–1716), was lost when Edwards died. “Goliathus” was intended as a companion to Edwards's defense of the embattled doctrine of the Trinity, Some Brief

Q. That it may be well with thee, & that thou mayst prolong thy Dayes upon the Earth. Did the better Sort of Jewes, rest in this, as a Promise only of Temporal Blessings? v. 40.

A. No. From this Word, Prolong, they extended their Hope, as far as the other World. Thus Maimonides tells us, They were taught by Tradition, to expound these Words; That it may be well with thee, in the World, which is, all Good, and mayest prolong thy Dayes, in the World, which is all long, (or, never ends.)²⁵

²⁶ The Latin passage (along with his elucidations), which Mather quotes from Anthon Wilhelm Boehm's Latin translation of Johannes Arndt's De Vero Christianismo libri quatuor (1708), tom. 1, lib. I, cap. 21, p. 128, § 16, may be rendered, "Christ is signified to good effect by those three cities." This popular work by the German Lutheran Pietist theologian Johann Arndt (1555–1621), was first published as Wahres Christenthum (1605) and translated into several European languages. Mather not only warmly recommended Arndt's mystical book to all candidates of the ministry ("whereby Hundreds of Thousands have been bro't into the Life of GOD"), in Manuductio ad Ministerium [1726], p. 38, but also felt it would "greatly serve the Interest of Piety in my excellent Consort [the wily Lydia Lee George Mather], if I should use, every Morning before I rise, to read a Chapter in my dear Arndt; and communicate unto her the principal Thoughts occurring on it." Similarly, he made the work the subject of his "Table-talk" in his family and had one of them read from it every morning for the edification of the whole Mather household, including his "Domesticks." He also donated a copy "unto our poor Colledge" and wrote to Boehm (6 d. VI m. [August,] 1716) that Arndt's works are among "the most valuable Things" he extracted for inclusion in his Biblia Americana (Diary 2:335–36, 348, 413).

Q. What is the Mount Sion, here spoken of? v. 48.

A. Not the Sion so famous in after times, when David made it his Royal Seat. This was on the other Side [of] Jordan, & written with other Letters.

But in all Probability, Sion here is a Contraction of Sinon; which is the Name, whereby the Sidonians called Hermon.²⁸

Q. Why does Moses often repeat his mention of the inexorable Anger of God, in denying him an Entrance into Canaan?²⁹

A. That the Israelites might be the more deeply sensible of the Danger of Sinning against God; since one Fault brought, such a Wrath, upon such a Man.

He would also magnify the Goodness of God unto them, who tho' great Offenders, enjoy'd a Privilege which was denied unto him.

It went very near to his Heart, we see. But he adds, That he would have them reckon Gods Promise unto them, as irrevocable, as His Threatning, to him.

Q. You may observe, that when the Decalogue, is Repeted, there is an observable Difference, in the Reason of the fourth Commandment. In Exodus tis, For in Six Dayes the Lord made all things, & Rested the Seventh Day. In Deuteronomy tis, Remember, that the Lord thy God brought thee out of Egypt; Therefore Hee commanded thee, to keep the Seventh Day. What [is] the Reason of this Difference? v. 6.

A. Have you Read the Epistle of Ludovicus Carretus, a famous and a learned Jew, converted unto Christianitie, who directs unto his own Children an Epistle, by himself entituled, Liber Visorum Divinorum, to recommend Christianitie unto them? However, I'll now give you some Extract of it; whereby I shall both answer your Quæstion, and give you some other Curiosities.¹

This Gentleman, Lewis [but, before his Conversion, Theodore] Carret, was an eminent Physician in Florence; and so circumstanced, that in his Conversion, hee could propose no Temporal Effects, but such great Crosses and Losses, as hee afterwards mett withal.²

A Night came, wherein this Gentleman Dreamt himself in a most spacious Valley where hee beheld himself surrounded with a Number of Aged and Shining Persons, who had Illustrious Diadems upon their Heads. The Splendor of the Seven Dayes concurring in One, would not have been more Illustrious, than the Lustre which, from above, accompanied, these Heavenly Persons; and these Words hee beheld written about them, The Sun shall bee no more thy Light by Day, neither for Brightness shall the Moon give Light unto thee; but the Lord shall bee unto thee an Everlasting Light, and thy God, thy Glory.³ While hee was, with Admiration contemplating these Objects, two Men, hee thought, hee saw walking in the Valley; unto whom hee Repairing, the one said unto the other, Expound unto this Man his Dream; and the other then turning to him, said, Come to morrow unto my House, and thou shalt hear the Word of the Lord! So hee Awaked, in Distress, about the Meaning of these Occurrences.⁴

On the Morning after, hee giving a Visit unto a Spanish Commander, then under his Care, hee mett some of his Friends, who told him, they were going to visit a celebrated Astrologer, who was the most matchless Fellow in the World, for wondrous and exact Predictions; and they would needs have him for to accompany them. When accordingly hee come to view this Fortune-teller, it smote him with horreur, to find, that hee fully answered the Shape of the Man, that had spoken to him, in his Vision, the Night before. The Man bid him, Come near; and looking stedfastly on his face, hee said, Friend, I have Good Newes for you, to Day; for you shall quickly become a New Man, and a Christian; The Lord shall cause His Face to shine upon thee; that so, converted unto Jesus, thou mayst obey Him forever! Whereupon, our Jewish Doctor, fell into a Distempered Rage, and call'd him, A Lying Rascal, and left the House with Indignation.⁵

But when hee was gone, his Heart smote him, in the Remembrance of what hee had seen the Night before; and in his Distress, hee cried unto the Lord, who saw it, That if these things did proceed from the Lord Himself, hee might have his Eyes, Ears, Heart opened, so as to understand, but, That, if they were Vain Things, hee might not bee led into Temptation. Thereupon, hee sett himself to Read the New Testament; especially the Epistles of Paul where hee found all Things contrived and expressed after a most excellent Manner, and suited unto the Great Law of Love to God, & our Neighbour; and the Lord so Illuminated him, that hee not only Received, but gloriously Defended & Maintained, the Christian Faith. But hee ascribed not his Conversion unto his Dreams; all the Use of Them, hee saies, was, to Quicken his Diligent Enquiries, and Researches, into the Word of God. And, as for the South-Sayer,⁶ with whom hee had been thus concerned, hee saies, the Lord made Use of him, as Hee did, of Balaams Ass; for the Man did not know what hee said, Himself.⁷

While this Renowned Jew, was under the Means of his Recovery, hee was willing to consider, whether not only the Scriptures of the Old Testament, but also the Writings of the Ancient Rabbins, did not countenance these Principles, wherein the Christians differed from the Jewes. How many most significant Things occur'd unto him, in the Comparing of these Matters, I will not now Recite; but only single out, a few of the Curiosities, wherewith several Texts, are by him herein Illustrated.⁸

The Doctrine of the Trinitie, is one thing, wherein the Christians Beleeve otherwise than the Jewes, at this Day. But our Carret produces Rabbins confessing,

That there are Three Lights, but all of them one God. [See Jam. 1.17.] So, that all the Difference between us is, about, the Names of the Trinitie.⁹ And the Cabbalists call the, First Number, who is Eternitie, by the Name of, The Father; which, you know, implies, A Son. The Second Number, they call, Wisdom, even that whereby the World was created. The first Clause of the Bible is rendred by Jonathan, In Sapientiâ creavit Dominus. This is, with Christians, The Word. The Third Number, they call Intelligence. Which with Christians is, The Spirit; from whom come all the Gifts of Understanding.¹⁰

[7v] The Godhead of the Messiah, is another thing, wherein the Jewes at this Day, beleve otherwise than the Christians. But our Carret offers Rabbins, who expound that Place, | Extolletur, et evehetur, et eminebit multum, [Isa. 52.13.] thus, Hee shall bee exalted above Abraham, Hee shall bee extolled above Moses, Hee shall bee very High, above the Angels of God. Now, if so, Hee can bee no less than God Himself. And that unutterable Union of God and Man in our Saviour, hee thinks, intended in Jer. 30.21. Their Governour shall proceed from the Midst of them, and I will cause Him to Draw near, and Hee shall Approach to mee. For, who is this, that engaged his Heart, to approach unto mee; saith the Lord. Sais hee, It notes, Unitionem tam Admirabilem, ut Narrata, non credatur.¹¹ And hee gives us the Words of R. Gequetilia; Mesia unitus est cum Numero, secundo; nempè Sapientiâ; ut Scriptum est, et Spiritus Domini requiesat super eo, Spiritus Sapientia.¹²

About the Manner of the Lords Coming, first more obscurely, then more gloriously, there is a Third Controversie between the Two Faiths. But our Carret shewes, that the First Coming of the Redeemer, must not bee after the Manner of a Conquerour. [Zech. 9.9.] Accordingly, the Talmudists do speak terrible things about, The Torments of the Messiah. And that the Reduction of Israel, is Reserved for His Next Coming. [Zech. 12.10.] Here hee takes Occasion to intimate that, in that Clause, [Hos. 3.5.] They shall fear the Lord, & His Goodness; by, His Goodness, is meant, His Christ; and that the same is intended, where the Psalmist says [Psal. 85.12.] The Lord shall give the Good Thing. But that, The Christ, must be Born of a Virgin, hee argues, not only from the celebrated Mem clausum, [Isa. 7.14.] but from that in Psal. 116.16. O Lord, I am the Son of thine Handmaid; that is, In quo semen paternum non est. Moreover, The Two Comings of our Lord, hee conceives to be signified, in that Repetition, [Psal. 96.13.] Rejoice before the Lord, for Hee cometh, for Hee cometh to Judge the Earth.¹³

The Keeping of the Law, is a Fourth Article of Controversie between us. But here, our Carret proves from Exod. 13.3. and Lev. 23.43, that all the Law of the Festivals, belonged unto the Deliverance of Israel from Egypt; the Memory of which, is now Superseded, & Abolished. As for the Law of Meats, hee finds Israelitish Doctors, who in Psal. 146.7. Deus solvit Vincitos, do not Read Vinctos, but, Vetita; because, Post Adventum Christi, cibi vetiti permitti debuerunt. As for the Law of Sacrifices, hee finds many Wise Men of Israel (and among the rest, Gequetilia, in his Porta Lucis) holding, That Oblations are to cease after the Coming of the Messiah.¹⁴

Only two Precepts of the Law yett stuck with him. One was, The Law of Circumcision. But here, hee soon perceived, That the Coming of the Promised Seed, rendred that Rite Insignificant. Nevertheless, hee Relates a very surprising Passage here; Namely, That at the Request of the Queen of Shaba, Twelve Thousand Israelites, a Thousand out of each Tribe, were sent by Solomon, to accompany her: and that, as the Annals of Judaea assure us, the Posterity of these Transplanted Israelites, became, like the Sand of the Sea, Innumerable.¹⁵ Hee sais, These, altho' Christianized, are still Circumcised; but only as a Testimony of their Love to Jesus, who underwent Circumcision for our Sakes. T'other was, The Law of the Sabbath. About which, being in much Agony of Mind, hee cried mightily unto God, for an Extrication. In Answer whereto, as hee was one Day returning from his Visiting of a Patient, a little Child mett him in the Street, and unto his Astonishment accosted him, saying, My Father, my Father! Hee replied, Well, What wouldest thou have, my Child? The Child answered, I pray, Syr, why are the Ten Commandments Twice Recited in the Bible, and Recited with so much Difference? Difference! Replied hee; *Pray, my Child, what is the Difference?*¹⁶ The Child returned; Why, in one Place tis said, REMEMBER THE SABBATH-DAY, TO KEEP IT HOLY – FOR THE LORD RESTED THE SEVENTH DAY; In another Place,

13 Carreto (Epistola, p. Ciii) invokes the immaculate conception of Christ: "In which there is not the father's seed."

14 Carreto (Epistola, p. Di) here quotes the Jewish sages who in Psal. 146:7 "God freed the oppressed" do not read "oppressed," but "the forbidden," because "after the arrival of Christ, forbidden foods had to be allowed." Carreto again draws on Gequetilia, aka. Gikatilla, Portae Lucis (1516), or Sha'are Orah, Gates of Light, a kabbalistic interpretation of the Sefirot.

15 Carreto (Epistola, pp. Di, Dii).

tis said, KEEP THE SABBATH-DAY TO SANCTIFY IT, – AND REMEMBER THAT THOU WAST A SERVANT IN EGYPT.¹⁷ Our Carret, astonished, now cried out, *Out of the Mouths of Babes, and Sucklings, O Lord!*¹⁸ Hee now saw, hee saies, that Moses considered these two Things, in the Sabbath; A Commemoration, and an Observation. The Commemoration, referr'd unto the Creation of the World; the Observation referr'd unto the Deliverance from Egypt. The former is an Unalterable Duty, the latter is Altered upon the Coming of our Lord. And, altho' the Cæremonial Ordinances, are called, Everlasting, hee saies, hee found sometimes, No very long Time called so. Tis said of a certain Servant, Serviet ei in Eternum, and yett it was to bee no longer than until the Year of Jubilee. So, hee thought, the Coming of the Lord, might well bee reckoned a Jubilee, for the Release of them that had been under the Servitude of the Everlasting Ceremonies. Wherefore, Jeremiah, foretels, A New Covenant.¹⁹

And that the Precepts of the Law, were to bee abrogated, hee reckons it a thing acknowledged, by the old Wise Men of Israel, when they distinguished the Ages of the World, into Two Thousand Years before the Law, Two Thousand Years under the Law, and Two Thousand Years, for the Messias.²⁰

But so much for Carret. I will not give you some of his Cabalistical Curiosities; tho' I can scarce forbear mentioning That one, That the first Letter of the Three first Patriarchs, and their Wives, of whom the Messiah was to come, 17 Carreto (Epistola, pp. Dii, Diii).

18 This dexterous story appears to echo the confessions of St. Augustine who, when at war with himself and in contrition of his heart, heard the voice of a child speak to him: "Lo, I heard the voice as of a boy or girl, I know not which, coming from a neighbouring house, chanting, and oft repeating, Tolle Lege, "Take up and read; take up and read." Immediately my countenance was changed, and I began most earnestly to consider whether it was usual for children in any kind of game to sing such words; nor could I remember ever to have heard the like. So, restraining the torrent of my tears, I rose up, interpreting it no other way than as a command to me from Heaven to open the book, and to read the first chapter I should light upon." What illuminated his mind as he wrestled with Apollyon can be found in Rom. 13:13–14. "No further would I read, nor did I need," Augustine remembers wrestling with Apollyon, "for instantly, as the sentence ended, – by a light, as it were, of security infused into my heart, – all the gloom of doubt vanished away" (Confession of St. Augustine 8.12.29), in NPNFi (1:127–28).

19 Carreto (Epistola, p. Diii). Jer. 31:31–34. Carreto refers to the debate between a Christian and a Jew on the issue of whether Moses' Ceremonial Laws were to last for all eternity or only until their abrogation at the arrival of the Messiah. In that case, the term "forever" would not mean "eternal" but only for "a certain duration of time" (Exod. 21:1–6). Carreto's doubts about the eternity of certain Mosaic rites appear to have been allayed by consulting De Veritate Fidei Christianae Libri Quinque (1543), lib. 3, cap. 5 ("De abrogatione legis"), p. 198, by Joannes Ludovicus Vives, aka. Juan Luis Vives (1493–1540), in which the Spanish humanist resolves this shift in meaning "Serviet ei in Eternum" ("he shall be a slave forever") as illustrated in Mather's excerpt. Vives's polemic De Veritate Fidei Christianae went through many subsequent editions and like its famous predecessor Pugio Dei Adversus Mauros et Juudeos (1651), by the Spanish Dominican theologian Raimundo Martini, aka. Ramón Martí (fl. 13th c.), aimed at winning Sephardic Jews and Muslims over to Christianity.

20 Carreto (Epistola, p. Diii) invokes the Tradition of the House of Elias the Prophet, in the Babylonian Talmud, tractates Sanhedrin (97a) and Avodah Zarah (9a).

Q. What Remarks may one make on the Design of the Four first Commandments? v. 7.

A. It is observed by Grotius, [L. 2. De Jure Belli et Pacis, c. 20. § 45.] That all true Religion, was ever built on these Four Principles. First, That there is a God, and that He is but One. Secondly, That God is nothing of those things, that wee see with our Eyes, but something more sublime than them all. Thirdly; That He takes care of Humane Affairs, & most Justly Judges them. Fourthly; That he is the Maker of all things whatsoever.²²

These Four Principles are explained in the Four first Præcepts of the Decalogue.

The Unity of the Godhead, is delivered in the First Place.²³

The Ground of the Second Commandment, which prohibits our making any Image of God, is, That the Nature of God is Invisible. The best of the Hea-then for that Reason, gave the like Prohibition, Ὡς οὐκ ἐφάπτεσθαι Θεοῦ δυνατόν ἄλλως ἢ νοήσει. Because it is impossible to conceive God otherwise, than by the Mind alone;²⁴ as Plutarch reports the Sense of Numa, among the Romans, which was also the Sense of Antisthenes among the Greeks, as Clemens Alexandrinus reports it; Ὁφθαλμοῖς οὐχ ὁράται, οὐδενὶ ἔοικεν, διόπερ αὐτὸν οὐδεὶς δύναται ἐκμαθεῖν ἐξ εἰκόνης. He is not seen by the Eyes, nor is like any thing; and therefore none can learn any thing of Him by an Image.²⁵ It may be, the Vulgar themselves would not have been kept so long to worship Images, as they were, if it had not been for bold Fictions; That some of them were Διοπετῇ, Fallen down from Heaven, and that all of them were, Θεῖα, καὶ θείας μετουσίας ἀναπλᾶ. Divine Things, &

²³ Patrick, on Deut. 5:7 (Deuteronomy 85).

[8v] full of a Divine Communication, as it is expressed by Iamblichus.²⁶ | To procure the more of Reverence for them, while some of them were Ἐμφανῇ, conspicuous to all the People, others were kept secret, in the inmost Part of their Temples, as Proclus upon Timæus expresses it. Ezekiel Spanhemius thinks, This was done, in imitation, of what Moses declared, concerning the Presence of God upon the Mercy-Seat, in the Holy of Holies.²⁷

The Third Commandment, is founded in the Third Principle; That all things, & our very Thoughts, come under the Notice of God, by whom a False Oath will be severely punished.²⁸

The Fourth Commandment is to establish the Fourth Principle. Indeed, here is a New Ground assign'd for the Observation of the Sabbath; namely, The Deliverance of Israel from Egypt. The Day which God appointed for the Sabbath, at the giving of Manna, was the very Day on which Pharaoh was overthrown in the Red-Sea.²⁹ But then, the Memory of the Creation of the World, obliged them to keep One Day in Seven. Some have distinguished between the Rest of the Sabbath-Day, and the Religion of it. The Rest was in Remembrance of the Deliverance from Egypt; the Religion of it, was in Remembrance of the Creation of the World; & so it was observed from the Beginning, by the Patriarchs. And that possibly may be the Meaning of the Words here used in Deuteronomy; [As the Lord thy God commanded thee.] It refers to the Command, & the Reason of the Command, given both in Genesis and Exodus. To preserve this Way, the Sense of Gods being the Maker of the World, was of so great Moment; that the First Sabbath-breaker, was punished with Death; because a præsumptuous Violation of the Sabbath, contained in it, a Denial, that the World was created by God.³⁰

²⁶ Patrick's second-hand Greek citation is from Ezechielis Spanhemii in Callimachi Hymnos Observationes (1697), "Observationes in Hymnum in Lavacrum Palladis" (v. 52), p. 587, an analytical commentary on Callimachus, a Greek scholar poet of Libya at the library of Alexandria, Egypt, by Ezekiel, Freiherr von Spanheim (1629–1710), a distinguished Swiss-German scholar, philologist, and diplomat. The Greek passage Θεῖα, καὶ θείας μετουσίᾳ ἀνάπλεα – here translated by Patrick – is by the Greek lexicographer Photius (Bibliotheca, Codex 215, Bekker page 173b, lines 6, 8) attributed to Iamblichus, but appears in its present form in Spanheim's In Callimachi Hymnos Observationes (p. 587).

Q. What Lawes among the Pagans were there, conformable to our Fifth Commandment? v. 21.³¹

A. Many. Particularly, the Lawes of Solon, made those Children infamous, who did not afford Sustenance to their Parents, and provide them an Habitation. By the ancient Laws of Athens, he that Reproached his Parents was disinherited; If he struck them, his Hand was cutt off; If he left them unburied, he lost his Estate, & was banished his Countrey: Yea, this Ingratitude was punished with Death. J. Meursius in his Themis Attica, shoves, That by Parents they understood not only Father and Mather, but Grandfather, and Grandmother; nay, Great Grandfather, & Great Grandmother, if they were yett Alive; as Isæus ha's told us.³² The Ground of all these Lawes was, as Æschines tells us, That Men ought to honour their Parents, as they did the Gods, οὐς ἐξ ἴσου δέ τιμαῖν τοῖς θεοῖς.³³ Whence, Hierocles calls Parents, Θεοὶ ἐπιγύνιοι Earthly Gods; and Philo, Θεοὶ ἐμφανεῖς Visible Gods; How properly first mention'd after the Second {Commandment.}³⁴

Q. What acknowledgements did the Pagans pay to the other Commandments of the Decalogue? v. 21.³⁵

³¹ Patrick, on Deut. 5:16 (Deuteronomy 89, 90).

³⁴ Patrick's citation (Deuteronomy 90) from the Greek Neoplatonist philosopher Hierocles of Alexandria (fl. 5th c. CE) is probably an adaptation of a fragment extant in Hierocles (Fragmenta ethica, p. 57, line 1) as preserved in Johannes Stobaeus's Anthologium (4.25.53, line 5). Philo Judæus, in his De decalogo (120, line 2) invokes the phrase in a negative sense, arguing that some audacious interpreters "magnify the title of parents, saying that the father and mother are 'evident gods,'" because like God they bring forth living beings (Works 529).

³⁵ The perennial interest in the similarities between the laws of the Israelites and their pagan neighbors is addressed in "Occasional Annotation. III," (Bibliotheca Biblica [1735], 5:95–112).

A. For the Sixth.

If a Man killed another Involuntarily, he was banished by the Lawes of Athens, from his Countrey for a Year; but if he killed another, ἐξ προνοίας, as Demosthenes expresses it, with Forethought, and with Design, he was putt to Death. We may read more to this Purpose, in Samuel Petitus, in Leges Atticas. Yea, so detestable was Murder accounted, that even τὰ ἄψυχα Liveless Things, as Wood, or Stone, or Iron, were ordered by Draco, to be thrown out of their Coasts.³⁶

For the Seventh.

The Lawes of Draco punished Adultery with Death. Solon indeed, left it unto the Liberty of the Injured Husband, either to kill the Adulterer, or lett him Redeem his Life with a Summ of Money. But if after this, he lived with the Adulteress, he was infamous, as Demosthenes tells us; who adds, That she might not publickly come into their Temples; If she did, any Man might there affront her, as he pleased without killing her. So odious was she, as to be thrown, Ἐκ τε τῆς οἰκίας τοῦ ἀνδρός, καὶ ἐκ ἱερῶν τῶν τῆς πόλεως, Both out of the House of her Husband, & out of the Holy Places of the City. Nor might she go abroad with any Ornaments, (Μὴ ἐξεῖναι κοσμεῖσθαι) according to the Law of Solon; If she did, any one might strip her of them, & beat her.³⁷

For the Eighth.

The Lawes of Draco, punished all Stealing with Death. Solon thought this too severe, & therefore changed the Punishment, into Satisfaction by a double Restitution. Yett he made it Capital, if any Man stole above such a Value or took any thing, tho' of never so little Value, out of the Publick Baths and such like Places.³⁸

For the Ninth.

At Athens, an Action lay, both against False Witnesses, and him that produced them. There was a Fine upon them, & they were made Infamous. If they were found Thrice in the same Fault, τούτους ἔδει καὶ αὐτοὺς καὶ τοὺς ἐκ τούτων ἀτίμους εἶναι as Andocides expresses it: Both they themselves and all their Posterity were made Infamous.³⁹

³⁸ Patrick, on Deut. 5:19 (Deuteronomy 91–92).

Q. In Exodus, the Tenth Commandment runs thus: Thou shalt not covet thy Neighbours House, thou shalt not covet thy Neighbours Wife. In Deuteronomy, the Order is altered, Thou shalt not Desire thy Neighbours Wife, neither shalt thou covet thy Neighbours House. What might be the Reason of this Alteration? v. 21.

A. Behold, a Wonderful Thing. The Holy Spirit of God, foresaw, that there would arise a Generation of Men, who being stung by it, would wickedly take away the Second Commandment out of the Decalogue; but because there must be Ten Words in the Decalogue, this Impudent Generation would splitt the Tenth into two: So that with them, the Ninth Commandment would be, Thou shalt not covet thy Neighbours House; and the Tenth Commandment would be, Thou shalt not covet thy Neighbours Wife. Now, Behold! On Purpose to cast Confusion on these Wretches, the Holy Spirit in Deuteronomy, sett's the Wife before the House; This demonstrates, That the Prohibition of Coveting the Neighbours Wife, can't be the Ninth Commandment; For that which they would have to be all the Tenth, here comes before it.⁴⁰

Q. Is there any thing observable, in the Order of the Præcepts in the Second Table? v. 21.⁴¹

A. Yes; There is a Remarkable Order.

First, such Offences are placed, as are consummate, and then such as are only commenced & not consummate.

Of the former Offences, the Lord proceeds, from those that are more Heinous, to those that are less Grievous.

Those Offences are the greatest, which disturb the Public Order, & do Mischief unto a great many. Such are those committed against Rulers, who are comprehended under the Name of Parents, by whose Authority Humane Society is præserted.

And then among Offences against particular Persons, those are the greatest, which touch a Mans Life. Next, those that wrong his Family, the Foundation of which is Marriage. Then those that wrong him in his Goods; either directly, by Theft; or more craftily, by bearing False Witness.

In the last Place are mentioned, the Sins which are not perfected, and are gott no further than Desire: To Desire and Covet, what is another Mans.⁴²

⁴⁰ Mather compares the two versions of the Decalogue as given in Exod. 20:1–17 and Deut. 5:4–21.

⁴¹ In his “Note Book of Authors” (Deut. 5:29), Mather refers to “MSS. Pat. No. X. Serm. 33. MSS. No. 1, p. 43.”

⁴² Patrick, on Deut. 5:21 (Deuteronomy 92–93).

Q. Can you find any thing in the Old Testament, to Illustrate the Doctrine of the Trinity? v. 4.

A. Yes; To Demonstrate it.

A Plurality of Persons in the God-head, is intimated, where God speaks of Himself in the plural Number. [Gen. 1.26. Gen. 3.22. Gen. 11.7.] This is not spoken by God, after the Manner of earthly Princes; for elsewhere intending to Declare the Greatness of His Majesty, Hee describes Himself in the Singular; I am the Lord Jehovah, and, I am the Almighty God. Nor was it the Custome of the Oriental Princes, to use any other Number; Pharaoh & Nebuchadnezzar, kept that Style, I Pharaoh, I Nebuchadnezzar. Besides, that Expression, As One of us, makes it evident that more than One Person is intended. And others do so speak of God. Moses, hee said, in Gen. 19.22. The Lord Rained from the Lord. Sais Job, ch. 35.10. Where is God my Makers? David sais, Ps. 149.2. Lett Israel Rejoice in those that made him. Solomon sais, Eccl. 12.1. Remember thy Creators. And the Prophet, Isa. 42.5. calls God, The Explainers of Heaven.

But now, for a Trinity of Persons in the God-head, tho' there are many plain Scriptures: As in Ps. 45.8. there is, a Divine Person, Anointing, a Divine Person Anointed, and one, who is the Oyl of Gladness. And in Isa. 48.16. there are two Persons, Sending, and then, another Divine Person Sent, who is the First & the Last, the Maker of Heavens & Earth. And, in the Sacerdotal Blessing Num. 6.24, 25, 26. the Name Jehovah, is thrice over employ'd. And, in Psal. 67.6, 7. There is God, and our God and again God. Yett there is no Text more emphatical, than what wee have, in Deut. 6.4. The Lord, Our God, the Lord, are One: for So tis to bee Translated. Here are evidently Three. And it is remarkable, that Moses here stirs up his Auditors, to expect some special Mystery. Yea, and of the Jewes themselves, R. Simeon Ben Jochai, in Zohar, explains these Words, by saying, That here is a Mystery Revealed by the Holy Ghost, Ad Sciendum, quod Tres Illi, יהוה / אלהינו / יהוה / Sit unum.¹ And indeed, the Second Person here more eminently chooses to bee called, Our God, because Hee would more especially be Ours, by taking Our Flesh & Blood upon Himself, & becoming our Lord-Redeemer.²

¹ YHVH Elohenu YHVH. The Zohar (Book of Splendor) is attributed to R. Simeon ben Jochai (Yohai), student of Akiba (2nd c. CE). In Soncino Zohar, Bereshith, Sec. 1 (15b), “‘The Lord our God the Lord’ (Tetragrammaton Elohenu Tetragrammaton) represent three grades corresponding to this deep mystery of Bereshith bara Elohim. Bereshith represents the primordial mystery, Bara represents the mysterious sources from which the whole expanded. Elohim represents the force which sustains all below.” Much the same is recorded in Zohar, Shemoth, Sec. 2 (9a, 134a), and (see below), in Zohar, Shemoth, Raya Mehemna (43b) – suggesting a tri-une manifestation of God. The Latin phrase signifies, “By Wisdom, which is three in one.” On the changing reputation of the Zohar, see Boaz Huss, “Sefer ha-Zohar” (257–307).

This Text may very profitably receive some further Illustration, from the Jewish Writings?

And It shall have so.³

And lett it not pass for nothing, That the Testimony out of Zohar, for the Trinity, is brought by a Jew.⁴ And, tho' the Jewes are prone to suspect the Quotations of Christians, yett methinks, they should have no Suspicion of what is quoted by the Jewes. [Markanti, in legem. fol. 194. col. 3.] That Author gives an Account of these Words, & explains them in the Order, as they ly in the Text before us; [where the Pesik, between /יהוה/ and /אחד/ requires a Pause between them.]⁵ He begins with Jehovah, first mention'd: And thus he saith; Jehovah is the Head (or, Beginning) of all things, in Splendor, Antiquity, & Holiness; and He is called, The FATHER. Elohenu, i. e. our God, is the Profundity of Rivers & Springs, which go forth & flow unto all things. And then, he adds, of the Jehovah last mentioned, That he is the Tree; Tis præsumed, he speaks of the Kabbalistical Tree, which is one of the Divine Sephiroth, by whom the World was created; the /בינה/ or /תבינה/ by which the | World was made.⁶ Compare, Prov. 3.19. [10v] [See Buxtorf. Lexic. Talmud. /אֵילֶן/] Our Author goes on, And all is One, One is

3 Mather's primary source for the following paragraphs is Richard Kidder's Demonstration of the Messiah. Part III (1700), ch. 4, pp. 182–83. Originally intended as a separate Q. & A., Mather decided to add the extract from Kidder as a continuation of Mather's annotation on Deut. 6:4.

4 In the Soncino Zohar, Shemoth, Raya Mehemna (43b), the kabbalistic exposition of “the Faithful Shepherd,” offers the following gloss on the Shema (Exod. 6:4) “Hear, O Israel יהוה יהוה אלהינו [TETRAGRAMMATON] Elohenu [TETRAGRAMMATON] is one’.” How can the three Names be one? Only through the perception of Faith: in the vision of the Holy Spirit, in the beholding of the hidden eyes alone ... the mystery of the threefold Divine manifestations designated by TETRAGRAMMATON Elohenu TETRAGRAMMATON – three modes which yet form one unity.”

5 Markanti is an alternate name for the Italian R. Menachem ben Benjamin Recanati (c. 1250–c. 1310), whose commentary on the Torah פירוש על התורה Perush 'Al ha-Torah (1523) was published in Venice by Daniel Bomberg and translated into Latin (now lost) by the Jewish converso Guglielmo Raimondo Moncada (Flavius Mithridates), on the behest of the Italian humanist Pico della Mirandola. The folio reference to Markanti's (Recanati's) commentary on the Decalogue is probably to the 1595 Lublin edition (fol. 194, col. 3). The Pesik is a “cutoff” or “pause”: /יהוה/ and /אחד/, i. e., Jehovah and Echad, i. e., One.

6 Kidder (Part III, ch. 4, p. 183); the Hebrew words /בינה/ Binah or /תבינה/ Ta-Binah signify the Understanding, the third element of the first triad of the Sephiroth, and constitutes part of the beginning of the emanation of God's name. For a useful explication of the ten Sephira, see D. C. Matt's Essential Kabbalah (7–11).

R. Joseph ben Abraham Gikatilla (1248–c. 1325), Portae Lucis, haec est porta Tetragrammaton, iusti intrabunt per eam (Augsburg, 1516), on the Sephirot, the ten emanations of God's name in the Kabbalah.

knitt to the other, & there is not found any Separation, but All are One. He tells us afterwards, That this Mystery was to be Reveled in the Dayes of the Messias.⁷

R. Bechai, a celebrated Author among the Jewes, discoursing of the Word Elohim, and of the import and meaning of it, [In Legem. fol. 4. col. 1. Edit. Cracov.] adds these Words; According to the Kabbalistical Way, this Name Elohim is two Words; viz. El Hem, i. e. They are God. But then the Explication of the Jod (which is wanting in these two Words,) is to be fetch'd from Eccl. 12.1. Remember thy Creators. He that is prudent will understand it. These Words do sufficiently prove the Kabbala among the Jewes, that tho' the Divine Nature was but One, yett there was some Kind of Plurality in this Divine Nature.⁸

⁸ Kidder, Demonstration (Part III, ch. 4, pp. 170–71), cites a passage on Gen. 1:1, from R. Bechai (Bachya) ben Asher's 1632 Cracow edition (folio) of his Perush ha-Torah [Torah Commentary] ביאור על התורה [Be'ur al ha-Torah], fol. 4. col. 1, ad vocem אלהים (Gen. 1:1), originally published in Venice (1546), by the famous printer Daniel Bomberg. Rabbeinu Bachya argues that "From a mystical point of view, i. e., קבלה [kabbalah], the word אלהים [Elohim] is composed of two separate words אל Him [El Him]. The first word is a name for G'd in the possessive form, the second word הם describing all the other attributes G'd employed when creating the universe. ... As to the letter ' [jod] in Kohelet 12,1 [Eccl. 12:1] וזכור את בוראך 'and remember

A late learned Writer, [J. Henr. Maij Synops. Theolog. Judaic. p. 31.] brings a Passage out of the Zohar, [Zohar, in Levit. fol. 29. col. 4. lin. 25. Edit. Cremon. Ed. Sulzbac. col. 106.] which is admirable. *The Mystery of Elohim, is this; There are Three Degrees and every one of these Degrees subsisteth by itself; and yett all of them are One, & knitt together in One; nor can one be separated from the other.*⁹ The same Author does quote several other Passages to the same Intent; which do intimate some Kind of Plurality in the Divine Nature; & sometimes a Trinity. Thus after a Stroke this Way on the אלהים קרבים in Deut. 4.7.¹⁰ he takes Notice of the Text, which is now under our Consideration, (Deut. 6.4.) and saies, These are Three Degrees, with respect unto the High Mystery in the Beginning, Barah Elohim. And elsewhere, the same Author on the same Occasion, (p. 47.) adds; “This is the Unity, which is called, The first Jehovah, Our God, The Jehovah. Behold, all is One. And therefore it is said אחד/ One, intimating, that these Three Names are One; And therefore we read אחד/ One, intimating, that they are One. This is known so to be, by the Revelation of the Holy Ghost: However it be otherwise also apparent, That THESE THREE ARE ONE.”¹¹

There is One Place more of the above-named Author (cited by Dr. Kidder, in his Demonstration of the Messias), who speaking of this famous Text, (p. 56.) adds, the following Explication.¹² This is the Mystery of Him, who was before the Rocks, and is united with the Head, the Stem, and the Way. By Jehovah (i. e. the first Jehovah, in Deut. 6.4.) is meant Sovereign, or, First, Beginning: By the Stem, is meant the Stem spoken of, (Isa. 11.) the Stem of Jesse: By Jehovah (i. e. the Last mention'd in Deut. 6.4.) is meant, the Way. Any Man may perceive, That by the Second of these, is meant, The Messias: (of whom the Words in Isa. 11.1. are understood.) And it might be easy, to show, why the Holy Spirit is called, The Way.

your Creator,’ where the letter ’ appears to be extraneous at first glance. ... The author contents himself with the enigmatic words: ‘the intelligent student will understand what I mean’” (Torah Commentary 1:3). G. Scholem’s Kabbalah (1974) is still one of the most perceptive studies of the Kabbalah.

9 In his Synopsis Theologiae Judaicae, Veteris et Novae (1698), Locus II: De Deo Uno et Trino, § 5, pp. 31–32., the German Lutheran Orientalist Johannes Henricus Majus, aka. Johann Heinrich Mai (1653–1719), professor of theology and philology at the University of Giessen, quotes from both editions of R. Simeon ben Jochai (Yohei)’s exposition on the designation Elohim, in Zohar (fol. 29, col. 4, line 25) of the 1559–60 Cremona edition and from Christian Knorr von Rosenroth’s 1684 Sulzbach edition (vol. 1, fol. 106), and his Kabbalah Denudata (1677), pp. 420–26. Many of the Ancient Fathers,¹⁴ (as Dr. Patrick notes) particularly, Theodoret and Greg. Nyssen, think, There is a plain Intimation of the Bl[essed] Trinity in these Words. And some of the Jewes themselves, have thought, there was in it something extraordinary, that the Name of God, should be Thrice mentioned, as it is in this Sentence. It signifies Three Middoth, or Properties, they confess; which they sometimes call Three Faces, or Emanations, or, Sanctifications, or Numerations; tho' they will not call them, Three Persons; as tis observed by Joseph de Voysin, against his Antitrinitarians.¹⁵ The Cabalists tell us of Ten Sephiroth in God, (which they take to be something different from the Essence of God, and yett, not Creatures, but Emanations from it, as Menasseh-ben Israel explains their Words;) and they make the Three First of them, to be more than the other Seven, and they call them, the Primordial.¹⁶ The First, they call, The Wonderful Intelligence, and, The first Intellectual Light, (as the Apostle James calls God, The Father of Lights,) and, The First Glory. The Second, they call (among other

¹⁶ The great Jewish scholar and diplomat Manasseh ben Israel addresses the significance of the Sephirot in Dionysius Vossius's Latin translation of Manasseh's Conciliator, sive De convenientia locorum S. Scripturae (1633), Genesis, quaestio LXIV (Gen. 48:16 and Exod. 20:3, 22:19), pp. 85–87; which, in E. H. Lindon's translation, appears in Conciliator (2000), pt. I, quest. 67, pp. 90–93. The first three emanations in the Sephirot are כְּתֹר [Keter], i. e., crown; the second is חֻכְמָה [chochmah], i. e., wisdom; the third is בִּינָה [Binah], i. e., understanding. The Book Jezirot סֵפֶר יֵצִירָה [Sefher Yetzirah], i. e., Book of Creation, attributed to the OT Patriarch Abraham or R. Akiba ben Joseph (2nd c. BCE), is believed to be the oldest mystical book of the Kabbalah. A useful guide is A. Kaplan's Sefer Yetzirah. The Book of Creation (1997).

Names,) The Illuminating Intelligence; (as the Evangelist John saies, The Eternal WORD enlightens every one that cometh into the World;) and, The Second Glory. The Third, they call, The Sanctified Intelligence; probably they mean, The Holy Intelligence; which is the very same with, The Holy Spirit. All this we find in the Book Jetzira, which they fancy was made by Abraham. From whence we learn, that they had an obscure Notion of the Trinity; and that the Apostles used such Language about it, as was usual among the Jewes.¹⁷

The best of them, are so sensible ob such Things, that they think, we Christians are not Idolaters, for beleeving Three Persons in the Godhead, (tho' they fancy it inclines to Polytheism;) inasmuch as we beleeve the Unity of God; & therefore may be saved as well as they. Thus, Wagenseil, in his Annotations on Sota; and Arnoldus in his Spicilegia after him.¹⁸

Q. How do the Jewes Interpret that Summ of the Law, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy Heart, & with all thy Soul, and with all thy Might? v. 5.¹⁹

A. Munster gives us the Summ of their Interpretations.

Dilige, ex toto corde; quod solum opus tuum, bonum vel malum facit.

Deinde, ex totâ Animâ; ut etiam si causa requirat, non trespides pro eo exponere Animam, id est corporalem vitam.

*Et tertio, ex totâ Virtute tuâ, ut scilicet potius omnium rerum tuarum pendium incurrere veliss, quàm ab amore, Dei deflectere.*²⁰

17 Patrick, on Deut. 6:4 (Deuteronomy 100–101). As Manasseh ben Israel explained the mystery of the Sefirot (the emanations of God) analogically, “the author of ‘Sahar Ora’ [i.e., R. Joseph Gikatilla’s Sha’are Oraḥ] draws the comparison of a king who, desirous of remunerating one for a good deed performed, sends him to his treasurer, or for justice to the judge acting under his authority, making use of different ministers for various purposes, according to the object; so for prayers to be properly and perfectly made, it is first necessary to address the petition to the King of kings, and then to invoke his aid through that attribute or Sefira by which he acts, according to the nature of the prayer” (Conciliator [2000], part I, Quest. 67, p. 92; [1633], Quaestio LXIV, p. 87).

18 Patrick (Deuteronomy 101) leans on Johannes Christoph Wagenseil’s annotations on the Mishnah (cap. 7) and the Gemara (cap. 17), in his Sota. Hoc est Liber Mischnicus (1674), cap. 7, pp. 750–52. Mather appears to have in mind Spicilegium Post Messem longioris epistolae instar (1661), a learned defense of the Pentateuch, by the Nuremberg Lutheran divine, professor of history, rhetoric, and Greek Christophorus Arnoldus (1627–1685), appended to Johannes Henricus Ursinus, De Zoroastre Bactriano (1661), 1–71 (sep. pag.). Whatever the nature of the controversy, Arnoldus’s Spicilegium was deemed sufficiently heretical to be listed in the Roman Catholic Index Librorum Prohibitorum Sanctissimi Domini Nostri Gregorii XVI (1884), p. 64. On Christopher Arnold, see R. Häfner, “Shaping Early Modern Comparative Studies” (2010).

19 Mather lists “MSS. no. V. Sermon. 4” in his “Note Book of Authors” on Deut. 6:5.

20 In his Hebrew-Latin edition Hebraica Biblia, Latina planq (1546), on Deut. 6:6, annot. (a), fol. 356, Sebastian Münster glosses, the sum of God’s law is as follows: “love with all your heart, because your sole action creates good or evil. / Then, from all your soul, so that even if

Q. On that, The Words which I commanded thee this Day? v. 6.

A. Dr. Gell is fond of having it read, The Words which I am commanding thee. God has given Commandments, and He still continues giving of them. I may say, every Man is to judge himself as really & actually commanded by God, as if, the Voice on Mount Sinai, were uttered over again, & particularly directed unto him.

Gells Observation upon it is, That others when they have done their Work, leave it unto the Care of others; Not so, our God. When He ha's done any Spiritual Work, He still goes on doing of it.

Thus, Gods Building, 1. Cor. III.9. is by Pagnin and Beza turned, Edificatio; a Work yett adoring. The Word of Grace is also said, εποικοδομησαι, Further to build us.²¹

Q. The Injunction, To write the Law on the Posts of the House, and on the Gates? v. 9.

A. The Jews are very scrupulous about the Words to be written, & on what Part of the Posts and Gates they were to Place them. This Writing they call Mesusah; and it was generally fixed upon the Right Side of their Gates. It is by some written upon little Rolls, which they fasten upon all their Gates. But others enclose them in a Case, which they fasten to the Door-Post, or putt into an Hole in the Wall. All who pretend unto Religion, whenever they go in and out, lay their Hands on this Place, and say, The Lord preserve my going out & my coming in.²²

Huet notes, It was the Usage of other Nations, to write their Laws upon their Gates.²³ Tis probable they did it, in imitation of the Jews; who to this Day, the case requires it, you may not tremble to expose your soul for it, that is, your bodily life. / And thirdly, with all your courage, it is better to run into the expense of all your things than to deviate from the love of God." Rashbam adds, that to love God with all your soul means "with all your life," that is, even if they should take your life." Rashi agrees and points out that "Obeying out of love is completely different than obeying out of fear." Nachmanides warns, "one must observe the commandments not for the sake of reward but out of the love of God"; and Ibn Ezra insists that "'Heart' refers to the mind; it is a metaphor for the rational soul, for which it serves as the vehicle. ... 'Soul' refers to the spirit of the body, the vegetative soul with its appetites, a phenomenon of the liver. ... [and] 'might' [signifies] with all your maximum" (JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot: Devarim 5:47–48). Mather addresses the same topic in his gloss in BA (vol. 7, Matth. 22:37).

²¹ Robert Gell, on Deut. 6.6 (Sermon XIV), in An Essay toward the Amendment (1659), pp. 659, 660*d*, enrolls Xantis Pagninus's own Latin translation of the Old and New Testaments, in Biblia sacra ex Santis Pagnini tralatione (1542), fol. 39^v, along with Annotationes Maiores in Novum DN. Nostri Iesu Christi Testamentum (1594), on 1 Cor. 3:9 (fol. 168r), by Theodore Beza (1519–1605), the Swiss Reformer, professor of theology at Geneva, and disciple of Calvin. See Appendix B.

²³ Pierre-Daniel Huet acknowledges this custom among the ancient Jews, in Demonstratio Evangelica (1690), prop. IV, cap. 2, § XV, p. 58 (Deut. 6:9).

VI. from v. 4. to v. 10. and, XI. from v. 13, to v. 20. which they roll up, and writing on it the Word Shaddai (one of the Names of GOD,) putt it into a Peece of Cane, or other hollow Wood, and fasten it unto the Doors of their Houses, & of each Room in them; and as often as they go in & out, they make it a Part of their Devotion, to touch this Parchment, & to kiss it.²⁴

Q. We are dehorted from Idolatry, by this Consideration, Lest the Anger of the Lord thy God be kindled against thee? v. 15.

A. We never do read, either in the Law, or in the Prophets, the Word, Charon [i. e. Fury,] or Aph [Anger,] or Caas [Indignation,] or Kinah [Jealousy,] ascribed unto God, but when mention is made of Idolatry. This is Maimonides's Observation.²⁵

[11v inserted into 11r]

²⁵ Patrick (Deuteronomy 107) and Maimonides's 1629 More Nebuchim Doctor Perplexorum (1.36.52–53) and Guide (1.36.82–83). On the question of idolatry, see J. Sheehan's "Sacred and Profane: Idolatry" (2006).

Q. Upon that; The Faithful God, which keepeth Covenant & Mercy with them that Love Him, & Keep His Commandments, to a Thousand Generations? v. 9.

A. You know, The Term of Seven Years, is with us, accounted, a Generation. It looks, as if this Passage had some Aspect on the Seventh Millennium. The Faithful God, will keep His Covenant with the Religious Patriarchs, by præserving the Israelitish Nation thro' a thousand Generations; and then doing for them all that He ha's promised in His Covenant. And when the Thousandth Generation arrives, there will be a Generation that will gloriously love God, and keep His Commandments. God will gloriously keep His Covenant & Mercy with that Generation.¹

Q. Why is it said, concerning Idolaters, That God will Repay them to their Face? v. 10.

A. The Meaning, is, They should themselves live to see and feel the Punishment of their Idolatry. So the Chaldee paraphrases it, Becajehon, i. e. In their Life.

Wherefore, when God threatens, to punish them unto the Third and Fourth Generation, the Meaning is not, That He will only punish their Posterity, but Them with their Posterity, whom they should see destroy'd before their Face. For the Fourth Generation (as Maimonides observes,) is as much as the oldest Men commonly live to see.²

Q. Why is the Out-stretched Arm of God, so often mentioned in the Redemption of Israel out of Egypt? v. 19.

Compare ch. IV.34. V. 15. Exod. VI.6. And many other Places.

¹ Mather's application of Deut. 7:9 to the descendants of the ancient Israelites reflects his early eschatology which entailed the conversion of the Jewish Nation just before or at the Second Coming of Christ. Mather's later allegorization of this pre-millennialist mainstay is reflected in his "Tri-paradise" (part III, Sec. XI), in The Threefold Paradise of Cotton Mather (1995), pp. 295–318, and in my introduction to this work (21–37). See also D. Komline, "The Controversy of the Present Time" (439–59).

² Patrick (Deuteronomy 117–18). The Chaldee Paraphrase (Targum Onkelos), on Deut. 7:10, renders the phrase /בְּחַיֵּיהֶן/ [Bechajehon] i. e., "in vita eorum retribuit eis" ("in their life will he punish them"), in Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (1653) 1:749. Maimonides addresses the questions of how God will punish idolaters and their offspring among the Israelites until the fourth generation (Guide 1.54.127). See also (1.36.82–85).

A. Our Blessed JESUS is expressly called, The Arm of the Lord. [Isa. XL.10. LI.5. LIII.1. compared with Joh. XII.38.] He is to bring His People Again out of Egypt. [Psal. LXVIII.22.] The Holy Spirit would here lead us to consider the Redemption wrought by our Glorious JESUS, who is, The Arm of the Lord.³

Q. The Lord thy God will send the Hornet among them, and they shall Hide themselves from thee; What is the Meaning of that? v. 20.

A. God Fights for His People, by sending Fear, Amazement, Confusion, Distraction, & Astonishment, into the Hearts of the Enemy. This, in Scripture, is called, Gods Hornet; which, like Beasts, that are stung with a Garabee, or Hornet, made Men run, they did not know whither, nor wherefore; nor did they know, where to be safe, they were in such a Consternation.⁴

[3082:]

Q. The first Author cited for such a Sort of Interpretation was Eusebius of Cesarea; and Austin follow'd him, tho' not without some Hæsitatio. The Arabic Interpreter goes that Way; Rabanus Maurus, Lyranus, & others of their Class take up with it; so do Borrheus, Piscator, and Lavater, learned Germans; Willet and Aynsworth, learned Englishmen; Diodati, a learned Italian, and, Junius, a learned Frenchman. But why may not the Hornet be literally understood? The Author of, The Book of Wisdome, [ch. 12.8. understood it literally. So did Theodoret, so did Procopius, and so did all the Ancient Jewes, and most of the Modern ones do so [v. 20].⁵

3 Rashi (Deut: 7:19) interprets "the outstretched arm" as "a reference to the sword of the plague of (the Egyptian) first born" (Metsudah Chumash/Rashi: Devarim 5:93–94).

4 Leaning on R. Simeon ben Lakis (Talmud Sotah 36a), Rashi adds, "הַצִּירֹה [ha-tzir'oh] ... is a flying insect which injected a poisonous substance into them, and castrated them and blinded them in every place where they would hide" (Metsudah Chumash/Rashi: Devarim 5:94). And Babylonian Talmud tractate Sotah (36a) knowingly relates that "the hornet did not pass over [Jordan] with them" but stayed on the banks of the river to ward off enemies.

5 Mather's list of Church Fathers and of Reformation and Post-Reformation divines who offer a metaphoric interpretation of the terms "hornet" or "wasp" (Exod. 23:28, Deut. 7:20, Josh. 24:12) is extracted from Samuel Bochart's Hieroicoicon, sive De Animalibus (1663), pars 2, lib. 4, cap. 13 ["De Vespiis & Crabronibus"], cols. 537–538 [misnumbered as cols. 535–536] (lines 68 ff). In addition to the theologians mentioned here (see Index), Mather (via Bochart) refers to Martinus Cellarius, aka. Borrhæus (1499–1564), German professor of rhetoric and theology at Basle (CBTEL); Johannes Piscator, Commentariorum in Omnes Libros Veteris Testamenti Tomus Primus (1646), fol. 409 (Scholia in cap. VII); and Ludwig Lavater (1527–86), a Swiss Reformed theologian of Zurich (BBK). Only the apocryphal Wisdom of Solomon (12:8), Theodoret, and Procopius interpret the term "hornet" in a literal sense. Recent historians argue that "hornet," as employed in Exod. 23:28, Deut. 7:20, and Josh. 24:12, is a veiled reference to the Egyptian campaigns against the Canaanite city states in the 15th and 14th c. BCE. See O. Borowski, "The Identity of the Biblical sir'a" (315–19).

A. And why not? Bochart observes very justly, That it would make sad Havock upon all the Histories in the World, if such plain Passages as this, may be turned into Metaphors. What tho' all the Circumstances of this Matter, are not Related in the particular Places, where we might look to find their Accomplishment? There are many other Things, which we find occasionally mention'd in the Bible, whereof yett there is a total Silence in that Paragraph, where one would have expected the first mention of them. It is probable, That in every Battel of the Israelites against the Canaanites, God might favour them, with the Auxiliary Hornetts, which He had promis'd them, tho' we don't find them still distinctly spoken of. Compare Josh. 24.12.⁶

Both Athenæus and Eustathius, relate (from elder Authors,) That the People near Peonia and Dardania, were compelled by Frogs multiplying upon them, to leave their Countrey.⁷ Those are the People that are called, Autariate, or, Aph-tariate, by Agatharchides, by Diodorus, & by Ælian. The like happened in France; where Pliny saies, Marcus Varro auctor est ab Ranis Civitatem in Galliâ pulsam. And of the Abderites in Thracia, we read in Justin, Propter Ranarum muriumque multitudinem, relicto patriæ solo, sedes quærebant.⁸

[12v] The Trojans, whom the Græcians could not conquer in a War of Ten Years | were conquered by Mice, if you'l beleeeve Pliny, who saies, Plurimi (Mures) ità ad Trojam perveniunt, ut jam indè fugaverint incolas.⁹ Diverse Nations in Italy, were compelled by Mice devouring their Corn, to change their Seats, as Ælian,

6 Samuel Bochart's Hierozoicon, sive De Animalibus (1663), pars 2, lib. 4, cap. 13 ["De Vespis & Crabronibus"], col. 538 (misnumbered as 536).

7 Mather alludes to the same amphibious story in his "Life of John Winthrop," Magnalia Christi Americana (1702), bk. II, ch. 4, § 8, p. 12. See also Josephus Flavius's relation of the infestations of frogs consuming Egypt as one of the ten plagues (Antiquities 2.14.2).

8 Samuel Bochart, Hierozoicon, sive Animalibus S. Scripturæ (1663), pars 2, lib. 5, cap. 2, col. 661 (line 62) – col. 662 (line 58). According to Athenæus Naucratis, the Paeonians and Dardanians were so inundated by frogs raining from the clouds that they were not able to keep them out of their houses, or out of their cooking utensils, let alone their drinking water (Deipnosophistæ 8.2.333a–b). And the Byzantine archbishop and scholar Eustathius of Thessalonica (c. 1115–1195) says much the same in his Commentarii ad Homeri Iliadem pertinentes (vol. 1, p. 58, line 28). For good measure, the story is confirmed by Agatharchides of Cnidius (De mari Erythraeo [excerpta]), sec. 59, lines 13–14, by Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca historica 3.30.3, lines 5–6), and by Claudius Aelianus (De natura animalium 17.41, lines 8–10). According to Pliny (Natural History 8.43.104), "Marcus Varro states that a tribe in Gaul was put to flight by frogs." Marcus Junianus Justinus (Justin) reports in his Epitome of the Philippic History of Pompeius Trogus (15.2.1) that the Abderites, or rather the Antariatas (according to Diodorus Siculus, 20.19), an Illyrian tribe of warriors fighting against the Macedonians (4th–5th c. BCE), "abandoned their [ancestral] country on account of the vast number of frogs and mice that infested it, [as they] were seeking a settlement."

9 Bochart (Hierozoicon Animalibus, pars 1, lib. 3, cap. 34, col. 1019, lines 1–15); Pliny (Natural History 10.85.186) – if we believe him – reports that "Vast numbers [of field-mice] thus appear in the Troad, and they have by now banished the inhabitants from that country." Fake News? Wonder what the Pied Piper of Hamelin would say about that?

after Agatharchides, and Diodorus, has Reported unto us.¹⁰ And They, (or, Flies) dislodged the Inhabitants of Megara. Heraclides Reports the Chalcidians to be driven out of their Seats, by Mice of such horrible Teeth, as that Iron itself could not stand before them; κατήσθιον και τον σιδηρον.¹¹ And Theophrastus (with others) reports the like, about the People of the Island Gyarus. Antigonus therefore saies, Ἐνταῦθα οἱ μύες διατρῶγουσι τον σιδηρον.¹²

How many Places have been dispeopled by Serpents, it would bee too long to relate. We will fetch no Stories out of Libya: Herodotus affirms, that even among the Snowes of Sarmatia, the Neurians, were forced by Serpents growing upon them, to leave their Countrey.¹³ Varro and Pliny tell us, of the like befalling Amyclæ, in the very Midst of Latium. Rhodes, and Chios, and Tenos, and Salamis, (Islands) were all deserted, because of the Serpents there growing too many for them.¹⁴ And Pliny speaks of a mighty Countrey in Ethiopia, whereof he saies, Latè deserta Regio est, à Scorpionibus et Solpugis gente Sublatâ. Other Authors likewise, besides Pliny, mention it. Especially, Diodorus and Strabo.¹⁵

¹¹ The Greek historian, statesman, and scholar Heraclides Lembus of Alexandria (2nd c. BCE) (OCD), extracting earlier sources, relates in his Excerpta politiarum (62a, lines 1–3) that in the ancient Greek city of Elymnion in Euboea, on mount Atho, the residents were driven out by mice, which devoured everything with their iron teeth: κατήσθιον και τον σιδηρον, or “they even eat up iron.”

¹³ Herodotus (4.105) narrates that shortly before the Persian king Darius I (522–486 BCE) invaded Scythia, the Neuri, a Scythian people, were driven out of their own country by swarms of snakes, “until in their suffering the Neuri left their own land and settled in with the Budini.”

¹⁵ Likewise, Pliny (Natural History 8.43.104) tells us that in Ethiopia is “a wide belt of desert where a tribe was wiped out by scorpions and poisonous spiders.” Diodorus Siculus (3.30.1–2) and Strabo (Geographica 16.4.12, lines 11–13) relate similar stories that make the heart of any arachnophobe skip a beat or two. As in the previous instance, Mather consults Bochart’s Hierozoicon Animalibus (1663), pars 2, lib. 4, cap. 13: “De Vespis, & Crabronibus,” col. 540, lines 10–25.

The Gnatts rising from their New Marishes, destroy'd the Myusians, as we read in Pausanias. The Moschito's that putt Sapores with his Army, to Flight, are famous in History; *Theodore*t calls them, θεῖα βελή, The Divine Weapons.¹⁶

We have no Cause then, to doubt; That Hornetts, or Wasps; might be employ'd by the Hand of God, as a sore Plague upon the Canaanites. And that this Plague may have yett a closer Illustration, I may now observe to you; That Herodotus tells us, Bees made the Countrey beyond the Ister unpassable; and the Themiscyrians fought the Armies of their Besiegers, by turning Swarms of Bees upon them.¹⁷ Iamblichus reports the Babylonian Forces putt to Flight, τῶ τῶν μέλινων πολέμῳ πονοῦμενοι, Apum insultu divexatae.¹⁸ It is reported in the Cretica of Antenor, That the City of the Rhaucians was broken up, thro' the insupportable Vexation that infinite Numbers of Bees gave unto them.¹⁹

In fine; what is most of all unto our Purpose is, The Report of Ælian, That the Phaselites were driven out of their Seats by Wasps.²⁰ By Phaselites, are meant the Solyimi, or the Inhabitants of the Solyman Hills, which were about the City Phaselis. We find in Strabo, ὑπερκεῖται δὲ αὐτῆς τὰ Σόλυμα ὄρος, Huic imminent Solyimi montes.²¹ Now you must know, That these Phaselites were of a Phœnician

16 Bochart (Hierozoicon Animalibus, pars 2, lib. 4, cap. 13, cols. 540–541) refers to Pausanias Lydius, Graeciae descriptio (7.2.11, lines 5–6), who records that when the river Maeander turned an inlet of the sea into a muddy lake, “gnats in vast swarms bred in the lake until the inhabitants were forced to leave the city, [and] they departed for Miletus” (Description of Greece 7.2.11). Even the army of Persian king Sapores Nisibin, aka. Shapour II (309–379 CE) (KP), was routed by swarms of pesky mosquitoes, as we learn from Theodore, Historia Ecclesiastica (2.25). When cursed by the Christian divine Jacobus, Sapores’s men were overcome by “clouds of mosquitoes and gnats,” which “filled the hollow trunks of the elephants, and the ears and nostrils of horses,” until “past endurance they broke their bridles, unseated their riders,” and sent the Persians packing in head-long flight (NPNFii 3:92).

17 Herodotus (5.10) questions this Thracian claim that bees make the entire area on either side of the Ister (Danube) impassable: “Their explanation does not seem to me likely,” Herodotus adds, “for the creatures are very sensitive to cold. Indeed, I think it is the cold that renders the countries to the north uninhabited” (History 359). The Greek historian Appianus Alexandrinus (c. 95–c. 165 CE), in his Mithridatica (secs. 346–347), reports that during the Third Mithridatic War (73–63 BCE) against King Mithridates VI Eupator of Pontus (132–63), when the Roman army of Lucius Licinius Lucullus had dug tunnels under the walls of Themiscyra on the Thermodon River, the embattled Themiscyrans “thrust beasts and other wild animals and swarms of bees into [the tunnels] against the workers” (Roman History 12.11.78).

18 Although both Bochart and Mather attribute the Greek passage to Iamblichus, it actually appears in Patriarch Photius Constantinopolitanus (Bibliotheca 94, Bekker page 74b, lines 5–6) and reads with Greek diacritics, τῷ τῶν μέλισσῶν πολέμῳ πονοῦμενοι, or “an attacking swarm of bees drove them apart.”

19 Finally, the obscure Greek historian Antenor Creticus (c. 2nd CE) (DGRBM) in his history of Crete (Fragm. 1, line 2–4), extant in Claudius Aelianus (De natura animalium 17.35, lines 1–6), has the last word on the potency of bees to scatter armies. All of the above and more is carefully outlined and cited in Bochart (Hierozoicon Animalibus, pars 2, lib. 4 cap. 13, col. 541).

20 Claudius Aelianus (De natura animalium 11.28, lines 1–4).

21 Strabo (Geographica 14.3.9, lines 1–4) explains that ὑπερκεῖται δ’ αὐτῆς τὰ Σόλυμα ὄρος “above [the city Phaselis] lies Solyima, a mountain.”

Original; they were originally Canaanites. Plutarch therefore calls their Country, Phœnicia; and Smyrnaeus calls it, φοινικος εδος, Phœnicium Solum.²² And even to the Days of Xerxes, the People there kept their Phœnician Tongue; The Poet Chærilus describes them from it.

Γλώσσαν μὲν Φοινισσαν ἀπο στομάτων ἀφίεντες.²³

And there is Cause to think, That this Colony of the Wasp-driven Phaselites, was planted about the Time of Joshua; for in Homer, and others, we find Bellorophon, who lived not long after Joshua, fighting against them. The Stings of the Hornets, which drove this People out of Canaan, were so Sharp it seems, that the Remembrance thereof continued Fifteen Hundred Years after, even until the Days of Ælian.²⁴

²³ The Greek epic poet Choerilus Samius (late 5th c. BCE) (OCD) in an extant fragment, probably from his Persica (Fragmenta epica 6, line 2), intones, Γλώσσαν μὲν Φοίνισσαν ἀπὸ στομάτων ἀφίεντες, or "emitting [the accents of the] Phœnician language from their mouths."

Q. It was an Article exhibited against the miserable Servetus, That in his Præface to Ptolomies Geography he said, The Fruitfulness of Judæa had been wrongfully cried up; since Travellers tell us, that it is a barren & poor Countrey; and that Moses was by him called, Præco Vanus, on that Occasion. Whereas, Calvin; quoting the CVII Psalms upon it; would have the present Barrenness of that Countrey, ascribed unto a Remarkable Malediction from GOD upon it; and that Judæa is, Hodie nobis illustre Divinæ Maledictionis Speculum.¹ We are not altogether Strangers to what the Infidels of our Days cavil upon this Matter, in Derogation of the Sacred Scriptures. Acceptable and Serviceable would be a few Agreeable Thoughts upon it? v. 7.

A. In the first Place, I will Judge it not amiss to transcribe the Words of the Bibliothèque Angloise upon it. "Palestine is not now, properly speaking a more Barren Countrey than it was in former times; were it improved & cultivated, it would be as Fruitful as it was in the time of the Israelites. Mr. Maundril, who Travelled in that Countrey, does not ascribe its Barrenness to a Divine Punishment, but a Want of Culture."

1 Mather invokes the conflict between the Swiss Reformer John Calvin (1509–64) and the anti-Trinitarian Michael Servetus of Navarre (1511–53), who was subsequently burned alive for heresy in Geneva (ODCC). The specific issue here is the disagreement between Servetus and Calvin on the alleged fertility or barrenness of the Holy Land. In his preface to his edition of Claudii Ptolemaei Alexandrini Geographicae Enarrationeis, Libri Octo (1535), Servetus had allegedly claimed that Moses was a "praeco vanus" (an "empty crier"), because contrary to the Hebrew Lawgiver's avowal, the Promised Land was not a land of milk and honey but a barren, infertile, and arid land. Calvin deemed Servetus's audacity heretical and – coupled with his anti-Trinitarianism – worthy of death. The Latin citation, which may be rendered "until today, Judea is unto us a clear illustration of the divine curse," appears in Calvin's apologia Defensio Orthodoxae fidei de sacra Trinitate contra prodigiosos errores Michaelis Serveti Hispani (1554), p. 59. See also Calvin's annotations on Psal. 107:33, in Commentary on the Book of Psalms (4:260–61) and Mather's glosses on Exod. 3:8 and Numb. 13:23 (above). W. K. Tweedie's Calvin and Servetus (1846) – denominational wrangling aside – is as illuminating as ever on Calvin's part in the execution of Servetus.

2 A French Huguenot, Michel de La Roche (fl. 1710–42) converted to Anglicanism after his escape to England for religious persecution in France. He became the editor of the first five volumes of Bibliothèque Angloise, ou Histoire Littéraire de la Grande Bretagne, a periodical of literary and philological criticism published in Amsterdam. After being accused of anti-Calvinist sentiments, the editorship of the journal was transferred to Armand de La Chapelle. Mather's extract in quotation marks is from Bibliothèque Angloise (1717), tom. 2, première partie, "Article VII. "Histoire de Michel Servet" (122–26), which excerpts the 1705 French translation of Henry Maundrell's Voyage d'Alep à Jerusalem en 1697. The passage in quotation marks is Mather's own translation from Bibliothèque (p. 122); however, his subsequent extracts from Maundrell are from the published English translation of Maundrell's Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem at Easter A. D. 1697 (1703), pp. 63–65, which Mather puts to good use throughout Biblia Americana.

The Passage being instructive & curious, it shall be here at Length inserted. "All along from Kane-Leban to Beer, as also as far as we could see round, the Countrey discovered a quite different Face from what it had before; presenting nothing to the View in most Places, but naked Rocks, Mountains, & Præcípices. At Sight of which, Pilgrims are apt to be much astonished, and baulked in their Expectations, finding that Countrey in such an Inhospitable Condition; concerning whose Pleasantness and Plenty, they had before formed in their Minds such high Idæas, from the Description given of it in the Word of GOD; inso-much that it almost startles their Faith, when they reflect, how it could be possible, for a Land like This, to supply Food for so prodigious a Number of Inhabitants, are said to have been polled in the Twelve Tribes at one time; the Sum given in by Joab, amounting to no less than Thirteen Hundred Thousand fighting Men, besides Women and Children. But it is certain, that any Man who is not a little biased to Infidelity before, may see, as he passes along the Arguments enough to support his Faith against such Scruples."³

"For, it is obvious for any one to observe, that these Rocks and Hills, must have been anciently covered with Earth, and cultivated, and made to contribute unto the Maintenance of the Inhabitants, no less than if the Countrey had been all Plain; nay, perhaps much more: Forasmuch as such mountainous and uneven Surface affords a larger Space of Ground for Cultivation, than this Countrey would amount to, if it were all reduced to a perfect Level."

"For the Husbanding of these Mountains, their Manner was, to gather up the Stones, and place them in several Lines, along the Sides of the Hills in form of a Wall. By such Borders they supported the Mould from tumbling; or being washed down, and formed many Beds of excellent Soil, rising gradually, one with another, from the Bottom to the Top of the Mountains. Of this Form of Culture, you see evident Footsteps, wherever you go in all the Mountains of Palastine. Thus the very Rocks were made Fruitful. And perhaps there is no Spott of Ground in this whole Land, that was not formerly improved to the Production of something or other, ministring to the Sustenance of Humane Life."⁴

"For than the plain Countreys nothing can be more Fruitful; whether for the Production of Corn, or Cattel and consequently of Milk. The Hills, tho' improper for all Cattel, except Goats; yett being disposed into such Beds, as are before described, served very well to bear Corn, Melons, Gourds, Cucumbers, and such like Garden-Stuff; which makes the principal Food of these Countreys for several Months in the Year. The most Rocky Parts of all, which could not well be adjusted in that Manner for the Production of Corn, might yett serve for the Planting of Vines and Olive-trees, which delight to extract, the one its Fatness, the other its sprightly Juice, chiefly out of such dry & flinty Places.”⁵

“And the Great Plain joining to the Dead Sea, which by reason of its Salt-ness, might be thought unserviceable both for Cattle, Corn, Olives & Vines, had yett its proper Usefulness for the Nourishment of Bees, and for the fabric of Honey; of which Josephus gives us his Testimony: And I have reason to beleieve it; because when I was there, I perceived in many Places, a Smell of Honey and Wax, as strong as if one had been in an Apiary.”⁶

[13v] “Why then might not this Countrey very well maintain the vast Number of its Inhabitants; being in every Part so productive of either Milk, Corn, Wine, Oil, or Honey, which | are the principal Food of these Eastern Nations? The Constitution of their Bodies, and the Nature of their Clime, inclining them to more Abstemious Diet, than we use in England and in colder Regions.”⁷

The Author of the Bibliothèque adds, That what is written by Mr. Reland upon the Barrenness of Judæa now, and its Fruitfulness in ancient Times, n'est pas moins Judicieux que temple d'Erudition, as full of Judgment as it is of Learning. And therefore Lett us now go to Mr. Reland, who instructs us in such things as these.⁸

The Waters and Fountains of Palæstine were sufficient for the Occasions of the Inhabitants; and the plentiful Rains which fell there, had also Cisterns præpared for the Reception of them. For this Cause Procopius of Gaza præfers Palæstine unto Egypt, where such Rains were wanting; – Arida nec pluvio supplicet herba Jovi.⁹

Be sure, for Oil and Wine we find Egypt not comparable unto Palæstine. They had Oil in Egypt, its true; as it appears from Theophrastus; But nothing so good. Hence, in Echa Rabbati we read, The Ten Tribes of old, sent Oil into Egypt. And Jerom, in his Commentary on Hosæa says, That Egypt, had its best ⁸ Michel La Roche (Bibliothèque 126) praises his Dutch colleague Adrian Reland (1676–1718), a Christian Hebraist and professor of Oriental languages at Utrecht, whose writing on the topic “is no less wise than a temple of erudition.” For the following paragraphs, Mather translates Hadriani Relandi’s Palaestina, ex Monumentis veteribus illustrate (1714), lib. 1, cap. 57, pp. 380–91.

⁹ The Latin quotation from Adrian Reland, Palaestina (1714), lib. 1, cap. 57, p. 380, which Reland attributes to the Christian sophist and rhetorician Procopius Gazæus, is actually from the Elegies (1.7, line 26) of the Roman poet Albus Tibullus (c. 54–c. 19 BCE), who in Elegiae (lib. 1, sec. 7) celebrates the triumph of Roman general Marcus Valerius Messalla Corvinus (64 BCE–8 CE) over the Aquitani of SW Gaul (27 BCE). In fanciful metaphors Tibullus compares his friend’s glorious victory to the stupendous inundations of the River Nile, which saturates Egypt’s fertile soil so that no “parched blade [of vegetation needs to] bow to Jove the Rain-giver.” See G. A. Simcox, (History of Latin Literature 1:325).

Oil from Ephraim, whose Land abounded in it. The Talmud in Menacoth, assign the best Oil more particularly unto Tekoa. And we read, There were Twenty Camels-Loads of Pure Oil, in the Annual Present of Solomon unto the King of the Tyrians.¹⁰

Egypt had no Vines, but lived on a Drink of Water & Barley, or a Sort of Beer, as we do. This is testified by Herodotus; Οἶνω ἐκ κριθῶν πεποιημένω διαχρέωνται. They lived, says he, on a Wine made of Barley. The Israelites coming out of Egypt, might well therefore be surprised with the Grapes of Canaan brought unto them. Rabshakeh owned it, A Land of Wine, & of Vineyards for the Wine-cellars.¹¹

Lett us pass to Meals and their Condiments. The Asphaltite Lake, afforded unto the People Salt enough; which Galen tells us, was the best in the World, Wheat and Barley abounded there; It is in Deuteronomy called, A Land of Wheat & Barley. And Solomon sent unto Hiram, no less than twenty Thousand Cors of Wheat at a Time: And a Cor was a Measure of Thirty Bushels. One would think, Six hundred Thousand Bushels, a pretty handsome Quantity! The Talmuds treating on the Tythes of the Fruits, & on the Rights of the Sabbatic Year; say enough upon it.¹²

Beeves, and Sheep, and Goats, and Birds, they had vast Numbers of. The Sacrifices consumed not a few. And the Pastures for feeding of Cattel, on the Eastern

10 Reland (Palaestina 380–81); Theophrastus, De Causis Plantarum (6.8; 6.12). According to Midrash Echa Rabbati (fol. 85.3), aka. Eichah Rabbah (JE), one of the oldest haggadic expositions of the book of Lamentations ascribed to R. Kahana and first published in Pesaro, Italy (1519), the Ten Tribes “exported [olive] oil to Egypt and brought back foodstuffs which they sent to Babylon [Assyria], so that if their enemies should advance, these [‘Egyptians and Assyrians’] should come to their assistance” (IV.17, and notes 3, 4), in Soncino Midrash Rabbah. Lamentations (IV:20). Jerome (on Hos. 12:3) praises the oil of Ephraim, in Commentariorum in Osee Prophetam Libri Tres ad Pammachium, lib. 3 (PL 025. 0923C). Quoting the Mishnah, tractate Menachoth (8.3), Abba Saul, in Babylonian Talmud, tractate Menachoth (85b), insists that the small town of “Tekoa [Hos. 1:1] ranks first for the quality of its oil.” According to 1 King 5:11, King Hiram of Tyre gave Solomon 20,000 measures of wheat and 20 measures of oil annually.

11 Reland (Palaestina 381); Herodotus, Historia (2.77, line 14), knowingly relates that Οἶνω δὲ ἐκ κριθῶν πεποιημένω διαχρέωνται “The wine they use is made of barley.” See also Theophrastus, De Causis Plantarum (6.15). The Assyrian messenger Rabshakeh (both a place name and the title of an ancient cupbearer) tells the Israelites not to listen to Hezekiah but to enter into agreement with the king of Assyria and henceforth enjoy “a land of corne and wine, a land of bread and vineyards, a land of oile Olive, and honie, that yee may live, and not die” (2 Kings 18:31, 32).

12 Reland (Palaestina 381); Galenus (De victu attenuante 43, line 3). Deut. 8:8; 1 Kings 5:11. According to CBTEL, a kor כֹּר (Gr. κόρος), signifying “round vessel” and “measure,” amounts to 10 ephahs, or baths, containing 6.25 bushels, or 220 liters. Following 1 Kings 5:11, Reland (380) speaks of “quotannis 20000 coros tritici” (“a quantity of 20,000 coros”), which in Mather’s fortuitous calculation signifies five times more than seems warranted. On the various types of cereal and fruit offerings, see especially Mishnaic tractates Terumoth, Hallah, Orlah, Bikkurim, as well as Menachoth, in The Mishnah (52–66, 83–98, 491–513). For the Sabbatic Year, see tractate Shebiith (The Mishnah 39–52).

Side of Jordan, and Sharon, and the Fields about Lydda and Jamnia, and elsewhere, were enough to rear Herds & Flocks innumerable.

Jordan, and the Sea of Galilee, abounded with Fish: and so did many Rivers. From the Mediterranean Sea also, they carried Fish, even to Jerusalem; where we therefore find a Fish-Gate belonging to the City.¹³

Here was a Plenty of Honey, besides what the Bees carried home to their Hives. The Woods were full of it. The Trees yeilded it. Reland will have This to be, the Μέλι αγριον that John the Baptist subsisted on; and not, as Bochart would have it, such as had been deposited by the Bees, in their Collections.¹⁴ Tis mentioned by Diodorus Siculus, who says of the Nabateans, They had απο των δενδρων, born from the Trees a Plenty of Honey, which they called Μέλι αγριον, and of which they made a Drink mingled with Water. Dioscorides mentions the Ελαιομελί of Syria. Pliny says, Eleomeli ex ipsis Oleis manta. And elsewhere, speaking of the Syrian Eleomeli, he says, Manat ex Arboribus pingue, Crassius melle, Resina tenuius, sapores dulci. Reland thinks this was the Honey, whereof Maundril perceived the Flavour.¹⁵

The Palmtrees of Judaea are celebrated in Ancient Writings. Pausanias mentions their εδωδιμον καρπον. While Strabo denies to those of Egypt any καρπον ευβρωτον. Horace talks of the Pinguia Palmeta, in his Countrey. Theophrastus writes of those here, which were the only ones capable of being præserved.¹⁶

¹⁶ Reland (382). Whereas Pausanias Graecia descriptio (9.19.8, line 2) mentions that the palm trees bear ἐδωδιμον καρπὸν “edible fruit,” Strabo (Geographica 17.1.51, line 2) denies that the Egyptian palms bear καρπὸν εὐβρωτον “fruit that is good to eat.” Horace (Epistularum Liber Secundus 2.184; Epistles 2.2.184) speaks of “rich palm-groves,” which the Roman vassal King Herod I, the Great (c. 74–4 BCE) had planted near Jericho. Finally, Theophrastus (De historia plantarum 2.6.8) tells us that of the many kinds of fruits in the region, “the only dates that will keep, they say, are those which grow in the Valley of Syria, while those that grow in Egypt and Cyprus and elsewhere are used when fresh” (Enquiry Into Plants 2.6.8.141).

The Balsam (Tree, shall we say, or Shrub,) that grew about Jericho, in the Valley of Aulon, is commemorated, by him, and by an Army of other Authors. Dioscorides and Pliny, as well as Josephus, affirm, the Balsam grows here, & no where else. Tis no Confutation of this, that Prosper Alpinus and Peter Bellonius, affirm, That now it grows not in Judea, except it be cultivated in Gardens, and | that the Nations now fetch it from Arabia. Soyls may in Seventeen hundred [14r] Years have some Changes upon them.¹⁷

The Flax and the Wool of Judea, we have heard of.¹⁸

But what shall we say? We are sure, that Judea had, as Josephus is not the only Author that assures us, A vast Plenty of People. And these were a People not much given to Merchandise, but must subsist mostly on the Produce of their Country. So it must be a Country whereof the Fertility must be admirable.¹⁹

The Soyl of Palestine, its Mountains and Valleys, and Shores on Salt-Water, and Banks on Fresh-Water, are to be considered. The Words of Dionysius Halicarnasseus in his Roman Antiquities; L. i. admiring the Land of Italy, might be used much more to applaud the Land of Judea: but I shall not be at the Pains to transcribe them; nor describe the Pure Air of his Country, præferrible to what Theophrastus finds in Egypt.²⁰

What Josephus relates concerning the Fertility of this Country, may be relied upon; for he had more Witt than to write, what Millions of People then Living would have known to have been a Falsehood. Among other things, he says, ενεργος ὁλη και συνεχης εστι καρποφοροι

Tota culta, et fructuum ferax.

The Talmuds tell us wonderful things upon it.²¹

17 Reland (383). Dioscorides Pedanius (De materia medica 1.19.1), Pliny (Natural History 12.54.115–123), and Josephus Flavius (Antiquities 14.4.1; 15.4.2) – all mention that balm grows near Jericho. In his Dialogus de balsamo (Venice, 1591), cap. 7, fols. 23^v–25^r, the Venetian physician and botanist Posper Alpinus (1553–1617) draws on Pierre Belon du Mons (Petrus Bellonius Cenomanus), who provides a detailed description of the aromatic balm (balsam; Fr. Baume) in his Les Observations de plusieurs singularitez (1554), liv. 2, ch. 39, pp. 110^v–111^v. However, he remarks that without cultivation it no longer grows in Judea (liv. 2, ch. 86, p. 144^v). See also Sir Thomas Browne's Certain Miscellany Tracts (1681), tract 1, item 34 (Works 3:253–53); Humphrey Prideaux's The Old and New Testament connected (1718), vol. 2, part 2, bk. 6, pp. 435–36 (“Anno 63. 20 Reland (384–85). Mather's partiality for the Land of Milk and Honey notwithstanding, Dionysius Halicarnassus (Antiquitates Romanae 1.36.3, lines 4–1.37.2, line 1) begs to differ: “I am not unaware that I shall not be believed by many when they reflect on Egypt, Libya, Babylonia and any other fertile countries there may be. . . .” Yet, “I am persuaded that Italy enjoys this universal fertility and diversity of advantages beyond any other land” (Roman Antiquities 1.36.3, p. 117). Be that as it may, Theophrastus Eresius (De causis plantarum 6.18.3) sings Egypt's praise.

21 Reland (385–86). In his De bello Judaico (3.44.2–3), Josephus Flavius argues that no matter what people say about Galilee's size, ενεργος ὁλη και συνεχης εστιν καρποφορος, tota culta, et fructuum ferax, it is “all capable of cultivation, and is everywhere fruitful” (Wars 3.3.3; see

There was an Aristæas, an old Gentleman quoted by Josephus and Eusebius, who mightily cries up the Incomparable Fertility of this Countrey. To him we might join Hecataeus Abderites, who says, That the Jews possessed near Ten Times three hundred thousand Acres, of as Fruitful a Soyl as was to be found any where on the face of the Earth; And Polybius, who tells, what an easy Subsistence the Army of Antiochus found in the Northern Parts of it.²²

In Tacitus, we find the Uber Solum, of this Countrey, celebrated, with Ammianus Marcellinus, tis, Cultis abundans terris et nitidis. Jerom, who was an Inhabitant of Bethlehem, in his Commentary on Ezekiel, speaks of it as an undoubted Thing; Inclutam esse Terram Judea, et cunctis Terris fertilior.²³

But unto the Reports of the Sacred Scriptures; 2. King. XVIII.32. Isa. XXXVI.17. Num. XIII.28. Zech. VII.14. Gen. XLIX.11. Deut. VIII.7. Exod. III.8. Ezek. XX.6. Joel. II.3. (And of these profane Writers,) there are those who will needs oppose the Reports of the modern Travellers; That a great Part of the Countrey is now horrid Rocks and Swamp. There are few cultivated Fields; Rivers and Fountains, almost None.

But it must be considered, That since the Jews are for their Sin driven out of their Land, the Land it self must carry Marks of the Divine Indignation upon it; And especially since the Times of that which we call, The Holy War; when the Countrey has become a perpetual Theatre of Desolations. Lett the best Countrey in the World become Deserted, and what will become of it? In a Word, also 3.3.2–4 and 3.10.8). R. Johanan asked the wise men of Israel why the region of the Sea of Gennesaret is called Kinnereth: They answered, “Because its fruits are sweet like the music of a harp [kinnor]” (Babylonian Talmud, tractate Megillah 6a).

22 Reland (386–87). Josephus (Antiquities 12.2.2–5; Against Apion 1.12, 22; 2.4) mentions Aristeas, one of King Ptolemy Philadelphus’s “most intimate friends” or body guards, who is sent to bring “first-fruits” to the Temple in Jerusalem. This Aristeus does not appear to be the same as the famous writer of the so-called “Letter of Aristeas” (KP 1:555–56), who relates to his brother Philocrates the miraculous translation of the Septuagint. This latter Aristeas mentions how the inhabitants of Samaria and Idumaea bestow much labor on their soil which, in turn, is highly productive (“Letter of Aristeas” §§ 107–114). Eusebius Pamphilus (Preparation for the Gospel (8.2, 4, 5, 9); Hecataeus Abderita (Fragmenta [Jacoby], vol. # F 3a, 264, F, fragm. 6, lines 40–51), extant in Diodorus Siculus (40.3.7–8), reports that during the conquest of Canaan, Moses annexed much land and divided it up among the people in equal lots, forbidding them to sell the land to others. Finally, Polybius (Histories 5.71–72, 79) relates how the Seleucid King Antiochus III, aka, the Great (c. 241–187 BCE), vanquished the cities of Samaria (218–17 BCE) and was able to feed his troops without problems in his campaign against Ptolemy IV Philopater (221–204 BCE) (KP 1:388).

23 Reland (387–88). Cornelius Tacitus (Historiarum 5.6) praises the health of the inhabitants of Palestine, and relates that even though it rarely rains, “the soil is fertile.” So, too, Ammianus Marcellinus (Roman History 14.8.11) explains to Caesar Flavius Claudius Constantius (c. 325–54 CE) and Consul Gallus that Palestine “abounds in cultivated and well-kept lands.” But St. Jerome clinches the argument in his Commentariorum in Ezechielem Prophetam (lib. 6, col. 188A), on Ezek. 20:5–6 [PL 025.0188A], adducing his proof that “the land of Judea is celebrated for all its fruitful soil.”

This Countrey is now given up to those whom our Bible calls by the Name of Locusts; and what can be expected there?²⁴

Indeed, Strabo does not well agree with Moses, in what he writes about Part of this Countrey. But this is not the only Instance, of the Mistakes, whereof Strabo is guilty when he has the affairs of Judea before him. And if we should grant him, the Soyl about Jerusalem for Sixty furlongs, to be υποπετρον, a Rocky Soyl, it signifies nothing to prove that it must be Barren; and, I pray, what signifies This, for the rest of Palæstine?²⁵

And now, Master Reland, I thank you, for the Help you have afforded us on this Occasion.²⁶

Q. Fed thee with Manna.] What saies the Great Salmasius (as they call him,) about the Manna? v. 15.

A. Salmasius, in a Treatise on Purpose about Manna, saies abundance, to prove, that the Manna, which God sent unto the Jewes, differed not in its Form or Substance, from that which commonly fell in those Countreyes, and still falls at this Day. But the Miracle about it, consisted, in the Lords giving it in such Quantities and Proportions, & every Morning, and at all Seasons. This made it a Divine Manna; for the common falls, but a little of it, and only at some Times in the Year.²⁷ | But such Insinuations as those of Monsr. Saumaïse, ought to be ²⁴ Reland (388–89). Rev. 9:3: “And there came out of the smoke locusts upon the earth, and unto them was given power, as the scorpions of the earth have power.” By these locusts of the fifth trumpet, Mather more than hints, are meant “the Turks and Saracens,” and has Matthew Poole’s Synopsis Criticorum (4:1792–93) and its worthy authorities to prove it.

well examined before they be entertained. There is a latent Venom in them. And anon, we shall have a Detestable Toland come, and make Nothing of the Great Works done by the Glorious GOD, for the People whom He distinguished with peculiar Displays of His Providence and His Government.²⁸

²⁸ To Mather, Masius's naturalist explanation smacks of the Deist dismissal of biblical miracles, as for instance in John Toland's Christianity not Mysteriorious (1696), esp. sec. 3, ch. 4, §§ 69–76, pp. 150–57; and in his Hodegus. Or, The Pillar of Cloud and Fire (1722). According to Toland, miracles are little more than natural occurrences of which causes we are ignorant. For a contemporary response to Toland's naturalist explanation in Hodegus, see "Occasional Annotation, VI," in Bibliotheca Biblica (1722), 2:166–79. On Toland, see J. Champion, Republican Learning (2003). In his "Note Book of Authors and Texts" (Deut. 8:18), Mather recommends "Collings, thirteen Sermons, p. 45"; i.e., "Sermon III. Deuteronomy 8:18," Thirteen Sermons Upon Several Subjects. London, 1684. pp. 45–62, by John Collinges, D. D. (1623/24–1691). An ejected clergyman, graduate of Emmanuel College (Cambridge), vicar of St. Stephen (Norwich), and later a commissioner at the Savoy Conference. After the Restoration of King Charles II, he was ejected but continued preaching to various groups of Independents and Presbyterians. Various lawsuits and controversies marked the remainder of his life until James II's Declaration of Indulgence (Liberty of Conscience) in 1687, which allowed Collings to work for the establishment of the United Brethren, the union between Congregationalists and Presbyterians until his death in 1691. See S. Wright, "Collinges, John (1623/24–1691)."

Q. The Sons of Anak; are there any Remembrances of those Anakims, among the ancient Gentiles? v. 2.

A. There are. 'Tis probable, that the Tyndaride or Διοσκουροι, whereof Tully will inform you, that there were more than Castor and Pollux, that were called by that Name; who, by the Greeks were called, Ανακες, had their Name from those Great Men, who were the Offspring of Anak.

These being, by Joshua, driven out of Palæstine, when hee overcame the Countrey, it is likely, went into Greece; and from them, the Ανακες of Athens and Sparta descended.

Probably, the Name of Ανακτες, hence also came to bee given unto great, principal, eminent Men.¹

Q. The Golden Calf, we find here, Burnt with Fire, and Stamp'd & Ground very small. Here our Adversaries think, they find a great Advantage against these Holy Writings; Forasmuch as all the Experiments made upon Gold, even by keeping it whole Months in our Strong Fires, have alwayes hitherto taught us, that it can only be melted, and not burnt in such a Manner as to be Beaten into Dust? v. 21.

A. The Incomparable Dr. Nieuentyt, adds to the Answers which the Learned have made unto this Exception.²

First, Tho' Gold in itself & alone, be incombustible, and incapable of being reduced by our Fire into such a Condition as to be stamp'd into Dust, yett the Chymists all know, it may be done by the Addition of some other Matter. They colour Glass, & counterfeit Jewels, by mixing of Gold with them; & make them looke like Rubies. These, together with the mixed Gold, can be beaten to Powder. Now it is not said, that Moses used no Additional Matter, to bring the Gold unto such a State.³

¹ John Edwards, Discourse Concerning the Authority (1693), ch. 6, pp. 193–94, supplies Mather with the entire paragraph including the reference to Tully Cicero's De natura deorum (3.21.53). According to Cicero, the ancient Greeks employed various titles of honor to the Dioscuri [Διοσκουροι], the sons of Jupiter: "The first set, called Anaces at Athens, the sons of the very ancient King Jupiter and Proserpine, are Tritopatreus, Eubuleus and Dionysus. The second set, the sons of the third Jove and Leda, are Castor and Pollux." Plutarch (Theseus 32.2.1–4 and 33.1.3) associates armies of the Tyndaridae (Dioscuri) with Castor and Pollux, who came against the city of Athens. See also Simon Patrick's commentary on Deut. 9:2 (Deuteronomy 135). Mather thus validates the biblical account of the giant Anakim with parallels in classical literature even as he underscores the euhemeristic origin of pagan deities. See Harry Clark Maddux, "Euhemerism and Ancient Theology."

² Mather also praises Dutch anti-Cartesian scientist Dr. Bernard Nieuwentijdt, aka. Nieuwentyt or Nieuentyt (1654–1718), whose 3-vol. The Religious Philosopher (Amsterdam, 1717; London, 1718–19) Mather also cites in his Manuductio ad Ministerium (1726), p. 51, in BA (1:327–28, 667), and elsewhere. In Religious Philosopher (1718), vol. 2, Contemplation 20, secs. 16–17, pp. 562–64, Nieuwentijdt argues that contrary to those who claim that Moses could never have pulverized Aaron's Golden Calf, Enlightenment science proves that this precious metal can be amalgamated with glass and thus ground to dust.

[16v] But then, Mr. Tschirnhaus, the Inventor of some late Burning Glasses, | relates, in the History of the Royal French Academy, 1699. That all Metals, being placed in the Focus of the Burning-Glass, will run into Glass; and Gold in its Vitrification, assumed a fine Purple Colour there.⁴

Mr. Hombergh in his Observation upon Gold, in the pure Fire of the Sun, 1702. shoves, that by the Collection of the Rays of the Sun, in a Focus, or very near it, Gold is evaporated, and is turned, partly into Fumes, and partly into Glass; The Author calls it, A Real Conversion of this heavy Metal, into a lighter Glass.

Now certainly, upon such a Vitrification, Gold may be stamp'd & ground unto Dust.⁵

We need not say, That Moses did make Use of such a Burning-Glass. The first mention we find of these Instruments, is made by Aristophanes; But they were very Imperfect Things. However, we may say, He might have the Knowledge of such pure and strong Fires, as are in the Rays of the Sun thus collected.⁶

3 Nieuwentijdt (2:562).

4 Nieuwentijdt (2:563) quotes from “Effets des Verres Brulans de Trois ou Quatre Pieds de Diametre,” by the German physicist, mathematician, and philosopher Ehrenfried Walther von Tschirnhaus (1651–1708), who developed optical lenses for “burning glasses” (magnifying glasses) and methods of making porcelain by vitrifying a mixture of silica (quartz) and the clay mineral kaolin (NDB). Von Tschirnhaus’s article on the vitrification of glass appeared in the famous French scientific journal Histoire de l’Academie Royale des Sciences Année 1699 (Paris, 1702): 90–94 (my page reference is to the third edition, published in 1732). Like the German monthly Acta Eruditorum (1682–1782) and the English Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society (1665–), the French Histoire de l’Academie Royale (1666–1793) was among the most distinguished scientific journals of the time. An abridgment of the Histoire (1699–1720) was translated into English by John Martyn and Ephraim Chambers, and published as The Philosophical History and Memoirs of the Royal Academy of Science at Paris (1742).

5 Nieuwentijdt (2:563–64) refers to the Dutch-German natural philosopher, physician, and alchemist Wilhelm Homberg (1652–1715), who (like von Tschirnhaus and his peers) experimented with transmuting inferior metals into gold and in the process made many significant discoveries in the emerging science of chemistry. Nieuwentijdt appears to have in mind Homberg’s two-part article “Essais de Chymie. Des principes de la Chymie en general” and “Sel principe Chymique,” in Memoire de l’Academie Royale, appended to Histoire de l’Academie Royale des Sciences. Année MDCCII. Third edition (1743): 33–52, esp. 43–44 (second series of pagination). More specifically, Homberg’s article “Sur la Vitrification de L’Or,” in Histoire de l’Academie Royale des Sciences. Année MDCCVII. Third edition (1730): 30–31, describes the vitrification of gold.

6 Nieuwentijdt (2:564) here draws on the anonymous article “Sur les Verres Ardents des Anciens,” in Histoire de l’Academie Royale des Sciences. Année MDCCVIII. Third edition (1730), pp. 112–15, esp. p. 113, which extracts a passage from the French translation of Aristophanes’s comedy The Clouds (lines 765–772) to demonstrate that the magnifying and burning virtues of rock crystals (“burning glasses”) were known to the ancients. See also Pliny’s Natural History

Q. Moses prays, That the Lord would not Look unto the Stubbornness of the People, nor to their Wickedness, nor to their Sin. What may be the special Import of each of those Words? v. 27.

A. Stubbornness may relate unto the evil Disposition of their Minds; Wickedness may relate unto their undutiful Murmurings. And, Sin, to their Idolatry; which is often in the Scripture called by the peculiar Name of Sin; It being the Highest Provocation, from whence there sprang all Manner of Impiety. Thus tis said of Jeroboam, He made Israel to sin.⁷

(36.67.199; 37.10.28). Thus drawing on cutting-edge scientific accounts, Mather as a physico-theologian validates the letter of the biblical story.

Q. It is here said, The Children of Israel took their Journey, from Beeroth, of the Children of Jaakan, to Mosera; There Aaron Dyed, & there he was Buried. v. 6. Whereas, if you turn to the Thirty Third of Numbers, you'll find Aaron Dyed & was Buried in Mount Hor, which was at least Seven Mansions distant from Mosera. And there is another Difficulty; in that here the Israelites Journey from Beeroth of the Children of Jaakan, to Mosera, whereas there the Israelites Journey from Moseroth to Bene Jaakan. How will you Reconcile this Business? v. 6.¹

A. Not as Capellus & Grotius do; by reckoning this Text, among the Ἀδιάλλακτα, which cannot be solved without granting an Error in the Scribes.²

² Matthew Poole provides the standard synopses of the contemporary debate and its combatants on Deut. 10:6 in his magnificent Synopsis Criticorum (1:778–779). In their annotations on Deut. 10:6, both the French Huguenot Ludovicus Capellus (Critica Sacra [1650], lib. 6, cap. 7, sec. 11, p. 413) and his distinguished Dutch colleague Hugo Grotius (Opera Omnia Theologica 1:86) argue that irreconcilable problems (Ἀδιάλλακτα) or errors occur at this point, stopping short of arguing that the text of the Hebrew Pentateuch is corrupted. The Samaritan Pentateuch (edited by Jean Morin) did not become widely available in Western Europe until its first publication in Guy Michel Lejay's Paris Polyglot (1645) and in Brian Walton's London Polyglot (1657).

But this Way; First Mosera was a certain Place in Mount Hor: it was a Tract in the Desert of Moseroth, where the mountainous Parts of Hor made a Figure. The very Name of Moseroth in the plural Number, shewes that there were several Mosera's. And this Mosera in Deuteronomy is to bee distinguished from the Mansion in that Part of Moseroth mentioned in the Book of Numbers. Consult, if no more, yett the Jewish Aben Ezra, & the Christian Varenius, upon this Point of Geography. And then, you must note that the Beeroth [or, Wells] of the Children of Jaakan, are not the same with the City of those Bene Jaakan. The Sons of Jaakan had Remarkable Wells of Water, a considerable Way from their City; and the Israelites might very easily sitt down, first at Beeroth Benejaakan then at the Mosera of Mount Hor, where Aaron dyed; and afterwards go from a Station in the Wilderness of Moseroth, to Benejaakan itself.³

Q. How comes in this Passage here; There Aaron died, and there he was buried; and Eleazar, his Son, ministred in the Priests Office in his Stead? What Connexion ha's it with the Context? v. 6.

A. Dr. Patrick, in his Commentary on Deuteronomy, saies; All the Satisfaction that he can give to it, is This. Moses having told them, that he putt the Tables, of the Testimony, or Covenant into the Ark, as a Token that God was Reconciled unto them; and that they still were there as the Lord commanded, he putts them out of all Doubt of it by telling them, that tho' Aaron, (who had the special Care of the Holy Place, and all things in it, committed unto him) was Dead, yett Eleazar his Son, was alive still, who was able to testify, that those Holy things remained, as when Moses first placed them there. He had been consecrated unto

3 R. Aben (Ibn) Ezra (Commentary on the Pentateuch 5:46–47) draws attention to this confusion and offers various explanations of Deut. 10:6. “This verse is inserted here because Moshe had said ‘I also prayed for the sake of Aaron at that time’ [9:20]; Scripture accordingly informs us that Aaron did not die, until the fortieth year.” Furthermore, Ibn Ezra argues that “Our ancestors asserted [Palestinian Talmud Yoma 1:1 (38b)] that they [Israelites] backtracked to a previous encampment.” However, this explication, the venerable rabbi objects, does not jibe with the place reference “there” in the comma “there Aaron died, and there he was buried.” Thus, the solution offered by the Sephardic R. Isaac ben Yehudah ibn Ghiyyat, who translates “there” as “then” (as in Gen. 49:24) does not satisfy either. “But in my opinion,” Ibn Ezra concludes, “none of this is needed,” because “Beerot-Bené-Yaaqan is not the same as ‘Bené-Yaaqan’ [Numb. 33:31],” just as “Moserah is not the same as ‘Moserot’ [Numb 33:30],” for “Beerot-Bené-Yaaqan is another name for Qadesh, and Moserah is the name of the desert region surrounding Mount Hor.” See also Manasseh ben Israel’s similar solution in his Conciliator (1633, 2000), part 1, quest. 169 (Num. 33:31, 37 & Deut. 10:6), pp. 270–72, which rehearses the same debate. Well, there it is. The German Lutheran theologian August Varenius (1620–84), professor of theology and Hebrew at the University of Rostock, published widely. The most likely text to which Mather refers is Varenius’s Decades Biblicae, In V Librum Mosis. Qui Deuteronomium (1675), an examination of difficult places in the fifth book of Moses. See also Wells, Historical Geography of the Old Testament (1711) 2:96–162.

the Priests Office, instead of Aaron; and in this very Mount, (Num. 20.25, 26.) which is the Occasion of mentioning that Station here, when most of the rest are omitted.⁴

Q. Upon that Expression, What doth the Lord thy God Require of thee? v. 12.

A. Dr. Gell does laboriously solicit, for the Term [Entreat] rather to be used here, than the Term, [Require.]

The Latin Criticks distinguish peto, and, posco, and postulo. Petimus prece. This is the Act of an Inferior. Poscimus pro Imperio. This is the Act of a Superiour. Postulamus Jure. The Demand is an Act, that is common to all who have any Right.⁵

Dr. Gell observes; that the Word [Require.] answers to the Two latter Significations.⁶ Whereas, the Glorious God, who has the most Sovereign Authority over His Creatures, and an independent & undisputed Right unto them, yett here, does not so much as poscere, or postulare, but, perere; he does Intreat, and Beseech. Oh! The wonderful Condescension of the most High God. This Text will be admirably illustrated by comparing it, with, 2. Cor. V. 20.⁷

Q. Remarks on that Expression, As the Stars of Heaven for Multitude? v. 22.⁸

A. It is very sure, That such a Multitude of Stars could not be seen in the Heavens, while they had not the Use of Telescopes. Hipparchus, in his Catalogues of Stars, has transmitted unto Posterity, the Number of 1026. Our Great Astronomer Hevelius, increased them to 1888.⁹

⁴ Simon Patrick, Commentary upon the Fifth Book of Moses, Called Deuteronomy (London, 1700), pp. 147–48.

⁶ See Appendix A.

⁷ Robert Gell, on Deut. 10: 12 (Sermon XV), in his Essay toward the Amendment (1659), pp. 683c–e, 684b. See also Mather’s gloss on 2 Cor. 5:20 (BA 9:352).

Johannes Hevelius's telescope (46 m long), from Hevelius's Machinae Coelestis. Pars Prior: Organographiam, Sive Instrumentorum Astronomicorum omnium. (Gedani, 1673). (fold-out between pp. 410–11).

But the Telescopes have now discovered, That the Milky Way is formed from a Collection of numberless little Stars; which is found also true in the Southern Magellanic Little Clouds.¹⁰

It is also found, as Mr. Huygens observes, That for one Star that we see with the Naked Eye, several others offer themselves unto the Telescope.¹¹ According to the Remarks of Cherubin d'Orleans; In the only Constellation of Orion, more

Royal Society of London, and councilor to King John II Sobieski of Poland, added more than six hundred new stars he discovered with the help of his Keplerian telescope. In his Catalogus Stellarum Fixarum (1687), posthumously published in his Prodromus Astronomiae (1690), Hevelius listed a total of 1564 stars – not 1888 as Mather (via Nieuwentyt) claims. Mather provides considerably more detail on the number of stars discovered by ancient and modern stargazers in his Christian Philosopher (“Essay 3: Of the Fixed Stars”).

¹⁰ See also Mather's Christian Philosopher, p. 29.

Stars, and according to the Observations of Rheita, related by Zahn, Twice as many, shew themselves, as are seen by the Eye only in the whole Heavens.¹² Tho' we don't say with Jordanus Brunus, That the Number of the Stars is Infinite, yett the modern Observations, by the Help of Instruments, assures us, That there is no counting of them.¹³

The Incomprable Dr. Nieuentyt, sais upon it; "Lett an Infidel tell how it is, that Moses, if he had not been divinely Inspired, could have pronounced the Stars to be Innumerable; since it was so many Ages after, that this excessive Multitude has been, upon the Discovery of Telescopes, experimentally known to Mankind?"¹⁴

12 In his La Dioptrique Oculaire (1671), the French Capuchin friar and astronomer Michel de Lassere (1613–97), better known by his nom de plume Le Pere Cherubin d'Orléans, describes his improvement of existing telescopes. His invention of the binocular microscope is described in his De Visione Perfecta (1678). In La Dioptrique Oculaire, he details the techniques and tools used in grinding lenses for telescopes. The venerable Cherubic friar relates the discovery of a greater number of stars in the constellation Orion, in his La Dioptrique Oculaire (1671), pars 3, sec. 9, p. 270, and sec. 11, ch. 1, p. 313. Mather (via Nieuwentyt's Religious Philosopher 3:819) alludes to Anton Maria Schyrllaes Rheita (1597–1660) of Bohemia, a Capuchin priest and astronomer living in Ravenna (Italy). Rheita invented an optical device which greatly improved the Keplerian telescope. He describes his invention in his Oculus Enoch et Eliae sive Radius sidereomysticus (1645). In 1642, Rheita publicized his observations on sunspots and was subsequently involved in a dispute with Galileo Galilei and his fellow astronomers about mapping the terrain of the moon. The German astronomer and mathematician Johannes Zahn (1641–1707), canon of Oberzell monastery, considerably improved the camera obscura, an optical device instrumental in developing photography, and devised the first hand-held binoculars (1702). Mather alludes to Zahn's Oculus Artificialis Teledioptricus, sive, Telescopium (1685), p. 209. Zahn's Specula Physico-Mathematico-Historica Notabilium ac Mirabilium Scien-dorum (1696) is a hodgepodge of natural history and mathematics. For useful background, see R. Taton et al., eds. Planetary Astronomy from the Renaissance to the Rise of Astrophysics (1989).

13 Even though he was well familiar with Bernard le Bovier de Fontenelle's popular Conversations on the Plurality of Worlds (1686), Mather implicitly denies Giordano Bruno's controversial claim of cosmic pluralism, a limitless universe filled with an infinite number of stars and galaxies. For this and other heresies Jordanus Brunus, i. e., Giordano Bruno (1548–1600), was executed by burning at the stake (1600). Christiaan Huygens, too, looks diffidently at Bruno's theory of innumerable galaxies in his ΚΟΣΜΟΘΕΩΡΟΣ [Cosmotheoros] (1698), bk. 1, p. 138, yet Nieuwentyt is convinced that "modern Observations made by the help of these Instruments [telescopes] does sufficiently evince, that the Stars are not to be counted" (Religious Philosopher 3:820). Mather's erstwhile friend and correspondent William Whiston postulates, in his Praelectiones Astronomicae (1727), scholia 3, p. 23, § 7, that the ever increasing number of fixed stars discovered through telescopes could never be counted.

14 Bernard Nieuwentyt, offers his teleological proof in his popular Religious Philosopher (1718), vol. 3, secs. 50–51, pp. 819–20.

Q. Egypt is called, A Land watered with the Foot. After what Fashion was that Watering managed? v. 10.

A. Philo describes it. He calls it, An Helix. This ὑδρηλὸν ὄργανον, or, Water-Work, hee saies, hath in “the Middle of it, certain [βαθμοί:] Degrees, which the Husbandman ascends, when he waters his Fields. But they are so made that hee must Necessarily fall: Nevertheless that he may not fall Immediately, he laies hold on the Next Stay, with his Hands, wherewith he supports his Body. In the mean, holding fast with his Hands, hee falls to Work with his Feet; The Hands do the Work of the Feet, & the Feet of the Hands. With the Feet he works, with the Hands he stands.”¹

Vitruvius makes mention of this Instrument; and saies, Pinnae quaedam cogere versari rotam et sine operarum calcaturâ ipsius Flumine impetu versatas, praestare quod opus est ad usum.²

I don’t perfectly comprehend Philo’s Engine. But I can easily understand, that when Water is carried in the Hands of People, to their Gardens, the Land is watered with the Feet of the Carriers.³

Q. What Account, about the Watering of Egypt, is given by the Ancients? v. 10.

A. Pliny mentions, the Rigua Nili, which were the little Rivers, and the διώρυγες, or Cutts, made to derive Water from the Nile, into Places at a distance

¹ Mather translates the entire paragraph from Philo Judaeus, De Confusione Linguarum (10.38.3–9), On the Confusion of Tongues (10.38), in Works (237). Mather’s holograph manuscript reads ὑδρηλὸν instead of ὑδρηρὸν, i. e., hydrostatic.

² The Latin passage quoted from Vitruvius Pollio’s De Architectura appears in several variants and adaptations. For instance, Ludovicus Elzevir’s widely available 1649 Amsterdam edition of De Architectura (10.10, p. 217) differs from the adaptation cited by Mather and from the standard 1934 Loeb edition of De Architectura (10.5.1). The Latin passage signifies, “certain paddles, which are being turned by the force of the river, cause the wheel [hydraulic screw] to turn without workmen to tread the wheel and supply the force needed for its use.”

from it, as it is observed by Salmasius upon Solinus. Hesychius calls them, δοχὰς ὑδάτων, Receptacles of Water, Ditches, or Dikes, or Canals.⁴

The Words of Strabo may serve as a good Commentary upon the Words of Moses.

[18v] “Nature, saies he, does much for Egypt, by the Nile; but Industry and Art about that River does a great deal more. For the higher it flowes, the more Ground it naturally Waters, & makes Fruitful. Ἀλλὰ ἡ ἐπιμέλεια πολλάκις καὶ τῆς φύσεως ἐξίσχυσεν ἐπιλειπούσης κλ. But Industry sometimes hath prevailed, when Nature hath failed: insomuch, that as great a Part of the Countrey hath been watered, in the smallest | Rise of Nile, as in the highest, which was effected, διὰ τῶν διωρύγων, καὶ τῶν παραχωμάτων, by the Cutts and Banks, which were made by Art.⁵ For before the Time of Petronius, he saies, there was the greatest Fruitfulness, when the Nile rose Fourteen Cubits; and when it Rose only Eight, there was a Famine. But in the Time of his Government, there was as great Plenty, when it rose only Twelve Cubits; and no Man felt any Want, when it rose only Eight. This was by the Care and Industry of the People, who were forced also sometimes to carry Water from these Cutts, as well as from the River, in Vessels, to moisten the Ground, when the Mudd left by the Nile was baked into a Crust, by the great Heat of the Sun.”⁶ So that the Ground of Egypt, might properly be said, to be, watered by the Foot, as we water our Gardens, when there wants Rain.⁷

Q. How is it said, That Gerizzim, and Ebal, were over against Gilgal? When Gilgal is intended? v. 30.

4 Patrick (Deuteronomy 160). Pliny the Elder describes the harmful impact of salt on the quality of water for drinking and irrigation (Natural History 31.52.29). The “Rigua Nili” are rivulets or tributaries to the Nile. So, too, Strabo (Geographica 16.1.9, lines 18–19) speaks of the “trenches” and “canals” cut into the Nile to divert its waters for irrigation. The superb commentary Plinianae exercitationes in Caii Iulii Solini Polyhistora (1629), fol. 588D, by the learned French classical scholar Claudius Salmasius, is the source for both Mather and Patrick on the canals and ditches cut into the Egyptian Nile to water the fertile region; Hesychius, the lexicographer of Alexandria, defines δοχὰς ὑδάτων as εὐρίπους (εὐριπος), as a “canal” or “ditch” – cut into rivers for irrigation purposes.

5 According to Strabo (Geographica 17.1.3, lines 54–55), plenty of rain and rising rivers watering the fields foster more crops, “but diligence has oftentimes, even when nature has failed, prevailed.” Mather’s ἐπιλειπούσης from ἐπιλειπω (via Patrick) should read ἐπιλιπούσης (has failed). Strabo (Geographica 17.1.3, line 57) continues, arguing that fields can be irrigated “through the means of canals and embankments.”

6 Strabo remembers (Geographica 17.1.3) that before the time of Gaius Petronius, Roman prefect of Egypt (25–21 BCE) – not his namesake, the author of Satyricon – the Nilometer on Elephantine Island, measuring the annual flood levels of the Nile, could thus forecast the bounty (or lack thereof) of seasonal harvests.

7 Patrick on Deut. 11:10 (Deuteronomy 160–61). See also Henry Hammond’s annotations on Psal. 1:3, in his Paraphrase and Annotations Upon the Books of the Psalms (1659), p. 7 (col. 2).

A. The Jewes, do all seem to understand it, of that Gilgal, which Israel took, the first Night after their Passage over Jordan. [Josh. 4.19.] Josephus reports that Gilgal to bee distant only Fifty Furlongs from Jordan; But the Gemarists, to fix Gilgal unto Gerizzim and Ebal, according to these Words of Moses, do make it more than Fifty Miles. They say, The Journey at this day, was more than Sixty Miles, from Jordan to Gilgal.⁸

But certainly, saies Dr. Lightfoot, The Gilgal whereof Moses here speaks, is to bee understood, of some other, than that which Joshua [ch. 5.9.] named so.⁹ For, when Moses uttered those Words, the Name of Gilgal, near Jericho, was not at all. Nor can that which wee read, [Josh. 12.23.] about, The Nations of Gilgal, bee applied unto that Gilgal, when it had obtained that Name. Therefore, in both Places, by Gilgal, seems to bee understood, Galilee. The Names are of a near Sound, and of the very same Root. And in Joshua, when some Kings of certain particular Cities in Galilee, are enumerated, as, Kedesh, Jokneam, Dor, the King of the Nations of Gilgal, is one who Ruled over many Cities in Galilee. The LXX therefore do so render it. And what Josephus calls, Arbel a City of Galilee, the Book of Maccabees, makes to bee in Galgala, or, Gilgal.¹⁰

⁸ Gilgal is generally believed to be near Mts. Gerizim and Ebal, near Shechem, yet the Gemarists (the rabbinical commentators on the Mishnah) disagree, arguing the reference applies to the region of Gilgal, in a different location. According to Soncino Babylonian Talmud, tractate Sotah (33b), R. Judah agrees with his peers that what is meant is “the land of the Canaanites which dwell in the Arabah – i. e., mount Gerizim and mount Ebal where the Cutheans [Samaritans] dwell. Over against Gilgal – [this means] near Gial.” According to the modern Soncino annotator, this Gial is not the one “east of Jericho, but another place of that name identified with Juleijil, east of Mt. Gerizim.” Much the same can be found in R. Solomon Jarchi (Rashi), Commentarius Hebraicus in Pentateuchum Mosis (1710), fol. 1361 (notes † and 104). See also Jerusalem Talmud, tractate Sotah (7:3). Josephus (Antiquities 5.11.1); R. David Kimchi, on Josh. 4:19, guestimates the distance as more than 60 miles, which the invading Israelites travelled that day, in Mikraoth Gedoloth: Joshua (26). See also Mather’s gloss on Josh. 5:9 (BA 3:92–93).

Q. It is here said, The Nations served their Gods under every green Tree. Can you in Antiquity find any good Commentary upon it? v. 2.

A. Lett Pliny be a Commentator upon Moses. In the Twelfth Book of his Natural History, concerning Trees, he begins thus; Hæc fuere Numinum Templa;

“Those were the Temples of the Gods; and even now, the simple People, after the ancient Rites, dedicate unto God, such Trees as excel the rest. Nor do we more adore the Images glittering with Gold and Ivory, quàm lucos, et cuijs silentia ipsa, than we do the Groves, and the solemn Silence therein.”¹

He then reckons, what Trees were peculiarly sacred unto Jupiter, Apollo, Minerva, & the rest; concluding, That several of their Gods, and some of the Nymphs, had their Names from the Woods.

This was a thing so notorious, that in their most sacred Solemnities, they were wont to present the Gods whom they worshipped, with a Crown, or Garland, made of the Boughs and Leaves of such Trees, in which they were thought to Delight. As, to Jupiter, a Crown of Oak; to Apollo, a Laurel; to Minerva, of Olive; to Venus, of Myrtle; to Bacchus, of Ivy; to Rhea, Pan, Neptune, and Vulcan, of Pine, etc.²

Q. The Place which the Lord your God shall chuse, to cause His Name to dwell there.] Why would not the Lord please any wherein His Law, to declare where that Place was to be; but tho’ He often determined them to One Place, yett He leaves the Place undetermined? v. 11.

A. Maimonides imagines, it may be for Three Reasons.

First, Lest the Gentiles might gett Possession of it, and make War upon that Account.

Secondly, Lest they in whose Hands it was, might endeavour to destroy it.

¹ Pliny (Natural History 12.2.3) relates that in times immemorial, trees “were the temples of the deities” and that the Romans show more obeisance to their images of gold and ivory “than to the groves and the solemn silences they contain.”

² Pliny (Natural History 12.2.3–4) is Patrick’s source for his annotation on Deut. 12:2 (Deuteronomy 172–73. Patrick also draws on Ezechiel Spanheim’s annotations on the Hymn to Diana (v. 200), in his “Observationes in Hymnum in Dianam,” In Callimachi Hymnos Observationes (1697), p. 264.

And, Thirdly; [which is the truest Reason,] Lest every Tribe should be desirous, to have it in their Lott, & Strife should arise among them about it.³

³ Maimonides, on Deut. 12:26, in his Liber מורה נבוכים [More Nebuchim] Doctor Perplexorum (3.45.475) and Guide of the Perplexed (3.45.576). Patrick (Commentary 180).

Q. A Remark on, Thy Friend which is as thy own Soul; putt in the last Place? v. 6.

A. I'll transcribe the Words of Dr. Patrick, in a Funeral-Sermon.

"A True FRIEND may sometimes be more dear, than the nearest Relation which we have; and there is a Friend that sticks closer than a Brother,¹ or whatsoever Name of Love there is in the World. And therefore it is observable, that in Deuteronomy, he is putt in the last Place, as the Chiefest of all Relations. – It is very cleer, that Moses rises up by Steps, from the Lowest to the Highest; from a Brother, to a Child, and then to a Wife, and at last to a Friend; as the Highest of all. And it is likely cleer, that a Man and Wife are but One Flesh, but a Man and his Friend are One Soul: and therefore, unless They be Friends, as well as Man and Wife, there is a greater Love than Theirs: But when both of these conspire together, the Relation of a, Friend, & of Consorts too, then it is the highest of all Love, and the Image of the Love that is between CHRIST & His Church."²

Q. Entice thee secretly. – A Difficulty rises here: How to prove a Man guilty, who enticed another secretly, and not before Evidence? v. 6.

A. The Jews make this Answer. He who was enticed was to dispose in a secret Manner some, who should ly conceled near the Place of the next Meeting, & overhear the whole Conversation, & be able to give in their Testimony before the Judges.³

[20v] Yett, if upon Admonition, | the Enticer desisted, & came to Repentance, and came over to the Worship of the true GOD, the Evidence might then desist from giving in the Information.⁴

² Although the funeral sermon preached by Simon Patrick remains unidentified, his anonymously published Advice to a Friend (1673), ch. 10, pp. 211–34, develops much the same theme.

³ See Patrick, on Deut. 13:9 (Deuteronomy 201), and John Selden's De Synedriis Veterum Ebraeorum Liber Tertius (1655), lib. 3, cap. 6, pp. 72–80.

Q. It is required, Thou shalt truly Tythe all the Increase of thy Seed. – It may be edifying to know, the Manner of their Tything? v. 22.
A. Here is a Synopsis, by Sixtinus Amama, taken out of Scaliger, which may a little Illustrate it unto us.¹

The Husbandman had growing,
In one Year,	Bushels,	6000.
Hee paid unto the Priest, for the First-Fruits of the Threshing Floor,	}	Bushels. 100.
There now remained unto the Husbandman,	Bushels,	5900.
He paid for the First Tithe, to the Levites,	Bushels,	590.
Hereof, the Levites paid the Priests, the Tithe of the Tithes.		59.
There now remained unto the Husbandman,	Bushels	5310.
He paid hereof a Second Tithe,		531.
There then remained unto the Husbandman,
as his own, –	Bushels	4779.
The Summ of both Tithes joined together, is,	Bushels	1121.
This is above a Sixth Part of the whole namely Nineteen out of an Hundred. ²

² Amama here leans on Joseph Justus Scaliger’s “Diatriba de Decimis in Lege Dei,” in Scaliger’s Opuscula Varia Antehac (1610), pp. 61–70. The original of the Hebrew-Latin table, of which Mather provides his translation, appears in “Diatriba De Decimis” (p. 65), via Amama’s Commentariolus (1618). See also Amama’s annotation on Deut. ch. 26, in Criticorum Sacrorum Sive Annotatorum ad Pentateuchi Tomum Primi Pars Secundi ad Leviticum, Numeros et Deuteronomium (1660), fol. 213 (third ser. pag.).

Q. Some Remark, if you please, on that Passage, The Tithe of thy Corn, of thy Wine, and of thine Oyl? v. 23.

A. The Observation of R. Bechai upon these Words, is a little curious; but, as Dr. Patrick notes, it has a great deal of Truth in it. If thou pay the Tithe, saies he, then it is Thy Corn; if thou do not, then it is my Corn, and not thine. [Compare, Hos. 2.9.] They forfeited the whole, who did not pay the Tenth, which was the Rent, that God reserved unto Himself.³

R. Bechai observes, The Law is very merciful. For the Fashion of the World, is, if a Man have Ground of his own, to lett it out unto Tenants, for a Third, or an Half, or at what rate he pleases. But it is not so, with the Almighty, whose the Earth is, & who makes it fruitful; He requires but One Part of Ten, for His own Uses.⁴

Q. The Tithes are here demanded from the Israelites, on that Consideration; That thou mayst learn to fear the Lord thy God alwayes. What is the Connexion? v. 23.

A. By these Tithes were supported the Levites, who were the Teachers of the People, and were to instruct them in what belonged unto the Fear of God, & His True Religion.⁵

Q. A Remark upon that; That the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the Work of thy Hand, which thou doest? v. 29.

A. In the Midras Tillim, there is a Note of R. Eliezer, not unworthy to be considered.

Nonne benedicet tibi, Quamvis fortasse otiosus sederis? Minimè. Nam expresse dictum est, IN OMNI OPERE MANUS TUÆ. Si operam suam navaverit, erit

³ R. Bechai, i.e., R. Bachya ben Asher (Torah Commentary 7:2529) glosses the text as follows: "It is only 'your' grain harvest, if you tithe it; if not it is 'My' grain harvest. The same applies to the grape harvest and the 'oil' harvest. This interpretation is based on Hoseah 2, 11 [2:9]: 'Assuredly I will take back My new grain in its time and My new wine in its season, etc.'"

⁴ Patrick, on Deut. 14:23 (Deuteronomy 218–19). Rabbeinu Bachya cites a midrashic approach from Yalkut Shimoni (892): "it is customary that when a person rents a field he has to give the owner at least a third or even half of the harvest. Seeing that we are 'renting' the land from G'd and He provides rain clouds, dew, manure, etc., and demands only 10 % of the harvest as His due we really have nothing to complain about" (Torah Commentary 7:2527–28).

⁵ Patrick (Deuteronomy 218) comes to a different conclusion: "This [Deut. 14:23c] cannot be meant of the Tithe paid to the Levites; of which the People were not to partake: but only the Priests, to whom the Levites were to give a Tithe. Therefore it must be understood of the second Tithe, separated (after the other was paid) for this holy use.

Benedictus; Sin minus, non erit Benedictus. It seems, we may not expect the Blessing of God, in a Way of Idleness; but in the Way of the Work of our Hand.⁶

Q. How is it said, Thou shalt sacrifice the Passeover unto the Lord thy God of the Flock, & the Herd? Certainly, the Lamb of the Passeover, could not be changed into any thing of the Herd? v. 2.

A. Moses here speaks compendiously, of the Passeover itself, & all the Sacrifices for the Days of Unleavened Bread annexed thereunto.

Dr. Gell propounds therefore, that the Word, [of] be left out.¹

Q. Why is Unleavened Bread, called, Bread of Affliction? v. 3.

A. Because tis a Sort of Bread, that they who are Afflicted with Poverty, by reason of pressing Hunger, do eat; not staying, or able to stay, until it be Leavened.

You may add, if you please; It is Insipid, and sits heavy on the Stomach.²

Q. It is said, Thou shalt rejoice in thy Feast, thou and Thy Son and thy Daughter, and thy Man-Servant & thy Maid-Servant. Was there any Imitation of this among the Pagans? v. 14.³

A. There was the like Law at Athens; where (as Macrobius tells us) King Cecrops ordained, the Master of every Family, should after Harvest, make a Feast for his Servants, and eat together with them, who had taken Pains with him, in Tilling of his Ground; Delectari enim Deum honore Servorum, contemplatu Laboris; For God is Delighted in the Honour done to Servants, on Consideration of their Labour.⁴ This, tis likely, he might learn of Moses; for he reigned at Athens, much about the Time that Israel came out of Egypt; Eusebius affirms, He was the first, who taught the Greeks, to call God, by the Name of Ζεῦς, which we may interpret, The Living God.⁵ Tho' there he seems a little mistaken; For Pausanias more than once, tells us, He was the First, who Διὰ ὀνόμασεν ὕπατον, called, Jupiter, by the Name of The most High. The same we read in Cyrl, against Julian.⁶

1 Robert Gell, An Essay toward the Amendment (1659), p. 695*b*, is one of the first to publish a whole book on problematic translations of the King James Bible of 1611.

2 Patrick (Deuteronomy 237).

3 Patrick (Deuteronomy 242).

4 The Roman historian Macrobius Ambrosius Theodosius, in his Saturnalia (1.10.22), praises the serpentine King Cecrops, the Greek mythical founder of Athens, for his humane treatment of his servants. Mather provides the translation of the Latin quote.

5 Eusebius Pamphilus (Praeparatio evangelica 10.9.486 cd) and Preparation (2:521).

6 Pausanias (Graecia description 8.2.3, lines 2–3) argues Cecrops was the first Διὰ τε ὀνόμασεν ὕπατον πρώτος “to name Zeus the Supreme God.” The Patriarch Cyrillus Alexandrinus (Contra Julianum 1.11, lines 13–14) says much the same in his debate with Julian the Apostate.

Q. Judges and Officers; what {is} the Difference between Schofetim, and Schoterim? v. 18.⁷

A. Moses de Cotzi, makes the former, [Judges,] to be Senators in the several Courts, who decided the Causes: And the latter [Officers] to be no more than Ministers attending the Court, for to keep the People in Order with a Staff and a Whip; & execute the Decrees and Orders of the Judges; And they were appointed, not only in the Court, but also in the Street, looking after Weights and Measures, in the Market, and correcting Offenders.⁸ Maimonides also makes them the same with our Apparitors; or those who in Roman Law, are called, Officiales, as Constantine L'Empereur observes, upon Cornelius Bertram, (who mistook them for Judges;) and in the Digests, Executores; and, in the New Testament, πράκτορας, Exactors. [Luk. 12. 58.]⁹ Josephus makes them to have been Publick Criers. [Deut. 20.8. and Josh. 1.11.] But then, some of them at least, seem to have been an Honourable Sort, like our Heralds. [Josh. 23.2.] And all of them were Men of Authority, tho' but young Men, (as Maimonides describes them,) who had not attained the Age & Knowledge of the Doctors of the Law, and therefore were unfit for to be Judges.¹⁰ The Jewes place them next under their Wise Men, Mather's sources (via Patrick) are all provided in Johannes Meursius, Regnum Atticum (1633), lib. 1, cap. 9, pp. 41, 42.

⁸ In his Sefer Mitzvoth Gadol. Liber Magnus Praeceptorum (1488), a commentary on the 613 commandments in the Torah, the thirteenth-century French Tosafist R. Moses ben Jacob Cotzi (aka. Kotzensis) describes the functions of the judges and officers of a Hebrew court of law (JE). Mather (via Patrick, Deuteronomy 245) quotes from Constantinus L'Empereur ab Oppijck's Latin translation of R. Cotzi's Hebrew observation on Deut. 16:18, as reprinted in L'Empereur's "Annotationes" (pp. 362–64), appended to his edition of De Republica Ebraeorum, Recensitus Commentarioque illustratus (1641), by the French Huguenot Orientalist Bonaventura Cornelius Bertramus (1531–94).

or Doctors, and above their Scribes and Clerks.¹¹ But that they were Under-Officers & not Judges, there is a further Intimation; In that Solomon on this Account commends the Ants, that they carefully do their Business, tho' they have no Schoter over them; [Prov. 6.7.] No ῥαβδούχος or ἐργοδιώκτης to force them, or fright them unto it.¹²

Q. What was the Meaning & the Reason of that Law, Thou shalt not plant thee a Grove of any Trees, near unto the Altar of the Lord thy God? v. 21.¹³

A. Besides a proper Grove of Trees, intended in the Hebrew Name /אֲשֵׁרָה/ here used; there are diverse other Significations of the Word.

It signified, a Wooden Image of a Grove. Thus, wee choose to read it, A Grove over the Altar, in Judg. 6.25. cutt down by Gideon. Thus tis said of Josiah, in 2. King. 23.6. Hee brought but the Grove from the House of the Lord; which probably was the Sculptile Luci, by Menasseh hanged there.¹⁴

Yea, sometimes it signifies, a Single Tree, as well as a whole Grove of them. Kimchi tells us, Omnis Arbor, quæ colitur et quæ plantatur, in honorem Numinis quod colunt Idololatræ, dicitur /אֲשֵׁרָה/.¹⁵ inflict corporal punishment on all offenders. Their deeds are controlled entirely by the judges." Furthermore, "only men of wisdom and understanding, of unique distinction in their knowledge of the Torah and who possess a broad intellectual potential. [They should also] have some knowledge concerning other intellectual disciplines, e.g. medicine, mathematics, the fixation of the calendar, astronomy, astrology, and [also] the practices of fortune-telling, magic, sorcery, and the hollow teachings of idolatry, so that they will know how to judge them" (Sefer Shofetim, Mishneh Torah 23:14, 20).

¹¹ Mather's source for this passage (via Patrick 245) is "A Review," in Discourse of the Right of the Church in a Christian State (1649), pp. XCIII–CIV (sep. pag.), by Herbert Thorndike (c. 1597–1672), an Anglican theologian and biblical scholar whose defense of episcopacy provoked the ire of the members of the Long Parliament (ODNB).

¹³ The following annotations on Deut. 16:21 are extracted from John Spencer's magnificent De Legibus Hebraeorum (1685), lib. 2, cap. 16, "De lege lucos prohibente," secs. 1–2, fols. 396–401.

¹⁵ Spencer (§ 2). R. David Kimchi, ספר השרשים Sepher Hashoreschim, Liber Radicum Commentarius (1535), sign. e^{5v}–e^{6r} (voce אֲשֵׁרָה). See also Rabbi Davidis Kimchi. Radicum Liber sive Hebraeum Bibliorum Lexicon (1847), p. 30 (col. 1). Kimchi's gloss on the term אֲשֵׁרָה [asherah]

Yea, sometimes it signified, A Temple. How else could it bee said, in 1. King. 14.23. They Built Groves under every Green Tree. It is therefore a Passage of Strabo, Poetæ propter consitarum Arborum juxta Templâ perpetuam consuetudinem, omnia Templâ ἄλση καλοῦσι Lucos appellant, etiam Arboribus carentia. And so the Temple of Trivia, is in Virgil called, The Grove of Trivia. Iam subeunt Triviæ Lucos.¹⁶

Yea, Dr. Spencer finds, by comparing the Greek, with the Hebrew, of Three Texts, namely, Judg. 2.13. & Judg. 3.1. and 1. Sam. 7.4. — that the Image of Ashtaroth, or Astarte, varied less in Sense, than in Sound, (which also is very little) from the Asherah, which wee translate a Grove. And therefore the next Clause, Any Manner of Tree, is added but exegetically hereunto.¹⁷

But, if wee enquire into the Occasion of this Prohibition, wee shall find, That the ancient Idolaters did consecrate Groves unto their Gods. [Consider, Exod. 34.13. Deut. 12.3. Judg. 6.25. 2. King. 21.3. & 23.6. 2. Chron. 34.7. Isa. 17.8. & 27.9. Ezek. 6.13. 2. Chron. 17.6.] A Town in Bæotia, that had a Grove so consecrated in it, was called Ascra, as Heinsius judges from the Name Asherah used in Scripture for a Grove;¹⁸ for Hesychius interprets it, as being, δρῦς ἄκαρπος.¹⁹ It was in Cadmus his Colony. And indeed, this Religion of Groves was frequent not only in Phœnicia, from whence Cadmus traveled, but also among the Græcians, the Romans, the Germans, the Britons, and whom not? The Amenitie of Groves was one thing which decoyed, & enchanted, the Minds of Men, to worship in such Places: especially in Countreyes where the Sun gave much Heat unto the Climate. They chose these Places, tis said, in Hos. 4.13. Because the Shadow thereof is Good. And so saies the Poet, Lucus in urbe fuit media, letissimus umbra.

Hic Templum.²⁰

explains that “Every tree that is cultivated and propagated from cuttings in honor of god and devoted to idolatry is called /asherah/.”

16 Spencer (397, § 3) cites Strabo (Geographica 9.2.33, line 5), arguing that “the poets embellish things, calling all sacred precincts near temples ‘sacred groves,’ even if they are bare of trees.” Virgil (Aeneid 6.13) has Aeneas and his shipmates dock on the shores of Euboean Cumae, and “now they pass under the grove of Trivia,” where in Virgil’s day stood the temple of Diana.

17 Spencer’s argument (397, § 4) about the similarities of sound between Hebrew and Greek is based in the then still regnant belief that all languages derive from Hebrew, the language of paradise as spoken by Adam and Eve. See BA (1:433, note 29; 1:728–29, 810–16), D.C. Allen, “Some Theories” (5–16), and P. Rossi, Dark Abyss of Time (195–206), 18 Spencer, De Legibus, lib. 2, cap. 16, sec. 2, fol. 398) affirmatively cites Aristarchus Sacer, Exercitationes (1627), cap. 1, p. 21 (sec. pag.), by Daniel Heinsius, professor of classical languages at Leiden, that the name of the Boeotian city Ascra was derived from the Hebrew word asherah (grove).

19 Spencer (398); the Alexandrian lexicographer Hesychius (Lexicon [A–O], alphab. letter alpha, entry 7719, line 1) defines it as a “barren tree.”

20 Spencer (398, 399). According to Herodotus (History 2.145), Cadmus (mythic founder of the Boeotian Thebes) is to have lived “sixteen hundred years before my [Herodotus’s] time” (c. 2,000 BCE). Herodotus credits Cadmus for having introduced the Phoenician alphabet to Greece (History 5.58). On the goddess Astarte adored in groves (Asherah), see John Selden’s

Whereof the Trees of these Groves, were for the most Part, as tis reported by Cyril of Alexandria, Not fruit-bearing ones, ἀλλὰ μόνον τέρψεως χάριν, ἄκαρπα ξύλα. Solummodò, delectationis causâ ligna infrugifera. And Origen has the very same Words, in his Illustration upon those Words of Jeremiah, *under every Green Tree.*²¹ To Justify, whose Account, wee have Herodotus, long before them, describing these Trees, as οὐρανομήκεα δένδρεα, Arbores in Cælum enutes. These caliginous Places, as they were a thousand Ways accommodated unto the absurd & obscæne Rites, with which the Divel was worshipped, so the very Procerity, and Antiquity of the Trees, with the Silence among them did naturally begett in Men, a sort of Devout Veneration. Ovid therefore mentions a Grove, under this Character,

*Quo possis viso dicere, Numen inest.*²²

And Seneca, saies, Illâ proceritas Sylvæ, et Secretum Loci, et Admiratio umbræ, in aperto tam densæ atque continuæ, fidem tibi Numinis facit. And Virgil sings,

*Hoc Nemus, hunc (inquit) frondoso vertice collem,
(Quis Deus, incertum) habitat Deus.* – ²³

Tis likely, that a special Respect unto Groves might have an Innocent Original. Wee may carry it as high as Abraham, who served God in one, and was there visited by the Angels of God. It is therefore a Passage of the most learned Huet, who saies of Abraham, *Ex Nemore quod plantavit in Bersabee, ut invocaret ibi Nomen Domini, propagata videtur apud Ethnicos, lucorum ad profanos Deorum Cultus et Sacrificia conserendorum consuetudo.*²⁴ Yea, what if wee should carry it as High as Adam. It is Mr. Medes Observation, That as God placed Man at first in a Grove, so Men afterwards chose Religiously to plant Groves for God. There

De Diis Syris Syntagmata II (1617), synt. 2, cap. 2, pp. 142–71. Virgil (Aeneid 1.441) has Aeneas marvel at Queen Dido's mighty Carthage, where stood Juno's temple: "Amid the city was a grove, luxuriant in shade, the spot" where stood Juno's shrine.

²² Spencer (399); Herodotus (Historiae 2.138, line 17) mentions the "trees towering to the sky" alongside the road leading to the temple of Hermes. Ovid (Fasti 3.296) celebrates the oaken grove of Aventine (one of the Seven Hills of Rome), "at whose sight you might say, "There is a spirit here."

was herein a Commemoration of Paradise, which was a Grove. And so saies Cluverius, Lucorum consecratio ex vetustissimo more, atque adeò ab ipso Adamo, profluxit. But Idolatry in later Ages, making these Groves to become the meer Stows of Divels, the Lord forbad any further Use of them in Worship, among His People.²⁵

Tis very certain, That Groves were, for the most Part consecrated unto the Worship of Baalim, that is to say, of Dead Hero's. Hence wee find Graves joined so often with Groves, in the Scripture. [See 2. King. 23.15, 16. and Isa. 65.3, 4.] Hence Virgil saies,

— Luco tum fortè parentis
*Pilumni Turnus Sacrata valle sedebat.*²⁶

So Cicero saies, Vos Albani Tumuli, atque luci, | vos inquam, imploro atque obtestor. And the old Pagans, imagined that the Ghosts of their Dead Friends, did Inhabit Groves; [23v]

Nulli certa Domus, lucis habitamus opacis, saies the Poet.²⁷

And Servius, upon those Words of the Poet, Lucus in urbe fuit, makes the Annotation, *Ubicumque Virgilius lucum ponit, sequitur consecratio. Dicuntur enim Heroum Animæ lucos tenere.*²⁸ Wherefore Nic. Perot observes well, That a Grove is not Cæduus ut Sylva, but rather, *Manu consitus Religiosusque, et alicui Deo, vel alicujus Hominis cineribus consecrates;*²⁹ that it was therefore either circa

²⁶ Spencer (lib. 2, cap. 16, sec. 3, fol. 402, § 1); Virgil (Aeneid 9.3) has Prince Turnus, leader of the Rutuli of Latium, valiantly fight against Aeneas's Trojans intent on settling in Latium. Imploring the goddess Juno for help, Turnus is “seated within a hallowed vale, in the grove of his sire Pilumnus,” when his prayers are answered by a messenger from the gods.

²⁹ The second-hand Latin quote (via Spencer 402) derives from “Notae in Martialis” (lib. 2), probably deeply buried in Cornucopia seu Latinae Linguae Commentarii (1529), by the learned Italian humanist, grammarian, and archbishop of Siponto, Niccolò Perotti, aka. Nicolas Perot (1429–80). Perotti's study on the evolution of modern Latin was highly esteemed, and his posthumously published Cornucopia (1499), which includes detailed notes on Marcus Valerius

Delubra, or, circa Sepulchra; and that it was called Lucus, à Luce Sacrificiorum. This gives you the Reason, why Baalim, and Groves, are so much together in the Bible. And for this Cause, it was that the Cypress Tree was præferr'd for Groves, a Tree from all Antiquity much concerned in Ceremonies about the Dead.

It is also certain, that the Heathen chose Groves to worship in, for the Conveniencies which they had therein, to practise all such Libidinous Rites as did use to accompany the Worship of Bacchus, Venus, Priapus; & the other unclean Divels, by whom they were led. [See 1. King. 14.23, 24.] And unto this Purpose Dr. Spencer translates, 1. King. 15.13. Insuper, et Maacam Matrem ejus, amovit, nè esset princeps, in Sacris Priapi, et luco eius quem consecraverat.³⁰ Those Groves were the Brothel-houses, where the Heathen did securely committ, all their Religiosa Delicta, as wee may after Cyprian, call them. Compare Isa. 57.4, 5. Inflaming yourselves (that is, to Venery) with Idols, under every Green Tree. And Jer. 2.20. and Hos. 4.13, 14. Thus Eusebius writing of a Phœnician Grove, saies, It was a Σχολή κακοεργίας, A School of Wickedness, opened unto all Impure Men, for them there to corrupt their Bodies.³¹ And Horace could style these Places, Parum castos lucos. Now, the Lord would have no Obscurities of Groves about His Altars, because, as Philo expresses it, verum Templum non postulat Amenitates, sed severam castimoniam.³²

Martial's Epigrams and other works, was highly prized; it went through numerous editions and reprints. Mather's contemporary Pierre Bayle reviews Perotti's accomplishment in his Dictionary historical and critical of Mr. Peter Bayle (1737) 4:585–88. See also J. P. Sullivan, Martial (265–66). At any rate, Mather (via Spencer and Perotti) tells us that a grove is not “fit for cutting, as a wood” but rather “planted by a pious hand and consecrated to some god, or to the ashes of a man”; that it was therefore either “near the shrines, or near the graves”; and that it was called “grove” from the light of sacrifices.”

30 Spencer (403 § 2) glosses, “Moreover, he [King Abijah] also removed his mother Maakah, so that she should not be chief in the sacred rites of Priapus and his grove, which she had consecrated.”

31 In his “Epistola Prima. Ad Donatum” [PL 004. 0212A], St. Cyprian (Cyprianus Carthaginiensis) complains about the “religiosa delicata” of the pagan gods depicted in various stages of consummating their lusts: “Men imitate the gods whom they adore,” Cyprian knowingly relates, “and to such miserable beings their crimes become their religion” (“Epistle I,” sec. 8, in ANF 5:277). Not to be left out on this topic, Eusebius Pamphilus of Caesarea denounces the licentious practices of the pagans (Vita Constantini 2.55.3, lines 1–2). In his The Life of Constantine the Great (3.55), Eusebius is dismayed at the sexual rituals performed at Aphaca (Phoenicia): In the grove dedicated to the fertility goddess Venus, men give themselves to effeminate practices: “It was a school of wickedness for the votaries of impurity, and such as destroyed their bodies with effeminacy. Here men undeserving of the name forgot the dignity of their sex, and propitiated the demon [Venus] by their effeminate conduct; here too unlawful commerce of women and adulterous intercourse, with other horrible and infamous practices, were perpetrated in this temple as in a place beyond scope and restraint of law” (NPNFii 1:534–35).

32 In his Carminum 1 (Ode 1.12.59–60), Horace invokes the wrath of Saturn, who will “parum inimica mittes fulmina lucis” “hurl your bolts of wrath upon groves that are ritually polluted.” In Mather's adaptation (via Spencer 403), Horace styles pagan shrines “polluted groves.” Writing in Greek, Philo Judaeus in his De specialibus legibus I (13.74) reminds his fellow

Yea, It is further certain, That at last, the very Trees themselves in the Groves became the Object of Worship, among the miserable People. Such was the Sottishness of Idolatry. Curtius affirms of the old Indians in the East, *Deos putant quicquid colere cæperunt; Arbores maximè, quas violare, capitale est.*³³ And so Theophylact bewails it, that Mankind was arrived unto such Madness, ὥστε καὶ δένδροις ὠραίοις, δια τὸ κάλλος δύνειν, *ut Arboribus speciosis, ob pulchritudinem, sacrificarent.*³⁴ And Zonaras relates, that even as late as the Dayes of Justinian, there was this Ethnicism still used, ἄλση καὶ τὰς ὕλας ἐσέβοντο, *Lucos Sylvasque colebant.*³⁵ They would Solemnly Devote a Tree, to such or such a Deity; and then adorn the Tree with Garlands and Candles; and make their Vowes at it, & hang up their Votiva Tabellæ there; & there deposit the Spoils of their Enemies; and Inscribe the Names or Images of their Gods thereupon, & reckon it the horriblest Crime imaginable to violate it. For the mentaining of this Idolatry, they had those Creatures which are called, in 1. King. 18.19. The Prophets of the Groves. Gutherius mentions an old Inscription to one, BETUO SACERDOTI LUCORUM, which will a little give Light unto this Matter.³⁶

And thus at last, Idols and Groves, grew in a Manner synonymous; & are in the Scripture putt one for another.

When you have laid all these Things together, you'll see, why Groves came to bee so Inhibited.³⁷

Romans that unlike the groves and temples of pleasure dedicated to their gods, an edifice which is "truly a temple [like that in Jerusalem] does not aim at pleasure and seductive allurements, but at rigid abstinence" (Works 541). Mather's Latin citation (via Spencer) is derived from the Latin translation Philonis Iudæi scriptoris eloquentissimi gravissimique libri quatuor (1553), translated by John Christopherson (d. 1558), the learned English Bishop of Chichester and examiner of several important Marian Exiles (ODNB). Christopherson's Latin translation became a standard work and was reprinted many times thereafter. My page reference is to Philo's De Monarchia, lib. 2, sign.^M (sep. pag.), in Philonis Iudæi, Summi Philosophi, Ac Scriptoris eloquentissimi (1561), tomus alter, p. 177 (sep. pag.).

33 In his Historiae Alexandri Magni (8.9, lines 34–35), the Roman historian and biographer Quintus Curtius Rufus reports that the various peoples along the Ganges (NE India) "regard as gods whatever they have begun to care for, especially trees, the violation of which is a capital offence."

34 Spencer attributes this passage to Theophylact, Commentaria in S. John cap. 4, p.m. 616, who bewails that mankind had arrived at such madness "that they would sacrifice to splendid trees, on account of their beauty."

35 The Byzantian historian and hagiographer Joannes Zonaras Constantinopolitanus (fl. 12th c.) (EB) relates in his Epitome historiarum (vol. 3, p. 250, lines 28–29) that "they were worshipping the groves and the woods" and adorned them with tablets or terracotta relief hung up in a tree or placed on a wall in gratitude for the god's answering their prayer.

36 The French jurist and historian Jacobus Gutherius, Jacques Goutière (1568–1638), wrote numerous works on ancient Roman history, law, and religious rituals. Mather's third-hand Latin quote (via Spencer 404 § 3) from a votive tablet in the grove of the goddess Diana reads, "To Betuo, Priest of the Grove," and appears in Gutherius, De Veteri Jure Pontificio Urbis Romae (1612), lib. 3, cap. 4, p. 253.

37 Here ends Mather's extract from Spencer's De Legibus, lib. II, cap. 16, fols. 396–404. On the subject of how the ancients worshipped their gods in sacred groves, see also John Selden's

*Mantissa.*³⁸

There is one, who has in a Manner mean enough, published, An Account of a Journey thro' some Provinces of Germany. 1698. From which I will however take the present Occasion to transcribe this Passage.

As they traveled along, he sais, "There were little Buildings of Brick, in which we could see thro' a Grate, there stood an Altar, and over it an Image, of the Virgin Mary. By every one of these, we should see at least one fair flourishing Tree, tho' there were not perhaps another in several Miles round about; so that we knew, and could expect before we came to it, that we should after a while see, a Chappel, by seeing at first only, the Top of a Tree. This Way of honouring a sacred Place with Trees, which were sacred too, is an old Custome derived from the Heathen, who in their Notions of the Matter had corrupted Religion; For they pretended, that a sort of Deities were lodged in those Trees, & dwelt there as long as the Trees lasted. For which, and perhaps other Corruptions, GOD forbid the Jews the Planting any Trees about His Altars."³⁹

³⁹ Mather's extract is from Theophilus Dorrington (1654–1715), Anglican clergyman and rector of Wittersham (Kent), who was known for his acerbic attacks on Independents and Presbyterians (ODNB), hence Mather's pejorative remark. His trip to the continent (1698) is recorded in his Observations concerning the Present State of Religion in the Romish Church (1699). Mather's excerpt (pp. 219–220) records Dorrington's description of the little roadside chapels or stela containing an image of the Virgin Mary or of a saint found in most every Roman Catholic region of Europe.

Q. What [is] the Reason of that Prohibition to the King of Israel, He shall not multiply Horses to Himself? v. 16.¹

A. If we should assign this for one Reason of it, That so the King & his Courtiers might præserve a due Temper of Humility, it would be countenanced in the Action of Plato, who presently Dismounted from his Horse, μή ἵπποτυφία λεφθῇ· *Ne Equino fastu corripetur.*² Or, if we should assign for a Reason of it, Ne fidat Equitatu suo, quia multus est, aut Equitibus suis, quia sunt maxime fortes; Sed Fiduciam suam habeat, in Solius Dei Nomen; we shall have Ramban to Countenance it.³ [And the Scripture too, Psal. 20.8. and Prov. 21.31. and Isa. 31.1.] Or, if we should assign this for a Reason; lest the King should make himself too burdensome unto the Subject, for the Pomp, which would soon come this Way to be occasion'd; This would have some Countenance, in the Story of Diomedes the King of Thracia, who, they say fed his Horses, with the Flesh of his People; meaning, that he exhausted their Treasures, with his Taxes, for the Maintaining of his Horses.⁴ But, finally, the chief Reason, was that which is here hinted in the Prohibition itself. Egypt was then the chief Countrey in the World, for

1 In his "Note Book of Authors" (Deut. 17:13), Mather points to "MSS. Pat. no. VIII. Sermon 9." And for Deut. 17:19, he recommends "Cripplegate Supplement, p. 161." By this cryptic reference he means Mr. Watson's Sermon VIII: "How may we Read the Scriptures with most Spiritual Profit" (Deut. 17:19), in the second edition of A Supplement to the Morning-Exercise At Cripple-Gate (1676), pp. 161–73, a collection of 31 sermons edited by Samuel Annesley (c. 1620–1696), an ejected Presbyterian clergyman, graduate of Queen's College (Oxford), doctor of civil law (DCL), sometime lecturer at St. Paul's (London), and lecturer at Salters' Hall. See "N. E. Key's "Annesley, Samuel (bap. 1620, d. 1696)." See also BA (1:948, n. 125). The following paragraphs in Mather's gloss on v. 16, including its source citations, are extracted from Samuel Bochart's Hierozaicon Sive Bipertitum opus De Animalibus (1663), pars I, lib. 2, cap. 9, col. 173.

2 In his Vitae Philosophorum (3.39, line 4), Diogenes Laertius relates that when Plato was in a fit of anger with his disobedient slave, Plato resisted his impulse of beating him because he did not want to let his passions get the better of him. The philosopher – conscious of his heroic act of self-control – reportedly dismounted from his horse because he did not want to get "infected with horse-pride."

3 Ramban, the Sephardic Rabbi Moses ben Nachmanides, glosses (Deut. 17:16) that the Hebrew Lawgiver commanded that the king "should not put his trust ... in his horsemen, because they are exceedingly mighty [Isa. 31:1], but his trust shall be in the Name of the Eternal [Jer. 17:7]" (Commentary: Deuteronomy 209–10).

4 If Pseudo-Apollodorus (2.5.8) provides a trustworthy history of Hercules's eighth labor imposed upon him as penance for killing his wife and children in a fit of rage, then Hercules (Herakles) was to bring the man-eating steeds of King Diomedes (son of Ares and Cyrene) of warlike Thracia to Mycenae. Mather's allegorical reading of the story – that the anthropophagian steeds signify the high expense of maintaining Diomedes's equestrian staples – is applicable to the Breeding of Horses. And God would mercifully forbid unto His People, the Occasions of too much Converse with the Idolatrous People of Egypt. Had an Horse-Trade been maintained between Israel and Egypt, it would have been upon many accounts, a Snare to the Religion of Israel.

The Quæstion will then be started, whether the Horse-Trade that Solomon sett up with Egypt might not be criminal?⁵

The Jewish Writers, I know, do generally condemn him.⁶ Nevertheless Bochart attempts his Vindication; inasmuch as there were then some Circumstances, that rendred Solomons Action to be not against the Design of the Law, so much as it was against the Letter of it. Hee adds, That Solomon had this Peculiarity in his Condition, that God would have him to exceed other Kings in Splendor, as a more express Type of the Messiahs Kingdome.⁷

How little Solomon after all depended on his Horses, you may gather from Prov. 21.30.⁸

the story of Solomon's own case. For the costly steeds and mares (the pride of kings) had to be imported from Egypt to supply him with horses for warfare and stately ceremonies.

5 According to Deut. 17:16, God appears explicitly to command that the king "shall not multiply horses to himselfe, nor cause the people to returne to Egypt, to the ende that hee should multiply horses: for as much as the Lord hath said unto you, Yee shall hencefoorth returne no more that way." Alas, kings need stately horses for ceremonies and warfare, and Egypt at the time appears to have been the only place from which they could have been imported. Thus, in sending horsetraders to Egypt, theologians wondered, did Solomon violate God's edict? Ancient and modern sages seem deeply divided on this issue; they fall into two basic camps of interpreters: those who insisted on a strict reading of God's proscription that no Israelite should return to Egypt (let alone live there) and those who offered broadly defined exceptions. See Poole's Synopsis Criticorum (1:809–10) and Works (8a:293–95). N. B. Mary, Joseph, and the infant Jesus, too, went to Egypt – for safety (Matth. 2:13–23).

6 Rationalist that he was, RASHI for one argued that (with Talmud, tractate Sanhedrin 21b in the back of his mind) it was not permissible, "Except as required for his riding entourage" (The Metsudah Chumash/Rashi 5:210). Nachmanides seconds Rashi's explication, adding that exceptions are to be allowed because Deut. 17:16(a) only rules out the multiplication of horses "to himselfe," for to increase the number of horses and equestrians is "the main desire of kings." In fact, says Nachmanides, Pharaoh granted Solomon "the right to export horses, meaning that he could take them out at will," sell them to kings and countries, and "keep the tax." Moreover, Solomon "also had merchants stationed in Egypt buying all horses and sending to their lord [Solomon] those that he wanted and selling the others to kings of other countries" (Commentary: Deuteronomy 5:210). R. Bachya ben Asher mostly concurs, adding that the stricture (Deut. 17:16(b)) "Yee shall hencefoorth returne no more that way," was applicable "only during the period when it was promulgated. It was intended to ensure that Israelites traveling to Egypt would not learn to copy the abominations practiced in that country ... This does not mean that there is a permanent prohibition for Jews to reside in Egypt" (Torah Commentary 7:2570). R. Abraham ibn Ezra is more careful: "Because of Solomon's need for their horses, he caused the people to sin and to return to Egypt. Obviously, it is a disgrace to return to Egypt after GOD has redeemed us from there" (Commentary 5:82).

Q. Our Lord Jesus Christ, being promised, under the Notion of, A Prophet like unto Moses, it invites mee to Request your Consideration of that Renowned Person, in his Typical Capacitie. I think, you have already given mee, all the Personal Types, which our Lord had before the Law: except you'l say, The famous & patient Job, should bee referr'd unto that Company; being sett up as a Type of our Lord, for the Gentiles to bee affected withal. And indeed, The Afflictions of Job, his profound Submission to his Afflictions, his glorious Deliverance from his Afflictions, were notable Repræsentations of what was to befall our Lord. But passing to the Personal Types of our Lord under the Law, it seems fitt, that Moses, by whom the Law came, should lead the Van; wherefore, I pray, say something of him. v. 9.¹

A. I say, That,

I. Moses was a Type of the Law.²

Indeed, the Mosaic Pædagogy, was not Really a Covenant of Works: Men were then saved, in the Wayes & on the Terms, of the Gospel; but yett there was in It, and in Moses himself, a Marvellous Figure of that Covenant.

In Moses, you may see the Terror of the Law. When the Law was given, there was a Terrible Light; Moses himself counted it so. [Heb. 12.21.] Thus, tis a Terrible Thing, to bee under the Covenant of Works.³

In Moses, you may see the Power of the Law. Wee read of Moses, at a great Age [Deut. 34.7.] His Natural Force was not Abated; Men that are under the Covenant of Works, will find the Force of it passing a Condemnation, & causing a Consternation, to the Soul, not Abated all their Dayes.⁴

In Moses, you may see the Weakness of the Law. Of Moses, wee are informed, [Num. 20.12.] That One Error, One Failing, barr'd him out of the Promised Land. The Rising Generation of Israel, committed the Same Sin, at the Same Place, for which, and at which, the Former Generation had provoked the

³ Samuel Mather, Figures (93).

Almighty to Destroy them. Hereupon, Moses was not Sinfully, & Frowardly Afraid, that God would also take the same Advantage of this Generation. For this One Mistake, was hee kept from the Canaan of the Lord. Thus the Covenant of Works, will Damn a Man, for One Miscarriage; except a Man continue in all Things. –

In Moses, you may see the Abrogation of the Law. The Body of Moses, was buried so, that it could never bee found again. Tis true, Tis Intimated that the Divel would fain have disclosed where it was, but the Archangel hindred him. The Covenant of Works ought in like Manner to bee Buried with us; Buried, not in the Grave of Moses, but in the Grave of Jesus. Tis true, The Divel would Re-vive this Covenant in the Spirits of Men, but the Saviour does oppose him in it.⁵

Lastly, In Moses, you may see the Preparation of the Law. When Moses had prepared the People for it, hee then committed them into the Hands of Joshua. This is the Business of the Law: It prepares us, for Union & Communion with our Jesus. Tis, a Schoolmaster, to bring us unto Christ. The Covenant of Works, Humbles us, Affrights us, Kills us, and so wee are made Ready a People prepared for the Lord.⁶

But besides all this, I also say, That,

II. Moses was also a Type of the Lord.

This Matter may bee thus Illustrated.⁷

The Parents of Moses, what were they? Honest, but obscure, Brickmakers. Thus, the Real Mother of our Lord; Shee was one of Low Estate. The Reputed Father of our Lord; hee was a poor Carpenter, & they say, a Yoke-Maker. When Moses was Born, what Sort of Cradle had hee? His Cradle was a Dirty, Dawbed Ark of Bulrushes. And when Jesus was Born, had Hee a better Cradle? The Of-fering of Joseph and Mary show'd their Poverty; two Doves or Pigeons was all they could bring, when a Lamb, was the least, that the more Able People offered. When the Oppression of the Egyptians, had made all Israel very low, then was Moses born; and when the Oppression of the Romans, had made all Israel very low, then was Jesus born into the World.

Pharaohs Cruelty pursued Moses, and Herods Cruelty pursued Jesus, immediately upon their Nativity. Moses was præserved by a Mother that Adopted him; Jesus was præserved by a Father that Adopted him; and in Egypt it was that this befel both of them. Wonderful Providences thus delivered Them that they might afterwards deliver other Men.

⁶ Figures (95).

⁷ For the next couple of paragraphs, Mather distills phrases and passages from his uncle's Figures (95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100). See also Laurence Howel, A Compleat History of the Holy Bible (1716), vol. 3, "The Proem," pp. xiv–vi, for a similar typological juxtaposition following hereafter.

As for Moses, hee had an extraordinary Knowledge. [Act. 7.22.] But our Lord much more. [Isa. 11.2.] As for Moses, hee had an extraordinary Vision too. [Num. 12.6, 7.] But much more our Lord. [Joh. 1.18.]

Of Moses, tis said, Num. 12.3. The Man Moses was very meek. Never did any Man Endure, and Forgive, more Injuries, than this Man did, for Forty Years together. But when the Cause of God was Concerned, and the Name of God Reproached, and the Law of God Violated, then was Moses all on a light Fire, and then hee called for a Sword. This was the Character of our Lord. [Math. 11.29.] This Lamb of God, was meek as a Lamb. When wicked Men Revil'd Him, Slandred Him, Yea, Plundered Him, and Muredred Him, all the Notice Hee took of it was, Father, Forgive them! But when the House of God was profaned, & the Work of God opposed, Hee spoke Thunder & Lightning, yea, Hee took a Scourge in Hand.

Wee have this Comparison between Moses and Jesus. [Heb. 3.5, 6.] Moses did Faithfully discharge his Trust; but Jesus does much more Faithfully discharge His, in the House of God.

There were many Lawes and Ordinances, wherein Moses instructed the Church of God. They are now Abolished by our Lord; but others are Instituted in the Stead thereof. [Heb. 3.2.] The Church of the Old Testament, was the House of Moses; and Moses as a Law-giving Mediator, ordered the Observation of many Sacraments, Caremonies, Devotions in it. The Church of the New Testament, is the | House of Jesus: To which Hee ha's enjoined such & such Methods of Devotion, as God will now Accept at our Hands. Hence now arises, this Great Principle, *That no Man, or Party of Men, may Appoint any Parts, or Means of Worship, which the Lord Jesus Christ, hath not in the Bible given a Warrant for.*⁸

It was by the Hand of Moses, that Israel was brought from the Land of Egypt, and the House of Bondage. And, by the Hand of Jesus it is, that our Souls are fetch'd from under the Calamities of a Natural Estate, & the great Pharaoh of Hell hath no more Dominion over us. [Isa. 61.1.]

It was by the Hand of Moses, that Israel was carried thro' the Howling Desert. And, by the Hand of Jesus it is, that wee are supported in all the Difficulties which here attended us. [Psal. 103.3, 4, 5.]

Of Moses, wee read, Exod. 17.11. When Moses held up his hand, Israel prevailed. Thus, our Lord, held up His Hands, while Hee was Hanging on the Cursed Tree. Hee had not a Rod in His Hand, but His Hands on a Cross, elevated for our Good. From hence ensued, a Victory over the Amalek of Hell; hence, the Success of the Armies of Israel.

⁸ On organizing a church and its discipline solely on scriptural warrant (sola scripturae) is also at the heart of Mather's Ratio Disciplinae Fratrum Nov-Anglorum (1726), art. 2, p. 34; art. 5, p. 85; and art. 8, p. 141.

When Moses was to Deliver the Law, hee Fasted Forty Dayes and Forty Nights together. Thus, when our Lord was to Deliver the Gospel, Hee also Fasted; and it was Forty Dayes with Forty Nights. Fasting must bee the Præface to weighty Undertakings!

Of the Great Moses, tis affirmed, in Deut. 34.11. God sent him to do Signs & Wonders. But it is also the Glory of our Lord in Act. 2.22. A Man Approv'd of God, by Miracles & Wonders & Signs. The Four Evangelists record about five & forty Miracles, wrought by our Saviour, in the Three Years & an Half of His public Ministry. By these was the Broad-Seal of Heaven, as it were annexed unto His Commission to bee, The Lord of all.

On a Mountain was Moses Transfigured, so that the People could not bear to look upon the Splendour and Brightness of his Face. Thus, there was a Mountain, on which our Lord was Transfigured; with a Face shining as the Sun, & a Raiment white as the Light. [Math. 17.2.]

It is reported of Moses, That hee married an Ethiopian, or more truly, an Arabian, Woman; a Proselytess of no less Piety than Quality.⁹ Shall wee say, After the Death of Zipporah? Truly, our Lord ha's now married himself, unto a Church out of the Gentile World; a Church, that may say, I am Black, but Comely.¹⁰

Finally, God, said unto Moses, Go up & Dy. Hee Goes, Hee Dies, How cheerfully! But as it should seem, quickly after, Hee Rose, Hee Ascended, the Body of Moses may bee now in Heaven, with Enoch, & Elijah there. All this befell our Jesus too; Hee Dy'd willingly, Hee Rose presently, Hee Ascended very gloriously.

If you will take the Pains to consult Antiquity, turn to Eusebius's Præpar. Evang. L. 3. and you'll find the Parallel between Moses and our Lord, excellently shown, in Sixteen or Seventeen Particulars.¹¹

But pursuing the Anthithesis, [as one Howel, ha's lately done, in a small Performance, which he calls, A Compleat History of the Holy Gospel:] you will see, how wondrously Moses was excelled by his Glorious Antitype.¹²

⁹ See Appendix A.

¹⁰ Song of Solomon (1:5).

¹² Laurence Howel's three-volume A Compleat History of the Holy Bible (London, 1716) had gone through at least four editions by the end of Mather's lifetime. Only the third volume is titled A Compleat History of the Holy Gospel (1716). Mather specifically refers to "The Proem to the New Testament (3:xiv–vi), in which Moses and his acts are programmatically juxtaposed as types of Christ and his works.

Q. Who may be meant, by him that useth Divination? v. 10.¹³

A. Of Divination there were very many Sorts. One was by raking into the Bowels of their Sacrifices, particularly, Humane Sacrifices. Yea, they offered little Children on Purpose, that thereby they might make their Auguries; as Geusius ha's observed, in his Treatise, De Victimis Humanis.¹⁴

Unto this Divination there may be a special Respect, in this Place; For, most of the Things here mentioned, are elsewhere joined, with making their Children pass thro' the Fire. [Particularly, 2. King. 21.6. 2. Chron. 33.6.] And the Prophet Ezekiel seems to intimate, that thereby they Divined, when he charges the Israelites with this Crime; [Chap. 20.26, 31.] For he adds, Shall I be enquired by you, O House of Israel? who have enquired, that is by making your Children pass thro' the Fire.¹⁵

We may add, that the Hebrew Words, Kosem Kosemim, (which we translate, useth Divination) are thought by many, to intend a Divination, by Casting or Drawing of Lotts. And as Dr. Castel observes, the Word is used in the Arabian Language, for, Distribution of Lotts.¹⁶ A Sort of Divination, much in Use 13 Patrick (Deuteronomy 285–88) is Mather's "Eleventh Muse" for all annotations on this verse (the "Tenth" being his fellow New Englander, Anne Bradstreet). In his "Note Book of Authors" (Deut. 18:10, 11), Mather lists as authoritative references "H. Mores Letter to Glanvil. p. 19" and "Dr. J. Edwards's C. P. H. T. Exercitations." The former is "D^r H. M. [Henry More] his Letter, with the Postscript To M^r J. G. [Joseph Glanvill]" (May 25, 1678), published in Joseph Glanvill's Saducismus Triumphatus (1681), pp. 19–57. In his "Postscript," the Cambridge Platonist, philosopher, and theologian Henry More (1614–1687) takes issue with The Displaying of supposed Witchcraft (1677), by John Webster (1610–1682), an English physico-theologian, alchemist, and outspoken critic of the belief in witchcraft. Like his friend and fellow theologian Joseph Glanvill (1636–1680), More belittles Webster's reading of Deut. 18:10–11 that the Hebrew phrase קוסם קסמים [Kosem Kesamim] "merely signifies 'a diviner,' or someone who 'by natural Knowledge or humane Prudence and Sagacity' can foretell the future or say soothe (Henry More, in Glanvill's Saducismus Triumphatus [1681], p. 21). Mather's latter reference is John Edwards's previously cited Exercitations Critical, Philosophical, Historical, Theological (1702), Part I, Exercitation IV: "The several Species of the Diabolick Arts" (Deut. 18:10, 11), pp. 54–70.

14 The Dutch physician Jacobus Geusius, aka. de Geus (d. 1671), studied theology and medicine at Groningen University. His 1663 inaugural dissertation on ancient religious practices, especially human sacrifice, was published in its expanded version as Victimæ Humane (1675), which went through at least three editions (BBK). Mather here refers to Victimæ Humanæ (pars 1, cap. 21, pp. 331–56; pars 2, cap. 5, pp. 103–20). See also BA (1:835).

16 Deut. 18:10. The Anglican divine and professor of Arabic at Cambridge, Edmund Castellus, D.D. (c. 1606–85), derives his translation of קוסם קסמים [qōšēm qesāmim] from the infinitive קָסַם קָסַם "to practice divination" [Strong ## 7080, 7081], in his Lexicon Heptaglotton (1669), cols. 3389–90: "Divinavit" and "Divinatio, sagacitas, oraculum." Castellus's own source among the Greeks and Romans; & probably before them, among the Nations of the Orient. Nothing is more known, than the Sortes Praenestinae, and Pativinae, among the Romans; and the Dodonaë, and Dindymenae, and many others, among the Greeks: particularly, that at Bura in Achaia, where there was a Cave, in which was the Image of Hercules;¹⁷ before which, they who resorted thither, to enquire Directions in any Case, or the Successes of any affayr, use to fall down, & say their Prayers; and after that, throw Four Dice upon the Table, and by the [26v] Letters or Marks upon which they fell, the Divination | was made; as Pausanias describes it in his Achaica. In other Places they went after a different Manner to Work.¹⁸ The Arabians divined by Arrowes, as Dr. Pocock, hath told us, but they performed it before some Idol; and therefore it was forbidden by Mahomet in his Alcoran, as a Diabolical Invention.¹⁹ Mahomet herein seems willing to have imitated Moses; who may be thought here to forbid such Kind of Divination.

It is also to be noted, That as Dr. Windet observes, out of the Sanhedrim, & Maimonides, they did use to Divine by a Dead Mans Skull. The Greeks followed is Edward Pococke's Notae in Quibus Aliquam-Multa quae ad Historiam Orientalium (1648), appended to Specimen Historiae Arabum (1650), "Notae," pp. 329–30.

17 Throughout the ancient world, centers of divination attracted many who consulted the gods for advice on any number of mundane or existential questions. Among locales in ancient Latium were the temple and grotto of Praenestina and Pativina (E of the city of Rome), Dodona and Dindymenae among the Greeks (Asia Minor), and Bura, one of the twelve cities of Achaia, where stood the temple of Demeter, Aphrodite, Dionysius, and Eileithyia (Pausanias, Graeciae descriptio 7.25.9). Just like the ancient priests of Israel who consulted the Urim and Thummim (lodged in the high priest's breastplate), pagan priests and priestesses used similar practices such as casting lots, dice, and tablets (Mather's "Sortes Praenestinaei"), shooting arrows, interpreting the flight of holy doves and eagles, listening to the sound of rustling leaves of holy oak trees, hydromancy (water divination), spells, or ecstatic visions pronounced by priests who served the ancient oracles (KP, "Orakel"). Such techniques of consulting the invisible world were certainly important to Mather and his peers, for they were directly related to witchcraft practices. See Mather's gloss on Saul consulting the Witch of Endor (1 Sam. 28:25), in BA (3:329–32) and Pierre Jurieu's Critical History of the Doctrines and Worship (1705), 2:110–15. See also Paul Wise, "Cotton Mather and the Invisible World" (227–57).

18 The Greek geographer and historian Pausanias in his Achaica, book 7 of his Graeciae descriptio (2nd- c. CE), relates that on the banks of the river Buraicus, near Bura (Achaia), a small cave was dedicated to Heracles (Hercules), surnamed Buraicus: "Here one can divine by means of a tablet and dice. He who inquires of the god offers up a prayer in front of the image, and after the prayer he takes four dice, a plentiful supply of which are placed by Heracles, and throws them upon the table. For every figure made by the dice there is an explanation expressly written on the tablet" (7.25.10). Sir James G. Frazer's detailed annotation on this topic, in Pausanias's Description of Greece (4:172–74), is well worth consulting.

19 In his "Notae" on his Latin translation of Gregorius Abdul-Farajus's De Origine & Moribus Arabum, in Pococke's Specimen Historiae Arabum (1650), pp. 327–30 (Azlam = arrow), the Oxford professor of Arabic establishes that the ancient Arabs used divining arrows [Al-Azlam] to inquire the future. Three arrows, each with separate inscription ("Do," "Do not"), except that the third did not carry any message, were shot into the sky in front of their idol. Mahomet, the prophet, outlawed this practice as idolatry in his Al-Qur'ān, Sura 5 (Al-Mā'idah): "O believers, this wine and gambling, these idols, and these arrows you use for divination, are all acts of Satan; so keep away from them. You may haply prosper" (5:90).

the Custome; For Palladius relates how Macarius enquired, πρὸς τὸν ξηρὸν κρανίον. At a Dry Skull.²⁰

There were a World of other Tricks, used by the Diviners, among the Edomites, and Moabites, & other Nations, who in the Dayes of Jeremiah deceived the People with Divinations, Dreams, Prophecies, Enchantments, & Sorceries. [Jer. 27.3, 9.]

Q. Who may be meant by, A Charmer? v. 11.

A. The Hebrew, Chober Chaber, seems to import, something of a Society, or Conjunction. Some therefore translate it, A Fortune-teller, who by the Conjunction of the Planets does foretel, Secret Things; others take the Wretch, for one, who hath a Society with Evil Spirits.²¹

Job Ludolphus is thought by Dr. Patrick, to give the plainest Account of the Words; which he translates, Congregans Congregationem.²² It was an ancient Way of Enchanting, for to bring various Beasts, into one Place. The Rabbins distinguish it, into, The Great Congregation, and, The Little Congregation. The Great

²⁰ Via Patrick (287), Mather paraphrases a passage from מנחה בלילה sive ΣΤΡΩΜΑΤΕΥΣ ΕΠΙΣΤΟΛΙΚΟΣ De Vita Functorum statu (1664), sec. 1, p. 5, by James Windet, M.D. (d. 1664), an English physician, Latin poet, and friend of Sir Thomas Browne (ODNB). Windet's מנחה בלילה [Mincha belulah] is a learned epistle in Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic, and includes assorted quotations in Oriental languages that are addressed to Dr. Samuel Hall, with whom he discusses the ubi sunt of the souls (good and wicked) after the death of the body. Like Mather in his Triparadisus (112–152), Windet relegates these souls to a middle state (or “Second Paradise”), where the good and wicked souls are kept in separate aviaries of sorts before their physical resurrection at judgment day. Windet – no slouch in his knowledge of theology and ancient rituals – quotes from Dionysius Vossius's Hebrew-Latin edition of Maimonides's De Idololatria (1641), cap. 6, sec. 2, p. 74; and Babylonian Talmud, tractate Sanhedrin (65b) and Gemarah (65b). See also tractate Sanhedrin (82a). Soothsayers (Yidd'oni) and Baal worshippers communicated with demons and the souls of the dead through a variety of rituals, including consulting a human skull – an idolatrous practice punishable by stoning. Mather's third-hand Greek quotation (via Patrick 287) relating to Macarius's consulting πρὸς τὸν ξηρὸν κρανίον (“at a dry skull”) and by Patrick extracted from Windet (5) is not from Palladius Episcopus (368–c. 431), bishop of Helenopolis (Bithynia) and author of Historia Lausiaca (a historical and biographical account of the monks of Egypt and Palestine) (CE), but from Joannes Damascenus, Oratio de his qui in fide dormierunt [PG 095. 0256, lines 10–11]. It is Damascenus who loosely attributes it to St. Macarius (c. 300–391), variously called Macarius of Egypt and Macarius the Elder. Interestingly, in his Dialogus de vita Joannis Chrysostomi (67, line 8–9), Palladius Episcopus does mention the skull of a dead man found in the desert, but not Macarius himself. Palladius appears to have in mind the apocryphal chestnut of St. Macarius who, when he moved the skull in the sand with a stick, the cranium of a pagan priest began to speak to the Desert Father about the torments of hellfire to which all idol worshippers and wicked Christians are subjected. On the story of the loquacious cranium, see B. Ward's Sayings of the Desert Fathers, p. 38.

²¹ Patrick (288). Hebr. חָבַר [chabar], “to unite, join,” and “be a charmer” (Strong's # 2266).

was, when they Assembled a great Company of the Larger sort of Beasts. The Little was, when of the Less; as of Serpents, and Scorpions, and the like.²³ Telezius tells us, This is in Use at this Day, in the Eastern Countreyes. For so he describes the Election of the King of Gingir; that he stood, compassed about with Lions, Tygres, Leopards, and Dragons; which by magical Arts were gathered together, as his Guard, and Courtiers.²⁴

But the Common Interpretation, which the Jewes give of Chober Chaber, is, That he is one who makes Use of strange Words, which have no signification; but are pretended for to be of Power to charm (for instance) a Serpent, that it shall not sting; or to preserve People from some other Harm. So Maimonides.²⁵ This is a Sort of Superstition, whereto the World has been so addicted, that the Præcept of Moses could not sufficiently warn the Jewes against it; But when they threw away other Charms, they used the Words of Scripture instead of them. They would cure Wounds by reciting that Verse of the Law, Exod. 15.26. I will putt none of these Diseases upon thee. So we find themselves acknowledging, in Sanhedrim; c. 2. s. 1.²⁶

23 Patrick's third-hand source (via Ludolph's Commentarius 216) is R. David Kimchi's סֵפֶר הַשְּׂרָשִׁים עִם נִגְזָרִים [Sepher Ha-Shorashim 'im Nigzarim] Dictionarium Hebraicum, ultimo ab autore Sebastiano Munstero recognitum, & ex Rabbinis, praesertim ex Radicibus David Kimbi (1535), sign. O³, radice חָבֵר [chaber] ("incantator").

24 Patrick (288) paraphrases a passage from Hiob Ludolphus, Ad suam Historiam Aethiopicam antehac editam Commentarius (1691), lib. 1, cap. 16, p. 216, a commentary on his Historia Aethiopica (1681), a history of Abyssinia, by the German Orientalist, author of the first grammar of the Ethiopian language Amharic, and man of letters. The passage in question appears in Ludolph's commentary (p. 216) and relates the story of the African King Gingiro who – during his coronation – surrounded himself with wild animals, large and small, which he summoned by incantation. This is how the pagans practice their magic to this day, the Jesuit Father Balthasar Tellesius of Lusitania (Portugal) explains – so Ludolph, who appears to doubt Tellesius's veracity, in his preface to Historia Aethiopica, "Proemium" (9–13).

25 Maimonides Avodah Zarah (11:12–13), in Maimonides, De Idololatria Liber (1641), cap. 11, sec. 12–13, pp. 155–56. According to Mitzvah 35 (Negative Commandment): "By this prohibition we are forbidden to practice the art of the charmer (chover); that is, to recite charms which are supposed to have certain good or bad effects. It is contained in His words (exalted be He), There shall not be found among you ... a charmer (chover chaver) [Deut. 18:10–11], on which the Sifré says: 'Chover chaver means a charmer of snakes or of scorpions' [Deut. 28:11]: that is to say, he recites charms over them so that, as he fancies, they will not bite him, or, if already bitten, so as to deaden the pain." The punishment is whipping, in Maimonides, סֵפֶר הַמִּצְוֹת Sefer HaMitzvoth (35 neg.), Commandments (2:35).

26 In the Soncino Babylonian Talmud, tractate Sanhedrim (101a), R. Abba is quoted as saying, "it is written, I will put none of these diseases upon thee, which I have brought upon the Egyptians, for I am the Lord that healeth. But since He hath brought no [disease], what need is there of a cure? He replied: Thus hath R. Johanan said: This verse is self-explanatory, because the whole reads, And he said, if thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God: thus, if thou wilt hearken, I will not bring [disease upon thee], but if thou wilt not, I will; yet even so, I am the Lord that healeth thee."

Maimonides condemns this; For, saies he, *the Words of the Law are turned hereby to another Use, than God intended in them; which was not for the Healing of the Body, but the Curing of the Soul.*²⁷

It is as great a Crime, to use the Schem Hammephorash, to such Purpose tho' the Jewes are so wicked as to think, that Moses wrought all his Miracles by the Vertue of it. Maimonides indeed, had the Sobriety to reject this vain conceit of his Countreymen.²⁸

[3798:]

Q. Who, the Necromancer?²⁹

A. The Woman whom Saul consulted, had a Spirit called, Ob: and she was one of them. Their Spirit, it seems, taught them, to call for the Dead.

But wherein differs the Necromancer, from him that had a Familiar Spirit? It may be, some had not such a Spirit, who yett consulted the Dead, by going down to their Graves in the Night, & there lying down, and muttering certain Words with a low Voice, that they might have Communion with them, either by Dreams, or by their Appearing to them. Unto this, tis thought, the Prophet Isaiah alludes. [Isa. 8.19. and, 29.4.]

Maimonides thus describes a Necromancer. He is one, who having afflicted himself with Fasting, goes to the Burying-Place, and there lies down, & falls asleep; and then, the Dead appear to him, and inform him, what he desires. There were some also, who putt on a certain Garment, spoke some uncouth Words, made a Fume, and lay down alone, that the dead whom they desired, might come & confer with them. To this Purpose, Aben Ezra.³⁰

³⁰ Maimonides (Avodah Zara 11:15), in De Idololatria (1641), cap. 11, sec. 15, p. 158; and Hilchot Avodat Kochavim V'Chukkotheim (11.13), in Mishneh Torah (3:210). See also ספר המצוות Sefer HaMitzvot (35 neg.), Commandments (2:37–38). In his gloss on Deut. 18:13–14,

The Gentiles were very prone to this Necromancy. It was reckoned so High an Attainment, that Julian the Apostate, who was ambitious to be acquainted with all the Heathen Mysteries, did practise this Νεκρομαντεία, in the most Retired Part of his Palace; cutting up the Bodies of Boyes and Virgins, to bring up the Dead unto him.³¹

The Talmuds (in Beracoth) tells us, That such kind of People did use to burn the Secundine of a Black Catt, when she had her first Kitlings, and beating it very small, putt some of the Powder on their Eye, whereupon Dæmons appeared unto them. See Greg. Nazianzen's Invectives against Julian, and Chrysostom's Oration upon Babylas.³²

This Impiety, as it was privately practised among the Gentiles, thus there were also public Places, whereto Men resorted, that they might consult the Dead. Particularly, At Thesprotis, near to the River Acheron, where Herodotus mentions a Νεκρομαντήϊον. And Plutarch mentions another at Heraclea; which Pausanias addresses in his Distress; as he related in the Life of Cimon.³³

Abraham ibn Ezra (Aben Ezra) argues that “whenever a man relies on his own crafts to learn the truth or predict the future, and not on GOD, he is therefore spiritually imperfect as well as mistaken. Let him who wishes to inquire, inquire of God through a prophet” – not a soothsayer (Commentary: Deuteronomy 5:86).

31 In his Lexicon (A – O), # 264, Hesychius provides both spellings: νεκρομαντεία as well as νεκρομαντεία. Anyway, the Greek noun Νεκρομαντεία [necromancy] or the raising of the spirits of the dead is related to Νεκρομαντεία [necyomancy], from νεκρς, “a corpse,” and μαντεία “a descent into the underworld of the dead” (CBTEL), reportedly a common practice among the ancients. Julian the Apostate, i. e., Roman Emperor Flavius Claudius Julianus Augustus (330–363 CE) allegedly was obsessed with all forms of divination, including necromancy (Philip F. Esler, ed. The Early Christian World 12–55).

32 According to the Soncino Talmud, tractate Beracoth (6a), R. Raba argues that if anyone wants to see the demons that surround us, “let him take the after-birth [secundine] of a black she-cat, the offspring of a black she-cat, the first-born of a first-born, let him roast it in fire and grind it to powder, and then let him put some into his eye, and he will see them [demons].” If that recipe don’t fetch them, Mark Twain’s Duke of Bilgewater would have argued, I don’t know my Arkansas. Anyway, the invectives against Julian can be found in Gregory Nazianzen’s Contra Julianum imperatorum 1–2), [PG 035. 0561–0712] and in Joannes Chrysostomus, De Babyla contra Julianum et Gentiles (secs. 68–127).

33 Herodotus (Historiae 5.92, eta, lines 7–10) reports that Periander, son of King Cypselus of Corinth, had sent messengers to the Thesprotians (one of the 14 Greek tribes of Epirus), near the river Acheron, to inquire of the Νεκρομαντήϊον, the Oracle of the Dead, about the hiding place of a treasure given to his father for safekeeping (History 5.92.398). In his De sera numinis vindicta (Stephanus page 555, C–), Plutarch relates that Pausanias (d. c. 470 BCE), Lacedemonian general of the Hellenic league against the Medes during the Persian Wars (499–449 BCE), was haunted by frightening visions after he had stabbed Cleonice, a virgin of Byzantium, whom he had intended to rape. To appease the ghost of the young woman, Pausanias traveled to the oracle of the dead at Heraclea and offered sacrifices. Much the same is told in Plutarch’s biography Cimon (6.4–6).

Q. How does it appear, that the Prophet, whom the Lord was to Raise up, like unto Moses, must be our Blessed JESUS? [v. 15].

A. If the Oracle here mean, a constant Succession of Prophets, (to divert the Israelites from seeking unto Sorcerers,) yett it was inexcusable in them, to reject our Blessed JESUS, who had all the Characters of one upon Him.³⁴

However, that Word, [like unto me] shewes, that the Oracle here speaks of a Single Prophet. If Joshua wrote the last Chapter of Deuteronomy, or it were done by any other inspired Hand, it is there denied, that he was like unto Moses.³⁵ And tho' Abarbinel mention Fourteen Things, wherein Jeremiah was like unto Moses, yett he confesses him, to have been inferiour unto Isaiah; yea, & that Ezekiel was to be præferred before him.³⁶ Now, Joshua, and Jeremiah, are the only two of whom the Jewes make to be the Single Prophet here intended. But of the Messiah, they have a Note upon this very Verse, which, tho' weakly founded, yett may be worth mentioning. The Verse begins and ends with the Letter, Nun, which is the Numeral Letter for Fifty; importing, that unto the Prophet here promised, there should be opened the Fifty Gates of Knowledge; Forty-nine of which only were opened unto Moses. The Verse also consists of Ten Words; to signify, That they were to obey this Prophet no less than the Ten Commandments.³⁷

34 Patrick, on Deut. 18:15 (Deuteronomy 293, 294). Abraham ibn Ezra (Aben Ezra) glosses on 'a prophet in your midst': "This is Joshua, as evidenced by the pronouncement 'to him you shall listen,' and the subsequent confirmation 'the children of Israel listen to him' [34:9]. Moreover, we find no other prophet, besides Joshua, who entered with Israel into the land. However, this verse also presents the paradigm for all future prophets who might arise after the time of Moshe" (Commentary 5:86).

35 Thomas Hobbes (Leviathan [1651], part 3, ch. 33, p. 200) – and many before and after him – argued that it is not enough to claim that Moses wrote the Pentateuch because this collection is called "The Five Books of Moses"; for like Homer's Odyssey and Virgil's Aeneid, the Pentateuch is named after its epic hero, not its author. Mather here refers to the problem of Moses' death and burial (Deut. 34:5–12). If these passages were added by Joshua (Moses' successor), he must also have written verse 6(b): "And hee buried him in a valey in the land of Moab, over against Beth-Peor: but no man knoweth of his Sepulchre unto this day" (emphasis added). However, Joshua and his contemporaries would surely have known where they buried Moses' remains. Thus the phrase "but no man knoweth of his Sepulchre unto this day" suggests that a long time must have passed since his burial, because the writer of these passages has no knowledge of the whereabouts of the tomb. On the controversial debate about the authorship of the Pentateuch, see Smolinski, "Authority and Interpretation" (175–203).

36 For Isaac ben Judah Abarbanel's commentary on Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, see his Perush 'al nevi'im 'aharonim (1979). Ibn Ezra (Commentary 5:86) for one argues that Deut. 18:15 speaks of Joshua and the several prophets that would follow in Moses' steps. This reading is also confirmed by Rashbam (R. Sh'muel ben Meir), in Hachut Hameshulash (6:1538), by Rashi (Metsudah Chumash: Devarim 5:223), and Nachmanides (Commentary 5:222).

37 According to Baal HaTurim's cabalistic reading of "a prophet from your midst" (Deut. 18:15), "This verse begins and ends with the letter נ [nun] (= 50). [This is] to indicate that he knew the [Torah which contains within it] fifty gates of understanding" (Baal HaTurim

Moreover, this Word, [like unto me] shows, that the Prophet here promised, must be a Lawgiver; which none of the Prophets were, till the Arrival of that Great ONE, our Saviour.

And how emphatically was He Raised up from the Midst of them? For He was extracted out of a Pure Virgin, as the first Woman was out of the Man, by the Almightyes own Immediate Hand. The Resurrection of our Lord was also eminently, in the Midst of them; it being at Jerusalem, the Metropolis of Judæa.³⁸

Whereas it follows, whosoever will not Hearken to my Words which He shall speak, in my Name, I will require it of him. Compare Joh. 12.49, 50. and Hab. 4.27, 28, 29. and you have a Notable Commentary.

Q. Might there be any special Intention of the Spirit of Prophecy, in the Warning here given concerning a False Prophet? v. 20.

A. My excellent Alting thinks there is.³⁹

In the Words immediately preceding, there is a Prophecy concerning the coming of the Messiah, the great Prophet of the Church.

It is now intimated, That after the Coming of the Messiah, there shall arise a remarkable False Prophet, who shall presume to speak in the Name of the Lord, such a Word as the Lord ha's not commanded him to speak; and who shall speak in the Name of other Gods. How Remarkably is this Accomplished in the Pope of Rome? 'Tis the very Character of that Antichrist. Every Protestant knowes how to demonstrate it. May the last Clause of the Prophecy have its Accomplishment hastened; He shall Dy!

And if Mahomet come in, for a share in the Character, this also may be worthy of Consideration.⁴⁰

Q. Is not the Failing of a particular Prediction, here assign'd, as an infallible Mark to discover and determine a False Prophet? v. 22.

Chumash: Devarim 2025). According to Babylonian Talmud, tractates Rosh Hashanah (21b) and Nedarim (38a), God created fifty gates of understanding – Moses received all but one. Patrick (Deuteronomy 295, 296, 297).

³⁸ Patrick (294)

³⁹ The Dutch theologian, philologist, and professor at the University of Groningen, Jacobus Alting (1618–79) furnishes Mather with his annotation on Deut. 18:20, from Alting's Opera Omnia Theologica; Analytica, Exegetica, Practica, Problematica, & Philologica (1685–87), tom. 1, fols. 572–73.

⁴⁰ Alting, too, like most of his Protestant peers, identifies Mahomet as the “magnus Propheta,” who “arrogantly” and falsely speaks in the name of God – just like “Papa Romanum,” the Roman pope (Opera, tom. 1, fol. 573b).

A. An Ingenious Gentleman, who writes on, The Wayes of GOD Reveling Himself to the Prophets, does propose rather a Suspension of this Perswasion.⁴¹ He so translates the Passage; When a Prophet speaketh in the Name of the Lord, if the WORD [Haddabar] shall not be, nor come, that is the Word the Lord hath not spoken; the Prophet hath spoken it præsumptuously. In those numerous Texts, where we read, The Word [Haddabar] of the Lord came to such and such, it cannot mean, That the Thing prædicted was Fulfilled; but that the essential WORD of GOD, or the Divine Power commissionating the Prophet with some Visible Manifestation came unto him. The WORD of GOD in them, [Jer. V. 13.] is the Definition of the Call given to the Prophets. Compare, Jer. XXVII.18. A certain evident conspicuous Power plainly proceeding from Above, to commissionate the Prophet seems here, to be, The WORD coming to him: And not the Accomplishment of his Prophecy assign'd, for the Proof of his Claim to the Acceptance of one coming from GOD.

For, the Design of the Text is, to præscribe, how one shall know a Divine Message at the Time of its being delivered. WHEN a Prophet speaketh. Now to make the Accomplishment of a Prophecy, the Proof of a Divine Message, at the Time of its being spoken, is an Inconsistency.⁴²

Again; There are many Instances of a Divine Message, in which nothing at all is foretold. And so, how could this Rule to know a Divine Message, have any Place in such Cases?⁴³

Lastly. A Divine Message which foretells any thing, ought to be received before the Thing does come to pass: else the Intention and Advantage of it is lost among the Children of Men, to whom the Divine Message comes.

41 Mather's "ingenious Gentleman" is John Lacy (c. 1664–c. 1730), an English merchant, millenarian, and self-styled prophet who became a leader among the French Prophets (Camisard) in England. Given to trances, prophetic utterances, and ecstatic healings, Lacy was a sometime member of the Tothill Street Congregation (Westminster), and supporter of Edmund Calamy, D.D. (1671–1732), an English Arminian nonconformist and historian (ODNB). Lacy's notorious ecstasies, prophetic announcements, and attempts to raise a dead man in Bunhill Fields (1708), led to his increasing isolation and ultimate end in Bridewell Hospital. Mather quotes from Lacy's anonymously published The General Delusion of Christians, Touching the Ways of God's revealing Himself, To, and By the Prophets (1713), part 3, ch. 2, art. 13, p. 297, but does not identify its author – perhaps for good reason. That Mather knew Lacy and his prophetic ecstasies is apparent from Mather's letter (8 Oct. 1718) to Lacy, in which he praises his Ways of God – even though Mather pretends ignorance about Lacy's authorship. Mather's letter bespeaks his sympathy for Lacy's cause, his longing for God's pouring out His spirit, revival of piety, Christ's Second Coming, but warns him to beware of Satan's snare in the matter: "In the meantime, whether the Sovereign Lord has permitted you to be assaulted by a Satan transformed, or no, – I cannot but love the excellent piety which I suppose working in you" (Silverman, Selected Letters 271). On Lacy and the French Prophets, see also Humphrey Lee's Historical Backgrounds (ch. 3), Hillel Schwartz's French Prophets (1980), and esp. Lionel Laborie's Enlightening Enthusiasm (2015), ch. 2.

But now, if this Text be understood of a Visible Supernatural Agency upon the Prophet, it is what the Prophetic Age of the Jews was well acquainted withal.

Otherwise, what happened on Isaiahs Prædiction to Hezekiah, and on Jonahs to the Ninivites, is well known unto us.

the Place of the High-Priest, on this Occasion, he was consecrated unto his Office by the Holy Anointing Oil; and so called, The Anointed for the Wars. How he received his Answer, tis not easy to determine. For there was no Mercy-Seat in the Camp: And yett we find Oracles given in the Camp. David by the Ephod & Breast-Plate ask'd Counsel several times, and had it with an Audible Voice given to him; Thrice in the Case of Keilah; Twice at Ziklag.⁴ The Priest Anointed for the Wars, probably had a Tent in the Camp, erected on Purpose for this Use; in which, there was a Part separated by a Veil; resembling that of the Holy of Holies in the Tabernacle. When he asked Counsel of GOD in the Camp, he appeared there, before that Veil, [verso] and the Answer was given from behind it, tho' no Mercy-Seat were there.

Q. Here are several Words of Encouragement made Use of, unto an Israelitish Army, going to engage in a Battel. What Fancy have the Jewish Doctors upon the Words? v. 3.⁵

A. The Jewish Doctors fancy, that the Four several Words used here, are opposed unto so many Actions of their Enemies, whereby they hoped for to strike Terror into them.

Lett not your Hearts faint,] when your Enemies brandish their Swords, & clash them one against another.

Fear not,] when you hear the Pransing of their Horses, and the Terrible Rattling of their Chariots.

And do not Tremble,] when they shout, as if they were sure of the Victory.

Neither be yee terrified;] when yee hear the Trumpets sound an Alarum to the Battle.

Thus, Moses Kotzensis. You have it in Schickard; And such a Passage Wagenseil observes out of Philostratus; upon the Gemara, of Sota.⁶

⁴ 1 Sam. 23:1–29; 1 Sam. 30:7–8.

⁵ The following paragraphs are extracted from Patrick (Commentary 320–21).

⁶ R. Moses ben Jacob Kotzensis (Cotzensis, Kozensis Mikkotsi, Coucy), Sefer Mitzvoth Gadol. Liber Magnus Praeceptorum (1488), neg. precept 231, as quoted in Wilhelm Schickard's מִשְׁפַּט הַמֶּלֶךְ [Mishpat Hamelech] Jus regium Hebraeorum (1625), cap. 5, theorem 16, pp. 114–15. Johann Christoph Wagenseil, in his Sota hoc est Liber Mischnicus (1674), cap. 8, annot. 2 (on Gemara, cap. 8, sec. 2), pp. 876–77, cites from Flavius Philostratus, Vita Apollonii (2.11, lines 20–22): εἴαν ἐκπλήττεσθαι τὸν ἵππον, ὅτε δουπήσειεν ἀσπίς ἢ ἀστράψειαν αἱ κόρυθες ἢ παιανίζόντων τε καὶ ἀλαλζόντων βοή γένοιτο· that a skillful horseman must pursue the enemy, “and not let the horse shy at the clang of a shield, the flash of plumes, or the noise of men chanting in victory or giving a war whoop.”

Q. It was proclaimed, what Man is there, that is fearful and fainthearted? Who were counted such? v. 8.

A. Some of the Jewes understand it of a Natural Timorousness, which makes Men Quake at every Danger. Others refer it unto old Age, in which the Vigour that makes Men valiant is abated. If we may beleieve Maimonides, They would not admitt one who had no Children, to go to War, because he was not thought masculine enough; or, at least, because they would not cutt off all Hope of his having Posterity.⁷

But there are those, who understand this, of the Terrors of an Evil Conscience. “For (as Dr. Patrick saies) “they did not do, as we are wont in these Dayes, (who send the wickedest Villains into the Wars,) but if they know any Man to be guilty of a great Crime, they thrust him out of the Army, lest they should all fare the worse for having him among them.” See Schickard, in his Jus Regium.⁸

Q. Peace was to be proclaimed by the Israelites, unto a City before they fought against it. Was this to be understood about every War, even the War with the Canaanites, as well as others? v. 10.

A. Maimonides and Moses Kotzensis, will have it so. Only they think, the Ammonites and Moabites were to be excepted: [Deut. 23.6.] And yett, they temper it thus; That if those Nations desired Peace of themselves, it was to be granted them. The most ancient Writers of the Jewes, tell us, That Joshua sent Three Messages to the Seven Nations of Canaan, before he invaded them; tho’ he understood the War, with a Command from God to destroy them; That is to say, If they did not submitt unto the Summons which he sent them, They must either Flee, or make Peace on the best Terms they could. This was the Subject of the two first Messages; on which followed a final Denunciation of War against them; as they inform us in the Jerusalem-Talmud. Maimonides was of the Opinion, that the Gibeonites had not heard these Proclamations; which made them use Craft, that they might procure Mercy from the Israelites.⁹ But P. Cunæus thinks, it more

8 Patrick (Deuteronomy 325); Schickard, in his משפט המלך [Mishpat Hamelech] Jus regium Hebraeorum (1625), cap. 5, theorem 17, p. 124, comments on Maimonides, Hilchot Melachim (7) and Moses Kotzensis, in Sefer Mitzvot Gadol (precept 120) that – according to R. Akiba – wicked men or those with a bad conscience should be expelled from the army, lest God punish them all for the crimes of these men.

9 Wagenseil, Sota hoc est Liber Mischnicus (1674), cap. 8, annot. 6, pp. 844–45, quotes from Maimonides on the Gemara of the Jerusalem Talmud in affirmation that Joshua sent three messengers to the Canaanites offering peace, but whereas the Gergesites fled, the Gibeonites probable, that they had refused at first, to submit unto Joshua's Summons. But seeing him victorious, they betook themselves to that Artifice, whereof we read in the Book of Joshua; when they could not hope for Peace by any other Means.¹⁰

Q. Thou shalt utterly destroy them.] What Opinion have the Jewes had of this Commission? v. 17.¹¹

A. Some of the Jewes have been so merciful, as to think this, not a Commandment, but a Permission. They thought it might Warrant their killing of all without any Distinction, but not Enjoin it, and that they might, after their taking a City, spare such as Repented, & Offered to become Proselytes of the Gate. Selden observes, that one would think this to have been the Opinion which anciently prevailed; inasmuch as we find the Reliques of these People so often mentioned in the Bible.¹² 'Tis also agreeable to the Law of Nations, that such as beg Mercy should be spared.¹³ It was thought that such Persons had an ancient Right unto it, as David Chytraeus observes out of Thucydides; and the known Verse of the Oracle, either did not hear Joshua's proclamation or they pretended to accept his peace offering to trick him. John Selden, in his De Jure Naturali Gentium (1640), lib. 6, cap. 13, pp. 735–37, cites Maimonides, Hilchot Melachim (cap. 6); Moses Kotzensis, Sefer Mitzvoth Gadol (precept 118); Nachmanides, on the Gemara of the Jerusalem Talmud (Shebiith seu de Juribus anni septimi, cap. 6, fol. 35, col. 3), and other authorities who argue that the Canaanites either ignored the peace offering or resorted to a ruse by pretending peace and – consequently – were utterly destroyed.

10 The Dutch jurist Petrus Cunaeus, aka. Pieter van der Cun (1586–1638), was one of the first Christian scholars to study Maimonides, Mishneh Torah in depth. In his De Republica Hebraeorum (1617), lib. 2, cap. 20, pp. 298–304, Cunaeus argues that according to Maimonides the Gibeonites – like all the other Canaanite tribes – rejected the peace offering of Joshua's ambassadors. Later, however, when the Gibeonites discovered that their Canaanite allies were all vanquished, they tricked Joshua into making peace with them by pretending they lived far away from Canaan (Josh. 9:1–27; 11:19). When Joshua discovered their ruse, he did honor his peace agreement with the Gibeonites, but made them subservient to the Israelites (Hebrew Republic 2.20.130–31).

11 Patrick (Deuteronomy 330–31) stands in again for Mather's own annotations. See also "Occasional Annotation V," on God's injunction against sparing anyone who resists, in "Occasional Annotation. V." (Bibliotheca Biblica [1735], 5:145–50).

12 John Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium (1640), lib. 6, cap. 16, pp. 744–45; Rashi (Met-sudah Chumash: Devarim 5:246) says much the same, as does Moses Kotzensis, in Sefer Mitzvoth Gadol (neg. precept 225), but see Maimonides, Hilchot Melachim (5:1–5), in Mishneh Torah (23:534–38).

13 So argues the famous Dutch jurist Hugo Grotius, in his De Iure Belli ac Pacis (1626), lib. 2, cap. 21, sec. 5, p. 415; and lib. 3, cap. 7, sec. 1, pp. 541–42. This particular law of nations, Grotius appears to argue, only applies to those who were captured in an unjust war (perpetrated against a peaceful nation) and to those (like slaves) who were forced to fight in a war against their will.

Μήδ' ἰκέτας ἀδικεῖν, ἰκέται
ἱεροί τε καὶ ἄγνοί·

*The Humble Supplicants, not to Hurt, but Spare,
Who Sacred, and Clear from Offences are.*¹⁴

Indeed, he does not mention the Place, where this Oracle was uttered; but Ezekiel Spanhemius has lately observed out of Pausanias, that it was at Dodona. And he notes, that Jupiter was called, Ἰκέσιος, because he was accounted an implacable Avenger of all Violence done to Supplicants; But they are Supplicants [31v] (quoth Chytraeus,) who confess their | Sin, & their Desert of Punishment, & give themselves up to the Pleasure of the Conqueror; but beg the Punishment may be mitigated by Clemency.¹⁵

Q. How come the Girgashites here to be omitted; who were mentioned before [Deut. 7.1.] as one of the Seven Nations? v. 17.

A. Maimonides thinks, the Reason to be, that they upon the first Summons of Joshua, fled the Countrey, into Africa; and therefore they were not named [Josh. 9.1, 2.] among them, that gathered themselves together, to fight against Israel. Or, as Dr. Patrick thinks, The Girgashites were a People mixed among the most; they lived not in a separate Part of the Countrey by themselves; it is evident, that some of them, at least, opposed Joshua, & were delivered into his Hand. [Josh. 24.11.]¹⁶

Q. The Law-giver allows the Israelites, in besieging a City, to cutt down the Trees that bear no Fruit, and therewith build Bulwarks against the City, until it be subdued. What Bulwarks, what Engines may be intended? v. 20.

¹⁶ Patrick (Deuteronomy 331) erroneously refers to Maimonides’s Hilchot Melachim as his source for the claim that the Girgashites fled to Africa. Actually, R. Samuel ben Nachman, in Midrash Rabbah: Leviticus XVII:6, is the one who opines that when Joshua sent three proclamations to the Canaanite kings, offering peace in exchange for submission, “The Girgashites rose and left of their own accord, and as a reward there was given them a land as good as their own land (as it is written [with regard to Israel], I shall come and take you away to a land like your own land, etc. (Isa. XXXVI, 17), namely, [some place in] Africa.”

A. Tho' Lipsius and Terduzzi think, That here was only meant Stakes and Palisado's for Ramparts and Sconces, yett (the wicked) Sir James Turner in his Essayes on the Art of War, saies, One may without Hæresy beleeeve, that the Vineæ and Plutei, of which we read in Latin Histories, may be meant in the Text; and the Ram also, wherewith Joshua may have battered the Walls of the Cities, which he had no Authority from the Almighty, to beat down with the Sound of Rams-horns, as he did the strong Walls of Jericho.¹⁷

The Vinea and Pluteus, are often confounded by Authors, and made one thing. According to others, the Difference was this; The Pluteus was made for to sloop only on one Side; the Vinea sloop'd on both. But Vegetius makes them to differ in this; That the Pluteus had Wheels, the Vinea none. They were made of small Timber, & rais'd on Legs, & being interwoven with Twigs, sometimes of the Vine-tree, they represented Arbours, and from thence were called, Vinea. Above they were covered with Hair-cloath, and Raw Hides, to save them from Fires cast upon them, as also with Hurdles; but below them, with strong Boards, where great Opposition was expected. They had within them Rafters, on which was a Gallery, wherein the Besiegers were sheltered from Stones, Darts, and Arrowes, when they made their Approaches to the Ditch, and out of these they endeavoured for to chase the Defendents from their Walls and Parapets, with all Manner of Missile Weapons.¹⁸

17 Pallas Armata. Military Essayes Of the Ancient Grecian, Roman, and Modern Art of War. Written in the Years 1670 and 1671 (1683), by Sir James Turner (c. 1615–c. 1686), a Scottish army officer, soldier of fortune during the Thirty-Years War (1618–48), knighted by King Charles II, and promoted to Lt.-Colonel to suppress Presbyterian dissidents in SW Scotland. His Pallas Armata is a historical examination of warfare, military strategies, and arms used among the ancients and moderns of his own time. Most likely, Mather dubs him “wicked” because Sir James, a royalist, not only fought against the Presbyterian cause in Scotland, but also maintained that for mercenaries it does not matter if the cause of war be just as long as their pay is commensurate (ODNB). Mather's extract is from Pallas Armata (1683), bk. 1, ch. 4, pp. 9–10; via Turner he compares the defensive strategies and ordinances described in Poliorceticæ sive De Machinis, Tormentis, Telis (1596) and De Militia Romana Libri Quinque (1595), by the Flemish classical scholar Justus Lipsius, aka. Joost Lips (1547–1606) (SEP), with Delle Machine Ordinanze, et Quartieri Antichi, et Moderni (1601), by the learned Hungarian soldier Achille Tarducci, aka. Terduzzi (1550–1601), in a discourse between Tarducci and General Giorgio Basta on their battles with the Ottoman Turks in Transylvania. Tarducci also published two more works on the Transylvanians' defense against the incursions of the Ottomans: Il Turco Vincibile in Ungaria, discorso appresentato à tre supremi Capitanei dell' Effercito confederate contra il Turco (1601) and Successo delle Fattioni occorse nell' Ongaria vicino a Vacia, nel 1597. & la Battaglia fatta in Transilvania contra il Valacco nel 1600 (1601). Latin translations appeared in Frankfurt (Germany). At any rate, “Vinea” and “Plutei” are protective movable contraptions or breast-work often on wheels to shield soldiers from flying projectiles – all plowshares and pruning-hooks beaten into swords and spears.

18 The Roman military expert Publius Flavius Vegetius Renatus (fl. 4th c. CE) authored one of the most influential books on ancient warfare: Rei militaris instituta, aka. Epitoma rei militaris (c. 384–386). It remained the standard handbook on all manner of soldiery, military tactics, ordinances, and weaponry until the early eighteenth century, and anyone writing on the subject was measured against Vegetius's accomplishment. Turner, Pallas Armata (1683), lib. 2,

The Agger was likewise used on these mischievous Occasions. This was a Rampart of Earth and Hurdles, with which they environ'd the Towns which they besieged. They fortified this Rampart both within and without, with Stakes or Palisadoes. In certain Places of the Rampart, at a convenient Distance one from another, they built Sconces, which they call'd Castles and Towers. The Use of these Aggeres was known in the World, before the Name of Rome was heard of.¹⁹

Moscoli were another Sort of lesser Engines, made of strong Boards, covered with Raw Hides, & moving on Wheels. Men were sheltered under them, when they approached unto the Walls. Tis thought by some, That the proper Use of this Musculus, was to help in drawing forward, the great moving Tower, & cleanse and clear its Way. And so it had its Name from that Fish, which they say, goes before the Whale, as a Guide unto it, in discovering Rocks and Shelves. This answers the Description of it in Vegetius; But others, and particularly Cæsar, makes it a lesser Testudo, by him described at length, in the Second Book of the Civil War. Others write, It had a Snout like a Mouse, wherewith it pickt Stones out of Walls, & was therefore called, Murusculus, and correctly and corruptly, Musculus.²⁰

[32v] The Testudo, or Tortoise, was made of what Bigness the General of the Army or Artillery pleased. Within it was a great | Beam, which sometimes had on the End of it, an Iron Hook or Grapple, which they shott forth when they were to draw Stones out of a Wall, or for other Uses, & pull'd the Beam in again, when they pleased; and therefore they gave it the Name of that Creature, which can thrust his Head in and out at Pleasure.²¹

Which leads us to the Aries, or the Ram. This was a formidable Machin; and they who yeelded not, before this Touch'd the Wall, had the worse Quarter for it. Cæsar gives this as the Reason, why he gave some of the Gauls their Lives, Because they surrendered before the Ram had begun to batter.²²

Achilles Terduzzi thus describes it. It was a great Beam, and of a great Length, two hundred foot and more, made like the mast of a Ship, and it had a great, huge, ponderous Head of Iron, sometimes resembling a Ram, sometimes of some other Shape. This Beam was supported by two others, which meeting above in an Acute Angle, kept the Ram suspended in an Æquilibrie. It was managed by Souldiers behind, and as many on both Sides, as could be lodged in cap. 4, pp. 49–50. Turner relies on Justus Lipsius' Poliorceticwn (lib. 1, dialog. 7–8, pp. 35ff) and on Vegetius, Epitoma Rei Militaris (lib. 4.13, 15). Joshua's conquest of Jericho is described in Josh. 6:1–27.

¹⁹ Turner, Pallas Armata (1683), lib. 2, cap. 4, p. 50; Vegetius (Epitome 4.15, 28); Lipsius, Poliorceticwn (lib. 2, dialog. 3, pp. 83ff).

Moscles, or Tortoises, or other Pent-houses. No Strength of Walls could resist the continued & reiterated Verberations of this Engine, as we may learn from Josephus, and many others. In the Time of its Battery, Baskets full of Earth, & raw Hides; on both Sides with Moscles, Vines, and Tortoises, from under which, the Besiegers incessantly cast their Missiles against the Defendents. And they at the Approach of the Ram to the Wall, beat it with huge great Stones, or heavy Lumps & Weights of Lead, tied with strong Ropes, or Chains of Iron, to a Crane or Telenon. Those who maintained and managed the Ram, endeavoured to gripe those Ropes or Chains, with long Hooks or Grapples; and on the other side, the Besieged essay'd with long Scythes to cutt the Cords, which governed & sustained the Ram. The Defendents also used to hang over the Walls, Beds, and great Sacks fill'd with Straw; Feathers, or Wool, which broke the Force of the Strokes, before they came to the Wall.²³

The Ambulatory Tower was also an horrid Thing. Who can read Vegetius describing it, without Astonishment? It was built after the form of an House, Thirty, forty, fifty foot broad; and so high as to æqual to Heighth of the Towers on the Wall. Vegetius describes one Three Stories High, in the Lowest whereof he lodges a Ram, with Men to order it; In the Third, he places the Velites, who afflicted the Defendents with Darts and Arrowes, & pelted them with Stones out of their Batton-Slings; In the Midst, he places a Bridge, one End whereof being laid on the Wall, Bands of armed Men pass'd over, and then, Ilico capta est Urbs. This is the Turris Vegetiana.²⁴ But what shall we say of those that were 180 foot high, & 60, or 70 foot broad, wherein might be Eighteen or Twenty stories? Livy mentions one in his 32^d Book out of which a Roman Consul sent whole Cohorts of Legionaries, one to sustain another, against a Macedonian Phalanx, that stood ready to receive them within the Walls; & yett the Cohorts were 500 strong. These moving Towers were covered with Raw Hides, and some of them faced with Iron.²⁵

They moved on many Wheels, pushed forward with the Strength of many Men, applying of Leavers. They were sometimes drawn with Beasts of Carriage. The Besieged, either by desperate Salleyes, or by undermin[ing] the Ground, or by Fire, endeavoured their defence.²⁶

Q. For the Discovery & Expiation of Secret Murders; was there any ancient Law, æqual to that of Moses? v. 1.

A. No; The very best Law the Pagans had, was that of Plato; which enacts no more but this; “That if a Man were found Dead, & he that killed him, after a diligent Search could not be heard of, publick Proclamation should be made, that he who was guilty of the Fact, should not come into any Holy Place, nor any Part of the whole Countrey; For, if he were discovered, he should be putt to Death, & be thrown out of the Bounds of the Countrey, & have no Burial.”¹

Q. Here is abundance of Solemnity, used by the Elders, for clearing themselves from the Murder of the Dead Man found in the Field? v. 7.²

A. The Mischna adds, That they further said, [For how can any one think, that Elders would be Murderers?] *This Man did not come into our City, that we know of, & dismissed without necessary Provisions; Nor was he seen by us, & permitted to go away without Company.*³ Maimonides expresses it more largely; representing the Wisdome of this Law, in these Words.

“The Elders called God to witness, that they had not neglected to secure the Wayes; nor to sett Watches to examine diligently, those who travelled; saying, as our Rabbins express it, This Man was not killed, thro’ any Negligence or Forgetfulness, which we were guilty of, in not observing our publick Constitutions: nor do we know, who killed him. Now by this Inquisition into the Fact, by this going forth of the Elders, & the striking off the Heifers Head, etc. a great deal of Discourse necessarily arose about this Business, which made the thing publick; and was a probable Means of discovering the Murderer, by some or other, who were there,

² See John Selden, De Synedriis (1655), lib. 3, cap. 7, sec. 2, pp. 83–85, for the procedure of the Hebrew elders.

or should hear of all this. And if any one came, & said, He knew the Author, then they forbore to behead the Heifer; but the Man being apprehended, if the House of Judgment did not putt him to Death; the King had Power to do it; if he neglected it, the Avenger of Blood might kill him, wherever he mett him.”⁴

Unto the Discovery of the Murderer, this also contributed; That the Place, where the Heifers Head, was struck off, might never be ploughed or sowed after it; which made the Owners of the Ground employ their utmost Diligence, to find out the Murderer, that their Land might not ly waste forever. Indeed, they might not so much as plant a Tree upon it!⁵

Q. What were the Capital Punishments among the Ancient Israelites? v. 9.⁶

A. 1. Killing with the Sword, or, Beheading, was among them. Tho’ wee find not this Directed in the Law, wee find it Practised by the People. Ishbosheth [2. Sam. 4.7.] was the first, that wee find actually thus executed: And whereas, tis said, They Smote him, & Slew him, and then Beheaded him; the Severing of the Head from the Body, was a Consequence of some foregoing Violence. Indeed, it was usual to cutt off the Head of the Person slain, & bring it in a Way of Trophy; as is evident from the Instances of Sisera, of Goliath, of Saul, of Sheba. Perhaps, in those Dayes, the Beheading of Persons alive, was not usual; but they rather took off their Heads, with Sword, or Axe, after they had been dispatched some other Way. The Decollation was only for Pomp, & that they might expose the Malefactors. Nor in the Account of John Baptists Death, is there any thing, to disprove, that his Life was taken away by the Executioner first, & then his Head cutt off,

4 Maimonides, מורה נבוכים [More Nebuchim] Doctor Perplexorum (3.40.458–59) and Guide (3.40.557).

5 Tractate Sotah (9.5) seems less rigorous in its directives here than Mather claims; for after the sacrificial heifer’s neck was broken to atone for the murder, the place where the victim was found was forever tainted and “forbidden for sowing and tillage,” although it was still “permitted to comb out flax there and to quarry stones there” (The Mishnah 304). The proscription against using the field in which the corpse was found was to ensure that the community would leave no stone unturned to discover the murderer. Ramban, on Deut. 21:4, in Commentary: Deuteronomy Shoftim (5:245), says much the same.

6 According to the rabbis of the Babylonian Talmud, tractate Berachoth (8a), “Nine hundred and three species of death were created in this world. For it is said: The issues of death, and the numerical value of Toza’oth is so. The worst of them is the croup, and the easiest of them is the kiss. Croup is like a thorn in a ball of wool pulled out backwards. Some people say: It is like [pulling] a rope through the loop-holes [of a ship]. [Death by a] kiss is like drawing a hair out of milk.” Be that as it may, the four principal forms of capital punishment are stoning, burning, beheading, and strangulation. On this topic, both David de Sola Pool’s Capital Punishment among the Jews (1916), pp. 1–15, and Samuel Mendelsohn’s Criminal Jurisprudence of the Ancient Hebrews (1891), esp. chs. 1 and 4, remain as illuminating as ever.

to bee brought in Triumph. When tis said, James was killed with the Sword [Act. 12.2.] tis probably meant of the Killing, which preceded Beheading.⁷

The Hebrew Masters inform us, That this was the Deadly Penalty of Murderers, & Apostates, or Seducers, to Idolatry.⁸

2. Stoning. This was usually, begun by the Witnesses against the Malefactor, and then all the People finish'd it. Such a Lapidation was used upon Blasphemers, Idolaters, Incestuous Persons, Witches, Profaners of the Sabbath, False Teachers, Children that cursed their Parents, or were Incorrigibly Rebellious. Achan, and Adoram, and Naboth, and Zechariah, suffered this Kind of Death. So did Stephen, and it was attempted against our Saviour, & against the Apostle Paul. This was the most general Punishment, for notorious Criminals; & this is meant sometimes, by the Indefinite Expression of, Putting to Death. [Compare Lev. 20.10. with Joh. 8.5.]⁹

7 Mather refers to the famous story of Jael, Heber's wife, who killed the Canaanite general Sisera by driving a tent peg through his temples before cutting his head off (Judg. 4:18–22); to young David, who killed the Philistine giant Goliath with a sling shot and subsequently severed his head (1 Sam. 17:48–51); to Saul and his three sons, whose corpses were decapitated after their bodies were discovered among the dead Israelites (1 Sam. 31:6–9); and to Sheba, son of Bichri, who involuntarily parted with his head after an unsuccessful uprising against King David (2 Sam. 20:1–7, 21–22). Finally, to John the Baptist, who lost his head to Salome's gyrations and had it delivered to Herodias on a platter (Matth. 14:1–11).

8 The Mishnah, tractate Sanhedrin (9.1, and 6.3) imposes death by beheading (decollation), Hebr. הֶרֶג [hereg], for murderers and apostates (Numb.35:16; Deut. 13:15), in The Mishnah (395). The Soncino Babylonian Talmud (Sanhedrin 52b) explains that "Execution by the sword was performed thus: The condemned man was decapitated by the sword, as is done by the civil authorities." Mekhilta De-Rabbi Ishmael, tractate Nezikin (4, lines 24, 31–35), invokes Deut. 21:4, 9 to confirm that "shedders of blood [are] to be [treated] like the heifer whose neck is to be broken. Just as the latter is killed by cutting off its head, so all shedders of blood are to be killed by decapitation" (2:379).

9 Executions by stoning, Hebr. סְקִילָה [sekilah], are imposed for such crimes as incest, homosexuality, bestiality, blasphemy, idolatry, offering one's "seed to Molech," being possessed by "a familiar spirit," soothsayers, profanation of the Sabbath, cursing one's parents, leading people astray to worship idols, sorcery, and intractability of "stubborn and rebellious son[s]," in the Mishnah, tractate Sanhedrin (7.4), The Mishnah (391–92), and Tractatus de Symedriis (7.4), in Surenhusius, סֵדֶר נִזְקִין [Seder Nezikin] sive Legum Mischnicarum (4:248–49). Achan, son of Carmi, was stoned along with his children and livestock for withholding the spoils of war consecrated to the Temple in Jerusalem (Josh. 7:1, 20–26); Adoram (Adoniyram) was lapidated by the rebellious ten northern tribes who refused to pay tribute to Rohoboam (1 Kings 12:18); Naboth, falsely accused of blasphemy by King Ahab's henchmen, died by lapidation because he did not want to sell his patrimony (vineyard) to Ahab and his Jezebel, Lady Mascara (1 Kings 21:14); the prophet Zechariah was stoned to death by a mob fomented by King Jehoash for inciting God's wrath against him and his people (2 Chron. 24:20–21); St. Stephen, the first Christian martyr, incurred death by stoning for what the Sanhedrin considered blasphemy (Acts 7:52–58); finally, St. Paul was dragged out of town by an enraged crowd of Antiochians who pelted him with stones, yet he escaped (Acts 14:19).

3. Burning. This was inflicted on those that vitiated their own Daughters, & on the Daughters of Priests committing Whoredome, and on some other Offenders. Tis by some thought, that they were Burnt alive; but others think, they were Strangled first, and then melted Lead was poured down their Throats, and afterwards their whole Bodies were consumed in the Fire. Burning seems to have been a Secondary Penalty; as it was in the Exemple of Achan. [Josh. 7.25.] Moreover, before the Law, Whoredome was thus punished. Judah pronounces this Doom against his Daughter, Lett her bee Burnt. And it is reasonable to think, that shee shall bee utterly | Burnt with Fire. Rev. 18.8.] is an Allusion to this ancient Punishment of Whordome; seeing that Babylon, there most signally stiled, a Whore; and her Fornication is often mentioned.¹⁰ [33v]

4. Hanging. But in this, they were Hang'd up, by the Hands, not by the Head or Neck: And the Suspension was not while they were Alive, but after they were Dead. It was therefore used, in Conjunction, with some other mortal Punishment, that went before; mostly, either Stoning, or Strangling. And the Design of it was to expose them, for a Warning & a Terror unto others. Hence, at Sunset when they could no longer bee a Spectacle, they were taken down. [see Josh. 10.26. & Josh. 8.29. – The same is to bee thought of Sauls seven Sons. 2. Sam. 21.9.]¹¹

Some reckon Suffocation, among the Capital Punishments. Did Job, refer to this, when hee said, Hee chose Strangling? [ch. 7.15.] The Hebrew Doctors tell us, that this is meant in those Parts of the Pentateuch, where tis commanded, that the Criminal shall bee putt to Death. [Thus, Lev. 20.10. and Exod. 21.15. and Deut. 22.22. the Targum of Jonathan, interprets of Suffocation.] The Way of

Strangling, was with a Towel, Napkin, or any Linen Cloth, putt about the Male-factors Neck, & so drawn by Two Men with Force, contrary Wayes.¹²

Submersion also, [Math. 18.6. and Mark. 9.42.] is by Jerom, and Buxtorf, and Casaubon, reckoned among the Punishments of the Jewish Nation; the Condemned hereunto were called, Men adjudged to bee Drowned.¹³

Q. Is there any thing observable, in the Place of Introducing the Law, about A Stubborn & Rebellious Son? v. 18.¹⁴

A. By a Stubborn Son, the Jewes understand one that will not do what he is bidden; and by a Rebellious, one who doth what he is forbidden. And they imagine, the Law annexed unto the foregoing, about the Marriage of a Souldier to a captive Woman; because the Issue of such a Marriage commonly proved Refractory, or at least, gave much Trouble to the Parents. This is observed, by Schickard, out of Tanchuma. And they confirm it, by an Exemple out of Scripture; Namely, The two Children of David, Absalom and Tamar, who were both born of a captive Woman, made a Proselyte: The Former of these conspired the Death of his Father; the other, being ravished by Amnon, was the Occasion of Death, to some of her Brethren.¹⁵

¹³ Based on Matth. 18:6, "Whoso shall offend one of the little ones which believe in me [Christ], it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea," St. Jerome claims that death by submersion with a stone hanging from the culprit's neck was a punitive measure practiced among the ancient Jews (Commentariorum in Evangelium Matthaei lib. 3, cap. 18, v. 6) [PL 026. 0129]. For more on this subject – along with Joannes Buxtorf and Isaac Casaubon's expertise – see John Selden's De Synedriis (1650–53), lib. 1, cap. 5, esp. pp. 72–80; lib. 2, cap. 13, pp. 527–77; and Selden's De Iure Naturali & Gentium, Iuxta Disciplinam Ebraeorum (1640) – all impressive studies of the juridical practices in the ancient Middle East.

¹⁵ Via Patrick (Deuteronomy 354), Mather draws on Wilhelm Schickard's משפט המלך [Mishpat Hamelech] Jus Regium Hebraeorum e Tenebris Rabbincis erutum & luci donatum (1625), cap. 5, theor. 17, pp. 137–38. Schickard extracts a gloss from Midrash Tanchuma, Parashas Ki Seitzei [Ki-Tetze], part 1 (Deut. 21:18), which directs that wayward and rebellious sons should be sent to Beth Din, the House of Judgment, to preempt unforeseen consequences – like those following the rape of Tamar by Amnon, and Absalom's fratricide: "If a man has a wayward and rebellious son." [This teaches us that] whoever marries a beautiful woman [from captivity] will produce a rebellious son. For it is written concerning Dovid [David], that he had lusted for Ma'achah [Maacah] the daughter of Talmi the king of Geshur, when he went out to war, and [this union] produced Avshalom [Absalom], who ultimately sought to kill him! ... And

Q. Does not the Sentence of Death upon the Prodigal Son, seem a little severe? v. 18.¹⁶

A. Dr. Patrick therefore thinks, That the Parents look'd upon such a Son, to be so debauch't, that he would not only spend all their Estate, if he had it, but was inclined also to kill them, that he might gett it into his own Hands.¹⁷ on account of him tens of thousands of Jews died. He caused a rift among the people Yisroel, and Shimi the son of Gera, Sheva the son of Bichri and Achitophel were killed" (Metsudah Midrash Tanchuma Devorim 8:213–14). Absalom and Tamar – David's offspring by the captive princess Maacah – proved to be nothing but a curse, for while Absalom caused sedition and civil war leading to the split of the twelve tribes, David's firstborn son Amnon raped his half-sister Tamar (2 Sam. 13:1–37), a conflict that led to fratricide when Absalom revenged his sister's dishonor and had Amnon killed. Wayward and rebellious sons, Rabbi Yosi therefore argues, are good for nothing and should be sent "to beis din [house of judgment] and be stoned" to prevent mischief. That is why the Torah recommends "it is better that he [rebellious son] died innocent than he die guilty, for the death of the wicked is beneficial for them and beneficial for the world" (Tanchuma Devorim 8:215). This story and its dire consequences – one sin begetting another – is confirmed in R. David Kimchi's note on 2 Sam. 3:3 (Schickard, cap. 5, theor. 17, p. 138) as well as in Maimonides, Hilchot Melachim (8.8), in Mishneh Torah (23:578–79, esp. notes 48–50). Those were the days. See also Mather's commentary on 2 Sam. 3:3 and 13:13–28, in BA (3:344, 369–70).

16 Mather's rhetorical question bespeaks his compassion and enlightened viewpoint on matters of child-rearing. In fact, his manual on the subject, "Some Special Points, Relating to the Education of my Children," says it all: "The first Chastisement, which I inflict for an ordinary Fault, is, to lett the Child see and hear me in an Astonishment, and hardly able to beleeve that the Child could do so base a Thing, but beleeving that they will never do it again. I would never come, to give a child a Blow; except in Case of Obstinacy: or some gross Enormity. To be chased for a while out of my Presence, I would make to be look'd upon, as the sorest Punishment in the Family. ... The slavish way of Education, carried on with raving and kicking and scourging (in Schools as well as Families), tis abominable; and a dreadful Judgment of God upon the World" (Diary 1:535–36). Mather's enlightened attitude is also noticeable in his A Family Well-Ordered (1699), Parental Wishes and Charges (1705), and Bonifacius (1710), pp. 52–67. See also E. B. Schlesinger, "Cotton Mather and His Children." P. Greven, Protestant Temperament. Patterns of Child-Rearing (1977), chs. 1–2; and K. Silverman, Life and Times, pp. 263–69.

17 Patrick, on Deut. 21:21 (Commentary 356–58); Midrash Tanchuma is explicit about how to deal with rebellious sons: It is not the prodigal's squandering of his father's wealth that warrants stoning, but the son's insatiable lust for more: "he will still seek to satisfy his habit, but when he sees that he is unable to, he will venture out to the crossroads and kill and blunder people." From this we learn "that one transgression leads to another transgression" (Tanchuma Devorim 8:214–15). Most of the great medieval rabbis who comment on a son's recalcitrance (Deut. 21:18) agree that severe punishment is called for: Rashi (Metsudah Chumash/Rashi Devarim 5:254–55), Ramban (Commentary Deuteronomy, Ki Theitzei 5:258–59), R. Bachya ben Asher (Deuteronomy 7:2619–20); and most important, Rambam, in Hilchot Mamrim (7.7): If the wayward son does not reform after repeated reprimands by the judges, they will determine if he is old enough to be held fully culpable: "[the youth] is examined to see if his pubic hair surrounded his entire male organ. If that is not the case and it is not three months after [he became thirteen], they [judges] complete the judgment against him as is done with all those executed by the court and he is stoned to death. He is not stoned to death unless the three judges who originally [sentenced him to be lashed] are present" (Mishneh Torah 23:390).

Other Nations were very severe, in their Punishment of such wicked Children, as are here described. Particularly, the Romans, after the Lawes took away from the Parents, the Power to sell them, or putt them to Death, and committed the Censure of them unto the Magistrates.¹⁸

And among the Athenians, (as Lysias tells us, in his Oration against Agoratus.) he who did beat his Parents, or did not maintain them, & provide an Habitation for them, when they were in Want, ἀξιός ἐστι θανάτῳ ζημιωθῆναι, was thought worthy to be putt to Death.¹⁹ Indeed, the Law did not inflict that Punishment, but only said, Ἄτιμος ἔστω, Lett him be Infamous.²⁰ That is, as they expound it; He might not come into the Public Assemblies, nor enter into their Temples, nor wear a Crown in their public Festivals; and if any such Persons presumed so to do, they were brought before the Magistrates, who sett a Fine upon their Heads, & committed them unto Prison, until they paid it. No Wonder then, that Moses ordained such a Punishment for a Son, who endeavoured to undo, his Parents. It has been followed by some States, in these latter Ages. David Chytraeus tells us, At Zurich in the Year 1550, he saw a Disobedient Son beheaded, who had cursed his Mother, & beaten her.²¹

²¹ David Chytraeus (1530–1600), the German Lutheran professor of theology at the University of Rostock, witnessed the decapitation of a young man (in the month of December, 1550) for abusing his mother. His beheading was to serve "ac exemplum huius severitatis in decollando filio inobediente," In Deuteronomium Mosis Enarratio (1575), cap. 21, p. 398.

Q. Was Crucifixion a Punishment ever used among the Jewes? v. 23.

A. No. If the Jewes had not been Assisted and Governed by the Romans, our Lord had not been at all Hanged Alive upon a Tree, but had first been Stoned to Death.²²

Q. Why is it said, He that is Hanged is Accursed of God? v. 23.²³

A. The Hanging was on a Peece of Timber struck into the Ground, (as the Sanhedrim tells us,) out of which came a Beam, whereto the Mans Hands were tied. So that his Body hung in the Posture of the Crucified.²⁴

That such an one was Accursed of God, is commonly interpreted by the Jewes, as if the Meaning were, That he was Hanged, because he Blasphemed God.²⁵

But the Apostle Paul, as well as the LXX, ha's otherwise translated it. They observed, what the Jewish Doctors did not, That Moses here doth not give a Reason, why the executed Man was hanged up, but why he was taken down.²⁶

22 Tractatus de Synedriis (6.4), in Surenhusius, Mischna (fol. 4), סדר נזיקין [Seder Nezikin] sive Legum Mischmicarum Liber qui inscribitur Ordo Damnorum (1702) 4:235. Crucifixion was not practiced among the ancient Hebrews. A culprit was first executed by stoning and then his corpse was hanged in the following manner: "They put a beam into the ground and a piece of wood jutted from it. The two hands [of the body] were brought together and [in this fashion] it was hanged. R. Jose says: The beam was made to lean against a wall and one hanged the corpse [by the hands] thereon as the butchers do." Yet the body was taken down before sundown and buried the same day (The Mishnah 390).

23 See Pierre Jurieu's Critical History of the Doctrines (1705), vol. 1, ch. 29, pp. 580–81.

24 Patrick (Commentary 359). In his משפט המלך [Mishpat Hamelech] (1625), cap. 4, theor. 14, p. 99, Wilhelm Schickard quotes Maimonides (Hilchot Sanhedrin 15.6–8) to confirm that the corpse hung up on the crossbeam in a crucified posture by the hands (not neck).

25 See, for instance, Metsudah Chumash/Rashi Devarim (5:257–58) and Babylonian Talmud, Sanhedrin (45b). As Ramban puts it (Deut. 21:22), "the law is according to the Sages that no offender [executed by] stoning is hanged save the blasphemer and the idolater. This is the sense of the phrase, for he that is hanged is a reproach unto G-d [Deut. 21:23] – because people will say, 'Why was this person hanged? Because he blasphemed G-d or worshipped a particular idol ...'" (Commentary 5:260). Identifying "blasphemy" as the reason for the culprit's execution and hanging is also given in the Chaldaic Targum Onkelos and Textus Hebraeo-Samaritanus (Deut. 21:23), in Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (1:805). So, too, John Selden's De Synedriis & Praefecturis Juridicis (1653), lib. 2, cap. 13, pp. 536–39 (nota 4).

26 The confusion appears to arise because the Mosaic stricture (Deut. 21:22–23) speaks in general (rather than in the specific case of the profligate son) that anyone who is condemned and executed for a capital crime should be hanged "on a tree" and buried on the same day, because a hanged man is "accursed of God: that thy land be not defiled." See also LXX (Deut. 21:22–23). [Significantly, the 1985 Torah translation by the New Jewish Publication Society (JPS) renders תְּחַלֵּית אָתּוֹ עַל־עֵץ "you shall hang him on a tree" as "you [shall] impale him on a stake" (Deut. 21:22). "For an impaled body is an affront to God: you shall not defile the land that the LORD your God is giving you to possess" (JPS Deut. 21:23)]. Be that as it may, Mather is concerned with a much more important, albeit related issue: Was Jesus merely hanged on

Yea, but what Consequence is there in this? Lett the Man be taken down, & buried, because he is Accursed of God! It must be understood, That such Persons are said here to be Accursed of God, not because they were hanged up; no, but because of their Sin, which deserved, that they should be thus exposed. So saies *Jerom: Non ideo maledictus quia pendet, sed ideo pendet quia maledictus.*²⁷ Hanging up was a Token, that a Man had committed an horrid Crime, whereby he had incurred the Displeasure of the Almighty. Every one who saw him Hanging up in that fashion, was to conclude, This Man was under the Curse of God for Sin. And unless he had undergone this Curse, he could not have been buried, nor putt into the Condition of other Men. When he had undergone it, it would have been a Sin in the People, if they had not then taken him down, or to have prolonged the Suspension any further, than God Imposed this Curse upon him. The Land had been defiled, if after this Suffering, which God had appointed, they had not buried him. This is the Opinion of Abarbinel; who confutes other
 [34v] Accounts of | this Matter; particularly, that of Solomon Jarchi; who thinks, the Man might not hang any longer than the Evening, because it would have been a Dishonour unto the Sovereign of the World, after whose Image Man was made: And this is the only Reason that Grotius also gives of it.²⁸

It is to be further noted, That they say, (in the Tract entituled Sanhedrim,) That not only the Malefactor, but all the Instruments of Punishment, were to the cross for “blasphemy” or for atoning the sins of mankind. St. Paul specifically raises this question and applies the Deuteronomic stricture to Christ’s propitiatory sacrifice as it relates to the question of redemption by works (observation of the Law) or by faith: “For as many as are of the works of the lawe, are under the curse: for it is written [Deut. 27:26] Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the booke of the Law to doe them. ... Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the Law, being a curse for us: for it is written, [Deut. 21:23] Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree: That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles, through Iesus Christ: that wee might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith” (Gal. 3:10–14). On the crux of these distinction, see John Selden’s De Jure Naturali & Gentium (1640), lib. 2, cap. 12, pp. 261–67; and Johann Heinrich Hottinger’s Smegma Orientale (1658), lib. 1, cap. 6, sec. 3, pp. 96–97. Mather has more to say on this topic in his glosses on Gal. 3:13 (BA 9:417–18).

be buried, at the going down of the Sun. Even the Tree itself, upon which the Man was hanged, was to be buried; *That no Memory of so foul a thing might be left in the World, nor any might say, Behold, this was the Tree whereupon such an one was hanged.*²⁹

[38H.]

Q. What intends that Passage; That the Land be not defiled, which the Lord thy God giveth thee? v. 23.

A. Namely, by the Stench of the Body after it is putrified, as Abarbinel expounds it; who observes, That the Dead Body of no Creature corrupts into Stench, sooner than that of Man.³⁰

For this Cause, he tells us, the Book Siphre determines not only that all Malefactors be buried, as soon as the Law orders, (that they might not imitate the Manners of the Egyptians and Philistines, & such like People, who lett Bodies rott in the Air, after they were hanged up,) but that every Man should bury his Dead, the same Day they died, or be deemed to have transgressed a Negative Præcept.³¹ This may pass for a Good Natural Reason, as Dr. Patrick saies; But, he truly adds, there is more in it, respecting a Legal Pollution, under which their whole Countrey lay, as long as an Accursed Thing hung openly among them. Just, as all that entred into the Tent where a dead Body lay, and all that was in it, were made unclean by it. [Num. 19.14, 15.]³²

Upon that Score, the Apostle Paul might well apply this Passage to Christ crucified for us: Not only because He bore our Sins, & was putt to Death, & exposed to such a Shame as these Sinners were, who were Accursed of God: but was also taken down in the Evening, in token that now the Guilt was removed:

²⁹ According to Soncino Babylonian Talmud, tractate Sanhedrin (45b), “[H]as it not been taught: The stone with which he [the condemned] was stoned, the gallows on which he was hanged, the sword with which he was beheaded, or the cloth with which he was strangled, are all buried with him? ... ‘They are all buried with him.’ Surely it has been taught: ‘They are not buried with him!’ – R. Papa explained: What is meant ‘by him?’ In the earth surrounding his corpse,” which soil is considered part of the corpse and must be removed. See also (Babylonian Talmud, tractate Nazir 64b) and Maimonides, Hilchot Sanhedrin (15.9) for the same.

³⁰ This and the following paragraphs are from Patrick (Commentary 362–63). Matthew Poole’s Synopsis Criticorum (1:830–31) and Works (8b: 62–66) offer the diverse views of the post-Reformation divines on the subject.

³¹ Two of the six-hundred thirteen Mitzvot are applicable here: Mitzvah 66 (Negative) exhorts “against leaving the body [of the one who has been executed and hanged] overnight on the tree” to avoid conjuring up in the mind of the spectator the capital crime of blasphemy against the Most High. According to Sifre (Kit Tetze), “‘You shall not leave his body overnight on the tree’ – this is a negative commandment,” in Mitzvot Lo Tāseh, Maimonides, ספר המצוות [Sefer HaMitzvot] 1–2 (2:42). Likewise, Mitzvah 231 (Positive) commands “to bury those who have been executed by beth-din on the day of their execution.” This is why Sifre (Ki Tetze) stipulates, “‘But bury shall you bury him’ – a positive commandment,” in Mitzvot Aseh, Maimonides, ספר המצוות [Sefer HaMitzvot] 1–2 (1:232).

as the Curse upon the Man that was hanged, ended at the going down of the Sun; and as the Land of Israel was pure & clean, after the Dead Body was taken down & buried, with the Tree upon which it was hanged. John Coch, hath well explained, in his Notes upon the Sanhedrim, to this Purpose. *As our Blessed Saviour, while He hung upon the Cross, was made a Curse & an Execration; so, when, according to the Law He was taken down, & buried, both He ceased to be a Curse, & all they that are His.*³³

³³ Johannes Coch, aka Cocceius (1603–69), the German-Dutch Calvinist theologian at the University of Leiden, was much admired for his works on federal theology, on the covenants of works and grace (TRE 8:132–40). Via Patrick (Commentary 363), Mather here refers to Cocceius's extensive commentary Duo Tituli Thalmudici Sanhedrim et Maccoth (1629), "Excerpta Gemarae Talmudicae," tractatus de Synedrio, cap. 6, sec. 5 (Nota 5), pp. 252–55. See also Cocceius's related commentary on Gal. 3:13–14, in Opera Omnia Theologica Exegetica (1689), tom. 4, pp. 904–10, §§ 106–67. For Mather's interest in Cocceius, see J. Stievermann's Prophecy, Piety, and the Problem of Historicity (2015), pp. 361–81. W. van Asselt's Federal Theology (2001) is the standard work on Cocceius.

Q. The Lord here gave a Law to Israel, about the Recovery of Lost Goods; How was that Law observed in Israel? v. 1, 2, 3.

A. I can tell you, how it was observed in Jerusalem. There was a Great Stone in Jerusalem, [mentioned by the Gemara, in Baba Metzia] the Name whereof was, אבן טועין, or, The Stone of the Strayes, and of that Stone there was this Law. Hee that had lost or found any thing, was to Repair thither; Hee that had found, was to stand there & produce it; Hee that had lost was to tell the Marks and Signs of it. Moreover, *Hee that had taken up any thing, was to cry it three times; and after Seven Dayes, once more.*¹

Q. But if no body could prove a Right in the Beasts that were found, whom did they fall to?

A. They became His, who found them. Nevertheless, he did piously, if he gave the Value of them to the Poor, (and so the Law was in many Places,) but he was an honest Owner of them, if he kept them to himself. This is Grotius's Observation.²

Q. Unto what referr'd, that Prohibition, The Woman shall not wear, that which pertaineth unto a Man, neither shall a Man putt on a Womans Garment? v. 5.

A. Maimonides tells us, That it was the Custom among the Ancient Idolaters, for Men dressed in Womens Apparel, to sacrifice unto Venus, & for Women

¹ Mather's mediate source is John Selden's De Jure naturali Genitum juxta Disciplinam Ebraeorum (1640), lib. 6, cap. 4, esp. pp. 681–84. According to Talmud, tractate Baba Metzia (28b), "There was a Stone of Claims in Jerusalem: whoever lost an article repaired thither, and whoever found an article did likewise. The latter stood and proclaimed, and the former submitted his identification marks and received it back. And in reference to this we learnt: Go forth and see whether the Stone of Claims is covered." Likewise, Mishnah, Baba Metzia (2.6), stipulates that according to R. Judah, the finder was not the keeper of the lost item until he had advertised his find "at the three Feasts and for seven days after the last Feast, to allow [to him that lost it] three days to go back to his house, three days to return, and one day wherein to proclaim [his loss]," The Mishnah (349). See also Maimonides, Hilchot Gezelah Va'Avedah (13.1, 8) for much the same. The Hebrew phrase אבן טועין suggests "stone of losses" or "erring."

² Hugo Grotius, De Jure Belli ac Pacis Libri Tres (1670), lib. 2, cap. 10, sec. 11, p. 220. See also Simon Patrick on Deut. 22:2 (Deuteronomy 364).

dressed in Mens Apparel to sacrifice unto Mars.³ And Philochorus, & from him also Macrobius tells us, That the like Rites were used in their Sacrificing to the Moon, which was esteemed both a Male, & a Female Deity.⁴ 'Tis probable, That these Idolatries, may bee first Intended in the Mosaic Prohibition. Altho' there is a Confusion, also upon civil Accounts herein forbidden; for to use the Words of Ambrose, Cur Vir mentiris Fæminam? Aut Tu Fæmina Virum? Suis unum quemque sexum Natura induit Indumentis.⁵ Yea, I may add, An Inversion in Temper, Order, & Office, may bee here forbidden, as well as in Garment. Such as That, which made the Poet complain of Men,

*Animum geritis Muliebre*⁶

And That which made the Ancient complain of Women, Matronæ et Mulieres sunt senatus noster; quæ dominantur in Ecclesijs, et de sacerdotali Gradu Favor Judicat Fæminarum.⁷

That the Rites of Idolatri were especially intended in this Prohibition, will bee evident, from the many Instances of such Rites, which Antiquity ha's given us. Lett Servius on Vergil tell us of the Image of Venus, at Cyprus (where Bochart proves the Phœnicians to have had their Colonies) formed, Corpore et veste muliebri; cum Sceptro et Naturâ Virili, quod ἀφροδίτων vocant: cui, viri in veste muliebri, et mulieres in virili veste, sacrificant.⁸ Lett Julius Firmicus tell us of

3 Maimonides, מורה נבוכים [More Nebuchim] Doctor Perplexorum (3.37.447) and Guide (3.37.544–45).

4 Bochart, Opera Omnia, Geographia Sacra Hoc est Phaleg editio tertia (1692), pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 19, col. 110, lines 28–31. John Spencer, De Legibus Hebræorum (1685), lib. 2, cap. 17, sec. 1, p. 408. According to Macrobius (Saturnalia 3.8.3), the Greek historian Philochorus of Cynus (c. 340–260 BCE) (OED) relates in his Atthis (no. 328 fr. 184, FGrH) that the Roman Venus, goddess of fertility, “is also the moon and that men sacrifice to her in women’s dress, women in men’s, because she is held to be both male and female” (59).

5 In his Letter to Irenæus (Epistola LXIX, § 1 [PL 016. 1232C]), St. Ambrose of Milan explains the severity of the Mosaic stricture against cross-dressing (Deut. 22:5): “Why do you play the woman, or you, O woman, the man? Nature clothes each sex in their proper raiment” (Letters of St. Ambrose Letters, 1–91), “Letter LXIX,” p. 410.

6 Illustrating how best to gain the admiration of his audience by denigrating his opponents, Cicero’s orator offers the following taunt by way of ridiculing cross-dressing: “Vôs enim, iuvenes, ánimum geritis mûliebrem, illa’ virgo ‘viri,’” De Officiis (1.61): “For ye, young men, show a womanish soul, yon’ maiden ‘a man’s.” Needless to say that the context of Cicero’s taunt is quite different from that to which Mather puts his quote.

7 St Jerome’s annotation on Isa. 3:12, in Commentariorum in Isaiam Prophetam libri Duo-deviginti, lib. 2, [PL024. 0066C–D], rehearses ancient misogynistic complaints: “Married women and wives are of our senate; they dominate in the churches, and the favor of women judges the priestly rank.”

8 Mather’s principal source for this and the following extracts is John Spencer’s De Legibus Hebræorum (1685), lib. 2, cap. 17, sec. 1, fols. 408 ff. Maurus Servius Honoratius, In Vergilii carmina commentarii (1:312), item 632, on Virgil (Aeneid 2:632), assures us that a statue of Venus was revered in Cyprus, and that “with feminine body and clothing; with male scepter and nature, which they call Aphroditos [male Aphrodite]: To her men sacrifice in female clothing and women in men’s clothing.” Samuel Bochart provides the historical underpinnings for the Venus worshipped among the Assyrians; wherein, *Sacerdotum suorum chorus, ei aliter servire non potest, nisi effæminent vultum, cutem poliant, et virilem sexunt ornatu muliebri dedecorento exornant muliebriter nutritos crines, et delicatis amicti vestibis vix caput lassâ cervice sustentant.*⁹ Lett Hesychius tell us, of the Ithyp[h]alli, among the Græcians, who worshipped Bacchus; γυναικείαν ἔχοντες στολήν· *Muliebrem induti stolam.*¹⁰ Lett Proclus tell us, how the Οσχοφόρια were celebrated among the Athenians, by νεάνια κατὰ γυναικας ἐστολισμένοι· *Adolescentes muliebri veste induti.*¹¹ Lett Polyænus tell us, how the New Moons were observed among the Argives, by Women with Mens Coats & Cloaks, & by Men with Womens Vailes, upon them.¹² Tacitus also will inform us, of this Rite among the old Germans, *Apud Naharvalos antiquæ Religionis lucus ostenditur: præsidet sacerdos muliebri ornatu.*¹³ And Plutarch will inform us, that among the Coans, the Priest of Hercules officiated, γυναικείαν ἐνδεδυμένος ἐθήτα, *muliebri indutus veste.*¹⁴ And in his Roman Questions too, you'll see, that on the Ides of January, the Fidlers, that sang before the Sacrifices, did walk about the City, with Womens Clothes upon them.¹⁵

It is remarkable, that in the Hebrew Original here, They are Arms of a Souldier, כלי גבר, / Arma Bellicosi, which are forbidden to the Woman; and the Phœnician colonies in the Mediterranean world, including those on the island of Cyprus, in Geographia Sacra (1692), pars 2, lib. 1, cap. 3, cols. 352–56.

9 Mather's quote (via Spencer's De Legibus [1685], fol. 408) is a conflated citation from Julius Firmicus Maternus, De Errore Profanarum Religionum (1652), pp. 6–7. Appalled at the Syrian and Carthaginian rites of windy Coelestis-Venus, in which cross-dressing men prostitute themselves in her temples, Firmicus exclaims, "Ah! the band of priests can minister to [Coelestis-Venus] only when they have feminized their faces, rubbed smooth their skin, and disgraced their manly sex by donning women's regalia, [...] nurse their tresses and pretty them up woman-fashion, dress in soft garments, [and] can hardly hold their heads erect on their languid necks" (The Error, ch. 4, sec. 2, p. 50).

10 Hesychius, Lexicon (A–O), alphab. letter iota entry 424, lines 1–2, mentions the Ithyphalli who, sporting their membrum virilis in their Bacchic processions, are "dressed in womanish garment."

11 Photius, Bibliotheca (Codex 239, Bekker page 322a, lines 14–15, quotes from a fragment of Proclus's Chrestomathia (87–92), by the Greek Neoplatonic philosopher Proclus Atheniensis (412–495 CE). The Οσχοφόρια (Oschophoria) was a Dionysian autumnal celebration honoring Athena and Dionysius (DGRA, BNP), in which a chorus of two "young men clothed in female garb" carried clusters of grapes from the grove of Dionysius to the shrine of Athena.

12 The Macedonian rhetorician Polyænus Macedo (fl. 2nd c. CE) (EB) holds forth on the celebration of the new moon among the Argives, in his Strategemata (8.33.1, lines 10–12).

13 The Roman historian Cornelius Tacitus, in his Origine et Situ Germanorum (43), reports that "Among the Naha[na]rvali," a Germanic tribe, "is shown a grove, the seat of a prehistoric ritual: a priest presides in female dress."

14 Plutarch's Aetia Romana et Graeca (263d–304f) reviles he-man Hercules for "attiring himself in female outfits" (Stephanus page 304, sec. C, line 5).

15 Spencer, De Legibus (1685), lib. 2, cap. 17, sec. 1, fol. 408. The Roman Ides of Ianuarius (full moon) always fell on the thirteenth (not fifteenth) of January.

they are the Clothes of a Female /שמלת אשה/ Stola muliebris, forbidden to the Man. Mars, the God, Armorum, and Venus, the Goddess Amorum, the Idolaters thought (as Gulielmus Parisiensis tells us hee found, in a Book of a certain Cacogræcus) thus to accommodate themselves unto. They thought, they would make their Sacred Rites, agreeable to their Deities, by the Habits, in which they performed them.¹⁶

[36v] And there was a Sort of Magic oftentimes intended in these Rites. Credebant (saith William of Paris) decepti viri, applicatione vestium muliebrium, maxime in sacris Veneris, conjungi sibi, ac conciliari amore fortissimo corda mulierum, propter quas hoc faciebant: Similiter et deceptæ, id ipsum credebant de viris, et virilibus vestimentis.¹⁷ However there was alwayes Mischief in these Rites: | Modesty was horribly Renounced in them, and a World of confounded Impudencies, and Impurities perpetrated. Hence Philostratus tells us of Comus, Κῶμος, [The Dæmon of Luxury] that this Comus, permitted the Woman to play the Man, & the Man to bee habited like the Woman.¹⁸ Moreover, they thus confirmed themselves in their Impious Notions of Different Sexes, in their Deities: which Impious Notions were the Foundation of many Absurdities and Abominations. And, at the same Time, there was thus Introduced the Imitation, as well as the Invocation of those Deities. If a Man appeared in a Womans Ornaments, annexed unto his own Weapons, hee openly declared, his Devotion to Venus ὀπλοφοροῦσα, or her Cousin Frigga, the Saxon Idol, which was, Muliebri Habitu amicta, sed Arcu gladióque Armata, as wee are informed by Sheringham. And so, if a Woman putt on Virile Accoutrements, Mars was therein openly declared for.¹⁹

¹⁹ Spencer, De Legibus (411). Cross-dressing men in arms were devoted to Aphrodite oplophoroussa (armed Venus). See Scholia in Apoollonium Rhodium (p. 67, lines 6–7). The English linguist and student of Anglo-Saxon language and literature Robert Sheringham (1602–1678) (ODNB) invokes the German medieval chronicler Adamus Bremensis (fl. 11th c. CE) about Aphrodite's cousin, Frigga (Frigg, Freya), old Saxon goddess and Odin's wife, who was "draped

It is evident, from the Trullan, and Asterian Councils, that Men did use to appear abroad like Women, especially near New-Years Day, when they worshipped their Gods, with a more zealous Imploration of their Favour.²⁰

Wherefore, well might the Lord, pronounce this, a most abominable Practice.

Q. In what Sense did the Ancients take this Prohibition? v. 5.²¹

A. Many learned Men, of the Moderns, as well as of the Ancients, conceding, That it had a special Relation to Following the Camp? This is particularly the Account that Josephus gives of it. φυλάσσετε δε μαλιστα εν ταις μαχαις. Cavete, maxime in Bello, neque Mulier, Habitu Virili utatur, neque Vir stolâ muliebri. Amazonian Women, would fly to the Camp in Armour; cowardly Men would fly from it in a Manteau.²²

But the Ancients were mainly on the Allegorical Stroke in this Matter. Thus Clemens of Alexandria; *Quam Rationem habet hæc lex? Annon vult nos esse viros, et nec corpore, nec factis, nec mente, nec verbis effeminari?*²³ Thus Ambrose; *Arbitror, quòd non tam de veste, quàm de moribus dixerit hæc lex, vel de Usibus, atque Actibus, quòd alius Virum, alius Fæminam deceat Actus.*²⁴ in female clothing but armed with a curved sword [scimitar],” in Sheringham’s De Anglorum Gentis Origine Disceptatio (1670), cap. 14, p. 314. See also Maimonides (Guide 3.37.544).

²¹ Mather’s source for the following paragraphs on the proscription against cross-dressing is the commentary on Deut. 22:5, in Antiquitates Biblicae (1671), fols. 276–77, by Johann Conrad Dieterich (1612–67), German Lutheran historian, librarian, and professor of philology at the University of Giessen.

²⁴ Dieterich (276) quotes St. Ambrose’s Letter to Irenaeus, Epistola 69.5 [PL 016. 1233A–B]. He addresses the appropriate actions of men and women in church and society at large: “I conceive however that it [Deut. 22:5] is spoken not so much of garments as of manners, and of our habits and actions, in that one kind of act becomes a man, the other a woman” (Letter 69.5), in The Letters (411).

It is a proper Admonition given by Mancinellus, De IV. Virtutibus.
Fæmineos Cultus, et Gestus sumere molles,

Quid magis est contrà Naturam, sive Decorum,

Q. What was the Occasion, what the Intention, of the Law about a Birds-Nest? v. 6.²⁶

A. It seems given to breed in the Jewes, a Sense of a Divine Providence, extending itself to all Creatures; and to teach them the Exercise of their Dominion over them, without any Kind of Cruelty. It was unreasonable also, that Men should consider only their own present Interest, without Regard unto Posterity; unto whom the breed ought to be continued by letting the old Bird go free.

Unto this, the Verses commonly ascribed unto Phocylides, have Respect;

Μηδετις ορνιθας καλιης αμα παντας ελεσθω,

Μητερα δ' εκπρολιπης, ιν' εχης παλι της τε νεοττους·

*Lett no Man take all the Birds together out of a Nest; but lett the Mother go, that thou mayst have Young Ones again of her.*²⁷

On the Prosperity annexed unto the Observation of this Precept, the Mischna has a good Remark.²⁸

25 Finally, Mather (via Dieterich 277) quotes four lines from Libellus de quattuor virtutibus (1484), by the Italian poet Dominicus Mancinus, aka. Mancinellus (fl. 1478–1491), whose epic poem on the four virtues went through a least 29 editions between 1516 and 2016 (OCLC WorldCat Identities). The quoted lines from De IV Virtutibus (6.379–382) intone, “A man may think it unworthy and at the same time ridiculous to take on female refinements and soft carriage. What is more against nature or propriety than that a man live in feminine clothing?”

26 Patrick, on Deut. 22:6–7 (Deuteronomy 366, 367).

27 Patrick (Deuteronomy 366) supplies the quotation from Pseudo-Phocylides’s Sententia (lines 84–85), along with the translation. Little is known about the Greek gnomic poet Phocylides of Miletus (b. c. 540 BCE), who is mostly remembered for his quotable moral aphorisms, extant in fragments (EB). Mather omits the Greek diacritics (which Patrick does provide): Μηδέ τις ὀρνίθας καλῆς ἀμα πάντας ἐλέσθω, / Μητέρα δ’ ἐκπρολίποις, ἵν’ ἔχῃς πάλι τῆσδε νεοσσούς. The translation is Patrick’s.

28 The Mishnah on tractate Hullin (12.3, 5) stipulates that “a man may not take the dam with the young for the sake of cleansing the leper [for whose purification two birds were required, one to be slaughtered and the other to be set free into the open field (Lev. 14:4)]. If in respect of so light a precept, which deals with that which is but worth an issar [farthing], the torah said, that it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days (Deut. 22:7), how much more [must be the reward] for the observance of the more difficult precepts of the Torah!” For the same, see Babylonian Talmud (Chulin 142a).

If in a light Precept concerning a thing that is hardly worth a farthing, the Law says, That it may be well with thee, & thou mayst prolong thy Days, how much more may this be expected from obeying more Important Matters, of the Law?²⁹

Q. The Design of that Law, Thou shalt not plough with an Ox & an Ass together? v. 10.³⁰

A. Taught by Dr. Spencer, I do not think with Josephus, and Jonathan, & R. Selomo, and some other Hebrew Doctors, That the Yoking together of all ἐτερόζυγα, Creatures of diverse kinds, or, as Maimonides takes it, the Yoking of any Clean Creature, with an Unclean, is herein forbidden; or, with Maimonides and Rasi and Bechai, & others of them, that other Actions besides that of Ploughing, are intended.³¹ It is a Scandal to mee, to see, how Nice the Jewes generally are, in Expounding & Applying the Lawes of Morality, not a Jot further than the express Letter of the Text; but how large they are in Interpreting the Lawes of Ceremony, as far as any Analogy will carry them. In this Law, lett us keep close to the Words: And lett us Beleeve, That the Conjunction of an Ox, and an Ass, Animals of so unæqual a Nature, Size, and Strength, in the same Yoke, was a Magical Rite, invented by the Divel, to bee used by Men in token of their Dependence upon him, for the fruitfulness of their Fields.

Tis very certain, That such an Unæqual Yoke, was indeed so much against common Reason, that no Reason can bee found for it, but in a magical Idolatry and Superstition. Calphurnius notes it, as every bodies Observation, That, Ne

³⁰ Mather's primary source for his commentary on Deut. 22:10 is John Spencer's De Legibus Hebraeorum (1685), lib. 2, cap. 19, fols. 419, 420, 421, 423.

*pecora quidam, eodem in Jugo, nisi paria, succedunt.*³² Euclio in Plautus, a Poor Man, speaking of marrying his Daughter to a Rich Man, saies,

*Nunc si filiam locassem meam tibi, in mentem venit
Te Bovem esse, et me esse Asellum; ubi Tecum conjunctus siem
Ubi onus nequeam ferre pariter, jaceam ego Asinus in luto.*³³

Paulinus writing to Ausonius, ha's this Passage,

*Namque pares subeunt Juga. Nemo valentes
Copulat infirmis; neque sunt concordia fræna,
Si sit compulsis mensura Jugalibus Impar.
Si Vitulum Tauro, vel Equum committis Onagro.*³⁴

Homer will have none but Boves ἰσοφόρους in the same Yoke.³⁵ And Palladius writes, *Illud antè universa curandum est, ut viribus ad Trahendum Boves comparentur æquales.*³⁶

You know, that when Ulysses personated a Madman, hee did it, by yoking an Horse and an Ass, together.³⁷ Common Sense would have diverted the Israelites from this Peece of Madness, if there had not been Magic designed in it. The 32 Spencer (421) primary source for the following paragraphs is Samuel Bochart's Hierozoicon Animalibus (1663), pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 13, col. 187. Thus via Spencer and Bochart, Mather quotes from the Declamationes (29), by the Roman rhetorician Calpurnius Flaccus (fl. 1st–2nd c. CE) (NCDGRB). The passage appears in Calpernii Flacci Excerptae (1680), p. 407, and explains that herders “do not hitch cattle in the same yoke, unless they are of equal strength.”

33 In his Aulularia (2.2, lines 228–30), the Roman playwright Titus Maccius Plautus (c. 254–184 BCE) has the Athenian miser Euclionis respond to Megadorus's proposal of joining their families through marriage of Euclio's daughter Phaedra: “Now if I were to give my daughter in marriage to you, it springs to mind that you are the ox and I am the donkey. When I'm hitched up to you and can't carry my burden the same way, I the donkey, would lie in the mud.”

34 A renowned Roman poet and senator and convert to Christianity who became bishop of Nola (Campania, Italy), St. Paulinus of Nola (c. 354–431) was also known for his many poems, sacred and prophane (CE). Via Spencer (421), Mather quotes from one of Paulinus's poems to his early teacher and fellow poet Ausonius of Aquitaine, in Poemata (Poema 11.32–35): “No man joins a strong partner with a weak, and it is no harmonious pair if those forced together are unevenly balanced. If you join a calf to a bull, or a horse to a wild ass ... [then you can compare me with you]” (Poems, p. 71).

35 Homer (Odyssey 23.245): ἰσοφόρους (of equal strength).

36 Spencer (421); Bochart (Hierozoicon Animalibus (1663), pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 13, col. 187; in his De Re Rustica Libri XIII (1543), lib. 4, Martius, Tit. XI, p. sec. 99, p. 101, the Roman writer on agriculture Palladius Rutilius Taurus Æmilianus (4th–5th c. CE) recommends that when cattle are hitched in teams for plowing or pulling, “That [it] is to be principally regarded, that they are equal in strength for the purpose of drawing, lest the strength of the more powerful one turn out to be destruction of the other” (On Agriculture 186).

37 Pretending insanity, Odysseus yokes an ox and a horse and plows his field to avoid being dragged into the Trojan War, in Fabula (95), attributed to the Roman writer of Iberia, Gaius Julius Hyginus (fl. 1st c. CE): Ulixes: Itaque cum sciret ad se oratores venturos, insaniam simulans pileum sumpsit et equum cum bove iunxit ad aratrum. “When he [Ulysses] learned that spokesmen would come to him [to join their expedition against Troy], he pretended madness, and yoked a horse and an ox to the plow” (Fabulae 95).

Divel singularly delights in Confusion; the Seething a Kid in its Mothers Milk,³⁸ the Sowing of Diverse Seeds,³⁹ the Wearing of Apparel | belonging to another Sex,⁴⁰ [37v] the, Præternaturalis Fæminam vitiandi modus, a Maimonide Memoratus (Mor. Nevoc. p. 451) Disturbances given to the Order of Nature, and things that the God of Order calls Confusions, these Rites were Agreeable to the Divel.⁴¹ The Ox was a Sacrifice, to the Dij Superi, the Ass to the Dij Inferi: Both Sorts of Deities, were sacramentally call'd upon, for the Success of the Plough, when these were in the Yoke together. Such Mixtures pleased the Divel wonderfully.⁴² Quære, whether the Name of a Witch, Mecasseph, carry not an Intimation of this, in the signification of it. The Divel would, Eà conjungere, quæ Natura simul et usus separasset, ut Deo et Homini se contrarium ostenderet. Now all that practised so Absurd a Rite, openly declared their Acknowledgment of its Diabolical Author.⁴³

Baal-Hatturim seeks a further Mystery in this Prohibition; hee saies, In-nuitur, nihil Justo cum Improbo, debere esse commercij. And Bochart inclines to think, that the Apostles Direction, 2. Cor. 6. 14. Bee not unaqually yoked with Unbelievers, is allusive hereunto.⁴⁴

41 Spencer (420, 421–422); Wisdom 14:26. Spencer here appears to refer to Rabbi Mosis Maimonides. Doctor Perplexorum. Cum commentariis R. Schem Tobh et R. Ephodaei (Venetiis, 1551), p. 451, rather than the more widely used 1629 Latin translation by Johannes Buxtorf. At any rate, Spencer refers to the Zabian fertility rites and “the method of preternaturally despoiling a woman,” remembered in Maimonides’s More Nevochim. The euphemism appears to cover up such magical rites as the following: “if four women lie down upon their backs, raise their legs, holding them apart, and say and do certain things while in this disgraceful posture, hail will cease falling down upon that place” (Guide 3.37.541). Maimonides argues that the Mosaic purity laws were instituted to combat the alluring fertility rites of the Zabians (Sabians). See BA (1:878–79, n183).

42 Spencer (421).

43 Spencer (420); Mather’s Quære (query) – not in Spencer – possibly alludes to the Cambridge Platonist Henry More’s “Postscript,” in Joseph Glanvill’s Saducismus Triumphatus (1689), “The Postscript” (32). Here, More draws on Johannes Buxtorf and R. Ibn Ezra explication of the Hebrew מכשף [mecasseph, mekashaph] (Strong’s # 3784), commonly translated as “witch,” “sorcerer,” “seducer.” Thus the devil likes to “join that which nature and custom at the same time have separated to show himself contrary to God and man.”

44 Spencer (lib. 2, cap. 19, fol. 423); Baal ha-Turim, aka. R. Jacob ben Asher (Rabbeinu Asher) of Cologne, Germany (c. 1269–c. 1343), is best known for his principal work on Jewish law (Ef). His explication of Deut. 22:10 mystically suggests that “a righteous man should not enter into partnership [of any kind] with a wicked man” (Baal HaTurim Chumash 5:2065); Bochart, Hieroicoicon Animalibus (pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 13, col. 187); Mather added this final paragraph at a later time.

Q. It has been objected, That the Tryal of Virginity, directed in the Mosaic Law is both Immodest, and Uncertain, & therefore Unbecoming the Wisdome of God. What can you say of it? v. 13.⁴⁵

A. Many Customes of the Elder Times & the Eastern Parts, may seem strange to us, that are not so well acquainted with the Reasons of those Customes.⁴⁶

If wee are offended at the Literal Sense of these Words, many of the Jewes themselves, do say, they are to bee understood Figuratively, of the Evidence, that that was to bee brought & laid open, before the Judges, on the behalf of the Defamed Person. To countenance this Apprehension, both Josephus and Philo, omitt the Circumstance of, Laying open the Cloth.⁴⁷

But if you take the Law, in the plainest Sense, a learned Man, will advance you at least, these two Vindications of it.

First, However Uncertain some Physicians have thought this Way of Trial to bee among ourselves; yett the Oriental, and especially the Arabian Physicians, do assure us, that it generally holds in those Countreyes. And hence, a Practice of this Nature, is by good Authors, reported, as observed among the Egyptians also, and other Africans, as well as the Arabians. Moreover, Tis possible that sundry Particulars, as to the Practice of this Law, are not here fully expressed; most particularly The Age of the married Persons; which among the Jewes, was commonly very early; even at Twelve Years old; which would give more Certainty to this Experiment.⁴⁸

Secondly. And that this Way of Trial, was not altogether so Immodest as you think for, you are to consider, The Law was Intended for the Præservaion of Persons, from undue & unjust Imputations; and so, such a Course was pitched upon, as would bee most likely to deter all Persons from such unworthy Defamations. Men would have been more prone to such Defamations, because of the Liberty of Divorce, & the Advantage they had, in saving the Dower, if they could prove the Party vitiated before Marriage; therefore all the Proof of that Nature, was to bee passed soon after the Consummation of Marriage; which being agreed then, by all the Friends, there was to bee no Liberty left for Defamation afterwards; but in Case any Man should bee guilty of it, the Producing of those

⁴⁶ Mather's attempt to mitigate the horrors of this demeaning custom speaks loudly in his literal and figurative explication of Deut. 22:13–21.

Evidences, which before they were Agreed upon, should bee a sufficient Vindication of the Accused Innocent.⁴⁹

In fine, Wee may look on this Law, as the Jewes do on that of the Rebellious Son, of which they say, That there is no Instance of its ever being practised; the Penalty threatned, being so effectual to prevent the Occasion of it.⁵⁰

But Lett us Transcribe, if you please, Dr. Patricks Commentary on this Matter: His Words are these.⁵¹

“Tho’ such Tokens of Virginity, as are commonly understood by these Words, might alwayes be found in those Countreyes, (being very consonant unto the Opinion of the chieftest Arabian Physicians, as Mr. Selden observes out of Avicenna, & of the Africans, and other People at this Day, as many Authors testify.⁵² See Joh. Geusius de Victimis Humanis. Part. 1. cap. 9. and P. 2. c. 2. and Wierus L. Medicarum observationum; sect. de Hymene.)⁵³ especially in such

⁵² Selden, Uxor Ebraica (1645), lib. 3, cap. 1, pp. 322–23, quotes from The Canon of Medicine by the renowned Iranian physician Abu Ali al-Husayn ibn Abd Allah ibn Sina, better known as Avicenna (980–1037). A medical handbook translated from Arabic into Latin, Avicennae Medicorum Arabum principis, Liber Canonis, De Medicinis Cordialibus, et Cantica (1556) appeared in many editions and reprints. Avicenna’s holistic medicine was widely appreciated throughout medieval Arabia and Europe and remained popular even beyond Mather’s lifetime. Via Selden (323), Mather refers to a medical description of the vaginal hymen in Avicenna’s Liber Canonis (lib. 3, Fen Quarti Canonis 21, cap. 1) and to that in Al-Razi’s Paraphrasis in Nonum Librum Rhazae Medici Arabis Clariss, ad Regem Almansorem (1537), lib. 1, cap. 26. The latter work, by the Arab physician Al-Razi, aka. Rhazes (854–925), is a paraphrastic translation prepared by the Flemish physician and anatomist Andreas Vesalius (1514–64), whose groundbreaking study on human anatomy appeared as De humani corporis fabrica librorum epitome (1543). On Avicenna, see Mones Abu-Asab et al. Avicenna’s Medicine (2013); on Al-Rhazes, see Abdul Haq Compier’s “Rhazes in the Renaissance of Andreas Vesalius.”

⁵³ Via Patrick (376), Mather refers to Jacobus Geusius (fl. 1660–75), a Dutch theologian and physician, whose 2-volume Victimae Humanae pars prima-altera (1675, 1691) is an anthropological study of ancient Jewish, Christian, and pagan cultural practices. See Victimae (pars 1, cap. 9; and pars 2, cap. 2) on the Jewish custom of preserving the blood-stained cloth as proof of a young woman’s loss of virginity on her first night. So, too, Mather refers to the Dutch physician Joannes Wierus, aka. Johann Weyer (1515–1588), now best remembered for his enlightened publications against the belief in demons and witches, whose Medicarum Observationum rararum liber (1567) Mather also refers to in his Christian Philosopher (169). My reference is to Wier’s segment “De Hymene” (which also includes a depiction of a speculum), in Medicarum Observationum (1660), lib. 1, pp. 939–42, in Opera Omnia (1660), pars 5, pp. 939–42. See also his “Hymenis membranae, qua omnes muniuntur virgines,” in Opera Omnia (1660), pars 3, De Lamiis, cap. 20, pp. 230–31 (a brief segment buried within his lengthy discussion on witches and human monsters).

Virgins, as the Jewes say, were here meant, who were under Thirteen Years of Age; and tho' all that some Physicians and Lawyers in these Parts of the World, have said unto the Contrary, is of no Consideration; yett there are weighty Reasons to incline us to think, that no Man of common Sense, would bring such an Action against his Wife, wherein he was sure to be cast, whether his Cause was Right or Wrong, if these were the Evidences whereby it was to be tried. For, if he Accused her falsely, he knew, her Friends were able to produce the Sheet wherein they lay, when they were married, with such Tokens upon it, as would disprove him, & render him guilty of Defamation. And if he had a just Ground to Accuse her, because he knew, they could produce no such Tokens; yett this was no Proof she had been vitiated, since she had been espoused to him; for she might have been corrupted before; and then he could not attain his End, which was to be rid of her, not by Way of Divorce (for then he must have given her a Dowry, which he was desirous to save,) but by having her putt to Death as an Adulteress, which v. 21. shoves to be the present Case. Such evident Reasons as these, have constrained the Jewes to understand these Words, not according to the very Letter of them, but Figuratively; of such Witnesses produced by her Parents, as convinced the other of Falsity, so evidently, that they made it appear as plainly as a Peece of Cloth, that is unfolded, & laid before Mens Eyes to view it.⁵⁴ And they think, the Hebrew Word, Simlah, which we translate, The Cloth, favours this Expression. For it never signifies, a Sheet, or a Linnen Cloth, (which is wont to be called, Sadin, Judg. 14.12. and Prov. 31.24.) but such Cloth as Mens Garments are made of; which commonly is Woollen, not Linnen.⁵⁵ And so it is used in this Book; ch. 10.18. and in this very Chapter, v. 5. So that the Sense is, They shall produce evident Proofs, & lay them before the Court, like a Peece of Cloth, which is spread for all that please, to look upon it."

"Whether this be the Truth, or no, I will not dispute; but refer the Reader, to Mr. Selden, Lib. III. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 1, 2."⁵⁶

Q. If a Man be found lying with a Woman married to an Husband, then they shall both of them Dy. It is not said, what Sort of Death? v. 22.

A. The Jewes tell us, They were to be Strangled. This is an Opinion so settled among them, that Buxtorf saies, He never saw any Hebrew Book, which assigned any other Punishment for Adultery. Indeed, Stoning was the Punishment of her, that after her Espousals, plaid the Whore, before Marriage. But after the Marriage was compleated, Strangling was the Punishment.⁵⁷

Q. In that Law, A Bastard shall not enter into the Congregation of the Lord, what is meant, by, A Bastard, and what is meant by, entering into the Congregation? v. 2.

A. The Mamzer [or, Bastard] here interdicted, is by Grotius thought, one born of a Conjunction so criminal, that either Death, or Excision, was the Punishment for it. And so the Hebrewes understand it. And by entering into the Congregation, Maimonides understands an Admission to, Jus Connubij, among the Israelites; to marry with an Israelites.¹

But the Prohibition of Eunuchs, and Bastards, and Ammonites and Moabites, to enter into the Congregation, until the Tenth Generation; or, the Children of the Edomites, until the Third: needs a little further Illustration?²

They who exclude these Persons, from the Liberty of being present at Religious Assemblies, are grossly mistaken. Strangers had by the Law of God, the same Liberty with Israelites, to be present at His Worship.³ To say, That the Prohibition intends only the Inner Court of the Tabernacle, where none but the Clean might enter, will not fully reach the Case. The Generality of Interpreters therefore, after the Rabbins, understand it, That the Heathens might not marry with the Israelites, who are called, The Congregation of the Eternal. But yett, the Lord allow'd Free Proselytes, and their Children, to marry with them; and they

1 Mather's source is Hugo Grotius's annotations on Deut. 23:2 (Opera Omnia 1.1.97–98), which narrows the meaning of the Hebrew word Mamzer מַמְזֵר (Strong's # 4464), which generally signifies a "bastard, child of incest, illegitimate child," but also one "born of a Jewish father and a heathen mother or vice versa." To Grotius, a mamzer is the offspring of an antinomian union, punishable by כרת "excision." To Maimonides (Rambam), the "Jus Connubij" or "Law of Marriage" entails a proscription against admitting a mamzer into the congregation of the Lord (Deut. 23:2, 3), which stipulation is "to deter people from illicit unions, [for] a bastard is forbidden to marry a daughter of Israel [Deut. 23:3]; so that the adulterous man and adulterous woman should know that by committing their act they attach to their descendants a stigma that can never be effaced. ... [T]he seed of Israel is regarded as too noble to mix with bastards" (Guide 3.49.611). Rambam says much the same in his Hilcoth Issurei Bi'ah (15.1–2, 7, 9–10), in Mishneh Torah (26:182, 184, 186). His interpretation is seconded by those of Rashi, Ibn Ezra, and most of the other classical rabbis, in The JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot (5:154). were accounted to be of the Tribe, to which they were allied. And why should there have been any Lawes about the Marriage of Eunuchs, who were not capable of it?⁴

Wherefore it must be at length observed; That for to enter the Congregation of the Lord, signifies, To be Members of the Government, and officiate in the Publick Administration of Affayrs. When tis said, The Priests enter into the House of the Lord, it means, They perform the Public Exercise of Religion in that House. And the Judges of the Jewes, are expressly called, The Congregation of God. [Psal. 82.1.]

Here then it might be rendred, They shall not enter into the Council of the Lord; or into the Magistracy.⁵

Q. That Law; Thou shalt not deliver up a Servant unto his Master, which is escaped unto thee from his Master: He shall dwell with thee, thou shalt not vex him. It seems a little strange, except we know, what Servant is intended? v. 15.⁶

A. The Chaldee has determind that, by adding, A Servant of the People; that is to say, of the Gentiles. Our Ainsworth gives a true Exposition; It means one who for the Religion of God, comes from his Master to the Church of Israel. Tis noted by Maimonides, This Servant that flees to the Land of Israel, is a Righteous Stranger; that is to say, a Proselyte come unto the Faith and Covenant of God.⁷

It is a Remark which our Ainsworth further ha's upon it; That by this Law God shewed His Love in Christ, towards all Strangers, even in their basest Estate, who do in Faith come unto Him; For there is neither Bond nor Free, but all are one in Christ Jesus. And he has this Remark also; That we have here a Figure of the Grace of God unto Sinners; who were the Servants of Sin, but obeying from the Heart the Doctrine of God, are made Free from Sin.⁸

That this Law might shine in its full æquity, the Hebrewes tell us, The Master was to be spoken unto, to write for this escaped Servant, a Bill of Manumission, and he again was to write him a Bill of Debt for his Price, until he was able to pay, and then he paid him. This you have in Maimonides's Treatise, Of Servants; who adds,

⁷ Maimonides, Hilchot Avadim (8.10), in Mishneh Torah (12:712), glosses that a "Slave who fled to Eretz Yisrael is a righteous gentile. Scripture adds a specific warning for anyone who would desire to deride him, for he is even more humble-spirited than a convert. Therefore, Scripture [Deut. 23:17] issues a command with regard to him: 'He shall dwell with you, in your midst, in one of your cities that he desires. You shall not abuse him'." Q. There shall bee no Whore of the Daughter of Israel, nor a Sodomite of the Sons of Israel: The special Design of this Law? v. 17.¹²

A. Wee have the Testimony of Athanasius for it, That the Phœnician Women of old prostituted themselves before their Idols, imagining that by so offering up their Virginity, their Gods were made propitious; and, that ἄνδρες [δὲ] τὴν φύσιν ἀρνούμενοι the Men abdicating their Sex, behaved themselves no more as Men, but affecting to bee used like Women, they thought they thereby did Honour to the Mother of the Gods.¹³ The Wretches exposed themselves to bee thus Abused, it seems, by the next Comers, in the Temples of their Divels, proposing to gratify those unclean Dæmons by such Horrid Actions. It is likewise a Passage in Herodotus, That the Babylonians had this filthy Law among them; That the Women once in their Lives, at the Temple of Venus, [or, Mylitta] prostituted themselves to ἀνδρὶ ξείνῳ, to some Strange Man or other, that should meet them there threw down a Peece of Money more or less, which was given to the Temple.¹⁴ The Women sat down in the Temple distinguished from one another, by little Cords, which the Man might break if the Woman seem'd coy, & carry her out of the Temple in a Corner. And the Epistle of Jeremiah tells us, that there were Whores Devoted unto Bel, among the Babylonians.¹⁵ Moreover,

¹⁰ Lev. 25:14 is probably more appropriate than the one Mather copies from Ainsworth: Lev. 27:17.

Strabo reports of Comana, in Cappadocia, That in the Temple sacred unto the Moon, πλῆθος γυναικῶν τῶν ἐργαζομένων ἀπὸ τοῦ σώματος, ὧν αἱ πλείους εἰσιν ἱεραὶ—there was a Multitude of Women, who prostituted their Bodies; whereof the most were Sacred; wherein, hee saies, the Place was like to Corinth, for the Multitude of Whores that were Sacred unto Venus there.¹⁶ And of Corinth, accordingly Alexander ab Alexandro saies, Corinthi suprà mille prostitute in Templo Veneris assidue degere, et inflammata libidine questui meretricio operam dare, et velut Sacrorum ministræ Deæ famulari solebant.¹⁷ Agreeable to which abominable Custom, be that which Alexander Sardus relates, Antè Nuptias Solebant Heliopolitæ in Veneris Templo prostare; Amorrhæ septem diebus in Syriâ; Armeniæ in Templo Deæ Tanaidis, aut Anaitidis.¹⁸

Now the Hebrew Words used in the Text before us, do carry some Consecration to Idol-Worship, in the Signification | of them. Compare 1. King. 14.24. [38v] and 2. King. 23.7. And what Grotius writes, upon the First of the Romans. And the Words here used by the LXX, intimate a Devotion to the Sacred Mysteries of Idolatry.¹⁹

The Law parallel to this, in Lev. 19.29. Mr. Selden judges to refer unto the old Rites of Mylitta, wherein Persons were diabolically prostituted. Hence the Reason given is, Lest the Land fall to Whordome, & the Land become full of Wickედness.²⁰ There were Whores always in the Land; the Book of Proverbs declares as much. But if once, the notion of Whoring under a Religious Character, & of

“The women also with cordes about them, sitting in the wayes, burne branne for perfume: but if any of them drawn by some that passeth by, lie with him, she reproacheth her fellow that she was not thought as worthy as her selfe, nor her cord broken.”

16 Strabo, Geographia (12.3.36, lines 8–9), “There is a multitude of women who make gain from their persons, most of whom are dedicated to the goddess [Aphrodite].”

17 Mather (via Spencer 440) extracts this passage from Genialium Dierum (1673), tom. 2, lib. 6, cap. 26, p. 753, by the learned Neapolitan lawyer Alexander ab Alexandro (1461–1523). First published in Rome (1522), this curious philological and historical miscellany was very popular and went through at least ten editions – with and without the valuable commentaries and notes by Andreas Tiraqueau and others. The two-volume Leyden edition of 1673 is most useful. The review of this work and of some of its editions, in Pierre Bayle’s 10-volume General Dictionary (1735–1741) 1:483–85, offers much valuable information. Be that as it may, the Latin citation from the learned Neapolitan translates, “At the temple of Venus in Corinth, more than a thousand prostitutes ply their trade, and ever inflamed give their lives of lust to the profit of harlotry and to serve their goddess as handmaidens of their rites.”

18 Spencer (440) slightly conflates his Latin quotation from De Moribus ac Ritibus Gentium libri tres (1557), lib. 1, cap. 3, p. 4, by the Italian historian and archivist Alexander Sardus (Alessandro Sardi) of Ferrara (c. 1520–c. 1599). See M. Saccenti, “Sardi, Alessandro.” Thus Sardi adds, “Before weddings, the Heliopolites were accustomed to whoring in the temple of Venus; the Amorites in Syria for seven days; the Armenians in the temple of the goddess Tanaid, or of Anaitis.”

20 Lev. 19:29; John Selden, De Diis Syris Syntagma (1617), Syntag. 2, cap. 7, p. 228, out of Herodotus (1.199).

Libidinous Practices being Acceptable to God, should have been at all entertained, the Poison of that Notion, would in a little Time have prodigiously infected all the Land: As Athanasius in his Oration against the Pagans, [says] excellently.²¹ And I suspect, that the Crime of those two Wretches, Hophni and Phinehas, partly lay, in Endeavours to Introduce Divellish Villanies under such a Notion: or, at least, to Imitate them.²²

When wee read the Inhibition given to the Priest, in Lev. 21.7. Hee shall not take a Wife that is profane; I suppose it means one of these Women; one, Quam aliquis, sub Religionis pretextu, et in Numinis alicujus profani Honorem corrumpisset. Such an one, tho' shee came to lead a New Life, was yett Profane, and the Priest of the True God might not marry her. Women Consecrated, or Initiated, unto an Idol, Actu meretricio were βεβηλωμεναι, or, Profane.²³

Q. The Sense and Scope of that Law, Thou shalt not bring the Hire of a Whore, or the Price of a Dog, into the House of the Lord thy God, for any Vow? v. 18.²⁴

A. This double Abomination, must bee distinctly spoken to.²⁵

For the former of these Abominations, It is very certain, that the ancient Pagans, did make a Gain of Prostitutions, with which Gains, their Temples were supported. Many are the Testimonies, which Antiquitie gives hereunto. Tis a Passage in Mic. 1.7. All the graven Images thereof, shall bee beaten to Peeeces, and all the Hires thereof shall bee burnt with Fire; – for shee gathered it, of the Hire of an Harlot, & they shall Return to the Hire of an Harlot. Jerom expounds it, That their Idolatrous Treasures, which being obtained by Harlotry, should bee carried into Ninive, a City compared unto an Harlot.²⁶ And you may add, if you please, 21 St. Athanasius, Oratio contra Gentes (27); Against the Heathen (26), in NPNFii (4:17–19).

22 Sons of Eli (high priest of Shiloh), Hophni and Phineas were members of the priesthood but committed idolatrous acts with the serving women and were killed in the Battle of Aphek (1 Sam. 2:12; 4:11–18). Significantly, the rabbis of the Babylonian Talmud, tractate Shabbath (55b) and the Gemarists, in tractate K'rithoth (28a) disagree about their guilt or innocence; as does R. Jonathan in the Chaldaean paraphrase Targum Jonathan, in Walton, Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (2:206, 208).

23 Mather's Latin quote is from Spencer's De Legibus (1685), lib. 2, cap. 22, fols. 442–43. According to Lev. 21:7, priests must not marry "[a woman] whom someone has corrupted under the pretext of religion and in honor of some divine power." Thus women consecrated unto an Idol, Actu meretricio by "an act of prostitution" were βεβηλωμένην (Lev. 21:7; LXX) profane or "desecrated."

24 Spencer, De Legibus (1685), lib. 2, cap. 23, sec. 1, fol. 444.

25 Maimonides, More Nebuchim (3.46.481–482) and Guide (3.46.583): "This is also the reason for the prohibition against offering up the hire of a harlot or the price of a dog [Deut. 23:19], because both are vile." See also John Selden's Historie of Tithes (1618), cap. 5, p. 57; and Selden's De Jure Naturali & Gentium (1640), lib. 5, cap. 4, pp. 553–57.

the Report of Athenæus, that the Gentiles did sometimes offer unto Whores, the Gifts that had been offered unto their Gods.²⁷ The Apocryphal Epistle of Jeremiah annexed unto Baruch, Chap. 6.42, 43. gives a full Relation of this Matter.²⁸ And, the Words of Herodotus are very particular, Ἐν τεμένει Ἀφροδίτης: Ad Templum Veneris sedent multæ mulieres, nodis corollisque Tempora revinctæ, è quibus aliæ accedunt, aliæ discedunt. Nam diverticula undecunque sic funiculis distincta, adytum præbent externis ad mulieres illas, quam cuique libuerit eligendam. Porro cùm semel illic consederint, non priùs Domum Regrediuntur quàm Hospitum aliquis pecuniam mulieri in sinum conjecerit, et cum eâdem, à fano seorsim abductâ, rem habuerit. Hospitem autem illum, qui pecuniam obtulit, dicere oportet. Tanti ego tibi Deam Mylittam imploro. At verò pecuniam illam, quantulacunque sit, non est fas rejicere: siquidem in Sacrum convertitur usum.²⁹ And Vincentius Leblanc, in his Travels, tells us, that near an Arabian Town, called Masar, there stood of old, a Temple Dedicated unto Venus, where the young Women prostituted themselves. But a more Noted Whore than the rest, named Ameliga, was noted for this, that shee would never take any Hire from the Rich, but oblige them to bestow something upon the Poor, using these Words, Worship the Goddess Ameliza, to whom these Things are offered.³⁰ How t'was among the Phœnicians, tis declared by Austin, who speaks of the, Venus meretricum, cui Phœnices donum dabant, de prostitutione Filiarum, antequam jungerent eos Viris.³¹ How t'was among the Africans, is declared by Valerius Maximus, who saies, that at Sicca, a Colony of that 27 Spencer (444); Athenæus Naucratis, in his Deipnosophistae (13.3–5), describes the sacred temple prostitution among the ancients.

28 The deuterocanonical Epistle of Jeremiah constitutes the sixth chapter of the Apocryphal Baruch. Chapter six details the idolatrous practices of the Babylonian religion as a warning for the captive Jews. Mather specifically refers to Baruch 6:42–43.

29 Spencer (444–45); according to Herodotus (Historiae 1.199), “Ἐν τεμένει Ἀφροδίτης”: “Most of the women sit in the sacred precinct of Venus [Aphrodite] with a garland round their heads made of string. There is constant coming and going, and there are roped-off passages running through the crowds of women in every direction, through which the strangers walk and take their pick. When once a woman has taken her seat there, she may not go home again until one of the strangers throws a piece of silver into her lap and lies with her, outside the temple. As he throws a coin, the man says, ‘I summon you in the name of the goddess Mylitta.’ The greatness of the coin may be what it may, for it is not lawful to reject it, since this money, once it is thrown, becomes sacred.”

30 The French traveller Vincent Le Blanc of Marseille (1554–c. 1640) records his imaginative and semi-fictional explorations of “64” parts of the world, including India, Persia, Pegu (Burma), Marocco, Guinea, South Africa, as well as in North and South America. The first edition of his Les Voyages Fameux du Sieur Vincent Le Blanc Marseillois (Paris, 1649) was reprinted in 1658 and translated into Dutch (Amsterdam, 1654), English (London, 1660), and various other European languages (François Angelier, Dictionnaire 428). Via Spencer’s De Legibus (1685), lib. 2, cap. 23, sec. 1, fol. 445, Mather paraphrases Spencer’s Latin extract, the original of which appears in Les Voyages Fameux (1649), partie 2, ch. 23, pp. 172–73.

31 In his Civitate Dei (4.10) [PL 041. 0121], St. Augustine speaks of the “harlot Venus to whom the Phenicians offered a gift by prostituting their daughters before they united them to husbands” (City of God 4.10), in NPNFi (2:70).

Countray, there was Fanum Veneris, in quod se matronæ conferebant, atque inde procedentes ad quæstum, dotes injuriâ corporis contrahebant.³² How t'was among the Egyptians; lett Lucian inform us; Hee sais, The Women among them, that would not bee shorn, to Adonis, Τοῖνδε ζήμιαν ἐκτελέουσι. Talem pænam exolvunt. Unum quidem Diem, ad quæstum corpore faciendum, foro prostant: forum autem illud solis peregrinis, exhibetur: et quod indè mercedis auferunt, hoc Veneri in sacrificium datur.³³ Both Justin, and Julius Firmicus, tell us of the like basenesses among the Cyprians.³⁴ Athenæus tells us, of the Temples, or Idols raised among the Græcians, by such Prices of Whoredome.³⁵ Arnobius twits them of it: and Clemens of Alexandria remembers it. And there wants not Proof of the same Usages among the Romans.³⁶

Now the Holy God of Israel, would have His Worship, wholly kept clear of all such abominable Impurities. Nothing that should bee contrary to the purest Chastity, would bee allow'd by the Holy One of Israel. Whereas, how ready would corrupt Nature have been, to have committed all the filthy Things imaginable, if once a Pretence of Religion might have given Countenance thereunto. How infamous, would all the Gains of Harlotry have been, & how disagreeable to the Reverence of the Sanctuary?³⁷

For the latter of these Abominations, I will not insist on the Opinion of Abarbinel, and Junius, & many more, that by a Dog here, is meant the Sodomite in the Context spoken of, who is in the Apocalypse also called a Dog; as Martial does likewise putt that Name upon a Man of much Impudence in Wickedness:³⁸

32 Spencer (445); Valerius Maximus, in his Factorum et Dictorum Memorabilium (2.6.15) relates that at Sicca there is a "temple of Venus, where married women used to gather and issuing thence for gain to collect dowries by outraging their bodies."

33 Lucianus, De Syria dea (6, lines 14–15) explains, "The women who refuse to be shaved have to submit to the following penalty, viz., to stand for the space of an entire day in readiness to expose their persons for hire. The place of hire is open to none but foreigners, and out of the proceeds of the traffic of these women a sacrifice to Aphrodite is paid" (The Syrian Goddess 46). See also Herodotus (1.199) and Strabo (11.14.16) for much the same.

34 Spencer (445–46); in his Epitome of the Philippic History of Pompeius Trogus, Marcus Junianus Justinus (18.5, line 5) reports that it was the custom among the Cyprians to send their virgins before marriage to prostitute themselves on certain days to gain money for their oblations to the temple of Venus. Likewise, Julius Firmicus Maternus, in his De Errore Profanarum Religionum (1652), p. 15, derides Cinyras of Cyprus in whose Venus temple unspeakable whoredoms are performed as sacred rites (The Error, ch. 10, pp. 65–66).

35 Spencer (446); in his Deipnosophistae (13.3–5) Athenæus Naucratis describes the sexual histrionics of conquerors and their gods among the ancient pagans.

36 Arnobius (Adversus Gentes 6.22–26) and Clemens Alexandrinus (Protrepticus 3.45.4–5) have much to say on the Cyprian temples devoted to Aphrodite and the ventry of her devotees.

37 Lev. 19:29–30

38 Spencer (449) enlists Franciscus Junius's commentary on Deut. 23:19, in Opera Theologica Sacrarum Literarum (1613), tom 1, pp. 583–84; see also Matthew Poole's Synopsis Criticorum (1:841–42) and Works (8b, p. 111), which mention the Lutheran divine Johannes Gerhard, the Jesuit Jacobus Bonfrerius, the Lutheran Johannes Piscator, and the Jesuit Joannes Stephanus

For Bochart saies well, Legislatores Tropis et Metaphoris uti non solent.³⁹ Nor will I insist on the Opinion of Josephus, herein followed by Castalio & Bonfrerius, That a Price for Liberty to keep a Dog, whether Pastoral, or Venatic, is here treated as an abominable Offering; which indeed, may agree well enough with the Context, but wants the Countenance of any ancient Usage to confirm it.⁴⁰ Nor will I insist on the Opinion of Austin, Lyra, Abulensis, Cajetan, & I know not who, that the Redemption for the First-born of a Dog, is Rejected in this Edict of Heaven.⁴¹ For in a Litter of many Whelps, brought forth in a Dark By-Place, who could say which was the First-born? And indeed the Law about Redeeming the First-born of unclean Animals, did not extend unto all Sorts of them; such pitiful Things (for Instance) as Cats & Apes were not therein comprehended.⁴²

But wee must know, that the old Zabians, & especially the Egyptians, did mightily worship, a Dog.⁴³ Diodorus Siculus tells us, that Σέβονται ἐν τῶν ζώων Menochius as post-Reformation theologians who also interpret the link (Deut. 23:18) between a prostitute and a canine as a reference to Sodomites. Gersonides and Abarbanel (Deut. 23:19) opine that “the reasons that dogs are mentioned in this context, and compared to whores, is that homosexuality is rampant among them. . . . Dogs are among the lowliest of animals” (JPS Miqra’ot Gedolot 5:158–59). Not much behind is the Roman poet Marcus Valerius Martialis, in his Liber de Spectaculorum (4.53), who likens Cosmus, a lonely, old man begging for food and lingering on the threshold of Minerva’s temple, to a dog – punning on the Greek word κυνικός [kunikos], i. e., Cynic, suggesting “dog-like.” Rev. 22:15 lumps together dogs, sorcerers, whore-mongers, murderers, idolaters, and liars – all of whom are excluded from the City of God.

39 Mather, via Spencer (450), draws on Samuel Bochart’s Hierozoicon, sive Bipertitum Opus de Animalibus (1663), pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 56, col. 690 (line 71), and insists that “lawgivers are by no means in the habit of using tropes and metaphors.”

40 Bochart (col. 690, lines 55–51) also supplies Spencer with the reference to Josephus Flavius’s Antiquitates Judaicae (4.206, lines 3–5), who glosses that “no one may take the price of the covering of a bitch, either of one that is used in hunting, or in keeping of sheep, and thence sacrifice to God” (Antiquities 4.8.9). Much the same appears in the gloss on Deut. 23:18, in Sebastian Castallio’s Biblia Interprete (1556), col. 208, lines 48–50; and in Jacobus Bonfrerio’s Pentateuchus Moysis Commentario Illustratus (1625), fol. 1003.

41 St. Augustine, on Deut. 23:19, in his Questiones in Heptateuchum Libri Septem (lib. 5, quaest. 38) [PL 034. 0759]; Nicholas de Lyra’s Postillae litteralis in Vetus et Novum Testamentum (1492), on Deut. 23:18; Alphonsus Tostatus Abulensis’s Commentaria in Deuteronomium (1596), fol. 123rd; and, at last, Cardinal Thomas de Vio Cajetan, in his Commentarii illustres (1539), fol. ccccxliii–ccccxliii.

42 Mather’s muse for this paragraph is Spencer’s De Legibus Hebraeorum, lib. 2, cap. 23, sec. 2, fols. 449–50.

43 Spencer (451); Maimonides, in his More Nebuchim (1629) 1.36.52–55; 3.29–31.421–30, and Guide (3.29–31.514–23) has much to say on the Zabians (Sabians) – a generic term for pagans – and their idolatrous rites, which the tractate Avodah Zarah (The Mishnah 437–45) anathematizes. On Mather’s discussion of the Sabians, see his “Antiqua. Or, Our Sacred Scriptures illustrated,” in Mather’s “Appendix. Containing Some General Stores,” ch. 5, appended to his commentary on Revelation (Biblia Americana, vol. 10). Humphrey Prideaux’s oft-reprinted The Old and New Testament Connected in the History of the Jews and Neighbouring Nations, 2nd edition (1716), vol. 1, pt. 1, bk. 3, pp. 177–79, 216–28, 241–42, 529–30), informs Mather’s extract in “Antiqua.” For Maimonides’s views of the ancient Sabians, see J. M. Elukin, “Maimonides.” The ancient Egyptian reverence of a “dog” is part of the cultus of the Jackal-headed καθ' ὑπερβολὴν· *They extravagantly worshipped some Animals, even when they were Dead, as well as when they were Alive, as Cats, Ichneumons, Wesels, & Dogs.*⁴⁴ And Plutarch tells us, That among them, τὰς μεγίστας τιμὰς ὁ κύων ἔσχεν· The Dog had the greatest Honours of any. And hence tho' one thing were worshipped by some, [39v] & another by others, wee are told by Strabo, They all worshipped the Dog.⁴⁵ | Juvenal therefore Jeers them,

*Oppida tota canem venerantur, Nemo Dianam.*⁴⁶

And whereas, upon the Death of a Cat in an House, Herodotus tells us, the Inhabitants express'd their Sorrow by shaving their Eyebrowes, on the Death of a Dog, they shaved πᾶν τὸ σῶμα καὶ τὴν κεφαλὴν· their whole Bodies, & their Heads: which Diodorus Siculus also relates of them.⁴⁷ There were many other Points of Dog-Worship among them, which doubtless were mentioned, in that Book of Labeon, De Dijs Animalibus, quoted by Servius, but the Book is lost.⁴⁸

Anubis, guardian of the dead, who presides over the judgment of the heart (R. H. Wilkinson, Complete Gods 187–92).

44 Mather translates his second-hand Greek quotation from Diodorus Siculus (1.83.1, lines 3–4), via Spencer (451), and lambastes the ancient Egyptians for their deification of animals: the feline Bastet (protectress of the dead) at the temple of Bubastis; the scorpion-like goddess Hedetet (or Serket), protectress of motherhood (perhaps even the scarab-headed god Khepri, associated with the rising sun); the mongoose-like Mafdet, variously associated with magic spells to countermand harmful creatures; and finally, the Jackal-headed Anubis (Wilkinson, Complete Gods 177–78, 196–97, 230–35, 187–92). Herodotus (2.66–76) has much to say about these zoomorphic deities of Egypt.

45 Plutarch (De Iside et Osiride (368f, lines 2–4) explains that Shackal-headed Anubis, born of Nephthys (“that which is beneath the earth and invisible”) and cherished by Isis (“that which is above the earth and visible”), is associated with the arc of the horizon, which touches both heaven and earth. Like all canines, Anubis is able to see by night and day. Strabo (Geographia 17.1.40, lines 6–8) knowingly relates that Anubis was especially revered at Cynopolis, the City of Dogs, where canines were regularly fed dainties in sacred rituals. “Certain animals,” Strabo continues, “are worshipped by all Egyptians in common” such as the “three land animals, bull and dog and cat, and two birds, hawk and ibis, and two aquatics, scale-fish and oxyrynchus, “a fish with a pointed snout” (OED), associated with an eponymous city on a tributary of the upper Nile.

46 Juvenal (Satire 15:8) mocks that in Egypt near Memnon and Thebes, “entire towns venerate a dog, but no one worships Diana.”

47 Mather's quote (via Spencer 451) is from Herodotus (2.66 line 17–2.67, line 1). The Greek Sicilian explains that “In whoever's house a cat dies naturally, those who dwell in the house all shave their eyebrows, but only these; if the dead animal is a dog, they shave all their body and head. The dead cats are carried away to sacred houses where they are buried, as soon as [they are] mummified, in the city of Bubastis” (The History 160). Not far behind Herodotus, the Roman historian of Sicily, Diodorus Siculus (1.87.3, lines 5–8) reports that some believe “that dogs guided Isis during her search for Osiris and protected her from wild beasts and wayfarers, and that they [dogs] helped her in her search, because of the affection they bore for her, by baying; and this is the reason why at the Festival of Isis the procession is led by dogs.”

48 In his famous commentary on Virgil's Aeneid, the learned Roman grammarian Maurus Servius Honoratius alludes to the household gods among the ancient Trojans whose sacred canine rites are to have shaped those of the Egyptians – that is if Servius's reference to Cornelius Labeo's now fragmentary De Diis Animalibus, a treatise on the Euhemeristic Penates and Lares (household gods) among the ancient Etruscan deities, can be trusted. This and more can be

Now one Reason of this Dog-Worship among the Egyptians, might bee that whereof Ælian takes notice: That upon the Rising of the Dog-Star, to their Observation, the fructiferous Inundations & Irrigations of Nilus do also begin; & so they worship the Dog-Star, ὡς ἄγοντα τὸδε τὸ γόνιμον ὕδωρ, καὶ παρακαλοῦντα. Ut Aquæ fertilis Inductorem; and the living Dog itself in Communion with it.⁴⁹ Moreover, a Dog was among them the Symbol of their Anubis or Mercury. And therefore, that wee may approach yett nearer to the Matter, the Price of a Whore and of a Dog, are forbidden, out of a Design to affront the Idolatry of the Egyptians, wherein that noted Couple, Isis and Anubis were adored; all the Rites, belonging to the Worship of those two Egyptian Idols, are thus Damn'd by the God of Heaven. Among the Egyptians, as well as other Nations the Worship of Isis was a Divellish Whoredome, and the Lucre of that Whoredome was employ'd upon her Temple.⁵⁰ Hereto may refer those Words of Ovid, found in Servius, In Vergilii Carmina Commentarii in Vergilii Aeneidos Commentarius (Thilo ed., vol. 1), lib. 3, sec. 168, p. 373. The Latin writer Cornelius Labeo, aka. Labeón (c. 2nd half of the 3rd c. CE), was the author of several works on religious subjects, including De Oraculo Apollinis Clarii and De Diis Animalibus – extant only in fragments (D. Briquel, “Cornelius Labeo” 345–56).

*Nec tu Niligenam fieri quid posit ad Isin Quæsieris.*⁵¹

And those of Juvenal,

49 The Roman Sophist Claudius Aelianus explains in his De natura animalium (10.45, lines 15–17) – here quoted at second hand from Spencer (451–52) – that the Egyptians revere the dog of Orion (like the Nile), “for bringing and summoning this fertilising water” and for inundating the arable soil every year in early summer.

50 Mather provides a paraphrastic translation of Spencer’s De Legibus (1685), lib. 2, cap. 23, secs. 2–3, fols. 453, 454. Spencer’s muse in much of this section is Samuel Bochart’s Hierozoicon De Animalibus (1663), pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 56, col. 691.

51 Ovid, Amores (2.25–26), teases, “Nec tu linigeram fieri quid possit ad Isim, quaesieris,” i. e., “Don’t ask what happens at linen-clad Isis’ temple.” Mather’s second-hand quote is from Spencer (454), who substitutes “linigeram” (linen-clad) with the variant reading “Niligenam.” This well-known punning substitution can be found in several seventeenth- and eighteenth-century annotated Ovid editions. “Niligenam” amounts to a double pun suggesting “Nile-born,” “brought forth by the Nile,” but also alluding to “nilum genere” or “born from nothingness” and “giving birth to something of no value.” This punning substitution alludes to Ovid’s hilarious story of the lecherous Jupiter/J Zeus who – to cover up his dalliance with the beautiful mortal Io (aka. Callithya, priestess of Zeus’s jealous wife Hera/Juno) – turns Io into a milk white heifer but claims that the fair form sprang from the earth. Hera, not easily outfoxed, suspects the ruse, has gadflies pester the heifer Io, until the beauteous bovine wanders off to Egypt, where she gives birth to Epaphus on the banks of the Nile (Ovid’s Metamorphoses 1.567–746). Ovid draws on a Greek variant myth of the Egyptian Isis (Io) and her sacred companion, the bull Apis (Epaphus) (EB).

52 And Juvenal (Satire 6.489–490), ridiculing the wiles of a genteel woman and her amorous affairs, laughs at her hurriedly getting ready “when she is already expected in the park, or rather at the sanctuary of Isis.”

Whereon the Scholiast expounds it, Apud Templum Isidis, Lenæ conciliatricis; quia in Hortis Templorum ejus Adulteria committuntur.⁵³ And then, for the Worship of Anubis, they gave him, as Diodorus Siculus assures us, κυνὸς κεφαλὴν· the Head of a Dog;⁵⁴ for which Cause, Lucian called him, κυνοπρόσωπος Ἑρμῆς· and Athanasius called him, κυνοκέφαλος Ἄνουβις.⁵⁵ and Virgil speaks of,

Omnigenūmq̄ Deūm Monstra, et Latrator Anubis.⁵⁶

Which is interpreted by Servius, Quòd Canino capite pingitur.⁵⁷

Moreover, the Familiaritie shall I call it, or Affinitie between Isis and Anubis, was abundantly testified by that Egyptian Pillar, erected unto Isis, which had these Words upon it, I am Isis, the Queen of this Region, ἡ παιδευθεῖσα ὑπὸ Ἑρμοῦ· Instructed by Mercury;⁵⁸ and shee that Rises with the Dog-Star, &c. And in the Poms of Isis, a Dog, for Mercury, went first: and this Dog was made the Image of Mercury, according to Servius, because, Canæ nihil sagacius.⁵⁹ And indeed, among the Egyptians, a Dog was the Hieroglyphic for a Prophet, a Scribe, or any singularly learned Person; for which as Horus tells us, κύνα ζωογράφουσι· Canem pingunt.⁶⁰

53 The scholiast of the Scholia Vetustiora on Juvenal's Satire (6.489) glosses, "Near the temple of Isis, a bawdy brothel-keeper meets [her customers] in the pleasure garden to commit adultery." The traditional glosses of the classical scholiast can be found in Decimi Junii Juvenalis Satiræ Ad Codices Parisionos (1810), p. 276, on v. 489. See also Alan Cameron, "The Date of the Scholia Vetustiora on Juvenal" (2010).

54 Diodorus Siculus (1.87.2) reports that since the dog both protects man and helps him hunt, the Egyptians depict Anubis, guardian of Osiris and Isis, with a "dog's head."

55 Lucian (De Sacrificiis 14, lines 5, 6), not to be outdone, speaks of the "dog-faced Hermes"; and so does St. Athanasius, in his Contra Gentes (22, line 9), who mentions the κυνοκέφαλος Ἄνουβις, the "dog-headed Anubis."

56 Virgil (Aeneid 8.698) sings of "Monstrous gods of every form and barking Anubis" fighting against Neptune, Venus, and Minerva. See also G. Rosati's article, "Latrator Anubis." Alien Divinities in Augustan Rome and how to tame Monsters through Aetiology," in Paradox and the Marvellous (268–87).

57 Servius, Virgil's scholiast, adds, "everyone depicts [barking Anubis] with a canine head" (In Vergilii Aeneidos Libros VI–III Commentarii, p. 302 (on Aeneid 8.698). See also Plutarch's De Iside et Osiride (368f, lines 1–2), which states that to some Anubis is no other god but the all-conceiving Titan Kronos, who is revered as a dog.

58 According to Diodorus Siculus (1.27.4, lines 2–4) the inscription of the stele of Isis reads, "I am Isis, the queen of every land, she who was instructed of Hermes [Mercury], and whatsoever laws I have established, these can no man make void."

59 Servius, on Virgil's Aeneid (8.698), explains that "nothing [no one] is more keen-scented than a dog" (In Vergilii Aeneidos Libros VI–III Commentarii, p. 302).

60 Mather's second-hand quote (via Spencer 455) is derived from David Hoeschel's edition of Hieroglyphica Horapollinis (1590), p. 48. The Greek description of hieroglyph # 39 (Temple of Horapolis) indicates that Egypt's sacred scribes or prophets are "depicted [in the shape of] a dog [jackal]" (the Egyptian Anubis). However trustworthy this interpretation of the Egyptian hieroglyphs, reliable translations of the ancient Egyptian cartouches did not become possible until the discovery of the famous Rosetta Stone in Egypt, which the French philologist Jean-François Champollion (1790–1832) managed to decipher. The Rosetta Stone bears the decree of King Ptolemy V (c. 196 BCE) and is engraved on the stele in three different languages or scripts: hieroglyphic, Demotic (hieratic), and Greek.

Except you'll say, that as *Taa*t was the Name of Mercury among the Egyptians, and they cryed likewise, Taa, or Tao, when they called a Dog.⁶¹

Q. Why is Usury forbidden in the Law of Moses? v. 19.

A. You may bee sure, only upon political Grounds; for tis added, Unto a Stranger thou mayst lend upon Usury: whereas God would never have said, with the Wife of Stranger, thou mayst committ Adultery.⁶²

Dr. Stillingfleet, ha's well expressed it. "It pleased God, to fix their Habitation, not upon the Sea-side, where Tyre and Sidon stood: but within Land, where they had no Conveniences of Trading, but the Riches of the Nation lay in Agriculture and Pasturage: In which, the Returns of Money, are neither so Quick, nor so Advantageous, to make sufficient Compensation for the Interest of the Money, in the Time they have it: For the main thing valuable in Money, is, the Advantage the Borrower makes of it; and where that is great, it seems Reasonable, that the Person, whose the Money is, should have a proportionable share of the Advantage made by it: But where Persons borrow only for present Occasions, to supply their Necessities, there it is only an Act of kindness to lend, & it would bee unreasonable to press upon, or take advantage by Anothers Necessities.⁶³ And this seems to have been the Case among the Jewes; They were only the Poor, that wanted Money for present Necessities; the Rich had no way to employ it in Trading, unless that they lent to the Tyrian Merchants, which it was lawful, by their Law to do. Now, if they took Usury of their own People, it must bee of those, whose urgent Necessity, and not Hopes of a mighty Increase by it, made them borrow; and therefore it was a very Just and Reasonable Law, to forbid Usury among them; which I beleeeve Hee would never have done, if ⁶² R. Bachya ben Asher answers the first part of the question as follows: "The whole reason for the prohibition of charging interest is based on our obligation to keep fellow Jews alive, to relate to them with deeds of loving kindness seeing the Torah wrote וחי אחיד עמך 'ensure that your brother will be able to live alongside you' (Leviticus 25:36). No such directive exists concerning Gentiles" (Torah Commentary 7:2651).

Hee had placed the Jewes upon the Coasts of Phœnicia, where Trading was so much in Request.”⁶⁴

Q. Some Remarks on the Law of Usury? v. 19.

A. Some that Lewis has collected.⁶⁵

The Law forbad the Israelites to contract, for more Money than they lent. But their Wise Men made this Addition; That they should not beforehand receive a Gift, for the inducing of them to lend; or any thing by Way of Gratiuity afterwards to express their Thankfulness. But Maimonides remarks, that this last was permitted in the Loan of Orphans Money.⁶⁶

No Usury was to be taken for Money lent unto Proselytes.⁶⁷ And whereas, by some tis maintained, that here is an Affirmative Præcept, requiring Usury to be taken of a Stranger, others more modestly maintain, That tho’ there is a Permission of Usury on a Stranger, yett they might not practise it, except it were to provide for themselves that they might subsist among the Nations. They give this Reason; lest the Jews by this Way of Traffick should grow too familiar with

⁶⁶ Lewis, Origines Hebraeae (2:184, 187–90); Maimonides argues that the property of orphans can be used as a security if the investment is “likely to profit and unlikely to lead to loss.” Thus “if there is a profit,” the trustee is to “give them [orphans] a portion of the profit. If there is a loss,” the trustee is to “suffer the loss [himself]” (Hilchot Malveh V’Loveh 4:14). Put in a different way, “our Sages felt that the need to protect the financial future of orphans takes precedence over safeguards for the prohibition against taking interest” (Mishneh Torah 24.246, 247n65). John Selden has much to say on the topic of usury in his De Jura Naturali Gentium Juxta Disciplinam Ebraeorum (1640), lib. 6, cap. 9, pp. 719–20.

⁶⁷ According to Maimonides’s Hilchot Malveh V’Loveh (5:6), “[The following laws apply when] a Jew borrowed money from a gentile at interest and then [the gentile] converted. If a reckoning was made [principal and interest] before he converted, [the convert] may collect the principal and the interest. If a reckoning was not made until after he converted, [the convert] may collect the principal, but not the interest.” Yet [Different rules apply when,] by contrast, a gentile borrows money from a Jew at interest [and then converts]. After a reckoning is made, even if it was made after the conversion, [the convert] is required to pay the entire sum, the principal and the interest. [This measure was instituted] lest people say that the person converted for the sake of his money. Even after he converted, the Jew can collect the entire sum of interest for which he became liable while he was a gentile” (Mishneh Torah 24:250, 252).

the Gentiles, & learn their Manners. Only Men that studied the Law, might lend their Money on Usury; & enrich themselves, if they could.⁶⁸

Six times, as they observe, it is forbidden in the Law to lend unto their Brethren on Usury; Nothing was more Just, than that their Neighbours, who made Gain by Merchandise, the Tyrians, the Sidonians, the Egyptians, & the rest, should not borrow Money of the Israelites for nothing: So, it was as Just, that the Israelites themselves, whose chief Profit was by Husbandry, should have Money lent them freely by one another without Interest.⁶⁹

Nevertheless; It was lawful for an Hebrew, to take a Pledge for Money lent, that he might secure the Payment of it. However, he might not go unto the House of the Debtor, to take what he pleased. He was to stand without, & to take what the Borrower could spare, & would chuse, to give. If the Man were so poor, as to pawn his Bed-clothes, or what contributed unto the Præservaⁿtion of his Life or Health, his Pledge was to be returned before night.⁷⁰

See also; Deut. XXIV.6, 7.⁷¹

Q. The Law forbidding Usury, unto the People of Israel; what was the True Intention and Original of it? v. 19.

A. Usury was forbidden to the Jewes, only upon a political Account; the Reason of it was, the Partition of Inheritances among them, which by the Practice of Usury would have been destroy'd: they were permitted therefore the Practice of Usury upon the Stranger, where this Partition was not concerned.⁷²

It is observable, that in those Countreyes where æquality of Inheritances was præserv'd, the Exercise of Usury was prohibited. Seneca observes of Solon, That hee making all things, in the State of Athens to bee æquo Jure, after a sort of Gavel-kind, did likewise forbid Usury, by a Law which hee called, Σεισάχθεια.⁷³ Laertius particularly describes the Σεισάχθεια, to bee, A Releasing of the Bodies and Estates of those, that were in Bondage, by Mortgages to their Creditors. Solon, hee saies, led the Way himself, by Forgiving Seven Talents that were due unto him.⁷⁴ That this was no other than an Eastern Law, brought by him into the Practice of the Athenian Republic, appears by an Observation of Menagius, who tells us out of Diodorus Siculus, That the Egyptians likewise, by whom, (as Mr. Turner well notes) wee are to understand the Jewes, had such another Constitution, and that Solon received his from thence.⁷⁵

The Partition of Inheritances, established by Moses and Joshua, allotting to every Tribe & Family, a Proportion of Land, which it was not in their Power to alienate from themselves any longer, than till the Year of Jubilee, seems to have 72 John Turner (b. c. 1649/50), hospitaler of St. Thomas, Southwark, sometime fellow of Christ College, Cambridge, and author of a work on Jewish and Roman antiquity, supplies Mather with the source material extracted from Turner's Boaz and Ruth: A Disquisition upon Deut. XXCV.5 (1685), pp. 365–66.

73 In his Epistulae morales ad Lucilium (Epistulae Morales 90.6), Lucius Aenaues Seneca (the Younger) points out that to prevent vice and tyranny from corrupting a kingdom, wise Solon established “just laws” for Athens.

74 Diogenes Laertius, in his Life of Solon (2.45), established for Athens the “Law of Release” (σεισάχθεια) to prevent the poor who “borrowed money on personal security” from falling into serfdom if they had fallen in arrears. Solon set an example by cancelling his sizable loan to his father Execestides of Salamis, in Vitae philosophorum (1.45, 1–7). Apropos, I wished the back-alley lenders who dealt in toxic subprime mortgages before the housing bubble burst in 2007 had been held accountable.

75 Mather, via John Turner's Boaz and Ruth (1685), pp. 237–39, tells the well-known story that the wisdom of the Greeks, like the laws of Solon, were borrowed from those of the Egyptians (or rather – as the story goes – from the Jews who were mistakenly identified as Egyptians), among whom Solon had studied. This is also the generally accepted opinion of the learned French classicist Aegidius Menagius, aka. Gilles Ménage, aka Egidio Menagio (1513–1592), whose Observationes et Emendationes in Diogenem Laertium (1663) quotes from Diogenes Laertius's Bibliotheca (1.98.1–4) as proof of the Egyptian influence on the laws of ancient Greece. My reference is to Menagius's annotations reprinted in the three-volume London edition Laertii Diogenis De Vitis Dogmatis et Apothemgmatis (1664) 1:17, 21DE (3rd ser. of pag.). See also Isaac Casaubon's annotations on the origin of Solon's laws, in the same London edition 1:22AC (1st ser. of pag.).

been much destroy'd, at the Time, when the Two Kingdomes of Judah and Israel were divided from one another. And one Consequence of this Alteration, seems to have been, that Usury once forbidden, must now, of necessity begin to obtain.⁷⁶

This equality of Inheritances, was not only observed, as Plutarch tells us, among the Lacedemonians, but also among the Romans, in their Beginnings, as is well proved from Varro, by Sigonius, and by all their Colonies, as is every where in Livy declared. But the Practice of Usury still destroy'd it.⁷⁷

If you consult the Fifth Chapter of Nehemiah, you will see, That when the old Partition of Inheritances was destroy'd, they were driven to subsist upon Usury.⁷⁸

Now the Usury then practised, was an Increase both of Money, and of any other Things necessary to the Support of Humane Life. | It was called, Neshech, [40v] from a Word that signifies, To Bite, because in Time it quite Ate thro' their Estates; and thus, all Extortion, is called, Eating, by the Turks at this Day; this also is the very Word, whereby David describes the Oppressors; Psal. 14.4. – who eat up my People, as they would eat Bread. And as with Relation to the Borrower, it was called, Neshech, so with regard unto the Lender, it was called, Tarbit, and, Marbit, which signifies, Improvement.⁷⁹ Being Reduced unto Want, they 76 Turner (292–93).

77 Turner (294, 295) draws on De Antiquo Iure Civilum Romanorum Libri Duo (1560), fol. 2, cap. 2, by the learned Italian humanist Carolus Sigonius (c. 1524–1584) of Modena. This massive compendium on Roman and Italian jurisprudence appeared in various reprints and editions over the following century and a half. Turner refers to this work by the title of De Antiquo Iure Italiae (1694), an edition of unknown origin. My reference is to Antiquo Iure Populi Romani Libri XI (1715), lib. 2, cap. 2 “De Coloniis,” p. 628, where Sigonius refers to Plutarch’s discussion of Lycurgus’s redistribution of land to alleviate the inequality among the classes and to raise the hoi polloi out of poverty. Turner also incorporates (via Sigonius 628), a quote from Varro’s De Re Rustica (1.10), which relates that before the Punic War, the Romans measured land by “iugera,” the amount of land a peasant and his oxen could plough in a single day. Two “iugera” make up a “haeredium,” a portion of land that Romulus is to have allotted to each citizen in his times. Finally, Turner alludes to Livy, whose History of Rome (7.21) explains how Roman dictator Publius Valerius Publicola (344 BCE) and his fellow Consul Gaius Marcius Rutilus (4th c. BCE) settled the discontent among the Romans about the oppressive practices of usury by appointing five impartial commissioners (a thing impossible in the US Congress these days!) to address the complaints of lenders and debtors fairly. This issue was rather close to Mather’s own heart, for his property was bonded in payment for the debts he assumed for his third wife Lydia Lee George and her daughter Katherine Howell. See Mather’s Fair Dealing between Debtor and Creditor (1716) and Diary (2:745–46).

78 Turner (302–303). Neh. 5:1–19.

79 Turner (304–305); Maimonides argues (Hilchot Malveh V’Loveh 4:1), “Neshech and marbit are one in [sic] the same [i. e., interest], as [Leviticus 25:37] states: ‘Do not give him your money with neshech and do not put forth your food at marbit.’ And further on, [Deuteronomy 23:20] speaks of: ‘Neshech from money, neshech from food, neshech from any substance that will accrue.’ Why is [interest] called neshech? Because it bites. It causes pain to one’s colleague and consumes his flesh. Why did the Torah refer to it with two terms? So that one would commit a twofold transgression when violating this prohibition” [Sefer HaMitzvot, Negative mortgaged, what they had, until the Year of Jubilee; & sometimes, they sold, their Sons till the Seventh Year, and their Daughters even till the Year of Jubilee.⁸⁰ The Principal, was called, Caput, which is manifestly, the Hebrew, Gabbouth, whereby any sort of Eminence, or Hill, or Top, was aptly signified; [and thus, the Capitol, was called, not, à Capite Toli, as the Roman Etymologists, tell us, but it was as much as Gabbouth el, or, Gabbouth al, which is The Hill of God: And so, by the way, the Mons Palatinus, was not, à balando, as the Roman Grammarians tell us, but from the Hebrew, Phillel, whence, Tephillah, and it was as much as to say, The Mountain of Prayer; and the Vatican Mountain, was as much as, Har Hayatik, the Old Mountain, where the first Planters of that Colony, seem to have worshipped God: Gnajin being changed into an Æolic Digamma, which answers to the Latin Consonant, v, and, f: And perhaps Vates, may be from hence, because the Prophets were generally, old Men.]⁸¹ It was also called, Sors; which is from the Hebrew, Joresb; an Inheritance; Inheritances being divided by Lott, Sors likewise, is a Lott, or Chance. The Interest, was called, Fenus: which was, Hanoush, from, Hanash, to Impose a Fine or a Mulct: And, another Term used for it was, Utor, (from the Chaldee, Hathar,) Usus, and, Usura, from Hasar, which in Hebrew signifies, A Tenth; for Usury was, Ten in the Hundred.⁸²

The Degree of it, was thus managed. The Eastern Year, anciently, did consist of Ten Months.

— In Anno,

Constituit menses quinque bis esse suo.

The Reason of it was, from the Time of Child-bearing.

Quod satis est utero matris dum prodeat Infans,

*Hoc anno Statuit Temporis esse satis.*⁸³

⁸⁰ Turner (304–306).

This Period of Ten Months, was called, The Time of Life. Consider, Gen. 18.10, 14. and 2. King. 4.16, 17.⁸⁴ The Quarters of this Year, the Greek properly called, καιροῦς;⁸⁵ – The Chaldeans had anciently Three several Wayes of measuring Time; their Σάροι, their Νεῖροι, and their Σῶσοι. Their First Kings, they tell us, Reigned One hundred & Twenty Sari; but they tell us not what Σάρος was.⁸⁶ Hesychius contents himself to tell us, that it was, Ἀριθμὸς τὶς παρὰ Βαβυλωνίους. A certain Number of Time among the Babylonians.⁸⁷ But a Fragment of Abydenus, preserved in Eusebius, gives us a more particular Account, That Σάρος ἐστὶν ἑξακόσια καὶ τρισχίλια ἔτη, a Σάρος contains Three Thousand Six Hundred Years; and Berosus, and Alexander Polyhistor agree with Abydenus: Thus of their Ten First Kings, one King with another must Reign Forty three Thousand, two hundred Years apeece.⁸⁸ For this Reason, Anianius and Panodorus concluded these Babylonian Years to bee indeed no more than Dayes: (as, every Revolution of any of the Heavenly Bodies, so as to describe an entire Circle, & End where it began, was, Shanah, ἐνιαυτὸς, Annus;) A whole Saros contained Ten of their perfect Years, which had no more than 360 days.⁸⁹ Its Name is from the Hebrew, ⁸⁵ Turner (318). καιροῦς from καιρός, “a measure of time,” “season” (of the year). Gen. 1:14, line 4 (LXX).

⁸⁶ Turner (323–24). Σάροι from Σάρος, “a Babylonian cycle of 222 months” (Suidas, Lexicon, alphab. letter sigma, entry 148, line 1); Νεῖροι from Νεῖρος or νείαιρᾱ “lowest,” “in the lower part” (Lycophron, Alexandra, line 896); Σῶσοι, in In Platonis Gorgiam commentaria (38.2, lines 6, 16), a commentary by astrologer and alchemist Olympiodorus of Alexandria (c. 495–c. 565); Σάρος “a Babylonian cycle of years (3600),” in Hesychius, Lexicon (Π – Ω), alphab. letter sigma, entry 226, line 1; and in Abydenus (Fragmenta 1, line 6), the fourth-century (BCE), disciple of Aristotle and Greek historian who authored the valuable History of the Chaldeans and Assyrians, extant mostly in fragments in Eusebius Pamphilus, Alexander Polyhistor, Syncellus, and Cyril of Alexandria.

⁸⁷ Hesychius, Lexicon (Π – Ω), alphab. letter sigma, entry 226, line 1; and in Abydenus (Fragmenta 1, line 6).

⁸⁹ Turner (324–25), via Pearson (Exposition 59), mentions Anianius (4th–5th c. CE) of Campania, the translator of Chrysostom (CBTEL), and Panodorus of Alexandria (fl. 400 CE), an Egyptian monk, historian, and chronologer. They are believed to have introduced the concept of chronological eras (Anno Mundi) and calculated that from the beginning of Adam to

Hasar. Their Νεῖρος was an Interval of Six hundred Dayes, or Two Times of Life; or Periods of Ten Solar Months; and their Σῶσος, was of Sixty Dayes, or Two such Months. Neiros, was from the Hebrew, Nechirim, the Two Nostrils; as here were Two æqual Periods of Time. Sosos was from the Hebrew Shish, which the Chaldæans might call Shoush, signifying Sixty.⁹⁰

Now, in the East, the Usury of Money, & other Things was paid every Month: whence it followes, that supposing the Year to consist of Ten Months, the Usura Centesima, was, Ten in the Hundred. J. G. Vossius therefore tells us, Antiquis moris erat, pecunias calendis credere, et usuras exigere, undè est, quod Plutarchus, libello de non Fenerando, ait, Neomenias ac Calendas, Dies sacratissimos, a Feneratoribus reddi nefandos ac detestabiles;⁹¹ and unto this Purpose hee applies that of Horace, – Tristes misero venere Kalendæ.

Tho', as Horace elsewhere saies,

*Fenerator Alphius
Omnem relegit Idibus pecuniam,
Quærit calendis ponere.*⁹²

Vossius adds, Quòd Feneratorum is fuerit mos, ut quanquam Calendis usura deberetur, tamen in Idus concederent dilationem.⁹³

The Hundredth Part in the Usury mentioned by Nehemiah, if you understand it of the Year, was next kin to no Usury at all, & could not bee the Cause of such loud Complaints. But it was, One in the Hundred for a Month; and Panodorus's own time (412 CE) 5,904 years had passed (NSHE 4:163). Suidas (Lexicon, alphab. letter sigma entry 148, lines 1–3). The Greek ἐνιαυτός and Latin Annus suggest anniversary, cycle, period and year.

⁹⁰ Turner (323–25, 326, 327, 328, 329). On the uncertainty of these early chronologies, see Edward Stillingfleet's popular Origines Sacra (1666), bk. 1, ch. 6, pp. 89–106.

there being then Twelve Months in the whole Year, t'was Twelve in the Hundred; which would produce dismal Effects.⁹⁴

For this Cause, the Tenth of all things was paid unto the Priests; They being the Family of God, who is the great Proprietor of all Things. The Tenth was paid unto Him, as an Usury.⁹⁵

And whereas, Nehemiah, writes of their Selling their Sons & Daughters into Bondage, the like Usage was among the Romans; only t'was more cruel and severe, because they had no Jubilee: and they that were thus enslaved, were called, Nexi, and, Addicti Corporibus, and, Nexu Vinciti, in Livy, who Tragically describes their Condition.⁹⁶

There also arose a Difference between the Usury of Money, and other Things, as Corn and Oyl, and the like. The Use of Money mostly comes within the Compass of the Centesima; if it exceeded the Imperial Edicts, yett extant, Restrained it. But in other things, the Borrower was to Refund a Third Part Increase, or an Half of the Whole; e. g. hee that borrowed Two Bushels of Corn, was to refund Three. This was called, Usura Hemiolia; of which there are several Imperial Lawes yett extant.⁹⁷

⁹⁵ Turner (362–63); Neh. 13:12.

⁹⁶ Turner (364–65); Neh. 5:5. “Addicti Corporibus” suggests “confiscating (binding) a person for debt” or “sentencing a person to debt slavery” – credit cards and all! According to Titus Livy (History of Rome, 2.23.8) “nexu/nexi vinciti” signifies “to bind, fetter” a bondman or debtor. Livy reports how in 495 BCE, bondsmen and debtors rose up in the Forum and implored the Quirites for protection against their being sold into bond-slavery by usurers.

⁹⁷ Turner (364). According to the Codex Theodosianus (2.33.1), Roman Emperor Constantine I (274–337) decreed that a maximum of 12 percent (centesima, per cent, per one hundred) interest could be charged annually on a monetary loan but that a whopping 50 percent (hemiolia, i. e., consisting of three halves as much) could be charged (extorted!) annually on loans in kind. Turner relies on the Codex Theodosianus cum Perpetuis Commentariis Iacobi Gothofredi (1665) 1:232–33, by the distinguished Swiss jurist Jacques Godefroy (1587–1652) of Geneva (EB). In his commentary on Codex (2.33.1) De Usuris ¶ De Modo usurarum, tom. 1, pp. 232–33, Godefroy discusses the extortionist practices of usury allowed by Constantine I. Thus usura hemiolia suggests charging interest at half, or at 50 percent of the value of non-monetary loans. Or as Mather renders it, “hee that borrowed Two Bushels of Corn, was to refund Three.” See also The Theodosian Code (2.33.1, p. 61): “If a person should lend farm products, either liquid or dry, to those who need them, he shall receive a third additional part as interest; that is, if the sum credited should be two measures, he shall gain a third additional measure. 1. But if, on account of the advantage of the interest, a creditor should refuse to accept payment of the debt when he is formally notified, he shall be deprived not only of the interest but also of the principal of the debt. 2. This law shall pertain to farm products only, for a creditor is forbidden to receive more than one percent [per month; that is twelve percent a year].”

Q. Upon the Law of Divorce here given? v. 4.

A. Our Saviour having said several times, It hath been said, [τοις αρχαιοις] To or By them of old time, leaves out the τοις αρχαιοις, and only saies, [Matth. V. 31.] It ha's been said, If a Man putt away his Wife, Lett him give her a Bill of Divorce. Why? The Speech was not said, to or by them of old Time. Compare, Matth. XIX.8.¹ But therefore, as Dr. Gell takes notice, The three Verses here, are, Sententia pendula, an imperfect Sentence, which is to be compleated in the Fourth Verse:

If [or, when] a Man has taken a Wife, and [IF] he write a Bill of Divorce; and [IF] she go & be another Mans, &c – Then her former Husband may not take her again.

Now, suppositio nihil ponit in esse. Compare, Jer. III.1.²

Thus the LXX express the Sense, of these Four Verses. Yea, so the Chaldee Paraphrase.³

Q. Why is there that Expression used; Remember what the Lord thy God did unto Miriam, by the way? v. 9.

A. It seems to be mentioned, That the People might not think much to be shutt up Seven Dayes, when they were suspected for to have the Leprosy, and Seven Dayes more upon further Trial; & to be putt out of the Camp, when it appear'd plainly that they had it; since that so great a Person as Miriam, was excluded so long from the Society of the People of God. [Num. 12.15.] It might be also an Admonition unto them, to take heed, that they did not Speak Evil of Dignities (which brought this Punishment on Miriam;) or disobey the Priests, (which might bring such a Punishment on them.)⁴

² Gell (724B–E). Mather's extract is a bit cryptic; Gell reads, "So that all the three first verses are but a condition of the Antecedent in order to the consequent; a supposition of somewhat which possibly might be; and if it so come to pass, then the consequent will take place. For Suppositio nihil ponit in esse; A Supposition makes nothing to be" (724C). Or, as the Jer. 3:1 (LXX) has it, "If a man put away his wife, and she depart from him, and become another man's, shall she return to him any more at all? shall not that woman be utterly defiled? yet thou hast gone a-whoring with many shepherds, and hast returned to me, saith the Lord" (Brenton translation). See also Mather's Christological application of Jer. 3:1 (BA 5:867).

Q. The Lawes about Pledges, might have a little Illustration? v. 12—

A. Pledges were to be restored by Sun-sett; And, if they were Garments, it is asked about him that gave them, [Ex. 22.26.] wherein shall he sleep? Why, Because in Hott Countreyes, tis very Dangerous to sleep ill-covered in the Night.⁵

Moreover, He who took the Pledge, might not go into his Brothers House to take it, but must receive it without Doors. This was, that he might not see the Nakedness of his Brothers House, nor covet any other Pledge, than what he could best spare unto him.⁶

Q. Might there not be a further Intention, in the Law about a Pledge?

A. The Law seems intended, for to keep them, from taking any Pledge at all, of a very poor Man; For, to what Purpose, should they every Morning fetch a Pledge, & every Evening return it? A thing that would create 'em a deal of Trouble.⁷

4 Simon Patrick on Deut. 24:9 (Deuteronomy 423–24). Rashi argues that Miriam was afflicted with leprosy because she slandered her brother: “If you intend to take precautions to avoid suffering tzora’as, do not engage in slander” (Metsudah Chumash/Rashi Devarim 5:283); Nachmanides adds, “Rashi takes this as a precaution to avoid harmful speech, but I believe it is as literal a commandment as ‘Remember the Sabbath day and keep it holy’ (Exod.20:8). . . . It is a prohibition against harmful speech, framed as the positive commandment to remember what God did to Miriam. Even though that righteous prophetess spoke only out of profound love for her brother, did not shame him to his face, did not speak about him publicly but only to her holy brother Aaron in private, and all her actions were for the best, this did her no good” (JPS Migra’ot Gedolot 5:163).

5 Maimonides’s explication is to the point in Hilchot Malveh V’Loveh (3:5): “Do not go to sleep while his collateral is in your possession”; this refers to a garment worn at night. With regard to articles that he wears or uses to perform work during the day, [Exodus 22:25] states: ‘Until the setting of the sun, return it to him’ – this teaches that he must return it to him throughout the day” (Mishneh Torah 24:230). See also Sefer HaMitzvot (Neg. Commandment 240).

6 Maimonides (Hilchot Malveh V’Loveh 3:4): “Even an agent of the court who comes to collect security [pledged for a loan] should not enter [the borrower’s] house to collect the security. Instead, he should stand outside. The borrower should go into his [own] house and bring out the security for him, as [Deuteronomy 24:11] states: ‘You shall stand outside’” (Mishneh Torah 24:228). See for the same in the Mishnah and the Gemara of the Babylonian Talmud, tractate Baba Metzia (113a).

Q. What was the Law, and what the Way, of Scourging Malefactors among the Jewes? v. 2, 3.

A. It is very plain, That the Law allowed Forty Stripes: but the Way among them was to give but Nine and Thirty. Hence Paul saies, in 2. Cor. 11.24.¹ Of the Jewes, Five Times Received I, Forty Stripes, save One. Tho' Erasmus Schmidius, I confess, will have that παρὰ μίαν, to bee supply'd with ἡμέραν, as if the Apostle had been scourged with Forty Stripes, five times in One Day.² But inasmuch as the Apostle was now among the Jewes, wee may rather suppose him treated after the Jewish Manner: which was to omitt giving the Last of the Forty Stripes allowed. And This Omission was not only because, the Letters of the Hebrew Word תִּיבָא, Thy Brother do number Thirty Nine; but the more effectually to prevent an Heedless Executioner from Exceeding the Number Forty, which was expressly forbidden; whereas, t'was not forbidden to Abate it. Nor was this all; but they herein Accommodated themselves to the fashion of the Scourging Instrument in aftertimes Invented among them.³

The fashion of the whole was this.

The Executioner stript the Malefactor, of all his Clothes, as far as his Thighs; and hee ty'd the Mans Hands unto a Fast Block, about a Cubit and Half high, from the Ground; so that the Man must lean and stoop forward upon that Block. The Executioner then standing upon a Stone, had in his Hand, a Tool, thus composed; the Handle was little more than an Hands Breadth; unto this there was fastned a long Thong of Neats Leather on the Sides of which, there was fastned a Couple of shorter Thongs, made of an Asses Hide: so that every Blow must give Three Lashes to the Delinquent: The Bull-Thong, in the Middle reached

1 Mather's manuscript erroneously reads "2. Cor. 11:44."

2 The German Lutheran Erasmus Schmidt (c. 1570–1637) served as professor of philosophy, Greek, and mathematics at the University of Wittenberg and published among several other learned works his Notae & Animadversiones, in Opus Sacrum Posthumum (1658). Schmidt's annotations (on 2 Cor. 11:24), reads "ἡμέραν, alternis diebus" ("one after the other [on one] day") instead of παρὰ μίαν ("save one"), in Notae (fol. 1138).

3 Schmid refers to an unspecified "Lexicon" as his source; if by this reference he means Valentin Schindler's widely used Lexicon Pentaglotton, Hebraicum, Chaldaicum, Syriacum Talmudico-Rabbinicum, & Arabicum (1612), col. 57, voce אֶחָד, then Schmid's translation (to which Mather takes exception) is borne out in the Syriac rendition of כָּל אֶחָד continens omnia ("immediately one after the other"). Maimonides's account is authoritative on this topic, in Hilchot Sanbedrin V'Haonshin Hamesurim Lahem (17:1–5), in Mishneh Torah (23:124–28). Tractate Makkoth 3.9–14 (The Mishnah 407–408). the Mans Breast, & the Two Ass-Thongs, on each Side, reached the upper and lower Parts of his Back, in the Laying on. The Executioner smote but Thirteen Times, which, multiplied by Three, make Nine and Thirty: in the mean time, there must bee present Three Judges of the Lesser Council; whereof One Read all the Time of the Punishment, those Three Texts, Deut. 28.58. If thou wilt not observe to do all the Words of this Law, that are written in this Book, that thou mayst fear this Glorious and Fearful Name, THE LORD THY GOD; then the Lord will make thy Plagues wonderful: And Deut. 29.9. Keep therefore the Words of this Covenant, and do them, that yee may prosper in all that yee do: And, Psal. 78.38. But Hee being full of Compassion, forgave their Iniquity, & destroy'd them not: This was partly for the Admonition, and partly for the Consolation, of the chastised Criminal: and the Scourging ended with the Reading: The Second Numbred the Strokes, and the Third still cry'd out, הַכֵּהוּ *Smite him!*⁴

Q. What were their Base Ways of Muzzling the Oxe? v. 4.

A. It was a Custome among the Hebrews (as well as among the Egyptians and Gracians and Romans) to use Oxen in treading out their Corn, either with their Feet, barely, or by drawing a Cart or other Instrument over it. And while they were at Work, there were some who muzzled them; others daubed their Mouths with Dung; others hung a woodden Instrument about their Neck, which hindered from stouping down, or putt Sharps into their Mouths, or kept them without Drink, or covered their Corn with Skins to prevent them coming at it. Moses forbidding this Inhumanity, instructs People in the Duties of Benignity & Compassion to one another.⁵

Q. Her Husbands Brother shall go in unto her. What Brother? v. 5.

A. The Hebrew Doctors understand it of the eldest Brother surviving; and only of a Brother that was by the same Father. Tho' their Mother were the same, yett if their Father were not the same, no Obligation lay upon him: For Brethren (saies Maimonides) by the Mothers Side, are not accounted Brethren; either in the

⁵ Patrick (Commentary 434–35) also refers to Samuel Bochart's commentary on "Leges de Bobus," in Hieroicoicon (1692), pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 40, lines 18ff, which also provides parallel discussions in Greek and Roman sources of how the treatment of domestic animals, like oxen, was regulated.

*Matter of Inheritances, or of Marrying a Brothers Wife: but they are, as if they were not Brethren; for there is no Fraternity which is not from the Father.*⁶

Schickard observes, That the King was excepted from this Law.⁷

This was a Law among the Patriarchs, before the Dayes of Moses, and it is plain from the Case of Onan, that the Law of Moses here brings in a Mitigation of it & a Dispensation with it.⁸

Q. The Gospel of the Law, about Leviratic Marriages? v. 5.

A. Gregory in his Pastoralis Cura, ha's a notable Illustration upon it.

Who should the Dead Brother, be, but, the Blessed JESUS, who after His Resurrection from the Dead, said, Go tell my Brethren. He dies without Children; Because His Elect are not yett brought in unto Him. The Care of His Church, & of raising up the Children of His Family, is committed unto Persons qualified for the Evangelical Ministry. The Face of him ought to be spitt upon, quisquis ex muneribus quæ perceperit, prodesse alijs non curat. And the Shoe is to be loosed from one of his Feet. Ministers are to have their Feet shod with the Preparation of the Gospel of Peace. He who minds only his own Repose & Pleasure, & not the public Service, ha's but one Shoe on. *Qui suam cogitans utilitatem proximorum negligit, quasi unius pedis calcea mentum cum dedecore amittit.*⁹

6 Patrick (Deuteronomy 435–36) refers to Johann Heinrich Heidegger's אֲבוֹת רֵאשִׁי Sive De Historia Sacra Patriarcharum (1667), vol. 1, Exercitatio Prima de Œconomia Patriarcharum, sec. 16, pp. 20–22; the specific reference is on p. 21. Deut. 25:5–10. See also John Selden's Uxor Ebraica (1646), lib. 1, cap. 12, pp. 79–90. Leviratic marriages were to ensure that an offspring was to be procreated by the brother of the deceased who was to marry his brother's widow. Maimonides, Hilchot Yibbum VâChalitzah (1:7), maintains that “Maternal brothers are considered to be brothers only with regard to the laws of mourning (Hilchot Aveilut 2:1) and the laws of witnesses (Hilchot Edut 13:1). With regard to the laws of inheritance (Hilchot Nachalot 1:6), and the laws of yibbum and chalitzah, [maternal brothers] are considered as if they did not exist. For fraternity is derived from the father alone (Talmud, tractate Yevamot 17b),” in Mishneh Torah (18:16).

8 Heidegger, Historia Sacra (1:20). Mather alludes to the story of Onan, Judah's son, who refused to marry his brother's (Er's) widow Tamar (Gen. 38:6–10).

9 The early Church was hardly less stringent when Leviratic marriage became applicable. According to Regula Pastoralis Liber (Pars 1), cap. 5, Pope St. Gregory the Great (c. 540–604), [PL 077. 0019B–19C] – following Jewish precedent – decreed that if the surviving brother refused to marry his brother's widow, the woman should spit in his face, “because whosoever cares not to benefit others out of the gifts which he has received” should be upbraided. “But he who, meditating his own advantage, neglects that of his neighbours, loses with disgrace one foot's shoe” (Pastoral Rule, part 1, ch. 5, pp. 4–5 (NPNFii 12:4–5). Eph. 6:15. On the topic of Levirate marriages, see also John Selden's Uxor Ebraica (lib. 1, caps. 14–15, pp. 96–117). On the ignominy of having one's shoe removed, see Maimonides, More Nebuchim (3.49.500) and Guide (3.49.603); for much the same, see Wagenseil's annotations on the Mishnah (tractate Sotah 4), in his Sota. Hoc est Liber Mischnicus (1674), pp. 663–64; and on Yibbum and Chalitzah (Ibum and Calitzah), in The History of the Rites, Customs, and Manner of Life, of the Present

Q. A Further Elucidation of the Leviratic Marriages? v. 10.¹⁰

A. Monsr. Jurieu ha's cultivated this obscure Subject, in his, History of the Doctrines & Worship of the Church.¹¹

In relation to the Law of the Levirate, we have nothing more Ancient, than what occur'd in the Family of Judah. There are not the least Footsteps of this Custome to be found among the Pagans. It seems a Law given only for the Posterity of Abraham. Philo is mistaken, when he insinuates that it was founded upon an ancient Law among the Canaanites. The Law of Solon quoted from Diodorus Siculus of this aspect, has no Respect at all unto it.¹²

The Holy One declares, he gave this Law, that the Name of the Dead might not be putt out of Israel; and that a Dead Brother might have one to succeed in his Inheritance. There might be also moral & mystical Reasons, the Discovery whereof, Monsr. Jurieu, thinks, will be very difficult.¹³

I shall here wave them, & only take notice of one, that ha's been sometimes offered. The Widow is a figure of the Jewish Church; The Husband who dies without Issue, is the Law, whereof the only Effect is Damnation; The Gospel that succeeds the Law, is the Brother, who descends from the same Race, & acknowledges the same Origin, even the Blessed GOD Himself. This Brother ha's raised up Seed unto his Brother; The Gospel ha's performed, what the Law could not; & saved Mankind unto Everlasting Life.¹⁴

But, Lett us make some Observations upon the Law of the Levirate, partly from the Sacred Scriptures, & partly from the Jewish Traditions.¹⁵

Jews (1650), part 4, ch. 7, pp. 193–201, by the Venetian R. Leone Modena, aka. Yehudah Aryeh Mi-modena (1571–1648) (EJ).

10 See Appendix B.

11 Pierre Jurieu, A Critical History of the Doctrines and Worship (1705), vol. 1, part 1, ch. 24, p. 236ff is the source of Mather's abstract.

12 Diodorus Siculus does not really discuss Levirate marriage in any Hebraic sense. He only describes how the Greek lawgiver Solon revised the decree of the renowned legislator Charondas of Catana, in Sicily (fl. second half of 6th c. BCE) (KP), who had stipulated that the next of kin marry a wealthy heiress and “likewise an heiress be assigned in marriage to her nearest relative, who was required to marry her or, if she were poor, to contribute five hundred drachmas as a dowry of the penniless heiress” (Bibliotheca Historica 12.18.3). Plutarch, in his Life of Solon (20) tells much the same. In his Guide (3.49.603), Maimonides specifically points out that “as for the reason for the levirate, it is literally stated [in Scripture] that this was an ancient custom that obtained before the giving of the Torah (Gen. 38:8) and that was perpetuated by the Law (Deut. 25:5–6).” Perhaps this is what Philo Judaeus has in mind when he compares pagan practices with those instituted even before Moses (Special Laws 3.4.22–24), in Works (596).

13 Jurieu offers several opinions on this issue but cannot bring himself to embrace any of the reasons offered by his fellow divines: “I can't comprehend that this reason [mystical – see below] should be weighty enough to engage God to the Establishing of a Law, directly opposite to the Law of Nature” (Critical History 1:238).

14 Jurieu (Critical History 1:237).

15 Jurieu (1:237).

If the Person who died without Issue, had several Brothers, the Eldest was he, who was under Obligation to marry the Widow; she was not at Liberty to chuse which of them she pleased.

If the Second Brother died without Issue, the Third succeeded; And if he did so, then the Fourth; & so on. But the Child born of the Woman, was considered as the Offspring of the eldest Brother, & not of any of the others.

If the Deceased Person had no Brothers, his next Kinsman, was in this Way to retrieve the alienated Estate of the Deceased.

We don't find, that the Brother or Kinsman, was to act in this Case, if he himself were married already.¹⁶

The Jews further affirm, That the Law of the Levirate only took place with Brothers of the same Father.¹⁷

[43v] In Case the Deceased Person left behind him a Daughter, or any Grand-children, the Widow was under no Obligation to marry her | Husbands Brother; she might then dispose of herself as she pleased. Nay, If her Husband left only a Bastard; provided he were born of a Jewish Woman, there was no Occasion for the Raising up of Seed unto him.¹⁸

In Case the Deceased left behind him, either a Son, or a Daughter, and the Offspring died immediately after the Father, the Brother was not obliged then to marry the Sister-in-Law.¹⁹

If the Eldest of the Brethren refused his Duty, Application was to be made unto the Second. And if he refused, the Eldest must then either marry the Sister-in-Law, or suffer the untying of the Shoe, according to Law.²⁰

They could not proceed unto the Consummation of the Second Marriage, until after the Expiration of Three Months at least, since the Death of the Husband; for fear of her being with Child, by him that was departed.²¹

He who thus married the Widow, was putt in Possession of the whole Estate of his Deceased Brother; But only in quality of Guardian to the Next Child. If diverse Children were procreated of this Marriage, only the eldest Son of this Woman was considered as the Son, and absolute Heir of the Deceased. On the Death of the Eldest the Second succeeded. If they had no more than one Son ¹⁶ Jurieu (1:238) refers to the case of Ruth, who married her next-of-kin Boaz (Ruth 2:1–4:15).

¹⁹ Jurieu (1:241).

²⁰ Jurieu (1:241); for this mark of infamy of having one's shoe untied, see Mather's preceding gloss on Pope St. Gregory's Pastoral Rule, part 1, ch. 5, pp. 4–5 (NPNFii 12:4–5). Eph. 6:15.

²¹ Jurieu (1:241).

between them, he was considered as the Son both of the Deceas'd, & of the Living Father.²²

Since the Establishment of the Mosaic Law, there appears no Necessity imposed on either Party, for entering into these Marriages. They might be declined on certain Penalties. If the Woman declined, she was treated as an undutiful Woman, and was turned out of doors without a Dowry. If the Man declined, the Book of Deuteronomy has determined, what was to be done unto him. He & his Posterity were to be branded with a Mark of Infamy. And yett in the Book of Deuteronomy, we find the Mark of Infamy ceased; what was done, signified no more, than a Renunciation of the Brother-in-Law, and a Surrender of his Right unto the Next akin.²³

The Jews also inform us, of certain Circumstances, under which the Brother-in-Law, might fairly decline marrying the Widow, without having the Shoe pull'd off. As, If the Widow were old, & past Child-bearing, or known to be naturally Barren: If she were unchaste, or convicted of any enormous Crime.

It seems, the Custome of Pulling off the Shoe, was not known in the Time of Judah. The Families of the Patriarchs, were not Numerous in those Dayes; and so, GOD had not yett given the Dispensation.²⁴

Q. The Reason for such Severity to the Amalekites; when the Edomites, who were of the same Race, were more favourably dealt withal? v. 17.

A. Abarbanel mentions diverse Reasons. First; When Men undertake a War against others, it is either to Defend their own Countrey, or to Subdue the Countrey of their Enemies. But the Amalekites had neither of these Pretences. The Israelites neither Invaded them, nor had any Land of their own; Here was nothing but petulant Malice, with an Intention to make Slaves of the Israelites. He might have added; Their Barbarity was much aggravated, by assaulting them, when but newly delivered from grievous Oppressions; and without any Provocation.²⁵

Secondly; All Countreys, by the Law of Nations, before they Begin a War, do Denounce it, and shew the Grounds of it. But the Amalekites treacherously fell upon the Israelites, altogether unexpectedly. They assaulted them, says one of the Rabbins, like a Bear in the Way, to devour the Mother of the Children.²⁶

Thirdly; They did not offer to the Israelites a pitch'd Battel, but fell basely on the Rear, to cutt off such as were obliged necessarily thro' Weariness to be lagging there.²⁷

Lastly; They knew how wondrously the Israelites had been delivered from their Bondage; and yett casting of all Sense of a GOD, they attempted a New Bondage for them; yea, tho' they had the glorious Cloud protecting of them.²⁸

The Injunction to destroy Amalek, was deeply imprinted on the Minds of the Israelites. They say, when the Officers proclaimed Freedom from War, to such as the Law excused, they always excepted the War against Amalek, which every one was bound unto.²⁹

Q. Upon the Inserting of this Passage here, Thou shalt blott out the Remembrance of Amalek from under Heaven; what is there observable? v. 19.

A. 'Tis an Observation of Abarbinel, that in this Paragraph about Amalek, the Injunction which God gave to Moses, Exod. 17.14. Write this for a Memorial in a Book; was fulfilled by him. No other Book, saith he, is hereby meant, but the Book of the Law; which when Moses wrote, he was bound to mention this Precept about Amalek; which he does in this Place accordingly.³⁰ exhausted Israelites, whose Egyptian bondage and strenuous journey through the desert rendered them vulnerable. In a way, the Amalekites, whom R. Asariah identifies as descendants of Esau, violated the sacred rite of hospitality [the precept of 'Honour'], because "he who comes from a journey should be met on the way with food or drink." Instead, Amalek "stood by the way like a she-bear, bereaved by man (and eager) to slay mother and children" (Pirkê de Rabbi Eliezer, ch. 44, pp. 345–46). Q. In what Sense was it said, A Syrian ready to perish was my Father? v. 5.

A. Jacob was ready to perish, or, very poor, & reduced unto great Straits, when he fled from the fury of his Brother, & lived as a Servant under an hard Uncle and Master.

But Onkelos takes the Words, which we translate, Ready to perish, in an Active Sense, for him who destroyes another. By, the Syrian here, he understands Laban; [compare, Gen. 28.5.] as if the Meaning were, The Syrian (that is, Laban,) sought to Destroy my Father.¹ For, as he used him very barbarously, when he was with him, so he pursued him, when he went away, with a Design to Ruine him. Thus Menasseh-ben-Israel understands it; & many others mentioned by Fesselius: which is the Sense also of the Vulgar Latin, Syrus persequabatur patrem meum.²

Q. When the Israelites, presented the Tithes of their Increase before the Lord, they were to make a Threefold Profession, whereon I pray you to bestow some Illustration? v. 14.

A. The first Profession was,
I have not eaten thereof, in my Mourning.³

1 Targum Onkelos (Deut. 26:5) indeed reads לָבָן--אֲרַמְאָה בְּעָא-לְאוֹבְרָא ית "Laban Syrus [Arammah] quæsitit perdere" but offsets the Chaldaic passage (but not the Latin rendition) in dashes, in Brian Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (1:821). Paulus Fagius's Thargum. Hoc est Paraphrasis Onkeli Chaldaica (1546), fol. R^v, is more faithful in this respect and places the reference to Laban, the Aramaean (Syrian), in brackets.

2 Patrick (Deuteronomy 453–54); The Latin passage from Jerome's Vulgate reads, "A Syrian attacked my father." R. Manasseh ben Israel, the famous liaison between Jews and Christians in the Netherlands, glosses in his Conciliator (1633), Quaest. 52, p. 77 (Gen. 28:5, 29:5), "The scripture terms, grandchildren, children, are clearly shewn in Question 39; therefore Laban might be called the son of his grandfather Nahor, although his father was Bethuel; or, according to Nachmanides and R. Bechayai, Bethuel was a man of no note, and therefore Laban was known in the land from his grandfather Nahor, who, as the brother of Abraham, was a person of consequence; and therefore that the shepherds might understand at once who he inquired for, Jacob said "Know ye Laban the son of Nabor?" (The Conciliator, Quest. 55(!); 1:82). Via Patrick, Mather references the oft-reprinted Adversariorum sacrorum. Tomus II (1650, 1657), tom. 2, lib. 8, cap. 2, § 11, pp. 237–39 (sep. pag.), by Daniel Fesselius, aka. Fessel (1599–1676), a German Lutheran theologian and superintendent of the Lutheran consistory at Küstrin, Brandenburg (CBTEL)

3 Although Simon Patrick (Deuteronomy 460) cites John Spencer as his source, Mather's annotations on Deut. 26:14 are extracted directly from John Spencer's De Legibus Hebraeorum (1685), lib. 2, cap. 24, sec. 1, fol. 456.

Now Diodorus Siculus informs us, of this mad Custome among the old Egyptians, κατὰ τὸν θερισμὸν.⁴ *In the Time of Harvest, the Egyptians, offering their First-fruits, do use to mourn over the Sheaves, & call upon Isis; in Honour of the Goddess, by whom those things were first found out.*⁵ And Julius Firmicus informs us, *In Adytis habent Idolum Osiridis, Sepultum: Hoc Annuis luctibus plangunt, radunt capita, ut miserandum [casum] Regis sui Turpitudine debonestati defleant capitis, tundunt pectus, lacerant lacertos:*⁶ – they counted, it seems, as hee adds, that the Seeds of the Plants were Osiris, and the Earth Isis, & the Separation thereof, was a lamentable Business. Eusebius likewise relates the like Rites, among the Phœnicians, That when the Time of the Lands leaving off to yeeld the Fruits, which they worshipped as Gods, arrived, they wept and howl'd, and ἔλεον, καὶ οἶκτον, καὶ κλαυθμὸν.⁷ – they consecrated, Mercy, Pity, Tears with Ejulations, to the Aged Fruit of the Earth. Indeed, the οδυνη, wherewith /ἦν/ is here translated by the LXX, well expresses the Travail-Anguish, with which the Pagans deplored the Death of Osiris, [or, which Heinsius will tell you, is all one, Adonis] repræsented in the Fruits of the Earth now failing.⁸ For as Ammianus Marcellinus reports, the Adonia were most mournfully celebrated at that Season of the Year; quod in adulto flore sectarum est Judicium frugum. And Lucian reports, that in these Rites of Adonis, μεγάλα πένθεα. *Great Mournings were introduced thro' the whole Region.*⁹

⁶ Spencer (456) cites from Julius Firmicus Maternus, De Errore Prophanarum Religionum (1652), cap. 2, p. 4, in which the Sicilian astrologer (mid-fourth c. CE) turned Christian apologists, reports that "Buried in their [innermost] shrines they keep an image of Osiris, over which they [Egyptian worshippers] mourn in anniversary lamentations, wherein they shave their heads, beat their breasts, tear their upper arms, so that the ugliness of their disfigured polls may show their grief for the pitiful lot of their king" (The Error, ch. 2, sec. 3, p. 45).

⁸ Mather (via Spencer 457) refers to Aristarchus Sacer, sive ad Nonni in Iohannem Metaphrasin Exercitationes (1627), cap. 1, pp. 8–9 (sep. pag.), by Daniel Heinsius (1580–1655), a Dutch Reformed theologian and representative at the Synod of Dort, whose Exercitationes is appended to Heinsius's dual Greek-Latin edition of Antiquissimi Scriptoris, S. Evangelii Secundum Iohannem Metaphrasis, a metaphrastic translation of the Gospel of John, attributed to Nonnus Pannopolitanus (c. 400 CE), Upper Egypt (CE). LXX (Deut. 26:14) ἐν ὀδύνῃ "with sorrow"; from ἦν [aven] (Strong's # 0205) "sorrow."

The Israelites now were to Renounce and Avoid, all these Idolatrous Usages. And it might bee partly in Opposition to this Idolatry, that the Harvest among them were still kept with such Demonstrations of Joy; the whole Town being then Illuminated, and Men Dancing and Singing (as Dr. Lightfoot assures us) and Playing on all sorts of musical Instruments.¹⁰ They would not imitate the Gentiles, of whom, tis related by Plutarch, That at the Time of the Year, when they saw the Earth Deserted of all its Fruits, πολλὰ θάπτουσιν [ν]ῶμοια καὶ πενθοῦσιν ἔπραττον. Multa in morem Sepelientium et Lugentium agitant;¹¹ and it is related by Eusebius, That when they saw the special Fruits of the Earth, which they adored as Gods, failing, they signalized the Time of the Year, with hideous Lamentations.¹² Indeed, there were many Lugubrious Rites, with which the Gentiles worshipped their Deities; [] of the {Egyptians,} | whence Philo saies, that the Israelites when they worshipped the Calf, just coming out of Egypt, did, Hymnos lamentis similes concinuisse.¹³ And Bacchus (the Egyptian Osiris) is by some derived, of בכה/ Lamentari, ululare.¹⁴ [44v]

10 As the illustrious John Lightfoot explains in his Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae. Impensae in Evangelium S. Johannis (1671), cap. 7, p. 116 (3rd ser. of pag.), on John 7:2, “the Levites with Harps, Psalteries, Cymbals, and other instruments of musick without number,” marched through the Temple’s courts until they came to the east gate, where “they turn’d their faces from the East to the West, and said, ‘Our Fathers in this place turning their backs upon the Temple, and their faces toward the East worship’d the Sun; but we turn our faces to God, &c.’” (Works [1684] 2:555–56).

11 Spencer (458); as Plutarch puts it in his De Iside et Osiride (70.379a), the Paphlagonians, when they planted their seeds in spring, “did many things like persons at a funeral in mourning for their dead.”

12 With Diodorus Siculus (1.11) at his elbow, Eusebius Pamphilus adds that in the Phoenician religion, their earliest “physical philosophers knew no other gods than the sun, the moon, and besides the planets, the elements also, and the things connected with them”; and that to these the earliest of mankind “consecrated the productions of the earth, and regarded them as gods, and worshipped them as the sources of sustenance to themselves and to following generations ...” But pity and lamentation and weeping they consecrated to the produce of the earth when perishing, and to the generation of living creatures at first from the earth, and then to their production one from another, and to their end, when they departed from life” (Preparation for the Gospel 1.9, 28ab).

13 Spencer (458); in his De Vita Mosis (2.162, line 4), Philo Judaeus knowingly relates that when the Israelites had escaped from their Egyptian thrall, they eagerly imitated their former master’s religion, made themselves a golden calf to which they offered sacrifices, instituted dances, and “sang hymns which differed in no respect from dirges” they used to offer to the Egyptian Apis (Works 505).

14 If Bacchus, eponymous god of the Dionysian bacchanalia, has the same origin as the Egyptian Osiris (both Virgin-born), then we can take Plutarch’s word for it, who tells us that “Osiris is identical with Dionysus [Bacchus]” (De Iside et Osiride 35.364e). Hence the etymological derivation of the name Bacchus from the Hebrew בכה [baca] signifying “ululare aut lamentari” (with “howling or wailing”) – as Daniel Heinsius has it in his Aristarchus Sacer (1627), cap. 1, p. 7 (sep. pag.), which is Spencer’s source (458).

The Second Profession was,
*Neither have I taken away ought thereof, for any unclean Use.*¹⁵

It means not, as the Jewes interpret it, That it was unlawful for any one under their Uncleanness to eat thereof; why? They had already said, That they had otherwise employ'd them.

It rather intends, That as they had not concealed any of their First Fruits in an Unclean Place; or employ'd them in a Private Place, where, by the Law of Draco, in Porphyrie, the Pagans were to offer their First Fruits unto their Gods: or, in an Idols Temple, where, according to Maimonides, the Zabians offered theirs: Thus also, they had not putt any of their First Fruits, to any Profane, Impure, Superstitious Use whatever. There were Magical, & other Carnally Unclean Uses, whereto First Fruits were abused, by the Worshipers of Isis, and Osiris; to whom Julius Firmicus therefore saies, *Pone propter Fruges vota reddi Numinibus illis, quid addis Incestum, quid Adulterium.*¹⁶

The Third Profession was,
*Nor have I given ought thereof for the Dead.*¹⁷

It means not, as the Jewes interpret it, That they had not employed any of them, to bear the Funeral Expences of their Dead Friends. What need of saying so?

But there was an Ancient Folly among the Pagans, which Austin in his Dayes complained of, *Mirror, cur apud quosdam infideles, hodiè tam perniciosus Error increverit, ut super Tumulos Defunctorum Cibus et Vina conferant; quasi egressæ de corporibus Animæ, carnales cibos requirant.*¹⁸ And, if I mistake not, our 15 "Nec separavi ea in qualibet immunditiâ," as John Spencer renders it in his De Legibus (1686), lib. 2, cap. 24, sec. 2, p. 459, quoting from the Vulgate (Deut. 26:14).

16 Spencer (460, 461) draws on Porphyrius (De Abstinencia 4.22, lines 34–35) about the ancient Athenian lawgiver Draco (7th c. BCE), whose eternal law to all citizens of Attica decreed the adoration of their gods and heroes in public and private places and to sacrifice to them "the firstling of fruits, and annual cakes" (On Abstinence 4.22.138). Quite to the contrary, Maimonides, in his More Nebuchim (3.37.449) and Guide (3.37.540–42) anathematizes the fertility rites of the Zabian (Chaldaean) idolaters, who, to protect life, limb, and property, established a law "that one tree, namely, the asherah, should be consecrated to the object of their worship and that its fruits should be taken, part of them serving as an offering while the rest should be eaten in an idolatrous temple" (Guide 3.37.546). And Julius Firmicus Maternus asks, in his De errore Prophanarum Religionum (1652), cap. 2, p. 4, "suppose it is because of growing things that vows are paid to those divinities [Isis and Osiris]: why add incest, why adultery [to your devotions]?" (The Error, ch. 2, sec. 7, p. 46).

17 Spencer, De Legibus (1686), lib. 2, cap. 14, sec. 3, fol. 461; Deut. 26:14.

18 At second hand from Thomas Malvenda's Commentaria in Sacram Scripturam (1601) 1:843, on Deut. 26:14, Spencer (461) quotes St. Augustine, who wonders "why among some unbelievers today folly and error have grown up [to such an extent] that they bring food and wine together over the graves of the dead, as if those spirits, having gone out of their bodies, need fleshly food" (Sermo 190. In Cathedra S. Petri I, § 2) [PL 039. 2101].

Indians, in New England, use to bury Food, with their Dead, for their Support.¹⁹ Malvenda thinks, that such a Setting of Meat for the Dead, is the Superstition here protested against.²⁰ Nevertheless, we may rather suppose, that the Offering of their First-fruits unto their Departed Hero's, [Gods called, The Dead, in Psal. 106.28. – Compare Isa. 8.19.] is the thing here condemned. And of these Baalim, singularly and emphatically, the Dead, Osiris, of Egypt, may be intended; whose Feast, they kept, with a Sacrifice, like Adonis's, call'd, Καθέδρα: after a very sorrowful fashion.²¹

²⁰ Thomas Malvenda (Deut. 26:14) in his Commentaria in Sacram Scripturam (1601) 1:844. ²¹ Spencer (462, 463); the Egyptian Osiris, brother and spouse of Isis and father of Horus (Adonis), fulfilled various functions in the Egyptian religion: ruler of the underworld, god of the afterlife, and god of rebirth and resurrection. One of the well-known Osiris myths is reported in Plutarch's De Iside et Osiride (12.355e–22.359f). The Greek lexicographer Hesychius associates the feast of “kathedra” or throne with the rite of Adonis, in Lexicon (A–O), alphabetic letter kappa entry 99, line 1. For more on such niceties of Graeco-Egyptian syncretism, see ΕΟΡΤΟΛΟΓΙΟΝ, sive de Festis Graecorum syntagma (1617), cap. “Adonia,” pp. 7–8, by the Flemish antiquarian and physician Petrus Castellanus, aka. Peeter Vande Castele (1585–1632).

Q. Upon the Great plastered Stones, there were to be written, All the Words of this Law. What may be thereby intended? v. 3.

A. Some think, The whole Book of Deuteronomy: And therefore Great Stones were to be provided. Some think, only the Ten Commandments; which were the principal Words of the Covenant. But Josephus is of Opinion, that he means the Cursings which here follow, from the fifteenth Verse to the End of the Chapter. And this is no improbable Opinion; the last of these Curses respecting the whole Law of Moses.¹

Q. Could not the Curses thus written, effectually deter all People from committing any Wickedness in the Sight of them?

A. No. Abimelek wickedly usurped a Kingdome, after the Murder of his Brethren, in the Plain of the Pillar which was in Shechem, [Judg. 9.6.] that is, by this very Pillar, which had the Curses of the Law written upon it. Whereupon Jotham, (you know) gott upon Mount Gerizzim, & from thence pronounced Curses upon the Men of Shechem. It shoves, that the Tops of these Mountains, were not so far distant from one another, but what was said upon the one, might be heard, by those who were on the Top, & Sides of the other. And yett, such a

¹ Patrick (Deuteronomy 467). The issue is a bit more complex than what it appears to be at first sight, for it involves several questions. (1) What does Moses mean when he instructs his people to write upon the great plastered stones “all the words of this Law”? (2) Did he intend the Chumash or Pentateuch of Moses, commonly referred to as “the Law”? (3) Did he only mean the Book of Deuteronomy (i. e., Second Law or Devarim), or (4) did he merely intend the Ten Commandments? More confusing yet, perhaps Moses only meant the “blessings and curses” carved on the stones of the altar he set up between Mts. Gerizim and Ebal upon which the tribes were assembled (Deut. 27:11–13). The question has engaged numerous scholars, past and present, who try to solve this conundrum by examining the logistics and utility of the “great stones” upon which the Law was to be written. If the interpretation of the Jewish historian Flavius Josephus is normative, then Moses only “wrote these blessings and curses upon the altar, on each side of it; where he says also the people stood” (Antiquities 4.8.44). The commentators on Seder Olam (ch. 11, pp. 109–12) similarly disagreed. Matthew Poole (Synopsis Criticorum 1:852–53) pinpoints some of the principal advocates of each position; Pierre-Daniel Huet’s Demonstratio Evangelica (1690), prop. 4, cap. 2, sec. 15, fols. 56–59, provides greater detail. Perhaps the Italian antiquarian Fortunatus Scacchus (1573–1640), professor of theology at Verona, Rome, and Padua, is the most restrictive of them all in his Sacrorum Elaeochrismaton Myrothecium Alterum (1627), Myrothecii Secundi, cap. 57, pp. 562–67, where he argues that what is meant here are only the words of God’s Covenant with Israel (Deut. 27:9–10). Q. With what Respects, are the Tribes marshalled, that were to appear upon Mount Ebal: & the Tribes, for Mount Gerizzim? v. 13.³

A. On Mount Ebal, were the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Asher; and Zebulun, Dan, and Naphthali. Four of these were Children of the Handmaids; and Reuben had lost his Dignity, by the Crime we have heard of; and Zebulun was the Youngest of the Sons of Leah; who was therefore chosen, rather than another, to make up the Number, for this less Honourable Employment.⁴

Q. Can you give mee nothing Talmudical about Mount Gerizzim, and Ebal?

A. I'll translate you a short Passage, in J. H. Otho's History of the Doctors of the Misna.⁵

"Mount Gerizim, had a Couple of Tops; whereof one was called Gerizim, a delicate Place, for Fountains and Gardens, the other was called Ebal, a Place horribly craggy and stony. Gerizim, was on this Account, a very Agreeable Place, to have the Blessings pronounced upon it. And for this Cause, the Samaritans erected their Temple there. Ebal was a Place, wherefrom what but Curses could bee expected? The Places were about Sixty Miles from Jordan. Here the Israelites obliged themselves for one another, at such a rate, that, as Raschi speaks, from hence one Man was punished for the Sins of another.⁶ The Samaritans had a Tradition among them, that Gerizim, was not overflowed in the Waters of the Flood. Hence was the Discourse between a Samaritan, and R. Jonathan, recited

² Patrick, on Deut. 27:13 (Deuteronomy 474). Since Moses had six tribes pronounce blessings from Mt. Gerizim and six pronounce curses from Mt. Ebal, the tribes on the two mountains must have been within hearing distance of one another (Deut. 27:11–14).

³ In his "Note Book of Authors and Texts" (Deut. 27:14), Mather identifies "Fullers Pisgah-Sight, – p. 191" as a useful source. Thomas Fuller, A Pisgah-Sight of Palestine (1650), bk. 2, ch. 9, § 33, p. 191, lists the twelve tribes and their order as they assembled on Mounts Gerizim and Ebal after Joshua had conquered Canaan.

⁶ Otho, Historia Doctorum Misnicorum (19), quotes Rashi's gloss on Deut. 28:29, on Babylonian Talmud, tractate Sanhedrin (29b). See also Rashi's gloss on Talmud, tractate Sotah (32a). Likewise, see tractate Mishnah Sotah (7.5–7), in The Mishnah (300–301).

in Bereschit Rabba. Non satius esset (said the Samaritan) te adorare in hoc Monte Benedicto, quàm in illa Domo vili? (meaning, the Temple at Jerusalem:) *Respondit illi, Quarè est hic Mons Benedictus? Regessit, Quia non fuit inundatus Aquis Diluvij.*⁷

“The Samaritans had not their Temple here, above Two Hundred Years; for Johannes Hyrcanus then destroy’d it. But the Hatred, which the Jewes and they, bore one another, for this as well as other Causes, yett ceased not; and therefore they never permitted it, ut post Cuthæi Benedictionem Amen responderet Israelita.”⁸

Q. How was the Action upon the Two Mountains to be performed? v. 15.

A. The People on the Mountains, being to Bless as well as to Curse, the Mishna rightly explains it: That first the Priests turning their Faces towards Mount Gerizzim, did proclaim with a Loud Voice, Blessed be the Man that maketh not any graven or molten Image; unto which all the People that stood there, answered, Amen. And then, turning their Faces towards Mount Ebal, they said these Words: Cursed be the Man that maketh any graven or molten Image. To which they that stood there, made the same Answer.⁹

7 Midrash Bereshith Rabba (32:10) relates the story of R. Jonathan en route to Jerusalem to worship God in the Temple on Mt. Zion. As R. Jonathan “passed the Palatinus” (as the Samaritans called their sacred mountain Gerizim), he was accosted by a Samaritan, who asked him, “Wither are you going?” “To worship in Jerusalem,” replied he [R. Jonathan]. “Would it not be better to pray at this holy mountain [Gerizim] than at that dunghill [Mt. Zion in Jerusalem]?” he [Samaritan] jeered. “Wherein is it [Gerizim] blessed?” inquired he [R. Jonathan]. “Because it was not submerged by the Flood,” retorted the Samaritan. Upon this audacious claim, R. Jonathan was momentarily struck speechless, but his servant took over and reminded the Samaritan, “If it is of the high mountains ... then it is written, AND ALL THE HIGH MOUNTAINS WERE COVERED [Gen. 7:20]. While if it is of the low ones, Scripture ignored it” (Bereshith Rabba 32:10). More to the point, Mather’s slightly altered quote from Otho’s Historia Doctorum Mishnicorum (19) reads, “Is it not better to worship on this blessed mountain [Gerizim] rather than in that worthless building [in Jerusalem]?” the Samaritan taunted. “The former [R. Jonathan] responded, ‘Why is this mountain [Gerizim] blessed?’ ‘Because it was not submerged by the flood waters,’ replied the Samaritan.”

8 Mather’s Latin quote from Otho’s Historia (19) reads in the context of Josephus’s Antiquities (13.9.3–10.3) that the Samaritans never kept their temple on Mt. Gerizim for more than 200 years, because after its destruction by the Hasmonean ruler and high priest John Hyrcanus (164–104 BCE), the Jews never permitted “the Israelites to respond with ‘Amen’ after the Cuthæan-Samaritans said their blessings.” For the efforts in Mather’s time to assess the textual differences between the Samaritan, Masoretic, and LXX renditions of the Pentateuch, see An Essay Towards Restoring the True Text of the Old Testament (1722), “Appendix I” (pp. i–xv), by William Whiston, who held the Samaritan Pentateuch in high esteem. See also P.N. Miller’s “A Philologist, a Traveller and an Antiquary rediscover the Samaritans” (2001): 123–41.

9 Mishnah, tractate Sotah (7.5), in The Mishnah (300).

Q. On that; Cursed is he who takes a Reward, to slay an Innocent Person? v. 25.

A. Dr. Gell wishes for this Translation, which more keeps Touch with the Original; Cursed he that taketh [or, is taking,] a Reward, to slay the Soul, the Innocent Blood, [or, the Blood of the Innocent.] The Soul, and, Innocent Blood; are to be joined by Apposition; Soul and Blood, signify the Same. Compare, Gen. IX.4.¹⁰

But then, this Gentleman pungently extends the Point of the Sharp, upon them, who have Stipends and Wages to be the Teachers of others, but grievously corrupt them, and so reduce them as to destroy their Souls. The Thought is very solemn and awful!¹¹

¹⁰ Robert Gell, on Deut. 27:25, in his Essay toward the Amendment (1659), “Sermon 17” (747D).

Q. If you consider such Passages of Scripture, as ly there before us [and Exod. 21.23, 24, 25, 26. and Lev. 26.3, 4. and, Deut. 6.24. and 7.12, 13.] you'l see the Promises and Threatenings used by the Lord, unto the People of Israel, still of a Temporal Aspect. Why are they generally of such a Strain? v. 1.

A. 'Tis Answer enough, that these Promises and Threatenings were Sanctions of a Covenant made with a People, even as they were a People. Now in the Judgment of the World to come, there shall no Peoples bee Judged, as such; the Judgment will bee of Persons only. Temporal Recompences, are most fitly propounded unto a People. It may bee a further Answer, That the Wisdome of God, then treated His People, with multiplied Shadowes; it was then a Day of Shadowes. Wherefore, when the biggest Part of their Worship was made up of Shadowes, t'was not amiss that there should bee Shadowes in the Promises and Threatenings that enforced it; Spiritual and Eternal Things lay covered, under the Figures used on this Occasion.

But wee will proceed unto more of Answer. The Israelites by their Conversation among the Egyptians, were confirmed in their stupid, and sensual, Disposition of Soul; they were become so like unto the Creatures which they might not eat of, that the Pearls of that Better Hope, which is now brought in, would have been trampled by their Dirty Inclinations. *Theodore*t has well expressed this Matter. The Jewes having Again. What was the true Root of Idolatry, in the other Nations, as well as that of Israel? Maimonides reports truly to us, That the Prophets of the Idols,

¹ John Spencer's De Legibus Hebraeorum (1685), lib. 1, cap. 3, fols. 32, 33, 34, 35, is the source for Mather's gloss on Deut. 28:1 in the following paragraphs. On the question relating to Deut. 27:11–28:68, "Why did he [God] subject them [Israelites] to curses and blessings?" Theodoreus, Quaestiones in Octateuchum (Quest. 34, p. 251, line 15), responds by contrasting the spiritual perfection Christ promises his followers in the kingdom of heaven with the curses and blessings God bestows upon carnal Israel on earth, in relation to "their earthly and groveling mentality" (Questions on the Octateuch 2:225).

² Quoting Horace, Mather explains that in the Mosaic economy, God accommodates the Israelites according to their frame of mind, just like "teachers sometimes [do by] giving cookies to children to coax them into learning their alphabet" (Satires 1.1.25–26).

did use to preach in their Assemblies, this Doctrine above any other, that the Worship of those Idols, procured them, the Rains of Heaven, the Fruits of Earth, a long Life, & a freedome from Diseases.³ [Compare, Hos. 2.5, 8, 9, 12. with chap. 9.1. which the Chaldee Paraphrase thus renders, Dilexistis servire Idolis, pro Ardis Frumentii.]⁴ Hence Paul preaching to the Idolatrous Greeks, presently falls upon the true Original of their Fruitful Seasons. [Act. 14.17.] What were the Gods of those Idolaters, but such as they served, according to the Confession of Prodicus Chius, διὰ τὴν ἀπ αὐτῶν ὠφέλειαν, as the Egyptians did their Nilus.⁵ Yea, they ascribed all the Conveniences of Life, & especially those that arose from Agriculture, unto the Rites of their Dæmonolatrie.⁶ [Compare Jer. 44.17, 18.] Whence Julian, addressing the Alexandrians, on the behalf of their old Worship, as they called it, had this Passage; You don't Remember the old Felicitie, which wee enjoy'd, while all Egypt, mentained their Communion with the Gods, πολλῶν δὲ ἀπελαύομεν ἀγαθῶν, and wee lived in all abundance of good Things.⁷ And Celsus discoursing on all the Comforts of Corn, Fruit, Wine, & a wholesome Air & Water, said, Do not Men receive each one of these Benefits, from some one or other of the Dæmons, οἷς κατὶ μέρος τὸ ἐπιμελὲς ἐκάστω προστέτακται, unto whom is allotted the Care of these things?⁸ Now, inasmuch as this Opinion, had beyond the force of any Philtre

3 Referring to “The Nabataean Agriculture” (attributed to Abu Bakr Ahmad Ibn Ali Ibn Wahshiyya), Maimonides warns in his More Nebuchim (3.30.428–29) and Guide (3.30.522–23) against the practices of the Sabians (aka. Zabians) whose prophets attributed all earthly blessings to practice of fertility rites and the worship of idols. See also Dionysius Vossius’s Latin rendition of Maimonides’s De Idololatria Liber (1641), cap. 1, § 3, in Gerard Vossius’s De Theologia Gentili (1641), 1:7–8.

4 Spencer (33) demonstrates that praying for bountiful harvest and performing obscene rituals was an all-too-common phenomenon. The Latin quotation (Hos. 9:1) is from Targum Jonathan (Chaldee Paraphrase, fol. 16, in Walton’s Biblia Sacra Polyglotta 3:16 (sep. pag.), and reads, “You loved serving idols, in proportion to shortages of grain.”

5 Via Spencer (34), Mather quotes from Adversus mathematicos (lib. 9, sec. 18, line 4), by the Greek Pyrrhonist philosopher Sextus Empiricus (c. 160–c. 210 CE) of Alexandria. So, too, Archbishop Amphilochius Iconiensis (c. 339–c. 403 CE), (CE), in Contra haereticos (line 237) argues that “idols were worshipped for gain.” The same passage appears in Emperor Flavius Justinianus’s (Novellae 73, line 38) and in several other places. Whether they all had in mind the Greek Sophist Prodicus of Ceos (c. 460–c. 399 BCE), a wealthy Attic lecturer and businessman of whom Plato admiringly speaks in his Dialogues, Hippias Maior (282c) and Cratylus (384b), is a different matter.

6 Mather has in mind Maimonides’s strictures against the agricultural fertility rites among the Sabians as described in the book “The Nabataean Agriculture” (mentioned above).

7 It is ironic that Mather enlists Emperor Flavius Claudius Julianus (c. 331–363), better known as Julian the Apostate, to address Egyptian paganism. Anyway, the quote from Julianus, Epistulae (111, line 20) reads, “in all abundance of good things.”

8 Spencer (34). Likewise, Mather’s extract from Ἀληθὴς λόγος [The True Word], an attack on early Christianity by the Greek philosopher Celsus (2nd c. CE), is to underscore the temptations of paganism to which the Israelites were exposed; hence Moses’ blessings and curses (Deut. chs. 27–28). At any rate the Greek quotation from Celsus’s Ἀληθὴς λόγος [The True Word] (ch. 8, sec. 28, line 9–10) as rendered in Origen’s Contra Celsum (8.28, lines 12–13) has Celsus explain that man has always depended on supernatural beings (daemons) who mediate between man strongly fascinated the Minds of the Jewes, it was infinitely proper, to strike at the Root of their Idolatries, by entailing upon the true Worship of the Ever True God, all those very things, by the Expectations whereof, those cursed Idolatries had been hitherto supported.⁹

Q. You have quoted Maimonides; perhaps on this Occasion you may fetch another Quotation from him, that may carry some Illustration in it? v. 1.

A. In his Preface to Perek Chelek, in which he treats of the Foundations of the Jewish Religion, he has this pertinent Passage: “This is the Meaning of the Promises and Threatenings in the Law; that if they were obedient unto the Præcepts of God, He would furnish them with all good things that should further them therein, & remove from them all that should hinder them. For no Man can serve God, as he ought, when he is Sick, or oppressed with Famine, or vexed with Wars. Therefore, God promises to Remove all those things, & to give them Health and Tranquillity, that they might perfect their Obedience, & be worthy of the Life to come. For this is not the End of the Law, to make the Earth bring forth plentifully, & to prolong Mens Life upon the Earth, & give them Healthful Bodies; but that by all those things they may be help’d and encouraged to perform Obedience unto it.”¹⁰ and the gods, οἷς κατὰ μέρος τὸ ἐπιμελὲς ἐκάστων προστέτακται, or “to whom they [pagans] have assigned these different provinces of nature” (ANF 4:649).

⁹ A philter is nothing else but a potion or drug that irresistibly attracts persons to their desired object.

¹¹ In his “Note Book of Authors” (Deut. 28:18), Mather recommends “Franzius Interp. p. 915” as a useful commentary on v. 18. The Lutheran theologian Wolfgang Franz here offers his polyglot comments on the maledictions to be bestowed on those who disobey, in Tractatus Theologicus Novus & Perspicuus, De Interpretatione Sacrarum (1619), “Oraculum C. Sacrum” (915–16).

And first, upon that; The Lord shall make the Pestilence cleave unto thee?
v. 21.¹²

A. The Author of Schebet Judah confesses, That after they had been wasted, & broken in Peeces by Wars, they that fled into Spain, in the Time of Alphonsus, were swept away in great Numbers, by a Plague, and he introduces one applying these very Words as a Prophecy of it.¹³

But indeed this Part of the Prophecy doth not belong to what hath befallen them since the last Destruction of Jerusalem. We find accordingly, that before then God often sent a Pestilence to destroy them. [2. Sam. 24.15. Jer. 14.12. & 21.6, 7, 9. & Ezek. 5.12. & 6.11, 12. & Amos. 4.10.]

It must also be acknowledged, That the Greeks call such unseasonable Weather that destroyes the Fruits of the Earth, by the Name of Λοιμὸς; Pestilence. Thus Plato notes, That which is called, A Disease, in Bodies, is called, λοιμὸς, A Pestilence, in the Seasons of the Year. The Murrain also in Cattel, is called by the same Name; which even the Pagans thought sent by the Anger of God for the Sins of Men; as we learn from Callimachus, in his Hymn to Diana.¹⁴

Q. It is said, Thy Heaven, that is over thy Head, shall be Brass; or have no more Moisture in it than Brass. What Emphasis here? v. 23.

¹² Patrick (Deuteronomy 492).

¹⁴ The reference to λοιμὸς (plague, pestilence) appears in Scholia in Platonem (scholia vetera), Dial. Min (Stephanus page 321a,bis, line 9), in Plato's Symposium (201d, line 4), and in his Leges (10.906c). In the latter work, Plato has an Athenian remind his interlocutor Clinias that λοιμὸς is called "acquisitiveness" when a person is in pursuit of lucre and ill-gotten gains; it is called λοιμὸς, "disease" when it appears in flesh and blood"; it is called "plague" when brought by the seasons or at intervals of years"; yet when it occurs in government and society at large, λοιμὸς is called "injustice" (Stephanus page 906c, lines 4–5). Finally, even Callimachus, in his Hymn to Artemis (In Dianam 3.125), has the divine huntress send plagues to feed on their cattle and on humans – young and old – as the towns are ravaged by disease.

A. It is Remarkable and Emphatical, that it is not said, The Heaven; that is, the Air, or Clouds: But, Thy Heaven; That is, The Clouds which hung over their Countrey, should be Dry, tho' they dropt upon other Lands.¹⁵

Q. How was the Rain of the Land, to become Powder and Dust? v. 24.

A. There should be so long Droughts, that instead of Rain, Showres of Dust, blown up into the Air by the Wind, should fall down from Heaven upon them.

Yea, there seems an Intimation, as if there should fall Showres of Ashes, which have sometimes fallen in great Quantities, as good Historians testify. Clouds of Ashes, vomited from Etna, have laid all the adjacent Countrey desolate.¹⁶

There is a Passage in honest Mr. Terry's Account of Indostan, which may be agreeably taken and entred here. "Sometimes [he saies] the Wind blowes very high, in the hott and the Dry Seasons; rising up into the Air a very great Heighth, thick Clouds of Dust and Sand, which appear like Dark Clouds full of Moisture, but they Deceive, like Jobs Brook, that has no Water in it."¹⁷ These Dry Showres, which Almighty God threatens to send among People as an heavy Judgment, Deut. XXVIII.24. The Rain of a Land Powder & Dust. – most grievously annoy all those among whom they fall; enough to smite them all with a present Blindness; filling their Eyes, Ears, Nostrils; and their Mouthes are not free, if they be not also well-guarded; searching every Place, as well within as without; so that there is not a little Key-hole of any Trunk or Cabinet, if it be not covered, but it receives some of that Dust into it. The Dust is forced to find a Lodging any where, being so driven & forced as it is by the extreme Violence of the Wind."¹⁸

¹⁵ Patrick (Deuteronomy 494), Jer. 14:1–22, and Maimonides's More Nebuchim (3.30.428–29) and Guide (3.30.522–23).

¹⁷ Job 6:15.

Q. What was, The Botch of Egypt? v. 27.

A. Some take this to signify, The Leprosy, unto which they were very subject in Egypt. Others take it, for that Boil breaking out with Blains, whereof we read in the Ninth of Exodus; for that is called, Schechin.¹⁹

The Hierusalem Targum reads this Text, The Word of the Lord shall smite thee. Might it not be to suggest, That He being the Conductor of Israel out of Egypt, was the Person concerned more especially to punish them for their shameful Ingratitude unto their Deliverer.²⁰

Q. How was that Threatening fulfilled; The Lord shall smite thee with Madness and Blindness and Astonishment of Heart. v. 28.²¹

A. Such was the Madness of this People oftentimes, that they did not know what Course to take for their Safety; such their Blindness, that they still took a wrong one; and then followed Astonishment of Heart, or a certain Horror of Mind, when they saw themselves ruined by their own wretched Contrivances.

There was a famous Instance of this, in the Time of Trajan, when they committed such outrageous Massacres, both upon the Greeks and Romans (as we find related by Dion, a very sober Author,) in Cyrene and Cyprus, (where great Numbers of Jewes dwelt, after they were driven out of their own Country,) that it was plain, they were smitten with the Madness and Blindness here threatened by the Lord; by which they provoked the Indignation of the Emperour, that would otherwise have slept; but now pursued them throughout his Dominions, not only as Enemies, or Traitors and Rebels, but also as Creatures noxious to Humane Society.²²

²¹ Patrick (Deuteronomy 498–99), drawing on Thomas Jackson’s The First Book of Comments upon the Creed, in Works (1673), 1:1–169, supplies Mather with the data for the following paragraphs.

²² Thomas Jackson, The Works (1673), tom. 1, bk. 1, ch. 27, pp. 121–22, § 1, is full of vitriolic invectives here and relies on Dion Cassius’s History of Rome (68.75.32) as his source to come up with a post-biblical application of Deut. 28:24. In the times of Roman Emperor Marcus Ulpius Traianus (c. 53–117 CE), Dion Cassius reports, “the Jews in the region of Cyrene [Lybia],” under the leadership of Andreas, attacked both Romans and Greeks in that famous N. African city, and “would eat the flesh of their victims, make belts for themselves of their entrails, anoint themselves with their blood and wear their skins for clothing; many they sawed in two, from the head downwards; others they gave to wild beasts, and still others they forced to fight

Indeed this Prediction was fulfilled in their foolish Credulity, which made them follow every one, that pretended to be their Messiah. This alwayes brought horrid Calamities upon them, as R. Gedaliah himself confesses in Schal-Schetheth Hakkala; were he mentions no small Number of these Deceivers, & showes, how many Jewes perished, who followed them. But there might be brought in a larger Catalogue.²³

[47v] | We shall add one Observations, out of Solomon ben Virga, who saies, That in Germany, they were possessed with such a Rabies, that they cutt one anothers Throats, to avoid the Oppressions of their Enemies; & burnt themselves & their Neighbours in their Houses, setting whole Cities on Fire, & perishing in the Flames. For such was their furious Revenge on the Christians, who pressed them to embrace Christianity. Many Stories of the like Importance, that Author gives us, in his Book, entituled, Schebet Jehudah; where he hath Sixty Four Histories, of the Calamities which befel them in that, & other Countreyes.²⁴

Dr. Patrick takes these Words to be fulfilled, in the First Desolation of Jerusalem; For tho' we have not such punctual Relations to Illustrate them, yett the Prophets mention their Madness; [Jer. 25.16, 18.] their Blindness; [Zeph. 1.17. Lam. 4.14.] and their Astonishment. [Jer. 4.9. Ezek. 4.17.]²⁵

Q. How ha's That been fulfilled; No Man shall save thee? v. 29.

A. It ha's been so Remarkably fulfill'd in the European Parts of the World, that the Magistrates, who had a Mind in many Places, to præserve them from Outrages, durst not venture to appear for their Præservation. And those who took them into their Protection, were but the Instruments and Occasions, of more Mischiefs unto them. For, as it hath been said, Even Succour itself turned into their Sorrow, and it is hard to say, whether Mens Purposes for their Good or for their Evil, brought greater Plagues upon them.

as gladiators. In all two hundred and twenty thousand persons perished." More of the same is to have occurred in Egypt and Cyprus under the aegis of "a certain Artemion."

²⁴ Solomon ibn Virga (aka. Salomon ben Verga), שבת יהודה [Shebet Jehudah] Tribus Judae Salomonis Virgae (1651, 1680), pp. 214–18, §§ 34–36, provides second-hand accounts ("convocatis Hebraeis imperant") about the slaughter, persecution, and expulsion of Jews who refused baptism.

²⁵ Patrick (499).

Yea, thus it was before their first Captivity. Pharaoh came to do it, but no Man could save them. [Jer. 37.7. and, 46.17.]²⁶

Q. How ha's That been fulfilled, Thy Sons and thy Daughters shall be given unto another People? v. 32.

A. This was most literally fulfilled, when the Jewes were banished out of Portugal, in the Time of King Emanuel; who ordered their Children under Nineteen Years of Age, to be taken from them, & brought up in the Christian Religion. Infants were then torn from their Mothers Breasts, with far more Grief and Sorrow, than they had at their Coming out of their Womb. Several hundred Years before that, when the Goths were Lords of Spain, they suffered no Parents to have any Commerce with their Children, after the Seventh Year of their Age; but by publick Decree, they were committed unto Christians, to be educated by them, who married them unto their own Sons & Daughters.²⁷

Q. It followes; Thine Eyes shall look, & fail with Longing for them, all the Day long. [v. 32.]

A. Yes; Their Women fill'd the Heavens, with more hideous & horrid Shrieks, than the Egyptians did, when all their First-born were slain in the Night. For these were bereft at once of all their dear Children, in the open Sun; in vain begging to have them Restored to them. And to increase their Calamity, many Moors professing Mahometism, were transported out of Portugal the same time, without such Violence offered to them. What was the Reason? God would have (as Dr. Jackson observes,) a manifest Distinction between the Jewes, & other People, that so this Prophecy might be fulfilled. It was in Part, because the Moors had a little Power in their Hand; the Portuguese abstained from such Violence to them, lest the African Mahometans might revenge it; but the Jewes, as it is here threatened, had no Power in their Hand; there was none to attempt any Revenge for them.²⁸

²⁶ Patrick, on Deut.28:29 (Deuteronomy 500); his source is Thomas Jackson's Works (1673), tom. 1, bk. 1, ch. 29, pp. 140–41 (§ 14).

²⁷ Patrick (501–502); Jackson, Works (1673), tom. 1, bk. 1, ch. 28, pp. 127–28 (§§ 1–2); ch. 29, pp. 141–42 (§§ 15–16). King Emmanuel I of Portugal (1469–1521) decreed in 1496 that all Jews be baptized or be expelled from his domain but leave their children behind. This unrest led to the infamous Lisbon Massacre (1506) when thousands of Jews were slaughtered. Jackson's historical source is Cardinal Hieronymus Osórius, De Rebus Gestis Emmanuelis Regis Lusitaniae, libri XIII (1571), lib. 1, which went through numerous reprints until the late 17th c. For a modern account of the reign of King Emmanuel I, see E. Sanceau, The Reign of Manuel I of Portugal (1970). The Spanish humanist Johannes Vasacus Brugensis (c. 1511–1561) is one of Jackson's sources on the fate of the children, in his Chronici Rerum Memorabilium Hispaniae (1552).

Q. How was that fulfilled; The Fruit of thy Land, and all thy Labours, shall a Nation which thou knowest not, eat up? v. 33.

A. It was remarkably fulfilled, when Salmanasser, & afterwards Nebuchadnezzar, dispossessed them, and placed other People in their Stead.²⁹

There were many strange People also among the Romans, who devoured their Labours before Titus destroy'd them. Ever since, they have no where scraped up Riches, but Strangers have presently fallen to squeezing of them. Very particularly, in the Time of the famous Croisado's, when diverse Nations marched in great Numbers to recover the Holy Land from the Infidels, their Business was in their Way to Spoil & Rob the Jewes, & make horrid Slaughters of them; as we read, in Schalscheleth Hakkabula, & in Matthew Paris, & others both Jewish & Christian Writers.³⁰

Q. And how That; Thou shalt be only oppressed & crushed alway?

A. Always in every Kingdome to which they have removed, they have suffered such Oppressions as no other People have done; which cannot but be ascribed unto a Just and Strange Hand of God! A brief Enumeration of the Oppressions which have been multiplied upon them, in the most Civil and best Govern'd States of Europe, would abundantly confirm the Truth of this Terrible Threatening. It is observed by J. Wagenseil, that the Jewes have no sooner grown Rich any where, & become considerable in any Countrey, but some great Calamity ha's presently befallen them. God ha's not suffered them to be utterly destroy'd, like the Amalekites, and Jebusites, and Philistines, of whom no Footsteps remain;³¹ but would have them to be scattered about, in all Christian ²⁹ Jackson (Works), ch 28, pp. 133–234; ch. 29, pp. 140–41).

³⁰ Patrick (503); Jackson (Works), ch. 21, pp. 83–84, 86; ch. 24, pp. 100–103; 137). Titus Flavius Caesar Vespasianus Augustus (39–81 CE) is best remembered in Judeo-Christian annals for his sacking of Jerusalem (69–70 CE) and the dispersion of surviving Jewry. There were at least four infamous Crusades (1095–1099, 1148, 1192, 1204–1212) in the Middle Ages to wrest the Holy Land from Ottoman hegemony. They all ended in bloody massacres and disasters. Jackson (ch. 29, p. 137) provides many examples of how European Jews were forced to pay huge ransoms to Spanish, Portuguese, English, French, and German rulers to save themselves or their families. The Benedictine monk Matthaëus Parisiensis (c. 1200–1259) at St. Albans Abbey (Hertfordshire) is best known for his Historia Anglorum sive Historia Minor; his Chronica Majora, a chronicle he continued from his predecessor, contains valuable information about the social and political conditions of Western Europe, including the persecution of Jews, in the first half of the thirteenth century. R. Gedaliah Ibn Yahyah ben Joseph's ספר שלשלת הקבלה [1587], as well as Salomon ben Virga's שבט יהודה [Shebet Jehudah] Tribus Judae Salomonis Virgae (1651, 1680), provides numerous accounts of the persecution and slaughter of Jews by Christian potentates and their henchman.

Countreyes; and there only oppressed & crushed alway, as Moses here foretold unto them.³²

One Instance lett us take from R. Solomon Virgæ, who in Schebet Jehuda, confesses, what great Miseries they have suffered by Persons pretending to be their Messiah; who have drawn the Hatred of all Nations upon them. In Persia particularly, he saies, they were lamentably handled on this Account. They were not only stript of all, but forced also to go about, like Dogs, with a great Clog of Wood bound unto their Necks; which exposed them unto the Contempt & Laughter of all Men. For while some threw it behind their Backs, others would come & throw it down before their Feet; some Dragging them backwards, & others beating them with it.³³

³² Patrick (Deuteronomy 503–504); Jackson (ch. 29, pp. 134–44). In his anti-Semitic diatribe Tela Ignea Satanae, 2 vols. (1681), Johann Christoph Wagenseil, professor of history and Hebrew at Altdorf, contributed in major ways to the persecution of German and Austrian Jews by republishing in Hebrew and Latin the old story: ספר תולדות ישו [Sefer Toledot Yeshu] Liber Toldos Jeschu, an inflammatory account of Jesus of Nazareth's illegitimate conception by the Roman soldier Tiberius Julius Abdes Pantera. Via Patrick (504), Mather refers to Wagenseil's argument in Carminis R. Lipmanni Confutatio (Tela Ignea Satanae 1:241) that the danger of Jewish persecution increases in the same degree as their wealth and influence rises in Christian communities. Wagenseil's Carminis R. Lipmanni Confutatio is a refutation of R. Lipmann's Carmen Memoriale, a poetic version of Lipmann's Nizzachon, by an unknown author, reprinted in Wagenseil's Tela Ignea Satanae (1:106–17).

³³ Patrick (504); Salomon ben Virgæ's שבת יהודה [Shebet Jehudah] Tribus Judae Salomonis Virgae (1651, 1680), sec. 31, pp. 162–69, tells the story of the Pseudo-Messiah David Eldavid of Amadia (fl. c. 1135–c. 1167), an ancient Medo-Persian city (N Iraq), who pretended that God had commissioned him as their messiah to liberate the Jews from their Persian overlord. David Eldavid (David son of David) posed a tremendous danger to the peace and survival of the Jewish population of Persia because Eldavid aroused the wrath of the Persian king until the pseudo-messiah lost his head – literally. The story of several other imposters (may they remain nameless) – and the deadly consequences for their disciples – follows on the former's heel, in ben Virgæ's work (sec. 32, pp. 169–90). David Eldavid's story was popular enough to be reprinted as a translation exercise “Historia de falso Messia Eldavid ... ex libro Schevet Jehuda” (along with Maimonides's epistolary caveat), in “Lectionis Hebraeo-Germanicae usus & exercitatio,” appended to Johannes Buxtorf (the elder), Thesaurus Grammaticus Linguae Sanctae Hebraeae Duobus libris methodiè propositus (1620), pp. 683–90, by the illustrious Johannes Buxtorf, the elder (1564–1629), professor of Hebrew at Basel. David Eldavid's story and lifetimes also impacted the mighty Joseph Mede and his millenarian timeline about Antichrist, in “Revelatio Antichristi,” in Mede's Works (1664), bk. 3, p. 885. More detail on the rise and fall of false messiahs in diasporic Jewry can also be found in R. Gedaliah Ibn Yahyah ben Joseph's chronology ספר שלשלת הקבלה Sefer Shalshelet ha-Kabbalah (1587); in David ben Solomon Gans, Zemach David (1644), sec. 31, pp. 300–303, as extracted from Salomon ibn Virgæ's שבת יהודה [Shebet Jehudah] Tribus Judae (1651, 1680), and in Jacques Basnage's compendium The History of the Jews, from Jesus Christ to The Present Time (1708), bk. 7, ch. 9, pp. 631–33.

killed themselves. Others, who had Opportunity, drowned their Children in Wells or Ditches. In England, one of their learned Rabbis, perswaded Four Hundred of his Companions, besieged with him, in a Strong Tower, by the furious Multitude, to cutt their own Throats, rather than fall into their Enemies Hands. He confirmed his Doctrine, by cutting his Wifes Throat first, and then his Children, & lastly his own.³⁴ In the Time of the Croisado's, the Souldiers made such dreadful havock of the Jewes, as they went along to the Holy Land, that many of them destroy'd themselves out of Despair; as their own Authors, R. Gedaliah, and David Ganz have informed us.³⁵

Q. What Accomplishment ha's that Threatning had; Thou shalt become a Proverb, & a By-word among all Nations? v. 37.

A. Compare, 1. King. 9.7. and Jer. 24.9. There was doubtless a Fulfilment of it in their First Captivity; [See Lam. 2.15, 16.] But there ha's been a more notorious Fulfilment of it in their Last. For instance, In England, (from whence they have been Banished above Three Hundred Years,) their Name serves as a perfect Measure, to express the Heighth of Impiety in any Agent, or the Depth of an Abject, Worthless, Forlorn Condition in any Patient.³⁶ We cannot better express the most cutt-throat Dealing, than thus, You use me like a Jew; or, None but a Jew would have done this. And, when in common Speech, we exaggerate Wrongs done to the most odious, or despised People among us, we say, I would not have done so to a Jew.³⁷

³⁴ Incited by Richard Malebisse and a Benedictine monk, a mob forced York's Jewish community to choose between death by torture or baptism. Led by R. Yom Tob Joigny, York's Jews sought refuge in Clifford's Tower at York (1190). In the ensuing massacre 150 members of the Jewish community chose to commit suicide rather than abandon their faith. See R. B. Dobson (1–8) and M. L. Margolis and A. Marx (386–88).

³⁶ King Edward I of England (1239–1307) issued his Edict of Expulsion in 1290; Oliver Cromwell officially readmitted Jews to England in 1657 under the auspices of R. Manasseh ben Israel.

Q. Very many of the Threatenings here denounced by Moses, had their Accomplishment, no doubt, in the Babylonian Captivity. But surely, the fuller Accomplishment is in the Roman?³⁸

A. Yes. What means that Passage, Hee shall putt a Yoke of Iron upon thy Neck? Methinks, It foretels the Bondage of the Jewes, unto the Roman Power. In the Vision of the Fourth Monarchy, expounded by Daniel, ch. 2.40. The Fourth Kingdome, – represented by the Legs of Iron, is the Roman Empire.³⁹

Q. What Remark to be made upon that, Thy Olive shall cast her Fruit? v. 40.

³⁸ The preceding paragraph was added at a later time, and the following paragraph (originally designed as a separate Q&A) now constitutes Mather's response. Patrick, on Deut. 28:36–37 (Deuteronomy 506–507). It is remarkable that Mather conceives of multiple accomplishments of individual prophecies, a hermeneutical position he also attained for OT/NT messianic prophecies after the controversy between Anthony Collins and William Whiston arising in 1724. See my discussion in The Threefold Paradise (1995), pp. 3–19, and Jan Stievermann's Prophecy, Piety, and the Problem of Historicism (2016), pp. 259–319.

⁴⁰ Originally designed as a separate Q&A, the two following paragraphs amplify Mather's exegesis of the fourth kingdom in Daniel's dream vision.

Q. Among all the Variety of Judgments threatned by Moses why no mention of, An Earthquake, to punish Disobedience unto the Law? v. 40.

A. Our Lord Jesus Christ most particularly does insist upon it; There shall bee great Earthquakes, in diverse Places.

It seems that an Earth-quake is of all Judgments, the greatest; and so tis Reserved for the greatest of all Sins; namely, for Disobedience to the Gospel.⁴³ 3839.

Q. That Threatening; Thou shalt begett Sons and Daughters, but thou shalt not enjoy them, for they shall go into Captivity; How ha's it been accomplished? v. 41.

A. It was accomplished in the several Invasions, which they suffered from their Neighbours. [2. King. 5.2. 2. King. 14.26. and 15.37.]

But it ha's been astonishingly accomplished, since their Crucifying of our Saviour.

Yea, tis a notable Passage, which Dr. Jackson, and after him, Dr. Patrick, ha's upon this Occasion; "Who knowes, whether many of their Stock, detained by King Emanuel, of Portugal, have not been transported into America; and whether many of the Spanish Colonies have not a Mixture of the Jewish Progeny in them?"⁴⁴

⁴³ Matth. 24:7 – one of the mainstays of end-time expectations. The massive earthquake in New England (Oct. 1727) served as an awakening call in Mather's Boanerges (1727), The Terror of the Lord (1727), and Threefold Paradise (1995), pp. 155–244. See also, Thomas Prince's Earthquakes the Works of God and Tokens of his just Displeasure (1727).

As noted above, King Emmanuel I of Portugal is to blame for the infamous Lisbon Massacre of 1506 – following his decree (1496) that all Jews in his realm be baptized. Manasseh ben Israel says as much about the presence of Israelites in America in his Spes Israelis (1648), secs. 3–6, in The Hope of Israel (1650), pp. 21–26 – except that he conjectures (as others had done before him) that the Ten Lost Tribes who had been taken into Medo-Persian captivity (722 BCE) from there removed eastward to Asareth (22), i. e., America. This famous myth is based on 2 Esdras 13:45 and given new impetus when the Sephardic Marrano Antonio de Montezinos, aka. Aharon Levi, related he had "discovered" descendants of one of the Lost Tribes in the province of Quito (Ecuador). On this topic, see also José Acosta's Naturall and Morall Historie of the East and West Indies (1604), bk. 1, ch. 23, pp. 74–77; Hugo Grotius's De Origine Gentium Americanarum Dissertatio (1642), and Thomas Thorowgood's Digittus Dei: New Discoveries (1652).

Q. How was that fulfilled; The Stranger that is within thee, shall gett up above thee very High, and thou shalt come down very Low? v. 43.

A. I will give you one Remarkable Instance of it. Vespasian, who was appointed to command, in the Wars against the Jewes, being a Person of a mean Birth & obscure Family, had no Thoughts of aspiring to the Imperial Seat. But by the unseasonable Desire of the Jewes, to exalt themselves above all Nations, they raised him to the highest Pitch of Greatness, who was to pull them down very low, & make them lower than any People. It was hee, who not only extinguished their Temple at Jerusalem, which was their Glory, but also shutt up & profan'd the Temple which the Egyptian Jewes built at Heliopolis, after it had stood above Three Hundred Years.⁴⁵

Q. And how That; The Lord shall bring a Nation against thee from far; from the End of the Earth? v. 49.⁴⁶

A. Menasseh ben Israel acknowledges, that this evidently belongs unto the Romans.⁴⁷ But it is yett more particularly observable; That Julius Severus was called by the Emperour Adrian, unto the Destruction of the Jewes, out of the Island of Britain. And Adrian himself, and Trajan, by whom they were still more crushed, after their City & their Temple had been destroyed by Vespasian, were both of them Spaniards.⁴⁸ Menasseh ben Israel understands this Passage, of the Souldiers

⁴⁵ Patrick (Deuteronomy 511); Jackson (Works), bk. 1, cap. 23, pp. 93–94, §§ 3–4. The Roman historians Suetonius and Tacitus give their account of Titus Flavius Vespasianus (23–79 CE), who was commanded to quell the Jewish uprising in Palestine, vanquished Jerusalem (70 CE), and returned to Rome as Titus Flavius Caesar Vespasianus Augustus (69–70), as the ninth emperor of the Roman Empire. If this elevation were not lofty enough, Suetonius deifies him in his Lives of the Caesars (8.1, 4–7, 12, 15, 25), but Tacitus (Histories 4.81) bestows upon Vespasian miraculous power to restore sight to the blind and agility to the lame, in Alexandria (Egypt). Well, there it is.

⁴⁷ In his צרוד החיים De Termino Vitae Libri Tres (1639), lib. 3, sec. 3, § 3, p. 129, Manasseh ben Israel wonders if the Mosaic prophecy of Israel's destruction by a faraway nation (Deut. 28:49) nearly 1,500 years later intended the Roman Empire: "Quare cum Moses ait, gentem fore de longinqua terra, intellige Romam, & de extremo terrae, accipe de multis gentibus, quas auxilio ibi accersivit Vespasianus ex Anglia, Gallia, Hispania, & ex aliis mundi tractibus" (129), or "wherefore when Moses, says, A Nation shall come from far, it must be understood of Rome, and from the end of the Earth, it must be understood of those Nations, which Vespasian sent for to assist him, out of England, France, Spain and other parts of the World," in the English translation of De Termino Vitae (1700), p. 64.

⁴⁸ Thomas Jackson's Works (1673), bk. 1, cap. 27, pp. 124–25, § 3. According to Dio Cassius's Roman History (69.13–14), Roman Emperor Publius Aelius Hadrianus Augustus (76–138 CE), in c. 132 CE, dispatched his General Sextus Julius Severus (2nd c. CE), governor of Britain, to suppress the "Bar Kokhba" revolt against Roman occupation and the construction of Hadrian's

Q. What Remarkable upon the Repetition of the Word, Nation, in the Commination? v. 50.

A. The Word, Nation, being used Thrice, in the fiftieth and the foregoing Verse, Menasseh ben Israel, is so critical, as to observe, that this Repetition intimates, Jerusalem was to suffer Thrice, by the Roman Power. First, in the Time of Pompey; Secondly, when Sosius came to the Assistance of Herod against Antigonus; And, thirdly, when it was besieged and ruined by Vespasian.⁵³

50 Jackson (125) interpreting Deut. 28:49–52.

51 Patrick (Deuteronomy 515) links Deut. 28:49 (“The Lord shall bring a nation against thee from farr, from the end of the earth, as swift as an Eagle”) with Homer’s hero Achilles, son of Peleus, who “swoops down like a black eagle” upon his enemies (Ilias 21.252). Bochart’s Hieroicoicon (1693), pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 9, col. 162 (lines 19–23) and pars 2, lib. 2, cap. 2, col. 170 (lines 50–63) appears to be Patrick’s muse in linking Moses with Homer’s Achilles.

There were several previous destructions of Jerusalem by invading armies, but during the Roman Empire, Consul Gnaeus Pompeius Magnus (BCE 106–48 BCE) vanquished Jerusalem and entered the Temple during the Third Mithridatic War (66–63 BCE); so, too, another Roman violated the Temple: Gaius Sosius, governor of Syria, supported Herod the Great (BCE 74–4 BCE) against the last Hasmonean king of Judea, Antigonus II Mattathias, who was executed by Mark Antony in 37 BCE; finally, Titus Vespasianus razed Jerusalem and its Temple in 69–70 CE. Q. How was that fulfilled; He shall besiege thee in all thy Gates; until thy High & Fenced Walls come down, wherein thou trustest, throughout thy Land? v. 52.

A. The Countrey being wasted, the Jewes fled into their Fenced Cities, where they laid up their Provisions, to enable their Holding out a Siege.

It is here foretold, how they should there be dealt withal. Josephus's History of the Jewish War, is the best Commentary for this Prophecy.⁵⁴

Particularly, the Walls of Jerusalem, were once rased by Pompey; and Sosius again took the City in the Time of Augustus. But we are informed by Tacitus, That the Jewes taking advantage of the Coveteousness of Claudius, purchased of him the Liberty to fortify their City. This they did so well, that they trusted, as Moses here speaks, to the Strength of it; which was indeed so great, that it cost Titus a long Siege to take it; & then it was utterly ruined.⁵⁵

Q. The Horrors of the Famine here described by Moses, when were they Exemplified & Accomplished? v. 53. etc.

A. At several Times, in the Sieges that befel them.⁵⁶

That horrid Circumstance of the Delicate Womens Eating their Infants, was literally fulfilled, in the Siege of Samaria, wherein a Woman boiled her Son; [2. King. 5.28, 29.] As many did, in the first Siege of Jerusalem, by the Babylonians. [Lam. 2.20. and 4.10.] But it was never so exactly fulfilled, as in the last Siege by the Romans; when a Noble Woman, (which fully answers to Moses's

i. e., The Book of Lineage, mentions five separate conquests of Jerusalem "(1) in the days of Nebuchadnezzar, (2) in the days of the Second Temple by Isibio, king of Egypt, (3) Antiochus, (4) Pompey and (5) Herod the Great. ... The city remained in ruins until Hadrian. He repaired it and gave it to goyim [gentiles], so the Jews would not enter, but the poor ones. When Titus took Jerusalem, many Romans died along with 600 000 Jews, as many as had left in the Exodus from Egypt" (589–90).

⁵⁶ Josephus Flavius (Wars of the Jews 6.10.1) mentions five separate times during which Jerusalem was taken and desolated. A sixth time ought to be added as described by Josephus, when Ptolemy Philadelphus, one of the four generals of Alexander the Great, "seized upon Jerusalem, and for that end made use of deceit and treachery, for as he came into the city on a Sabbath-day, as if he would offer sacrifice, he, without trouble, gained the city, while the Jews did not oppose him, for they did not suspect him to be their enemy" (Antiquities 12.1.1).

Description,) did the very same; as it is related by Josephus, in his Book of the Jewish War. (L. 7. c. 8.) A most unnatural Fact, as he observes, which was never committed, either by Greek or Barbarian; and which he would not have related, because it might seem incredible, if there had not been many Witnesses of it, besides himself.⁵⁷

What we translate, And, toward her Young one:] in the Hebrew properly signifies, The After-birth; & so the LXX translate it, τὸ γόριον.⁵⁸ This renders the Passage more plain; That their Hunger should make them so unnatural, as first to eat the After-birth which came from them, and then, the Child which was wrapped in it.⁵⁹

Q. Plagues wonderful, Great Plagues, & of long Continuance, are threatned unto the Rebellious Israelites? v. 59.⁶⁰

A. We will give some Instances. Tho' their Great Plagues, under Vespasian, by Famine, Sword, and Pestilence, had lessened their Numbers exceedingly, yett they had by the Time of Trajan and Adrian (as Dr. Jackson expresses it) like Traitors taken for a while from the Rack, recovered Strength enough, to be putt unto greater Tortures. They were then again exposed unto the World, as a Spectacle of the Divine Vengeance; & they then (as Dr. Patrick expresses it) show'd their Natural Strength, by their grievous Lingring Pains in Dying.⁶¹ For not only in Mesopotamia, and in Cyprus, but especially in Cyrene, & throughout all Egypt, they broke out into such Outrages, ὥσπερ ὑπὸ πνεύματος δεινοῦ τινοῦ καὶ στασιώδους: As if they had been possessed with some fierce & seditious Spirit; (as Eusebius expresses it:) whereupon Marcus Turbo was sent against them, & setting upon them, both by Sea & Land, with Horse and Foot, made an horrible ⁵⁷ Patrick, on Deut. 28:56 (Deuteronomy 520); Josephus Flavius tells the horrific story of Mary of Bethzab, who had fled to Jerusalem upon the approach of the Roman troops. Being overcome with extreme hunger during the siege of the city, Mary "slew her son; and then roasted him, and ate the one half of him, and kept the other half by her concealed" (Wars of the Jews 6.3.4). The dramatic tale is only half told in this quote. All this and more Mather and his muse read this incident as confirmation of the Mosaic prediction in Deut. 28:57.

Destruction of them.⁶² Dion, and Xiphilinus, describe their Destruction, at such a rate, as to afford a terrible Commentary on these Words of Moses.⁶³

It is a strange Relation that we find in the Writings of the Jewes themselves. In the Hierusalem Talmud, one of their Doctors tells us, That when Trajan came upon them with his Army, they were then Reading these very Words of the Law, The Lord shall bring a Nation against thee from far, from the Ends of the Earth, &c which he understanding (having asked them, what they were doing) he cried out, Here is the Man (pointing to himself,) who am come Five Dayes sooner than I intended! And immediately, compassing them about, he slew them all. Then he went unto their Wives, & offered Mercy unto them, if they would submitt themselves: But they replied, What thou hast done to the Grain, do to the Stubble. So he dispatch'd them also, and shed so much Blood, that it ran into the Sea, as far as unto Cyprus. At this time, [so the Story concludes,] the Horn of Israel was cutt off from Israel, never to be restored into its Place, till the Son of David come.⁶⁴

Q. What are the Diseases of Egypt, which are threatned unto the Israelites? v. 60.

A. What these Diseases were, Petrus Cunæus hath expressed in these Words; Virilignes, Psorasque, et tetra Ulcera &c. Leprosies, Itches, Botches, and Stinking ⁶³ Mather, via Patrick, on Deut. 28:59 (Deuteronomy 523–23), and on Dio Cassius's Histories (69.14) comments that “Five hundred and eighty thousand men were slain in the various raids and battles, and the number of those that perished by famine, disease and fire was past finding out” (Histories 69.14.1); and 68.32.1–3). The preceding extract from Dio Cassius survives only in the epitome (bks. 61–80) of the Greek Orthodox monk Xiphilinus Joannes of Constantinople (fl. 11th c. CE). See also Mather's gloss on Gen. 28:3 (BA 1:1016–17).

See also Abraham Zacuto's ספר היחסין Sepher ha-Yuchasin (1581), i.e., The Book of Lineage (112–13) on “the Horn of Israel hewed down,” i.e., the disappointment in Ben Koziba (Bar Kokhba) as Israel's Messiah. The Sibylline Oracles (5:361–74) alludes to this event as follows: “There will come to pass in the last time about the waning of the moon / a war which will throw the world into confusion and be deceptive in guile. / A man who is a matricide will come from the ends of the earth / in flight and devising penetrating schemes in his mind. / He will destroy every land and conquer all / and consider all things more wisely than all men. / He will immediately seize the one because of whom he himself perished. / He will destroy many men and great rulers, / and he will set fire to all men as no one else ever did. / Through zeal he will raise up those who were crouched in fear. / There will come upon men a great war from the West. / Blood will flow up to the bank of the deep-eddyding rivers. Wrath will drip in the plains of Macedonia, / an alliance to the people from the West, but destruction for the king.”

Ulcers, the greatest Physicians have anciently ascribed unto the Egyptians and Syrians, as Plagues proper to those Nations: Unto which Diseases, he observes, the Jewes were strangely obnoxious.⁶⁵

Q. They are also threatned with, Every Plague, which is not written in the Book of this Law? v. 61.

A. Of this, they themselves are so sensible, that they have confessed the Truth of this Part of the Prophecy, in those later Ages. For Solomon ben Virgæ having related, (in Schebet Jehudah) how they were transported out of Palæstine into Spain, & so miserably handled, that not one of a thousand outlived the Miseries; and then, they were destroyed in Germany and France, where, of innumerable Multitudes (æqual to the Number which came out of Egypt,) scarce Five thousand survived the Destruction: And what he himself saw in Castile & Portugal; where they suffered such things, as cannot be expressed or conceived, by Famine, by Deprædations, by Transportations, & by being sold for Slaves, or drown'd in the Sea; he at last concludes the sad Story, that they who fled, from the Storm, found the Truth of this Oracle; *Every Sickness & Plague which is not written in the Book of this Law, shall the Lord bring upon thee, till thou be destroyed.*⁶⁶

Q. It is foretold, Yee shall be left Few in Number? v. 62.⁶⁷

A. Yes. And Josephus tells us, That in the Siege of Jerusalem, there were destroy'd Eleven Hundred thousand; besides above Ninety Thousand carried Captive.⁶⁸

In the Reign of Adrian, they shook the Roman Empire, by their Fury; which moved Adrian to exercise an horrible Severity upon them. There were then slain of them, Five Hundred & Eighty Thousand, besides a vast Number

⁶⁷ The following paragraphs are extracted from Patrick (Deuteronomy 526–28).

consumed by Famine, & Sickness, and Fire, during the Time of this lingering War. And now, Dion, as if he had intended an Exposition on the Words of Moses, tells us; That Severus besett them and attack't them so separately, in several Parties, That very few of them escaped. Fifty of their strongest Fortresses, were utterly razed; Nine Hundred Eighty & five of their most noble & populous Towns were sack'd: Insomuch that, as his Words are, *All Judea was in a Manner laid waste, & left as a Desert.*⁶⁹

Because they would not obey the Voice of the Lord their God; He gave them up to listen unto False Christs, whom they followed unto their Destruction. Particularly, There was Barchocheba, who in the Time of Adrian, took upon him the Title of, Their King, & sett up his Throne at Bitter, in the Tribe of Benjamin; which the Jewes had made their chief Seat, after the Destruction of Jerusalem; and there were in it as they pretend, *Four Hundred Synagogues.*⁷⁰ Here the Romans made such a Slaughter of them, that they tell us, Twice as many perished now as came out of Egypt: Great Rivers ran with the Blood of the Slain, which (say some of them) carried great Rocks with it in the Stream. With many such Hyperbolical Speeches, they exaggerate their own Calamities; as many have observed; out of Juchasin, and Gittin; particularly Const. L'Empereur, in his Annotations on *Jach-chiades.*⁷¹

69 Patrick (Deuteronomy 526–27); Jackson (Works), lib. 1, cap. 27, pp. 124–25, § 4. Roman Emperor Hadrian, aka. Caesar Traianus Hadrianus Augustus (76–136 CE), sent his troops under Sextus Julius Severus, governor of Britain (2nd c. CE), to Judaea to quell the Jewish uprising headed by the messianic leader Simeon Bar Kokhba (132–135 CE) (EB). The Roman historian Dion Cassius (Histories 69.14.1–2) reports that “Fifty of their [Judaean] most important outposts and nine hundred and eighty-five of their most famous villages were razed to the ground. Five hundred and eighty thousand men were slain in the various raids and battles, and the number of those that perished by famine, disease and fire was past finding out. Thus nearly the whole of Judaea was made desolate, a result of which the people had had forewarning before the war”; the latter reference may well intend the prophecy of Moses (Deut. 28:62) in the opinion of those who read the signs of the time from this perspective.

70 Mather refers to the desperate revolt under Simeon Bar Kokhba (aka. ben Koziba), who was called “nasi” or “prince” (see preceding notes).

71 Patrick (Deuteronomy 527–28); the Sephardic astronomer and mathematician R. Diego Roderigo Zacuto aka. Abraham ben Samuel Zachuth (1452–1515) served as royal astronomer to King John II of Portugal (1455–1495). R. Zacuto’s ספר היחסין Sepher ha-Yuchasin (1581), i. e., The Book of Lineage, is a chronological history from the Creation to 1500; Zacuto reports (p. 246) how Alexander, the hated son of Johanan II, ruthlessly executed 6,000 Pharisees “on the Day of the Willow” and “executed 50,000 Jews from the Pharisee sect and crudified eight hundred Pharisee elders” before falling prey to “quartan ague” (quartanus typhus). R. Joseph ben David Ibn Yahya (1494–1534), aka. Jacchiades, is well known for his commentary on Daniel, which became readily available in L’Empereur’s bilingual translation and edition פירוש דון יוסף אבן יהי'א [Peirush Don Yosef ibn Yahya] Paraphrasis in Daniele cum Versione, & annotationibus Constantini l'Empereur ab Oppyck (1633). Mather refers to L’Empereur’s annotations on Dan. 11:34 (pp. 241–42) and is similarly skeptical about the huge loss of life as described in tractate Gittin (57a) of the Babylonian Talmud, which describes Bar Kokhba’s bloody uprising as follows: The Emperor (Hadrian) “hath cut off in fierce anger all the horn of Israel (Lam. 2:3). R. Zera said in the name of R. Abbahu who quoted R. Johanan: These are the eighty

Tho' now they were thus left Few in Number, yett in other Countreyes where they were dispersed, they multiplied again, that the Plagues of Heaven might still be more multiplied upon them. Some Ages after this, [Anno 1009,] they, by bringing the Persians on the Christians, to destroy the Churches dedicated unto our Saviour at Jerusalem, so incensed the Christians against them, that it was resolved by the common Consent of all Christians, that no Jew should live in their Territories, but be driven out of them throughout all the World.⁷² By which means, the greatest Part of them Died of several Kinds of Death, or made away themselves; insomuch that the Words of Glauber, (who relates this Matter, L. 3. c. 7.) are; Vix pauci residui fuerint in Orbe Romano.⁷³

Q. It is also foretold, As the Lord had Rejoiced over them to do them good, so He would Rejoice over them, to destroy them, & bring them to nought? v. 63.⁷⁴

A. The State of the Jewes (as Dr. Patrick observes,) from the Time of Adrian, till the Expiration of the Roman Empire, cannot be gathered from the Roman Writers; but the Fathers of the Church often mention their Miseries; and so do their own Authors. Particularly, the Author of Schebet Jehuda; who saies, "It is not in the Power of Man, to tell all the Kingdomes & Cities, where they were scattered; in which they suffered so horrid things, that it is fitter to pass them over in Silence, than to relate them. But therein was verified, the Divine [thousand] battle trumpets which assembled in the city of Bethar when it was taken and men, women and children were slain in it until their blood ran into the great sea. Do you think this was near? It was a whole mil [sic] away. It has been taught: R. Eleazar the Great said: There are two streams in the valley of Yadaim ['Hands'; i. e., Nile Delta], one running in one direction and one in another, and the Sages estimated that [at that time] they ran with two parts water to one of blood. In a Baraitha it has been taught: For seven years the Gentiles fertilised their vineyards with the blood of Israel without using manure" (Gittin 57a).

72 Mather refers the Edict of Fatim Caliph Al-Hakim bi-Amr Allah (985–1021), aka. Abu Ali Mansur, to destroy the Church of the Holy Sepulchre as well as synagogues and churches in Jerusalem (1009), allegedly because of the fraudulent descent of the "celestial fire" on the altar. On this topic, see Niall Christie, Muslims and Crusaders ("Document 2," p. 125), and P.G. Jes-tice's "A Great Jewish Conspiracy?" (25–42).

73 The Latin quote is from Rodulfi Glabri Historiarum Libri Quinque ab Anno Incarnationis DCCCC usque ad Annum MXLIV, by the Burgundian chronicler Rodulfus Glaber Cluniacensis (c. 985–c. 1047). The work was first published in 1596 (EB). Glaber blamed the destruction of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre on "the wickedness of the Jews" ("Judaeorum nequitia") "who became the objects of universal hatred; they were driven from the cities, some were put to the sword, others were drowned in rivers, and many found other deaths; some even took their own lives in diverse ways." Mather (via Patrick) glosses over the atrocities detailed in Glaber's Historiarum (lib. 3, cap. 7 [PL 142. 0658B–C]) and ends on the glib comment that after the destruction of the Temple and ensuing expulsion of the Jews, "very few of them were to be found in the Roman world" (Histories 135).

Prædiction, Lev. 26.38. *Yee shall perish among the Heathen, and the Land of your Enemies shall eat you up.*⁷⁵

Dr. Jackson, to explain this, hath more particularly observed, That as God raised up Cyrus, in testimony of His Rejoicing to do them good, who released them from their Captivity in Babylon; so, to give the World a Testimony of His Rejoicing to destroy them, & bring them to nought, He advanced, Philip Augustus, to the Crown of France, [about An. 1179.] to defeat all the Hopes, which they had conceived from some Kindness that had been shown unto them. For he spoiled their Synagogues, of all their Donatives & Ornaments; confiscated all their Lands Immoveable Goods; and granted a Release from all the Debts that any Christians ow'd them.⁷⁶

Q. How was that Threatning fulfilled, Yee shall be plucked from off the Land, whither thou goest, to possess it? v. 63.

A. It was wonderfully fulfilled by Adrian; who prohibited, by a publick Decree, which was ratified with the Consent of the Senate, any Jew to come within Sight of Judæa. This he did, out of a Politic Respect, lest the Sight of their Native Soyl might inspire them with some fresh desperate Resolutions, to endeavour a Resettlement of themselves in that Countrey. But herein he was unwittingly (as Dr. Jackson wittily expresses it,) the Angel of God, to keep this wicked Race, out of that Paradise, the Good Land, from which God had now chased them.⁷⁸

⁷⁵ Salomon ibn Virga (Verga) laments the fate of the Jewish remnant in his שבת יהודה [Shebet Jehudah] Tribus Judae Salomonis Virgae, aka. Historia Judaica Re Judaeorum (1651, 1680), § 49, pp. 315–16.

⁷⁷ See Appendix B.

⁷⁸ Patrick (529–30); Jackson, Works (1673), ch. 27, p. 125 (§ 5), leans on the obscure chronicler Aristo Pellaeus (c. 100–c. 160), whom Eusebius Pamphilus paraphrases in Historia Ecclesiastica (4.6), arguing that “by the decree and commands of Adrian” (Publius Aelius Hadrianus), Jews were prohibited “from even entering the country about Jerusalem, so that they could not behold the soil of their fathers even at a distance” (Ecclesiastical History 132).

3852.

Q. And how that; The Lord shall scatter thee among all People, from the one End of the Earth, even unto the other? v. 64.

A. The Effect of Adrians Decree, could be no other, than the Dispersion of the Jewes all over the World. And such as were made Captives in Adrians War, he transported into Spain, which was his Native Countrey; & was then counted the Western End of the Earth. And it is evident from their own Books, that many of them then fled as far as Babylon, which was to them the Eastern End of the Earth.

In Spain they continued many Years, a numerous People; expecting a Wind for their Passage to a Place yett more distant from their ancient Seat. And, saies Dr. Patrick, “who knowes, whether many of them have not, since the Discovery of America, been transported thither?”⁷⁹

R. Isaac, who had Occasion to mention these Words of Moses, in his Munimen Fidei, brought lately to Light by Wagenseil, thus glosses upon them.

*In the Roman Captivity, the Jewes were dispersed and dissipated, thro’ all the Regions of the East, & of the West; For every Nation of which the Roman Army consisted, when they returned unto their own Countreyes, carried some of them along with them, into Greece, Germany, Italy, Spain, France, & all other Countreyes, which either Christians or Mahometans do now possess.*⁸⁰

Q. And that; there thou shalt serve other Gods, which neither thou nor thy Fathers have known, even Wood and Stone? v. 64.

A. Dr. Jackson commends it unto Consideration, whether this Prophecy must not be understood of the Convert Jewes throughout the Popes Dominions, who are urged often to commit Idolatry with Stocks and Stones upon more Tyrannical Terms, than their Forefathers were, either by the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Egyptians, Romans, or any whatsoever that led them captive.⁸¹

It is admirable to see Moses foretelling, That after their final Transportation into the Western Countreyes, They should serve such Gods as their Fathers had not known. Their Fathers too well knew the Heathen-Gods; but they never knew the Popish ones; they were perfect Strangers to the Image-Worship, that is now practised.⁸²

⁸¹ Patrick, on Deut. 28:64 (Deuteronomy 531), paraphrases Jackson’s Works (1673), vol. 1, bk. 1, ch. 29, p. 143 (§ 17). See also, ch. 16, p. 61 (§ 5).

It is observable, that these Words, which neither thou nor thy Fathers have known, are omitted in the Thirty Sixth Verse of this Chapter, where tis foretold, as well as here, That they should serve other Gods, of Wood & Stone. For that Part of the Chapter, belongs more peculiarly to the First Captivity in Babylon, as tis observed by Menasseh ben Israel. But what is now before us, belongs, as he observes, unto their Latter Dispersion; and reciting these Words of Moses, he adds, This we see fulfilled, after a Singular Manner, in this Present Captivity; because of all those Evils, wherewith the Hebrewes have been afflicted in France, and England, and Spain. For there, they many times complied with the Idolatries of Rome, rather than be undone, when pressed thereunto.⁸³

Q. Let us look upon some of the Threatenings against the Disobedient Jewes; particularly on that, Thou shalt serve other Gods, which neither thou nor thy Fathers have known, even Wood and Stone? v. 64.

A. One Mr. John Smith in his, Christian Religions Appeal, ha's a memorable Observation.⁸⁴

Dr. Lightfoot observes, out of Xiphilinus (apud Dionem.) That the Jewes, in acknowledgment of their Subjection to the Emperour, were enjoined by Vespasian, to pay unto the Capitol, the Didrachma, or Half-Shekel, which they usually paid unto the Temple for their Lives. The [Exod. 30.12, 13.] Ransome for their Souls unto the Lord.⁸⁵ What Xiphilinus relates more obscurely, is by Josephus ⁸² This unexceptional swipe at Roman Catholicism appears in Patrick (531) out of Jackson (143).

⁸⁴ The following paragraphs – including their references to classical authors – are extracted from Christian Religion's Appeal from the Groundless Prejudices of the Sceptick (1675), lib. 2, cap. 9, secs. 4–5, pp. 110–15 (sep. pag.), by John Smith (fl. 1675–1711), rector of St. Mary's in Colchester. An evidentialist apology for the NT as prophetic fulfillment of the OT, and a response to the Hobbist and Spinozist attack on the inspiration of the Bible as text, Smith's Christian Religion's Appeal is a learned work upholding the verity of the Bible with citations from ancient histories and pagan philosophy. Mather must have been impressed by Smith's accomplishments, for he also quotes from the same work in BA (1:1146–47; 3:42, 798–800, 849; 4:417, 484, 583; 5:90, 873); in Christian Philosopher (1994), “Essay 31” (224–25); and in his Threefold Paradise (292).

⁸⁵ In the preceding and following lines, including the references to Xiphilinus, Dion, and Josephus Flavius, Smith draws on John Lightfoot's “Harmony of the New Testament,” sec. 54 (Matth. 17:24–27), in Works (1684) 1:240. The Byzantine monk Johannes Xiphilinus (fl. 12th c. CE) epitomized the Historia Romana (80 books; extant bks. 36–80), a history of Rome from its mythical foundation in 753 BCE to the state of the Roman Empire in c. 229 CE, by the Graeco-Roman senator and historian Lucius Cassius Dio (155–234 CE) (KP). The reference is to Xiphilinus's epitome of Cassius Dio's Historia Romanae (66.7.2, related more expressly; [Bell. Jud. 7. 26.] φορον δε κλ· The Emperour Vespasian laid this Tribute upon the Jewes, wheresoever they lived, that they should pay to the Capitol that Didrachma, which hitherto they had paid to the Temple.⁸⁶ This was called, Sacred Money, and sent by the Jewes to the Temple, from all Parts of the World, where they were dispersed. From their vast Numbers it was, that Crassus found such vast Summs in the Treasury of the Temple, when he plundered it; and that Mithridates by surprize took Eight Hundred Talents at Cous, which the Jewes of the Lesser Asia had deposited there, during those Wars, because they durst not send it unto Jerusalem, lest it should be snap'd up in the Passage.⁸⁷ This Half-Shekel was never by any Conqueror before Vespasian, required as a Tribute. Pompey reputed it so sacred, that he durst not lay Hands on it, when he entred the Temple.⁸⁸ Men imputed the Overthrow of Crassus, unto the Vengeance of Heaven upon him for his Meddling with it. In Caligula's time, we find the Jewes in the Province of Babylon depositing this Treasury at the Imprægnable Neerda, till at certain Seasons they might send it with Safety to Jerusalem; which they did with a Convoy of many Thousands.⁸⁹

The Tribute-Money imposed on the Jewes, by the preceding Emperours, had Cæsars Image & Superscription upon it. [Matth. 22.18, 19.] It was a Roman Coin, and the Evangelists call it by a Latin Name, Δηνάριον.⁹⁰ On this very lines 3–5): “Thus was Jerusalem destroyed on the very day of Saturn, the day which even now the Jews reverence most. From that time forth it was ordered that the Jews who continued to observe their ancestral customs should pay an annual tribute of two denarii [διδραχμῶν] to Jupiter Capitolinus” (Roman History 65[!].7.2, p. 271).

⁸⁶ Smith (2:110–11); Flavius Josephus's De bello Judaico (7.218 lines 1–4), in Wars of the Jews (7.6.6), in Complete Works (597). Mather's reference to Josephus [Bell. Jud. 7.26] is to one of the many popular Greek-Latin editions of Josephus's collected works, before William Whiston's 1737 English translation cornered the English book market. See Flavii Iosephi Hierosolymitani Sacerdotis Opera quae extant (1611), lib. 7, cap. 26, fol. 983.

⁸⁷ The story of how Roman General Marcus Licinius Crassus (115–53 BCE) and King Mithridates VI of Pontus (135–63 BCE) pillaged the Temple treasury is told in Josephus (Antiquities 14.7.1–2 and Wars of the Jews 1.8.8–9). According to Josephus (Antiquities 14.7.2) and Appianus Alexandrinus (Roman History 12.5.23), Mithridates collected a large sum of money on the Island of Cos, in the SE Aegean Sea. This treasure – according to Appianus Alexandrinus's (12.5.23) – had been deposited there by the Egyptian Queen Cleopatra and looked after by her grandson, the future King Ptolemy XI Alexander of Egypt, during the Second Mithridatic War (83–82 BCE).

⁸⁹ According to Cassius Dio (Roman History 40.27.3), some say that when the Parthians decapitated Crassus (53 BCE), they “poured molten gold into his mouth in mockery; for though a man of vast wealth, he had set so great store by money as to pity those who could not support an enrolled legion from their own means, regarding them as poor men.” Josephus (Antiquities 18.9.1) tells the story of the stronghold of Neerda (a city in Babylonia) and its treasury, which outlived its usefulness during the time of Roman Emperor Gaius Julius Caesar Augustus Germanicus, aka. Caligula (12–41 CE).

⁹⁰ Denarion: The Greek Didrachma was considered worth two Roman Denari.

Account, our Saviour determined it to be Cæsars due. He could convince them, That the Tribute of the Denarium was due to Cæsar; and the Tribute of the Didrachma was due to God. The Denarium had the Face of Cæsar upon it, and these Words, Cæsar August: (such a Year) after the taking of Judæa. The Didrachma, had on the one Side, the Pott of Manna, or Aarons Censer, with these Words, The Shekel of Israel. On the Reverse, it had | Aarons Rod budding, with this Motto [53v] in the Rundle, Jerusalem the Holy City. This was the Sanctuary Shekel. But, if it were the Royal and Common Shekel, it had on one side, a Tower standing between יְרוּשָׁלַם and שְׁלֵם, & this Motto, Jerusalem the Holy City; and the Rundle fill'd with this: David King, and his Son Solomon King. It was Gods Coin, & it bore upon it Gods Claim. Weems is in the right on it; That the Tribute which Cæsar exacted, and Christ bid them to pay, was not the Half-Shekel due to God. Our Saviours Plea, for Exemption from the Payment of this Tribute, [Matth.17.25.] is to be applied unto none but the Half-Shekel to be paid unto the Holy King.⁹¹ Our Lord, being the Son of God, the Collectors of His Fathers Tribute, should not have demanded this Tribute of Him. Yett He being a Man also, and under an Obligation to fulfil the Law, rather than offend, in His not paying what was due to the Temple, He fetched Money out of the Fishes Mouth.⁹²

91 John Weemes, aka. Weems, Weemse, Wemys (c. 1579–1636), a Scottish Presbyterian clergyman and Hebrew scholar of Lathocker, Scotland, is the source for this important distinction, in Weemes, Explication of the Iudicial Lawes of Moses (London, 1632), lib. 1, ch. 13, pp. 51–52. Weems speaks of a “threefold halfe-shekel” paid to the Lord. “The first was called Argentum animarum, Exod. 30.2. which every one payed for the redemption of his life. The second was Argentum transeuntis, that is, the halfe shekell which they payed to the Lord, when they were numbered head by head, 2 King. 12.5. The third was that halfe shekell which they offered freely unto the Lord. This halfe shekell had Aarons rod upon the one side, and the pot with Manna upon the other. ... This was not the penny which Cæsar craved of them, for it had Cæsars Image and superscription upon it. Neither would the Lord have bidden them give that to Cæsar, which was due to God” (Explication 51).

by any former Conquerour.⁹³ It utterly subverted their Holy State; and made (as much as in him lay,) the God of Judah, tributary to the Gods of Rome. Yett as Austin expresses it, [De Consensu Evangel. L. 1. 14.] *Non quòd ipse sit victus, in Hebræo populo suo, qui Regnum ejus Romanis expugnandum delendumque permisit.*⁹⁴

Our Smith supposes, That now was fulfilled the Text, which we have before us. In the Babylonish Captivity, the Jewes constantly had in their Mouthes, [Jer. 10.11.] The Gods that made not Heaven shall utterly perish from under this Heaven. They were far from falling before Idols of Wood & Stone. It was Vespasian that brought them to it. How? But by being forced to pay the Homage of their Soul-Tribute unto the Capitoline-Gods. Mr. Medes Paraphrase on the Text is, *They should serve them, not Religiously, but Politically, inasmuch as they were to become Slaves unto Idolatrous Nations.*⁹⁵ But after all, Titus with the Point of his Spear, hath written in the Dust of Jerusalem, so clear a Comment on this Text, that we need not fly to the Refuge of a Trope for its Exposition. The Jewes politically Served now, not only the People, but also the very Idols, of Rome; while they must pay the Tribute of their Souls unto the Capitol. The Jewish Nation was now declared Abominable unto God; and their Tribute was as unacceptable as the Hire of a Whore unto Him.⁹⁶ Their Fathers indeed had known too well, the Gods of Egypt, & Syria, and Chaldaea, & the rest; but the Gods to whom Vespasian made them Tributary, Their Fathers knew not; nor did they themselves ever acknowledge, until now, God sett the Wicked over them, & placed Satan at their Right Hand. [Psal. 109.6.]⁹⁷

Martial accordingly tells of the Tribute,

Quod de Solymis venit perustis, which came from the Jewish Temple, now in Ashes.⁹⁸

[3854:]

Q. What Fulfilment had that Prophecy; Among these Nations thou shalt find no Rest? v. 65.⁹⁹

A. It was wonderfully fulfilled, in the Ages which followed that of Adrian. They continually broke the Rest of others, & could find no Rest themselves. In the Third Century, they raised a Sedition, under the Reign of Severus, by whom they suffered extremely, about the Year 202. In the Fourth Century, we are informed by Chrysostom, in his Second Oration against the Jewes; “That they, Rebelled again in the Time of Constantine, who caused their Ears to be cropt off, dispersed them, καθάπερ τινὰς δραπέτας καὶ μαστιγίας· as vile Fugitives & Vagabonds, into various Countreys, where they carried this Mark of Infamy along with them, that all might be instructed to make no more such Attempts.”¹⁰⁰ In the Fifth Century they made New Commotions, & were driven out of Alexandria for their seditious Practices, where they had been settled ever since the Time of Alexander the Great; & were now scattered into several Countreys, as tis observed by Socrates, in his Ecclesiastical History; who proceeds then to relate, how miserably they were deluded in Crete, by one pretending to be Moses, come down from Heaven to lead them unto their own Land thro’ the Sea, into which many threw themselves, & perished.¹⁰¹ This Expulsion out of Alexandria to Martial by offering to fellate him. Martial, notorious for his stereotypic portrayal of Jewish males with large penises, ridicules Chrestus, telling him that if he wants to ingratiate himself to anyone, Chrestus might as well fellate a Jew, “one that comes from burned-out Jerusalem, [one lately doomed to pay taxes]” (Epigrams 7.55.7–8). Mather, presumably conscious of the bawdy context of his third-hand citation from Martial, quotes out of context and only copies the first part of a longer citation. On Martial’s view of Jewish sexual mores, see B. Carmany’s Rethinking Eros (2010), ch. 3, esp. pp 28–30.

⁹⁹ Mather’s subsequent annotation is extracted – hook, line, and sinker – from Patrick (Deuteronomy 532–33).

¹⁰⁰ In his Adversus Iudaeos (Oratione 2, sec. 11) [PG 048. 900, line 32], St. Joannes Chrysostomus, archbishop of Constantinople (397–407) and one of the early Church Fathers of the Greek Church, apparently alludes to the persecution of the Jews under Roman Emperor Flavius Claudius Constantinus Augustus, aka. Constantine II (316–340 CE), and under his brother and successor Constantius II (317–361 CE), whose edicts (337, 339 CE) made intermarriages between Jews and Christians, and conversion to Judaism a capital crime.

is mentioned by David Ganz, one of their own Authors.¹⁰² In the Sixth Century, as Elmacinus tells us, they again Rebelled in Palæstine against the Romans, who slew a great Number of them. In the Seventh Century, they were expelled from Antioch, by Phocas, & by Heraclius from Jerusalem; & out of Spain, by Sisebutus, or, Sisebodus, King of the Goths.¹⁰³ And they flying in great Numbers into France, were shortly after putt unto this hard Choice, either to Renounce their Judaism, or to lose all they had; which Persecution is Recorded by those who wrote the Life of Dagobert, as one of the chief Memorables in his Reign.¹⁰⁴ In the [Mediterranean Sea]. Those who came first to the precipice did so, and were immediately destroyed, some of them being dashed in pieces against the rocks, and some drowned in the waters: and more would have perished, had not the Providence of God led some fishermen and merchants who were Christians to be present” and persuaded them to desist. “In consequence of this experience,” Socrates explains, many Jews embraced the Christian faith (Ecclesiastical History 7.13, 16, 38, in NPNFii 2:161, 175). See also “Pseudo-Messiahs: Moses of Crete” (JE).

102 The German Jewish chronicler and mathematician R. David Solomon Ganz (Gans) authored צמח דוד [Tzemach David] Chronologia Sacra-Profana (1644), a history in the form of annals from the creation to his own time. It was first published in Prague (1592) and expanded and reprinted several times thereafter (JE). Mather (via Patrick) refers to Chronologia Sacra-Profana (1644), lib. 2, p. 181 (anno 4180. 420.), where Ganz tersely mentions the following: “420, expulsi sunt omnes Iudæi, qui errant Alexandria in Ægypto; qua de causa sunt excitata magna bella, & multum sanguinis effusum est” (“[in the year] ‘420, all Jews, who were in Alexandria in Egypt, were expelled, which was incited by a great struggle, and much blood was shed”).

103 The Egyptian Coptic historian Georgius Elmacinus Ibn Al’Amid (c. 1223–c. 1274) is mostly remembered for his Historia Saracenica, qua Res Gestæ Muslimorum (1625), a history of Islam from the time of Muhammed to 1118. Thomas Erpenius translated and published Historia Saracenica in a bilingual Arabic-Latin edition in Leiden (1625). Even though Mather (via Patrick) identifies Elmacinus as his source (possibly referring to Historia Saracenica (lib. 1, cap. 1, pp. 5–6; cap. 3, pp. 24), the information is more likely than not to have come from Samuel Purchas’s Purchas his Pilgrimage, 4th ed. (1626), bk. 2, cap. 22, §1, p. 215. Greco-Roman Emperor Phocas (547–610), engaging the Parthian King Chosroes II (590–628) in a losing battle during the Byzantine-Sasanian War (602–628), was executed by his own general Heraclius (610). Just prior to his own death, Phocas squashed the Jewish uprising in Antioch during which Bishop Anastasius was killed. Crowned Roman Emperor of the East (610–641), Flavius Heraclius Augustus (c. 575–641) took over where Phocas left off and continued the Byzantine-Sasanian War against Chosroes II until the Parthian’s decisive defeat in the Battle of Nineveh (627) (ODB). Meanwhile, Jewish leaders had made common cause with Chosroes II in an effort to regain control over Jerusalem and to build the Third Temple (614). However, their victory against Heraclius was short-lived when their Persian ally favored the cause of the Christians during a revolt in Jerusalem and had the Jews expelled (ODB). The latter episode is described in A History of Heraclius (ch. 24), by the Arminian Bishop Sebeos of Bagratunis (7th c.). Pious King of the Visigoths, Sisebutus, aka. Sisebodus (c. 565–621), established his rulership over the Roman territories on the Iberian Peninsula (612–621) and decreed in 616 that all Jews in his domain should convert to Christianity or be expelled. The brief Latin account is recorded for the years 616 and 694, in Chronici Rerum Memorabilium Hispaniae (1552), fols. 101^r and 111^v, by the Flemish historian Johannes Vasaes of Bruges (1511–1561), who became lecturer at Salamanca (Spain).

104 Mather’s source (via Patrick’s Deuteronomy 533), is Thomas Jackson’s Works (1673), vol. 1, lib. 1, cap. 28, §§1, 4, pp. 127–28. According to Vita Dagoberti III regis Francorum, the Merovingian King Dagobert I (c. 603–639) expelled all Jews from his kingdom in 629 (JE). The event is briefly mentioned in Papiri Massonus’s Annalium Libri Quatuor (1578), lib. 1,

Eighth Century, there appears little notable about the Jewes, but the Appearance of a False Messiah, who brought a deal of Trouble upon them.¹⁰⁵ In the Ninth Century, there were no learned Men among them, nor indeed in the Christian World. And in the Tenth, little was their Condition mended, when they were fain to make a Weaver the Head of one of their Universities.¹⁰⁶

But they could no where obtain any long Settlement. In the Beginning of the Eleventh Century, they were so vexed throughout the most Part of Europe, that, Quid agerent, aut quo se verterent, nesciebant; as Paparius Massonus has it, out of Glauber. Their David Ganz tells us, that now coming on a famous Expedition, for the Recovery of the Holy Land, The Jewes felt it a most calamitous Time, as being Robb'd and Kill'd by the Souldiers, as they went along. Indeed so much Cruelty was now exercised upon them, that it moved Bernards Compassion, to write unto the Bishop, Clergy, & People of Spire, not so severely to persecute them: For they are dispersed, said he, into all Lands, that while they suffer the just Punishment of their horrid Wickedness, they may be Witnesses of our Redemption.¹⁰⁷

pp. 62–63, and the cause is attributed to the avarice of the Gallic bishops and of King Clotharius II (584–630), father of Dagobert I. See also Alexander Wilthemius, Acta D. Dagoberti Francorum Regis et Martyris, et in ea Notationes (1653).

105 Several “false” or pseudo-Messiahs made their appearance in the eighth century, among them Ishak ben Ya’kub Obadiah Abu ‘Isa al-Isfahani of Isphahan (Persia), who like many before and after him claimed that God had sent him to liberate Israel from oppression. Yudghan, aka “Al-Ra’i,” of Hamadan (Ecbatana), in Persia, was also believed to be the Messiah who was expected to return after his physical death. For good measure, there was a Syrian Christian variously called Sherini, Serenus, Severus, who assumed the role of Moses to lead the Jews of the Diaspora back to Israel during the time of Calif Omar II (717–720) (EJ). See also J. Rabow’s Fifty Jewish Messiahs (2002).

106 Patrick (Deuteronomy 533).

107 Patrick (Deuteronomy 533–34) draws on Jackson’s Works (1673), pp. 128, who relies on Papiri Massonus, Annalium Libri Quatuor (Editio secunda, 1578), lib. 3, pp. 208–209, arguing that the Jews all over the European territories were severely harassed and would rather move on than be willing converts to Christianity. In fact, the tribulation was so great that “What they should do, or where to turn, they knew not.” Massonus’s vademecum is Rudolph Glaber’s Historiarum Libri Quinque (lib. 3, cap. 7, col. 657–59) [PL 142, 0657–659], who describes the plight of the Jews after the destruction of the Church of St. George at Rampla and, more important, of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem, by Al-Hakim bi-Amr Allah (996–1021), sixth Fatimid Caliph of Cairo. Glaber argues that “the dispersed and wandering Jews who had survived this affliction remained hidden in distant and secret places until five years after the destruction of the Temple [Church of the Holy Sepulchre], when a few began to reappear in the cities. For it was proper, although ultimately to their confusion, that some of them should survive for the future to serve as witnesses of their own perfidy, or testimony to the blood of Christ which they had shed” (Histories, bk. 3, ch. 7, § 25, p. 137). R. David Ganz (Gans), in his צמח דוד [Tzemaḥ David] Chronologia Sacra-Profana (1644), lib. 2, p. 305, refers to the pogrom of Speyer (Spire), SW Germany, during the Second Crusade (1146–1149), when many Jews were killed or expelled, ostensibly because they refused to contribute to the Crusade (JE). Aware of the widespread persecution of European Jewry, the Cistercian Abbot Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1153), in “Epistola CCCLXIII,” § 6, warned his readers that the Jews are not to be harmed because their dispersion is preordained: “Non sunt persequendi Iudaei, non sunt trucidandi, sed nec effugandi quidem. ... Propter hoc disperse sunt in omnes

And the Author of Schebet Juda, mentioning their Banishment, out of Savoy, Piedmont, Lombardy, Sicily, & other Countreys, quotes these very Words of Moses, [Among these Nations, thou shalt find no Rest,] as a Prophecy of that Exile, which was accompanied with many other Mischiefs; For as they fled unto other Countreys, an immense Multitude of People fell upon them, and pillaged them of all the Gold and Silver they were carrying away with them.¹⁰⁸

Q. And how have things proceeded in the Fulfilment of that further Article, The Lord shall give thee a Trembling Heart? v. 65.¹⁰⁹

A. The Jewes were always in Dread of New Miseries. Their Condition in the Twelfth Century grew still more dismal. As there is in Moses's Prophecy, a Progress of Calamities, thus there was in the Fulfilment of the Prophecy. They themselves (in Tzemach David, and other Books) relate, that in the Year, 1142, an hundred & twenty of their Congregations, were utterly subverted & dispersed. And in the Year, 1170, they were again expelled out of France, & spoiled of their Treasure; which was renewed in the Year, 1198.¹¹⁰ Our own Chronicles tell us, how they were used in England; and the like Ill Usage, they suffered, in Germany and Spain.¹¹¹ R. Zacut complains of no less than Ten grievous Persecutions in this regiones, ut dum justas tanti facinoris poenas luunt, testes sint nostrae redemptionis” [PL 182. 0567]. This may be rendered, “The Jews are not to be persecuted, nor by any means butchered, nor indeed driven away. ... For they are dispersed throughout all the lands, that while they suffer the just punishment for their horrid crime, they may be witnesses for our redemption.” Thomas Jackson, Works (1670), bk. 1, cap. 28, sec. 7, pp. 130–31, has much to say on this topic as well. See also D. Berger, “The Attitude of St. Bernard of Clairvaux toward the Jews” (1972); on the fate of the Jews of Speyer, see H. H. Ben-Sasson, A History of the Jewish People (1976), esp. 412–19, 504, 510, 554, 563.

¹⁰⁸ Patrick, on Deut. 28:66 (Deuteronomy 537) refers to Salomon ibn Virga, שבת יהודה [Shebet Jehudah] Tribus Judae Salomonis Virgae (1651, 1680), sec. 11, pp. 108–109. Ibn Virga adds that many Jews were forced to undergo baptism but continued to practice Judaism in secret. For the same, see Ganz’s צמח דוד [Tzemach David] Chronologia Sacra-Profana (1644), lib. 2, p. 305.

¹⁰⁹ Mather’s vademecum for the remaining glosses on Deut. ch. 28 is, once again, Simon Patrick whose popular commentary is nothing less than the fifth pillar of Biblia Americana. ¹¹¹ Thomas Jackson, Works (1670), lib. 1, cap. 29, §§ 1–17 pp. 134–44; David Ganz briefly alludes to the destruction of a large number of synagogues in England and to the expulsion of Jews from England, France, Germany, Italy, and Spain, in Zemach David (lib. 2, p. 305). In his The Last volume of the Chronicles of England, Scotlande, and Irelande (1577), the famous Elizabethan chronicler Raphael Holinshed (1529–1580) reports numerous cases of mayhem, one Age, to abolish the Name of Jewes, out of the World. This could not but give them a very Trembling Heart.¹¹²

Q. And failing of thine Eyes?

A. They look'd for some Releef; but still they were more cruelly used in the Thirteenth Century. In the Year 1253, they were again expelled from France, whither they had returned. And again in 1295, when they expected some Rest, there was a fresh Expulsion, mentioned by R. Levi ben Gersom; who saies, They were spoiled of all their Goods, & sent away only with their Cloathes upon their Backs. It was done in his own Time; & he saies, The Number of them exceeded those which came out of Egypt. Flying from France, into England, and Germany, they were most cruelly used there.¹¹³ murder, and extortion to which the Jews of England were periodically subjected. For instance, Holinshed instances that King Henry the III of England (1207–1272) fleeced the Jews to refill his coffers in times of duress: “Whereas hee [King Henry III] stode in great neede of money, he required by way of tallage eight thousand marks of the Jewes, charging them on payne of hanging, not to defer that payment. The Jewes sore empoverished with greevous and often payments, excused themselves by the Popes usurers, and reproved plainly the Kings excessive taking of money, as well of his Christian subjects as of them. ... To be short, when he [Henry III] had fleeced the Jewes to the quick, he set them to ferme unto his brother Earle Richard, that hee mighte pull off skinne and all; but yet he considering their povertie, spared them, and neverthesse, to relieve his brothers necessitie upon pawne, he lent to him an huge masse of money” (Chronicles [1577], bk. 3, p. 739, col. 1). The index to this volume provides ample references to similar cases.

112 Abraham ben Samuel (Diego Roderigo) Zacuto describes the signs of the times in his ספר היוחסין Sepher ha-Yuchasin [Liber Yuchasin], “The Chronicles of the Kings of Israel and the Kings of the Nations,” in The Book of Lineage (597–600). The persecution of the Jews of France, Germany, and England during the First, Second, and Third Crusades (1095–1099; 1147–1149; 1189–1192) are well known. See, for instance, Papirius Massonus, Annalium Libri Quatuor (1578), lib. 3, p. 290, which refers to the edict of King Philip II (Augustus) of France (1165–1223), who decreed that all Jews in his realm must undergo baptism or incur expulsion.

113 Patrick, on Deut. 28:65 (Deuteronomy 535). The Sephardic Philosopher, mathematician, and physician ר' לוי בן גרשום R. Levi ben Gersom (RalBag), aka. Gershom, aka. Gersonides (1288–1344), born in the region of Languedoc (SE France), is well known for his works on mathematics, astrology, and philosophy. For our purposes, his commentaries on the Torah are most important and nearly rank among such classics as those by Rashi, Rambam, ibn Ezra, and Nachmanides. Via Patrick (535), Mather here refers to Gersonides's Commentary on the Torah, פירוש על התורה [Perush 'al Sefer Ha-Torah], first printed in Venice, 1547. The Benedictine monk Matthaeus Parisiensis (c. 1200–1250) provides much detail on the expulsion of the Jews from England in his Chronica Majora, covering the period from the Creation to his death. The Jews of Germany did not fare any better, if we consult the Annalium Boiorum libri septem (1554), lib. 7, pp. 717, 735, by the German humanist and historian Joannes Aventinus Boioarum, aka. Johannes Thurmair (1477–1534). This work was republished in Frankfurt, in 1627.

Q. *And Sorrow of Mind?*¹¹⁴

A. Which, how could they avoid; especially when they found their Miseries yett increasing upon them, in the Fourteenth Century. They were then again Banished from France, & Spoiled of their Goods; A. C. 1306. and once more, A. C. 1395. which the Jewes call their Fourth and Last, Banishment.¹¹⁵ About the same time, they were Banished out of Germany. A. C. 1392.¹¹⁶ In Castile indeed, they Redeemed their Lives with Money; (which they could not part withal, without much Sorrow of Mind;) But in Catalonia, and Arragon, such a terrible Storm fell upon them, that they themselves, [in Juchasin] say, There were no less than Two Hundred Thousand, who turned Christians, with Heavy Hearts.¹¹⁷ Long would be the Story, long the Mischief, to relate all that they suffered in the Fifteenth Century, in Germany, Hungary, Polonia, Italy, Spain, and Portugal. We will only touch upon what befel them, in Portugal, in the next Century, A. C. 1506.¹¹⁸ All that is foretold in this Verse, was then fulfill'd, with most horrible Circumstances. There was then a most bloody Massacre of the Jewes, made at Lisbon, for Three Dayes together. Men were not suffered then to Dy, of their Deadly Wounds, but were dragg'd by their mangled Limbs into the Marketplace, where the Bodies of the Living & of the Dead, & of others half Living, half Dead, were burnt in Heaps together. So hideous was the Spectacle, that it quite astonished the rest of this wretched People; Two thousand of them then perished in ¹¹⁴ Patrick, on Deut. 28:65 (Deuteronomy 535–36), relies heavily on Jackson's Works (1673), bk. 1, ch. 29, pp. 142–43.

¹¹⁶ Probably a reference to the expulsion of Jews from Speyer and Rothenburg on the Tauber (SW Germany) and from Austria.

¹¹⁷ Abraham ben Samuel Zacuto his ספר היוחסין Sepher ha-Yuchasin [Liber Yuchasin] (1566) alludes to the expulsion of the Sephardim from Spain in 1492, by Isabella I of Castile (1451–1504) and Ferdinand II of Aragon (1452–1516); The Book of Lineage (605). See esp. J. Pérez, The History of a Tragedy (2007), ch. 4.

¹¹⁸ Known as the Lisbon Massacre, thousands of Portuguese Jews were murdered by a Catholic mob (April, 1506). The massacre is described in Epistola seremissimi Regis Portugalie ad Julium Papam Secundum de Victoria Contra Infideles Habita (Roma, 1507), by King Nicholas Manuel I of Portugal (1469–1521). How the mob violence got started is retold in Chronica D. Manoel Por Damiao de Goes [Góis] (Lisboa, 1749), cap. 102, pp. 141–42. See E. Sanceau's Manuel I of Portugal (1970).

this barbarous Manner; Parents then durst not mourn for their Children, nor Children sigh for their Parents, when they saw them ha[u]led unto the Place of Torment. Were they not then filled with Sorrow of Mind? Yea, Sic eos metus exanimaverat, ut vivi non multum à mortuorum similitudine distarent: Fear had so dispirited them, that the Living, in their Aspect little differed from the Dead; Which Words of Osorius, (in his Fourth Book, De Rebus Emanuelis) Dr. Jackson, who relates this dismal Matter out of him, looks upon as a Paraphrase upon the Words of Moses, (tho' Osorius did not think of them,) I will give thee a trembling Heart, and failing of Eyes, & Sorrow of Mind.¹¹⁹

Wonder not, that now it followes; Thou shalt fear Day, & Night, & have no Assurance of thy Life. None of them knew, who would be next siezed for the Butchery. In some of their Banishments, they were told, That their Banishments were the best Remedies for the Evils Impending over them; as the Author of Schebet Juda speaks; who tells us, That the Reason given by several Princes, for their Expulsion out of their Territories, was, To prevent their being, torn in Peeeces by the People, who were most furiously sett against them.¹²⁰

Q. And in what Circumstances, did they see the Fulfilment of that Prædiction; In the Mourning thou shalt say, would God, it were Evening? v. 67.

A. Abarbinel reckons up, Four Universal Banishments; The first, out of England; the next, out of France; the third, out of Asia, Germany, Tuscany, Lombardy, and Savoy; and the last, out of Spain; when he himself was one of those who were constrained to leave that Countrey, & knew not whither to go. He hath given us a lively Description of that Calamity (like to which, he saies, none had befallen them, since they were Banished from their own Countrey;) in his Preface to his Commentary on the Book of Kings; which he wrote the very next ¹²⁰ Patrick, on Deut. 28:66 (Deuteronomy 537); Salomon ibn Virga, שבֿת יהודה [Shebet Jehudah] Tribus Judae Salomonis Virgae (sec. 23, pp. 148–49), tells of yet another forced baptism of the Sephardic Jews on pain of expulsion or execution, even though the Moorish scholar Abugardan Delcadin, highly respected by the Spanish ruler, intervened on their behalf.

¹²¹ See Appendix B.

Year after that Expulsion. A. C. 1493; and the Author, of Schebet Judah hath transcribed it in his own Words.¹²²

“A Decree was made & publicly proclaimed, that all the Jewes, either should change their Religion, or quitt the Countrey in three Months time. Abarbinel had then a Place in the Court; where he petitioned the King & besought his Ministers & Counsellors to Revoke the Edict, & be content with their Estates, which they offered unto him, but all in vain. For, Three Hundred Thousand, Old and Young, Men & Women, & he among the rest, went away on foot, upon one day, not knowing whither to go. Some went into Portugal, others into Navarre, where they conflicted with many Calamities. For some became a Prey, others perished by Famine & Pestilence. And therefore others committed themselves unto the Sea; hoping to find a quiet Seat in some other Countreyes. But on the Sea, they mett with New Disasters; for, many were sold as Slaves, when they came on any Coast; many were Drowned; many burnt in the Ships, which were sett on fire; in short, all suffered the just Punishment of God the Avenger. For after all this, a Plague came, & swept away the rest of these miserable Wretches, who were Hated by all Mankind; so that all the vast Number perished, by one Calamity or other, except a very few.”¹²³

More of the woful Miseries befalling this People, are to be found recounted in Schebet Juda; and particularly, what befel those who sought New Habitations in the Kingdome of Fess; where they lived a long Time upon Grass, & eat its very Roots, and then Died; and their Bodies lay exposed, none being so charitable as to bury them.¹²⁴

Q. How was that fulfilled, The Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again? v. 68.¹²⁵

A. The Hierusalem Targum translates it, The WORD OF THE LORD shall bring thee back again; even HE, who conducted them out of Egypt, in a glorious Cloud.¹²⁶

122 Mather's source is Patrick (538–39), whose extract from Abarbanel's preface to his commentary on Isaiah, in his פירוש על נביאים אחרונים [Perush 'al nevi'im 'aharonim] Commentarius celeberrimi Rabbi Ishak Abarbanel, Super Iesaiam, Ieremiam, Iehazkelem et Prophetas XII. Minores (1642), is derived at second hand from Salomon ibn Virga, שבת יהודה [Shebet Jehudah] Tribus Judae Salomonis Virgae (1651, 1680), sec. 51, pp. 318–23.

123 Ibn Virga, שבת יהודה [Shebet Jehudah], sec. 51, pp. 321–23.

124 שבת יהודה [Shebet Jehudah], secs. 52, 53, pp. 323, 324–25. Ibn Virga reports out of Abarbanel's preface that those of the Sephardim who escaped to Fez (Morocco) did not fare much better because the inhabitants did not admit them for fear that the arrival of Jewish refugees would deplete the kingdom's resources and inflate the price for food. The famine among the arriving Jews was so great that some were forced to sell their sons as slaves in exchange for a piece of bread.

125 The following paragraphs are extracted from Patrick (Deuteronomy 539–40).

126 Targum Hierosolymitanum, on Deut. 28:68, in Brian Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (4:372), reads as follows: וַיְחַזֵּד יְהוָה מִיָּמָרָא דִּי לְמַעְרִים בְּלִבְרַנְיָא בְּאוֹרְחָא דִּי אֲמַרִית לְכוֹן לֹא תוֹסֵפּ:

This was first fulfilled, after the Desolation made by Titus; when many of the Jewes were transported, as Captives into Egypt; as tis related by Josephus.¹²⁷ And here, Menasseh-ben Israel ha's a very pertinent Observation, That Vespasian transported them into many & various Regions; but only Egypt is here named, the more to reproach the Jewes; as if he had said, Yee shall be carried into that Land as Captives, out of which yee came in a triumphant Manner.¹²⁸ This may incline one to think, (as Dr. Patrick notes,) that he was much of the Mind with Dr. Jackson, who observing how cruelly they were used here in England, & many other Countreyes, concludes, That this Island, and every Place of Europe, wherein their Condition of Life, had been more hard & burdensome than their Forefathers was in Egypt, may be said to be that Egypt into which God here threatens to bring them.¹²⁹

Q. Why is it added, With Ships?

A. It putts them in Mind, how different their Condition is now become, from what it was, when they came out of Egypt, without any Ships; the Sea giving them a Passage through out. Their being also carried thither by Ships, made their Condition the more deplorable, because there were no Means of escaping out of them, as there might have been, if they had gone by Land.¹³⁰

Q. It followes, And there yee shall be sold?

A. And so they were; exposed unto Sale at so vile a Price, that (as many Historians have related it) Thirty of them were sold for one small Peece of Money. Josephus tells us, The more goodly young Men were kept for to attend the Triumph of Titus; of the rest, those that were above seventeen Years old, were sent bound, for to labour in the Works of Egypt; many he distributed in the Provinces, to perish on the Theatres; All under seventeen Years, he ordered to be sold;

:תה: "And the Word of the Lord will cause you to return into Mizraim [Egypt] in galleys, by way of which I said to you, Ye shall see it no more" (Ethridge, The Targums 2:649).

127 Josephus Flavius (War of the Jews 6.9.3) reports that "the number of those that were carried captive [by Titus] during this whole war was collected to be ninety-seven thousand; as was the number of those that perished during the whole siege, eleven hundred thousand, the greater part of whom were indeed of the same nation, [with the citizens of Jerusalem,] but not belonging to the city itself" (Works 587).

128 Manasseh ben Israel, צרור החיים De Termino Vitae Libri Tres (1639), lib. 3, sec. 3, § 3, pp. 131–32: "Etsi enim Vespasianus in varias, & multas regiones Hebraeos ablegavit: nihilo minus tamen sola Ægyptus, ignominiae ergo nominatur, quasi diceret, In eam terram, unde triumphantium instar egressi estis, intrabitis captivi."

129 Patrick's muse (Deuteronomy 539–40) is Thomas Jackson, Works (1673), tom. 1, lib. 1, ch. 29, sec. 7, pp. 136–37.

But while they were making this Distribution, Twelve thousand of them died of meer Famine, especially thro' the neglect & malice of their Keepers. By this a Judgment may be made, how little worth, these vile Wretches were; for, as it follows, they even hung upon the Sellers Hands; no Man almost thought 'em worth taking off, at the vilest Price in the World.¹³¹

Q. One Remarkable, upon the Whole?

A. Dr. Jackson ha's Remark'd it.

Moses is near Four Times as long, in enumerating the Plagues as the Blessings, upon this People. And so have the Miseries of the latter Jewes, been Four Times as long, as the Prosperity of their worthy Ancestors.¹³²

Q. Thy Shoe is not waxen old upon thy Foot. What Shoe? v. 5.

A. Bochart probably conjectures, That the Israelites used no Shoes in Egypt; but being to take a long Journey, thro' a Rough Way in the Wilderness, Moses commanded them to eat the Passeover, with Shoes on their Feet. [Exod. 12.11.] And these very Shoes, which they putt on, at that Festival, when they were ready to march, God suffered not to Decay, in all their Travels for Forty Years ensuing.¹

Q. What is meant by A Root that beareth Gall and Wormwood? v. 18

A. It means, a Person lurking secretly among the People (as a Root under Ground,) that was tainted with Idolatry; who might poison others therewith, & bring forth in time, the Fruits of their Impiety, which he calls, Gall and Wormwood. It must be observed, That the Hebrew Word Rosch, which we translate, Gall, properly signifies, an Herb growing amongst Corn, as bitter as Gall; which elsewhere [Hos. 10.4.] we translate, Hemlock; And commonly in Scripture, tis joined with Wormwood. [Jer. 9.15. Lam. 3.19. Amos. 6.12.] Idolatry is compared unto it, because it is very distasteful unto God; & produces Bitter Effects in the Punishments of it, upon the Children of Men.²

Q. What means, Adding Drunkenness to Thirst? v. 19.

A. Both the Words in the Hebrew, are Adjectives. And the Particle, Beth (a Note of the Accusative) is putt before the Word, Thirsty, or Dry; therefore, that is the Thing to be added unto the, Drunken, or Wett. The Sense is, To Draw others into the same Wickedness; just as if a Drunken Man should draw sober Persons to play the Fool with him, & do as bad as himself; or, after one Peece of Land is overflowed, the Water should be lett into that which is Dry, & spoil that also.

¹ Patrick, on Deut. 29:5 (Deuteronomy 547), acknowledges as his source Samuel Bochart's Hierozyicon (1693), pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 50: "De Agno Pascali," col. 600, lines 71–74; col. 618, lines 65–68; See also Deut. 8:4 and Eph. 6:14–15.

² Patrick (Deuteronomy 554). Nachmanides (Ramban) offers an interesting gloss on this phrase: "'Rosh v'la'anah' (gall and wormwood) are bitter or poisonous herbs. These are their names in the Sacred Language. Or it may be that they are surnames, one called rosh ('the head') because it is the head of the bitter herbs, the bitterest of all, and the second is called la'anah, from the expression 'lei'anoth' (to humble thyself) before Me (Exod. 10:3), for he who eats it becomes oppressed and is humbled, because he eats it only in order to afflict his soul" (Commentary on the Torah 5:334).

The Meaning of the whole Verse appears to be This; If a Man shall be so præsumptuous, as not only to cry, Peace, unto himself when he runs after his own Devices, in serving other Gods; but endeavours to draw others into the same Wicked Practices.³

Q. What may bee the true Import of that Clause, which in our Translation is, To add Drunkenness to Thirst? v. 19.

A. Wee generally conform our Sense of this Place, to that of the Arabian Version, In cogitationibus Cordis mei ambulo, ut addam ebrietatem ad sitim;⁴ Fitt Language for People, who inebriated with Sin, promise themselves that Security therein, which makes them yett more eager after it. But the Words which wee English, Drunkenness to Thirst, are in the Original, The Drunken to the Thirsty. And by the Drunken here my Pfeiffer understands, the Fertile Earth; and by the Thirsty, hee understands, the Dry, the Hard, the Barren: The Signification being thus carried on; And it shall come to pass, when hee [who is in the foregoing Verse described] heareth the Words of this Curse, that hee bless himself in his Heart, Saying, I shall have Peace, tho' I walk in the Stubbornness of my Heart, until the Fat Soyl bee consumed, together with that which is Dry;⁵ That is, Till I have nothing

3 Patrick (Deuteronomy 555). JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot (5:199) provides several different rabbinic readings – apart from the classic commentaries: “Adding ‘moist’ sins, which do not add to his satisfaction (like wearing linsey-woolsey or sowing two kinds of crops together), to the sins for which he is ‘thirsty’ (as the Hebrew really says), like theft or sexual immorality (Bekhor Shor). Some understand the ‘moist’ to be a reference to the intellectual soul, representing the righteous, and the ‘thirsty’ to be a reference to the appetitive soul, representing the wicked (Kimchi). The point of the expression is that one who is ‘thirsty’ for transgression wishes to bring this to the point where his ‘thirst’ can be quenched in public without fear of punishment (Hizkuni). One who has a dry field next to a well-watered one will automatical irrigate the well-watered one in the course of irrigating the dry one (Abarbanel). He is the ‘moist’ one, soaked in the appetites he has sated; he believes he can add himself to the joyful fate of the righteous, who are ‘dry’ by virtue of having separated themselves from physical appetites (Sforno).” Johannes Cocceianus supplies synopses on the topic of ten principal interpreters (both rabbinic and Christian), in his Considerationes Ad Ultima Mosis (1650), “Observ. VII: Ecclesis sitiens & satiatæ,” fol. 12, § 134 (sep. pag.), in Opera Omnia (1675), fol. 12 (sep. pag.). See also Thomas Jackson (Works), vol. 1, bk. 1, ch. 30, pp. 147–48, § 4.

4 Mather’s source for the Latin translation of the Arabic version of the Pentateuch (Deut. 29:19) is not Walton’s Biblia Sacra Polyglotta 1:841), but that of Augustus Pfeiffer’s Dubia Vexata Scripturae Sacrae (1699), Centuria Secunda, Locus XL. “Ebria cum sitiente” (Deut. 29:19), pp. 316–17; Pfeiffer’s own source appears to be Ludovicus de Dieu’s Critica Sacra, sive Animadversiones (1694), fol. 46. Be that as it may, the Arabian version reads, “I walk in the thoughts of my heart, so I will add drunkenness to thirst.” Rashi, Ramban, Ibn Ezra, and most others of the classical rabbinic commentators would not have disagreed with this explication; see JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot (5:198–99).

left mee, but one Part of my Estate is gone after another; first, my best Lands, & then the worst ones, to the Improvement whereof I am driven by the Loss of my best. —⁶

But we may Illustrate the Text, yett a little more distinctly?⁷

Moses represents the Disposition of a profligate Prodigal, (as the Author of, the Essay for a New Translation of the Bible, expresses it,) who without any Regard unto Gods Threatning, or his own Duty, or to the evil Consequences of his wicked Behaviour, promises himself an uninterrupted Prosperity, tho' he should indulge his inordinate Affections to such a Degree, as to consume all his Goods, by Mortgaging his Lands, in the best Season of the Year, when they are watered, and as it were Drunk, with Dew and Rain, & by Selling of them when they are Barren, and Dry. We should therefore translate it, I shall have Peace tho' I follow the inordinate Motions of my Heart even to the Consuming of my Lands, when they are watered with Rain, & when they are parched with Drought.⁸

Q. What may be the Admonition given to us, in that Passage; Secret things belong unto the Lord our God? v. 29.

A. The Jewes do generally take these Words, to be meant, of the Punishment of Secret Sins (especially Idolatry), which belonged unto God; as the Punishment of Open Sins belonged unto them, who in Obedience unto the Law, were to putt Idolaters unto Death.

But the Words may be understood, as a further Answer to such Enquiries, as that in the Twenty fourth Verse; in which if Men persisted, & still asked, But why does God punish thus His own People, with such terrible Severity, when there are many Idolatrous Nations far worse than they, who continue still in their own Land, & are not thus Rooted out? Moses bids them silence all such Enquiries, & rest satisfied in this, That we cannot give an Account of such things, as God hath not Revealed; particularly, why He punishes these and those People,

⁶ Pfeiffer, Dubia Vexata Scripturae Sacrae (1699), on Deut. 29:19, p. 317: “Per ebriam intelligitur terra fertilis, per sitientem arida.”

⁷ Originally devised as a separate Q&A, the opening line is turned into a transition between the former and latter paragraph.

when He spares others as bad; but must mind our own Duty, which He hath Revealed unto us.⁹

Q. How may we further understand that Passage, The Secret things belong unto the Lord, – but those things which are Revealed, belong unto us, etc.? v. 29.

A. Some take the Meaning to be, That God reserves to Himself the Punishment of Secret Crimes, & commands the Israelites, to punish only such as were Publick. Some again; That Moses wishes, that God might never visit His People, with such Judgments, as he had been describing, but that they might be Reveal'd unto them, to the End they might be kept unto their Duty, for fear of drawing the like Punishments upon themselves. And not a few think, they signify, That we ought not to penetrate too much into Gods Decrees, but rest satisfied with what is plainly Reveal'd unto us. But, the Author of the Essay for a New Translation of the Bible, propounds to us, rather to translate the Words, with Luther; These things were Secrets, known only to God; but now they are Revealed unto us, & unto our Children forever, that we may do all the Words of this Law.¹⁰

'Tis very sure, some great Men have so translated these Words; The Secrets of the Lord our God, are Revealed unto us, & unto our Children. Thus Onkelos, whose Judgment is very valuable: which Grotius follows; & before him, Forsterus; and Paulus Fagius, represents it as a commodious Sense; [making it the same with, Psal. 147.20.]¹¹

Or, as the German Reformer Martin Luther renders the passage, “Das Geheimnis des Herrn unsers Gottes ist offenbart / uns und unsern Kindern ewiglich / das wir thun sollen alle wort dieses Gesetzes.” Luther’s marginalia explain what is meant by “Das Geheimnis” [The secret]: (Das Geheimnis) Wil so sagen Uns Jüden hat Gott fur allen Völckern auff Erden/ seinen willen offenbart / und was er im sinn hat Darumb sollen wir auch deste vleissiger sein,” in Biblia: Das ist: Die gantze Heilige Schrift (1545), fol. CXIII, on Deut. 29:29.

Q. Some Remarks upon that Prædiction; If any of thine be driven out unto the uttermost Parts of Heaven, from thence will the Lord thy God gather thee? v. 4.¹

A. Nehemiah plainly alludes unto this Promise, in his Prayer to God, for the Prospering of his Endeavours to Rebuild Jerusalem; [Neh. 1. 8, 9.] And finding the Truth of it confirmed, by the Kings gracious Concession to him, he went about the Work, tho' one who was accounted a Prophet (yea, several,) dissuaded him from the Enterprize. [Neh. 6. 10, 11, 12.]

In their Dispersion by the Romans, they are scattered into more distant Regions, than in that by the Babylonians. [As tis threatned, Deut. 28.64.] Yett, if they would now come to Repentance, the compassionate God would undoubtedly favour them with a wonderful Restoration.²

The Jewes themselves have long applied this Text, unto their present Condition. Besides what there is to this Purpose, in the ancient Nitzacon,³ and afterwards in the Chissuk Emuna of R. Isaac,⁴ it is more lately mentioned by Menasseh

1 The following paragraphs – including the references to other primary sources – are extracted from Patrick, on Deut. 30:4 (Deuteronomy 564–67).

2 As Ramban interprets Deut. 28:64, after the destruction of the Sanctuary, the Romans and their allies – “Greece, Egypt, Syria and many other peoples” – took with them their Jewish captives: “Then was fulfilled the verse, And the Eternall shall scatter thee among all peoples etc. [Deut. 28:64]. The verses after that, all refer to their punishment in exile. ... In the countries [of our exile] we are like the rest of the peoples who inhabit whatever country, or even better than them [i. e., in Spain], for His mercies are upon us, because our habitations in exile are by [virtue of] the promise He made to us, And yet for all that, when they are in the land of their enemies, I will not reject them, neither will I abhor them, to destroy them utterly, and to break My covenant with them; for I am the Eternal their G-d [Lev. 26:44]. ... The secret of this covenant ... refers to the present time of our exile at the hand of the ‘fourth beast’ [Dan. 7:7], and afterwards He assured us of being [completely] redeemed therefrom” (Commentary on the Torah 5:326–27).

3 According to anonymous ישן נוצחון ספר נצחון [Sefer Nizzachon Yashan] Liber Nizzachon Vetus (in Wagenseil’s Tela Ignea Satanae 2:253–54), the Jewish polemicist complains that Christians constantly badger Jews about the length of their present exile. These Christian infidels argue, “The exile in Egypt lasted four hundred years, and the Babylonian exile lasted seventy years. Why, then, does this [present] exile last so long? It is evident that if you [Jews] were going to be redeemed, you would have been redeemed already. It must be, then, that because of your sin against Jesus, you will remain in exile and will never be redeemed. This is how you should answer them: The earlier exiles were given an explicit time limit which applied whether the Jews had repented of their sins or not, and as a result they were redeemed when that time came. This [present] exile, however, is dependent upon repentance; if they repent, the time will be shortened, as it is written ... [Deut: 30–2–4]. Nevertheless, God has set a time limit to our exile, but it is hidden from us,” in Nizzachon Vetus Translation (sec. 242, p. 226).

4 R. Isaaco Filio Abrahami, in his ספר חזקת אמונה אשר חבר יצחק בן אברהם [Sepher Hizzuq ‘Emunah] Liber Munimen Fidei, pars 1, פרכי 1, פ (cap. 7) and פרכי 1, כז (cap. 27), addresses the same polemic argument about the long duration of the Jews’ present exile, which (Christians ben Israel, in his Book, De Termino Vitæ.⁵ He saies, “Herein all the Prophets imitate Moses; being wont, after terrible Threatenings, to conclude with some singular Consolation, which made R. Aquiba (as the Talmudists report) fall a laughing, when all the Wise Men, who were with him, wept & lamented, at the Sight of the Ruines of Jerusalem & the Temple. Which they wondring at, he said, After the Clouds, the Sun will break out, & after the End of the Evils which Moses threatned, we may hope for Good Things; for God is not more faithful in fulfilling the one, than in performing the other.”⁶

But the miserable Jewes are to this Day hardened in their Unbeleef, & continue bitterly to Reproach our Lord JESUS CHRIST & His Religion. Abarbinel himself, tho’ a Gentleman of a noble Family, a well-bred Person, & of an excellent Understanding, is extremely Guilty of This.⁷ And since his Time, Solomon Virgæ, in the Age before us, considering the astonishing Plagues that have befallen them, he reckons up Seven Causes, why the Divine Majesty should be so Angry with them.⁸ One of them, he reckons, is, The Putting of Jesus of Nazareth argue) proved that God had cut them off for good. R. Isaac rejoins that their deliverance depends on their genuine repentance (Wagenseil’s Tela Ignea Satanae 2:17–18, 21).

5 Manasseh ben Israel, צורד החיים De Termino Vitae Libri Tres (1639), lib. 3, sec. 3, § 3, pp. 132–33: “In eo autem Mosem imitantur omnes prophetae, ut post aliquot malorum narrationem, quae illis eventura sunt, finiant verba singulari quodam subjuncto populi solatio. Unde Talmudici scriptores referent de Rabbi Aquiba eum risisse, cum omnes sapientes, qui ipsi aderant, visa eversione, & ruina templi plorarent. Rogatus causam, cur ille plerantibus caeteris, rideret, inquit, Post nubila Phoebus, & post finem malorum, speranda sunt bona: quippe Deus non minus verax est in uno, quam in altero consummando.”

6 Patrick (Deuteronomy 565–66) supplies Mather with the English translation of Manasseh ben Israel’s Latin original reprinted in the preceding footnote. A comparable English translation of this passage appears in De Termino Vitae; or the Term of Life. Viz. Whether it is fix’d or alterable (1699, 1700), bk. 3, sec. 3, § 3, p. 65.

7 Among the many Jewish-Christian polemics on the topic are the previously cited anonymous ספר נצחון ישן נושן [Sefer Nizzachon Yashan] Liber Nizzachon Vetus (1681) and its much earlier כוזרי Liber Cosri Continens Colloquium seu Disputationem De Religione (1660), by the Sephardic R. Judah ha-Levi (c. 1085–post 1140) and dating to the twelfth century. Among Christian polemics of the same nature is the popular De Veritate Religionis Christianae (1627), by the Dutch statesman Hugo Grotius (1583–1645) and its infamous predecessor Pugio Fidei Raymundi Martini Adversus Mauros, et Judaeos (1651), by the Spanish Dominican Raimundus Martinus (c. 1220–c. 1284). Mather (via Patrick 566) probably refers to one of Abarbanel’s following apologetics: ספר מעיני הישועה [Sefer Ma’yanei ha-Yeshu’ah] (1551), aka. The Fountain of Salvation, a commentary on Daniel and polemic against the Christian exposition of Daniel as a prophecy of Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah. This work was completed in 1496, first published in Ferrara (1551), and reprinted in Amsterdam (1647) (JE). His second major apologetic work is ספר ישועות משיחו [Sefer Yeshu’ot Meshicho], aka. The Salvation of His Anointed, which was finished in 1497 and circulated in manuscript copies until its first publication in 1828. Abarbanel’s ספר משמיע ישועה [Sefer Mashmia Yeshuah] (1526), aka. Proclaiming Salvation, was completed in 1498 and first published in Salonica (1526) (JE). Through these works, Abarbanel tried to reinvigorate Jewish belief in the coming Messiah at a time when the Sephardim were suffering from the hardships of their expulsion from Spain.

8 Salomon ben Virga (Verga), שבת יהודה [Shebet Jehudah] Tribus Judae R. Salomonis Fil. Virgae (1651, 1680), sec. 63, pp. 340–41, where Virga list seven reasons why God continues to visit to Death; yett not as a Crime; no, but as that which ha's enraged the Christians against them. He wickedly illustrates it, by that Speech of Moses, [Exod. 8.26.] which he thus translates, If we slay & sacrifice the abominable Gods of the Egyptians in their Sight, will they not stone us? which is the Highest Reproach he could vomit against our Saviour; mingled (as Dr. Patrick observes) with the most stupid Folly; in giving that as a Reason of the Divine Anger, which at the most, is in their Account, only a Reason of Mens Indignation.⁹

It is observable, That the violent Hatred & Outrage of the Christians against the Jewes, hath mightily ceased since the Reformation; and the Jewes are accordingly now less virulent against our Saviour.¹⁰

Q. That Prophecy, He will multiply thee above thy Fathers? v. 5.¹¹

A. Dr. Patrick observes; one cannot well think, that so magnificent a Prophecy as this, was entirely fulfilled, after the Return of the Jewes, out of Babylon; when they were Tributary to the Persians; and afterwards fell under the Power of the Græcians; under whom they suffered very much, especially in the Dayes of Antiochus Epiphanes.¹²

Hermannus Witsius, in his Decaphylon, endeavours to prove, that there was no Moment of Time, after their Deliverance out of Babylon, wherein it could be said, That they were made greater than their Fathers; especially in the Dayes of David and Solomon. And therefore he concludes, That the Promise, remains to be still accomplished.¹³ his people with punishments. The most intriguing is, perhaps, the third argument: "Tertia est caedes Jesu Nazareni, neque frustra Moses Exod. Cap. viii. v. 24. dixit, Quodsi mactaverimus seu immolaverimus abominabiles Ægyptiorum Deos in conspectu eorum, non ne nos lapidibus obruent? (sec. 63, p. 341): The third reason [for our punishment] is the murder of Jesus of Nazareth; for Moses said (Exod. 8:24 {26}), Look, if we slaughter and sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians in front of their eyes, will they not stone us?"

9 Patrick (566).

10 Patrick (567).

11 The following paragraphs are extracted from Patrick (Deuteronomy 568). In his "Note Book of Authors and Texts" (Deut. 30:11–14), Mather lists as potential sources "MSS. no. IV. Sermon. 21"; for Deut. 30:15, "Mantons 20 Sermons, p. 323. –" and "MSS. no. 1. p. 74." Thomas Manton, D. D. (1620–1677) was a voluminous author, Reformed theologian, member of the Westminster Assembly, and chaplain to Oliver Cromwell. After the Act of Uniformity (1662), Manton was ejected from his post and served as lecturer at Pinner's Hall. His sermon on Deut. 30:15: "See, I have set before thee this day life and good, death and evil" is "Sermon XVII," in Twenty Sermons on Important Passages of Scripture, published in The Complete Works of Thomas Manton, D. D. 22 vols. (1871): 2:357–69.

12 The Seleucid king Antiochus IV Epiphanus (c. 215–164 BCE) is well known for his repeated wars with Egypt, the Hellenization of Judaea, including the desacralization of the Temple, and his armed conflict with the Maccabees – all of which are believed to have been foretold in Dan. 11:20–35.

13 The Dutch Reformed theologian Hermann Witsius (1636–1708), perhaps mostly remembered for his popular work on Federal Theology, was also concerned with the OT prophecies

[55v] | And thus R. Isaac (in his Book before-named, Chissuk Emuna) argues, that God bestowed not Benefits upon them, æqual to those which their Fathers enjoy'd, while the Second Temple stood; but that all the Time thereof was full of Calamities; [for which he alledges, Dan. 9.25.] And therefore, he saies, These Words of Moses can by no means be thought fulfilled, when the Tribes of Judah and Benjamin returned from Babylon, & left a vast Number behind them, who would not Return with them.¹⁴

about God's punishment and restoration of the Jews of the Diaspora. In his ΔΕΚΑΦΥΛΙΟΝ [Decaphylon]. Sive de Decem Tribus Israelis, cap. 10, p. sec. 9–12, appended to his Ægyptiaca, et ΔΕΚΑΦΥΛΙΟΝ (1696), esp. pp. 385–86, Witsius explores the historical fulfillment of the Mosaic curses (Deut. 28:15–68) and their particular application to the times of Persian rule over the Ten Tribes, to the reign of King Antiochus Epiphanus IV of Greece (175–164 BCE), to the rule of Hasmonean King Judah Aristobulus I (104–103 BCE), and to the days of High Priest and King Aristobulus II of Judea (66–63 BC).

¹⁴ Mather refers to R. Isaac ben Abraham's ספר חזוק אמונה אשר חבר יצחק בן אברהם [Sepher Hizzuq 'Emunah] Liber Munimen Fidei, cap. 6, in Wagenseil's Tela Ignea Satanae (2:69–70), where R. Isaac dismisses those who argue that the promised blessings (Dan 9:25) were fulfilled at the return of the two tribes from Babylonian captivity and the period of the Second Temple.

Q. We read, Moses wrote this Law, and delivered it unto the Priests, – and unto all the Elders of Israel. How was it? v. 9.¹

A. As he delivered the Book of the Law (by which Abarbinel, and others of the Jewes understand the whole Pentateuch,) unto the Priests, commanding them to præserve it safe, near the Ark; so he delivered another Copy of this Book, to the Elders of every Tribe;² as the Jewes affirm in Debarim Rabba: where they say (and as Dr. Patrick thinks, it is highly probable,) That Moses before his Death, wrote Thirteen Copies of the Law, (with his own Hand, as they add,) and having delivered every one unto the Priests, to be præserted in the Holy Place, gave one to each Tribe, which he committed unto the Care of the Elders of it.³ Thus Maimonides in his Præface to Jad Chazakah, quoted by Buxtorf, in his, Historia

² The issue of when and how much of the Torah Moses had written thus far (Deut. 31:9) is not as simple as Mather's source makes it out to be. Abarbanel addresses this question at great length and frequently contradicts his rabbinical predecessors. Ramban for one argues that Moses wrote this Law (Deut. 31:9) "from the beginning of Bereshith [Gen. 1:1] to in the sight of all Israel [Deut. 34:12] (Commentary on the Torah 5:345). Abarbanel, however, believes that the passage "And Moses wrote this Law, and delivered it unto the Priests" (Deut. 31:9) contradicts the later addition of the Song of Moses (Deut. 32:1–43), which God commanded him to write down and add to the book Deuteronomy (Deut. 31:19–22, 24–26). Thus Abarbanel insists that Moses wrote the Pentateuch piecemeal: While receiving the Law at Mt. Sinai (Horeb), he wrote down everything from the beginning of Bereshith (Gen. 1:1) to the end of Shemos (Exodus 40:38). Furthermore, once the Tabernacle was completed in the desert (Exod. 36:8–39:43), Moses recorded the books of Vayikra and Bamidbar (Leviticus and Numbers) as he received them by the word of God in the Tabernacle. Yet the divine Lawgiver "did not write the book of Devarim [Deuteronomy] until told to do so by Hashem [the name, i.e., God]." It was then "incorporated into the five 'Chumashim' the five books of the Torah." Alas, the Pentateuch was still not complete, for God asked "Moses to add the song of Haazinu [Song of Moses] to the book of Devarim [Deuteronomy]" (Deut. 31:19, 22–26; 32:1–45). And it was only after Moses had "attached it to the book of Devarim" that he then "gave the Torah to the Levites in order for it to be placed next to the Ark of Hashem." Furthermore, Moses now gave one [copy of the] Torah to the Kohanim [priests], one to the Bnei Levi [Levites], and one to the elders. It is also possible that Moses gave a Sefer Torah to each of the tribes" Abarbanel, Selected Commentaries 5:202, 203–204).

³ According to the Soncino Midrash Rabba: Debarim (IX:9), "The Rabbis say: When Moses learnt he was to die on that day, what did he do? R. Jannai said: He wrote thirteen scrolls of the law, twelve for the twelve tribes, and one which he placed in the ark, so that if a man should seek to forge anything therein, they would refer to the scroll in the ark" (Deuteronomy Rabbah IX:9). Likewise, Gersonides agrees that Moses wrote "as much as he had written down to that point [Deut. 31:9]." Yet "this was not the copy to be placed 'beside the Ark of the Covenant' (v. 26); in fact, he must have made more than one of these, since a single scroll could not have sufficed for all the priests and the elders" (JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot 5:208).

*Arcae foederis.*⁴ The Intent of this might be, that all the People of each Tribe should Resort unto it, (as the whole Nation were to Resort unto that in the Sanctuary,) if they doubted of any thing, which might be thought amiss by the Errors of the Transcribers.⁵

Q. Thou shalt Read this Law before all Israel.] Who was to Read it? v. 11.⁶

A. 'Tis plain, that it was the Supream Governour. The Jewes rightly say, That their Kings, when they had them, were bound not only to Look after this Matter, but also to Read the Law themselves, unto as many as could hear it; Appointing the Priests & Levites, to Read it in as many other Assemblies of the People, as were necessary for the Fulfilling of this Præcept. In Order hereto, a Pulpit was therefore sett up, in the Court of the Men of Israel; on the very First Day of the Feasts, (for, as the Jewes observe, they did not think it proper to defer it until the Last; because it is here said, when Israel is come to appear before the Lord; not, when they were going to Depart;) And the King went up into it, whereupon the Minister took the Book of the Law, and delivered it unto the Ruler of the Synagogue, who gave it unto the Sagan (or, Vicar of the High-Priest,) who delivered it unto the High-Priest, and he unto the King; who stood up to Receive it, & then satt down to Read. They say, He began to Read, at this Book of Deuteronomy, (which is a Compendium of the Law.) & proceeded, before he stopt, unto those Words, Ch. VI.4. Hear, O Israel. Which having also Read, he omitted the rest, until he came to Ch. XI.13. And it shal come to pass, if thou wilt not hearken Diligently; – reading to the 22^d Verse. And then he skipt unto Ch. XIV.22. And thou shalt truly Tithe, – reading on to the Section concerning the King; Ch. XVII.14. and then, the Cursings and Blessings, out of Ch. XXVIIth, and XXVIIIth till he had ended all that Section of the Law. Thus the Mischna, in the Title Sota; illustrated by Wagenseil.⁷

Dr. Lightfoot also informs us, The King might sitt down, if he pleased, when he Read; but it was esteemed more Honourable, if he stood, as King Agrippa did, when he performed this Office.⁸ And before he began to Read, he made a Prayer to God. He adds, It was done in the Court of the Women; which well agrees, with what here followes, Gather the People, Men & Women. If the King were of the Family of David, he read in the Court of the Men of Israel; if not, then in the Court of the Women, as Wagenseil observes out of Maimonides.⁹

Q. What Records do we find, of the Observation of that Law, about Reading the Law? v. 13.

A. We find, that Joshua, the Supream Governour after the Death of Moses, did Read all the Words of the Law, not omitting a Word that Moses commanded, before all the Congregation, with the Women & the Little Ones, & the Strangers that were conversant among them. [Josh. 8.34, 35.] But from that Time, to the Reign of, Jehoshaphat, [2. Chron. XVII.7, 8.] which is commonly computed Five Hundred & Thirty Years, we find no mention, of a publick Reading of it. Nor from that Time, unto the Eighteenth Year of King Josiah, [2. Chron. XXXIV.30, 31.] which was the Space of Two Hundred Eighty & Two Years. Nor from that Time, until after the Captivity of Babylon. [Neh. 8.2, 3.] No doubt, this Neglect might contribute unto their Forgetfulness of the Law, & their falling into Idolatry.¹⁰

⁷ Johann Christoph Wagenseil's Sota. Hoc est: Liber Mischnicus (1674), cap. 7, sec. 8, pp. 678–79, is a bilingual Hebrew-Latin edition of tractate Mishnah Sotah (7.8) and adds a whole slew of learned annotations on this segment from the leading rabbinic commentators (679–84).

¹⁰ Patrick (Deuteronomy 586–87). Mather (via Patrick) appears to follow James Ussher’s chronology. The fourth king of Judah, Jehoshaphat reigned from c. 870–849 BCE. In the third year of his reign he sent priests throughout his kingdom to teach the Law to the people

Q. The Divine Song is commanded here to be taught unto the Children of Israel, & putt in their Mouths. What is to be Remark'd upon this Way of Teaching? v. 19.¹¹

A. It hath alwayes been thought the most profitable Way of Instructing People, & Communicating Things to Posterity, by putting them in Verse; and young People are especially advantaged by this Way of Instruction. Plato therefore having spoken of the Songs, which he would have composed for the Use of the People, would have it enacted That all Men and Children [δεῖν πάντα ἄνδρα καὶ παῖδα] *whether Bond or Free, Male or Female, should be bound, thro' the whole City, to sing such Songs, & never cease to do so.*¹² This is Remark'd by Eusebius, in his Prepar. Evangel. (L. 12. c. 32.)¹³ And Plato in his Book, De Legibus; giving a great many Cautions about this Matter, concludes, τοῦτο δὲ θεοῦ, ἢ θείου τινὸς [ἄνδρὸς] ἂν εἴη: *This must be the Work of a God, or some godlike Man.*¹⁴ One would think, he had been acquainted, with the very Song of Moses here before us. However, this is a Testament to the Wisdome of the Hebrew Discipline.

Aristotle reports, in his Problems, That People anciently sung their Lawes; which the Agathyrse (he saies) continued still to do, in his Dayes, ὅπως μὴ ἐπιλάθωνται, *That they might not be forgotten.*¹⁵ Athenæus informs us, out of Hermippus, That the Lawes of Charondas were wont to be sung at Athens, παρ' οἶνον, *over a Glass of Wine.*¹⁶ Dr. Bentley hath made it probable, That they were

(1 Kings 22:1–50; 2 Chron. 17:7–8). King Josiah of Judah (c. 640–609 BCE) read from the Book of the Law of God, i. e., Book of the Covenant (2 Kings 23:1–3) in the 18th year of his reign (c. 622 BCE).

¹² Mather's Greek quote invokes Plato (Leges 2.665c, line 2) as extra-biblical evidence that embedding the Law in songs to be taught to all generations is the best didactic device to preserve the Law for all times. Thus Plato has his Athenian interlocutor respond to Clinias's question, "that every man and child, free-man and slave, male and female – in fact, the whole state – is in duty bound never to stop repeating to each other the charms [i. e., songs] we have described [659e]. Somehow or other, we must see that these charms constantly change their form; at all costs they must be continually varied, so that the performers always long to sing the songs, and find perpetual pleasure in them" (Leges 2.665c, lines 1–7), in Works (1356).

¹⁴ Again, in Mather's mind, Plato (Leges 2.657a, lines 8–9) must have been familiar with the Torah of Moses when he has his Athenian tell Clinias that the harmonious laws of music – like those of civil society – must have been devised by a god or godlike man.

¹⁶ In his Deipnosophistae (14.10, line 41; 619b), the Greek rhetorician Athenæus Naucratis (fl. 3rd c. CE) enlists Hermippus of Smyrna (Fragmenta 88, line 2) in his The Sophists at Dinner composed in Verse, or some Tuneable Measure.¹⁷ Tully tells us, That Cato in his Book, De Originibus, reports, That it was the Custome among the old Romans, to have the Vertues and Praises of famous Men sung to a Pipe, at their Feasts; which, he thinks, they learnt from the ancient Pythagoreans in Italy; who were wont, Carminibus præcepta quædam occultius tradere; To deliver in Verses certain Præcepts, which were the greatest Secrets in their Philosophy, and composed the Minds of the Scholars to Tranquillity, by Songs & Instruments of Musick.¹⁸

Q. It is ordered, That the Book be putt in the Side of the Ark. Whereabouts? v. 26.¹⁹

A. Not in the Inside; but in a little Box on the Outside, as Jonathan, and others expound it; [Compare, 1. Sam. 6.8.] where none could putt it, but the High-Priest. We know, There was nothing in the Ark, save the Two Tables of Stone. [1. King. 8.9. and, 2. Chron. 5.10.]²⁰

The Book, was kept in this Box, not only that if any should go to deprave any thing in the Law, they might (as Abarbinel notes) be from hence convicted; but (as the Author of Tzeror Hammor expresses it,) that if they should be so wicked, as to lose the Books of the Law, this Copy, kept under the Care of the Priests, might remain, to testify what was the Will of God.²¹ to demonstrate that Charondas (c. 580–504 BCE), celebrated legislator of Catania (Sicily), had his laws sung over a glass of wine (OCD). Bottoms up!

17 The reference is to A Dissertation Upon the Epistles of Phalaris (1699), sec. 12, § 8, pp. 373–74, by Richard Bentley (1662–1742), royal librarian, renowned classical scholar, and Master of Trinity College (Cambridge), whose Dissertation was spurred by a philological disagreement with Charles Boyle (1674–1731), fourth Earl of Orrery.

18 Marcus Tullius Cicero, in his Tusculan Disputations (4.2), invokes the now lost De Originibus (7 books), by the Roman historian Marcus Porcius Cato the Elder (c. 234–149 BCE), to remind his audience that it was customary among the Pythagoreans “to convey certain instructions more guardedly in the form of verse.” See Patrick, on Deut. 31:19 (Deuteronomy 592–93).

19 Patrick (Deuteronomy 595–96).

20 Targum Jonathan ben Uzziel, sec. 52 (Deut. 31:26), in Walton, Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (4:379), reads in translation, that Moses commanded the Levites, the bearers of the Ark of the Covenant, “Take this book of the law, and put it in the side of the Ark of the Covenant of the Lord, and it shall be there for a witness against thee” (Ethridge, Targums Onkelos and Jonathan ben Uzziel 2:547). See also Johannes Buxtorf’s on Deut. 31:25–26, in his Exercitationes Ad Historiam (1659), pars 1: “Arcæ Foederis,” cap. 5, pp. 56, 65.

21 Buxtorf, Exercitationes Ad Historiam (1659), pars 1: “Arcæ Foederis,” cap. 5, pp. 62–63, quotes Abarbanel on 1 Kings 8:9 to assert that the Torah was kept in a box outside of the Ark of the Covenant. A student of the Sephardim R. Isaac de Leon, R. Abraham Saba (1440–1508) of Castile exemplifies the suffering of Jews who, in trying to evade the expulsion of the Jews from Spain (Alhambra Decree of 1492) by moving to Portugal, incurred the same fate under King Manuel I of Portugal four years later (1496). His ביאור על התורה Zeror ha-Mor Biur al Ha-Torah (1567) (Bundle of Myrrh) is a commentary on the five books of Moses offering both literal and mystical readings of the Torah (JE). On R. Abraham Saba’s exegesis, see especially A. Gross, Iberian Jewry from Twilight to Dawn: The World of Rabbi Abraham Saba (1995).

Thus, the Book was found in the Dayes of Josiah, when they were about the Reparations of the Temple. Tho' we cannot say, it was found in the Side of the Ark, but rather on the Roof of the House, or in the Rafter, where the Priests had hid it, as the Jewes think, when Menasseh was endeavouring to destroy this Authentic Copy of the Law, as he had done all the other that he could find: It seems, when they came to uncover the House, it appeared there.²²

²² Patrick (Deuteronomy 596). During the Reform of King Josiah of Judah (c. 648–609 BCE), the Temple in Jerusalem was repaired (2 Kings 22:4–9), at which time the High Priest Hilkiah discovered a lost copy of the Mosaic Book of the Law. Josiah's father and predecessor, King Manasseh of Judah (c. 709–c. 643 BCE), embraced the worship of pagan gods (2 King 21:1–7), which Josiah subsequently destroyed.

Q. Why are the Heavens & the Earth called upon, to give Attention unto the Song before us? v. 1.

A. Angels and Men, are here called in as Witnesses. But some of the Jewes (tho' more stupid, than the most Insensible Things in the Heavens or Earth) observe here an Intimation, That if they would not hearken, the Heavens were forbidden to give them Rain, & the Earth to yeeld them Fruit.¹ The Gloss of the Hierusalem Targum likewise is not amiss; That Moses being shortly to Dy, calls the Heavens and the Earth, which endure all Ages, to be Witnesses against them, when he should be gone from them.²

566.

Q. That Expression, My Doctrine shall Drop as the Rain, my Speech shall Distill as the Dew, what is there in Antiquitie, to Illustrate it? v. 2.

A. You know the Egyptian Manner, to Describe, and yett Cover the Affairs of Religion, by their Hieroglyphicks. Among their Hieroglyphical Figures one was this; when they would Repräsent Learning, they pictured the Heavens, pouring down Rain or Dew; and it is probable that they borrowed this Notion, from the Writings of Moses.

Moreover, This Passage may be a Prayer. Lett my Doctrine drop as the Rain.³

1 ¹ This is certainly the position of Rashi in his comments on Chumash Devarim (5:380), where the venerable rabbi explains that heaven and earth are eternal witnesses to God's Covenant with Moses and his people. If they abide by the Covenant, their reward will be that "The grapevine shall give forth its fruit, the earth give forth its produce, and the heavens give forth their dew" (Zech. 8:12). But if they renege on this Covenant, these eternal witnesses of God will withhold their bounty: "He shall curb heaven, so that there will be no rain, and the earth shall not give forth its produce' and after – 'You shall quickly perish'" (Zech. 17:7; 11:17). Most intriguing is the gloss of Abarbanel, who renders "heavens and earth" as mere "euphemisms for two layers or strata" of mankind. "The heavens [there are seven of them according to Chizkuni] stand for the elite, the wealthy, the aristocracy, the royalty, and the leaders of the people. The term earth represents the masses and lower class, the poor, the laborers, etc. And just as the heavens bestow their bounties upon the earth [rain, dew, sunshine], so too the elite and the wealthy leadership pass on the bounty that they possess, to the masses of the people" (Selected Commentaries: Devarim 5:219). Methinks, this is trickle-down Reaganomics before its time. Since Moses uses the Hebrew noun שָׁמַיִם [shamayim], i. e., "heavens" (Deut. 32:1) in its dual or plural form, R. Chizkiyahu ben Rabbi Manoach argues "there are a number of different heavens making up many layers" (Chizkuni 4:1202).

2 Patrick, on Deut. 32:1 (Deuteronomy 601) is Mather's muse once again. Targum Hierosolymitanum (sec. 53), in Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (4:379) bears out Mather's reading of the Jerusalem Targum (Etheridge, The Targums 2:630).

3 This last line was added at a later time. Henry Ainsworth, too, argues that this verse may express "a wish, and also a promise" (Annotations [1626–1627], 1:146, sep. pag.).

Q. On that, He is the Rock, His Work is perfect? v. 4.⁴

A. It may be best rendred, His perfect Work is that Rock. Or, That Rock is His perfect Work. What Rock? Take a glorious Answer from a sufficient Expositor; 1. Cor. X.4.⁵

Q. Some Remark upon that; All His Wayes are Judgment? v. 4.

A. Tho' we cannot penetrate into the Methods and Reasons of the Divine Dispensations, yett there is nothing of Iniquity in them.⁶ They are very good Words lett fall by the Author of, Sepher Cosri hereupon; "He who beleeves this, That all Gods Works are perfect, and His Wayes Judgment, will alwayes lead a sweet & a pleasant Life. All Afflictions will be made light unto him; Nay, he will Rejoice that his Iniquities are being alleviated, and that he shall one day be Rewarded for his Patience, which he teaches Men by his Exemple, & thereby Justifies the Judgments of God."⁷

With Respect here as Dr. Patrick supposes it is, the Jewes now begin the Prayer, which they make at the Burial of the Dead, with this verse in the Song of Moses; which Prayer they call, Tzidduck haddin, or, The Just Judgment, as is related by Leo Modena.⁸

⁴ In his "Note Book of Authors" (Deut. 32:4), Mather lists "MSS. no. 15. p. 183" as a potential resource.

⁶ Patrick (604); Maimonides (3.49.502): Deut. 32:4 "It says that just as the things made by Him are consummately perfect, so are His commandments consummately just. However, our intellects are incapable of apprehending the perfection of everything that He has made and the justice of everything He has commanded. We only apprehend the justice of some of His commandments just as we only apprehend some of the marvels in the things He has made, in the parts of the body of animals and in the motions of the spheres. What is hidden from us in both these classes [species] is much more considerable than what is manifest" (Guide 3.49.605–606).

⁸ Patrick, on Deut. 32:4 (Deuteronomy 604), refers to The History of the Rites, Customs, and Manner of Life, of the Present Jews (1650), part 5, ch. 8, sec. 4, p. 236, an English translation of the Italian original Historia de gli Riti Hebraici (1637), parte 5, cap. 7 (!), sec. 3, p. 211, by the controversial Jewish scholar R. Leo Modena (1571–1648). The Italian original differs in many aspects from the English translation by the Oxford musician, translator, and scholar Edmund

Q. How are those Words to be taken; They have corrupted themselves? v. 5.⁹

A. Maimonides much better translates the Words; Did He (i. e. our God, the Rock before spoken of) do him any hurt? The Hebrew Word, Shecheth, with, Lamed, after it, signifies, To Hurt, or Destroy. [Num. 32.15. 1. Sam. 23.10.] as Job. Cocceius observes, in his Ultima Mosis. The Meaning is thus much; Is God to blame for the Evils that befall them? i. e. Israel.¹⁰

The Answer follows in the next Words; which we translate, Their Spott is not the Spott of His Children. In the Hebrew, the first Word of the Sentence is, Lo; i. e. Not, or, No. But the Accent, which they call Tipcha under it, shewes, it must not be joined with the Words that follow, but it is to be taken by itself.¹¹ No; His Children are their Blott, i. e. All the Evil that befalls them, is the Fruit of His Childrens Wickedness. Are their Blott; is, q. d. are to blame. And so these Words, are in Effect the same with Solomons; Prov. 19.3. The Foolishness of Man perverteth his Way, and his Heart fretteth against the Lord.¹²

Chilmead (1610–1654), sometime chaplain of Christ Church, Oxford (OEDB). The English translation supplies the Hebrew צדוק הדין [Tzidduck haddin], absent from the Italian original. See also Richard Simon's Comparaison des Ceremonies des Juifs, et de la Discipline de l'Eglise (1681), a supplement to Modena's work.

⁹ Mather lists "MSS. no. 18. p. 51 & 101" and "MSS. Pat. no. 10. p. 38" as resources for annotating Deut. 32:5, 6, in his "Note Book of Authors."

¹⁰ Via Patrick (604–605), Mather draws on Maimonides, Liber מורה נבוכים More Nebuchim (1628), pars 3. cap. 12, p. 356 (Guide 3.12.443); and on Ad Ultima Mosis, hoc est sex postrema capita Deuteronomii considerationes, § 701, fol. 52 (Deut. 32:5), in Opera Omnia (1675), tom. 1, fol. 52 (sep. pag.), by the previously cited Dutch Federalist theologian Johannes Cocceius: "Verbum שחת [shecheth] cum ל [lamed] est Numer. 32: v. 15. 1. Sam. 23: v. 10. ... Rupes aetati perversae? Non. Filii ejus sunt labes ipsorum."

Q. Pray, Give us an Ingenious Paraphrase upon those Words of Moses, As an Eagle stirreth up her Nest, fluttereth over her Young, spreadeth abroad her Wings, taketh them, beareth them on her Wings? v. 11.

A. That I will, in the Lines of an Ingenious Poet, who wrote in the former Age.¹⁶

*Ac velut alituum princeps, fulvusque Tonantis
Armiger, implumes et adhuc sine robore natos
Sollicitâ refovet curâ, pinguisque ferinæ

Vesticipes crevère, vocat si blandior aura,
Expansâ invitat plumâ, dorsoque morantes
Excipit, attollitque humeris, plausuque secundo
Fertur in arva, timens oneri, et tamen impete presso
Remigium tentans alarum, incurvaque pinnis
Vela legens, humiles tranat sub nubibus oras;

¹⁶ Mather's "Ingenious Poet" is the Scottish theologian, post-Reformation scholar, and professor at the Huguenot Académie de Sedan (France), Andrew Melville (1545–1622), whose Carmen Mosis, Ex Deuteronomi. Cap. xxxii (1574) furnishes the following excerpt. Frequently reprinted in collections of Scottish poetry, Carmen Mosis was dedicated to James VI of Scotland (1567–1625), the later James I of England (1603–1625), and included in a collection of Scottish poems, Delitiae Poetarum Scotorum hujus ævi Illustrium. Pars Altera (1637), 2:84–90, esp. p. 86. Melville's poetic paraphrase of Deut. 32 was greatly esteemed for its vivid imagery; Mather's subsequent citation is taken from Bochart's Hierozoicon sive De Animalibus S. Scripturæ (1663), Pars II, lib. II, cap. 3, col. 180.

¹⁷ Quoted in John Godfrey Angley's De Clifford. The Philosopher (London, 1847), pp. 85–87. Angley says that "the following striking paraphrase of the passage ... [on Deut. 32:11, 12 and Exod. 19:4], is preserved by Scheuchzer from some ancient poet, and which I find I translated a long time since, viz. —"

And as the prince of birds, the golden king
And bearer of the Thunderer's flaming bolts,
With anxious care supports his unfledged brood,

Tis that Stroke, Moremque volandi Addocet, the Eagles teaching and helping the Young Ones to Flie, that is the Thing principally aimed at, in this Comparison.¹⁸

Suidas in voce εὐξενος, ha's these Words about the Eagles Young Ones, οἱ νεοὶ τῶν αἰτῶν κλ· *The Young Eagles, while their Wings are yett feeble, do fly about their Parents, and learn Flight from them.*¹⁹ Suidas does not mention the Name of the Author, whose Words he pretends now to Quote. But the Author was Philostratus, in the fifth Chapter, of the First Book, of his Apollonius; who probably never had Read the Writings of Moses. Bochart saies hereupon; *Quæ Mosis verbis tam similia sunt, ut vel ab ipso Mose, vel ab aliquo Mosis Interprete descripta videri queant.*²⁰

It is indeed Admirable to consider, How the Israelites, lying as it were in the Filth of their Nest, without any Disposition to stir towards a State of Liberty, God called upon them, (as the Eagle upon its Young Ones,) to shake off their Torpid Slavery, and assert their Liberty, & fly forth after the Assertors of it, that He sent unto them. The same Word, that is used by Moses here, Moses also uses for the Spirit of God, moving on the Face of the Waters, at the Creation.²¹

Still powerless; and cheers them with rich food
Of venison: but when the striplings' wings
Expand in strength mature, to milder air,
He calls them forth, with outspread plume allures
And takes the timid loiterers on his back,
Raised on his shoulders, with propitious wing
While trembling for the load, he bears them forth
To pleasant fields. Yet still with impressed force.
He assays the power and oarage of his pinions,
Gathering his incurved sails; beneath the clouds,
Swims over the lowlier lands, thence by degrees
Soars round the heights above; and now even now
Is borne beneath the stars, urges this course
Thro' finer air, and circuits all the world!
Thus his young brood he leads with various arts,
Or swift returns to chide their dull delay,
And shews the way, and prompts their tardy flying,
Till they instructed, by long use begin,
Fearless, at length, to trust their bolder wings
To the broad heaven. — So great a care he shews,
Till he prevail for his dear fosterlings! (Angle's translation, pp. 86–87).

20 Via Bochart, Mather refers to the Greek Sophist Lucius Flavius Philostratus (c. 170–247 CE), whose (Vita Apollonii 1.5), or Life of Apollonius of Tyana, is a biographical account of the Pythagorean philosopher Apollonius of Tyana (c. 40–c. 120 CE). (KP). The Latin quote from Bochart's chapter on "Of Eagles," Hierozoicon Animalibus (1692), pars 2, lib. 2, cap. 3, col. 181, lines 37–39, translates, "these are so similar to the words of Moses, whether they are described by Moses [himself], or from some interpreter of Moses."

21 Gen. 1:1.

It was, the Spirit of God, which now moved the Indisposed, and the Disobedient Israelites, to Attempt a Flight out of Egypt. And the Providence of God, afterwards watching of them, kept them (as an Eagle its Young Ones,) from falling into Innumerable Mischiefs in their Flight.

Some have observed, that the Dispensation towards the Church in the Old Testament, is compared unto that of an Eagle; but in the New Testament, unto that of an Hen. In the one, was expressed more of Power, and Majesty; as in the Way of bringing the Church out of Egypt. In the other, was expressed more of Grace, and Abasement; as when our Lord appeared in the Humble Form of a Servant and Humbled Himself to the Death of the Cross.²²

Q. How did Israel, Suck Honey out of the Rock, & Oil out of the Flinty Rock? v. 13.²³

A. Wild Honey was an excellent Food, which abounded in their Land; being found sometimes upon the Ground, sometimes in the hollow Part of Trees, & sometimes in the Clefts of Rocks; as Bochart observes out of good Authors. The Rock-Honey was the best in its Kind. [Psal. 81.16.]²⁴

Yea, they had Oil out of the Flinty Rock. No Part of the Countrey was barren. Some say, That Olive-trees thrive best in Rocky Places. Columella observes of the Olive, Magis Modicos Clivos amat.²⁵ And Chytræus notes, That as the most generous Wine is produced upon the Rhine, below Mentz, out of the hardest Flints, Sic olea locis petrosis sterilibus non infeliciter proveniunt, thus Olive-trees grow prosperously in stony & barren Places.²⁶

The Water that followed Israel from the smitten Rock, in the Wilderness may be here called, Honey and Oyl out of Rock. Q. Why is Israel called by the Name of Jeshurun? v. 15.

A. You know the usual Reason; From יֵשׁוּר a Righteous One; to intimate that the People of God should bee Righteous. But there are others who derive this Name, from יֵשׁוּר which signifies, An Oxe: and how properly is it now added, They waxed Fat & Kicked.

Q. What is that Bitter Destruction, which God threatens to His Apostatising People? v. 24.

(NSHE) adds in his Ecclesiastical History (5.22) that after Julian the Apostate had ordered the Jews to rebuild the Temple, they “hoped by this means to falsify the prophecies of Christ.” And after the Jews had cleared the rubble from the Temple’s foundation, “it is said that on the following day when they were about to lay the first foundation, a great earthquake occurred, and by the violent agitation of the earth, stones were thrown up from the depths. ... Instead of regarding this unexpected earthquake as a manifest indication that God was opposed to the re-erection of their temple [Matth. 24:2, 15], they proceeded to recommence the work. But all parties relate, that they had scarcely returned to the undertaking, when fire burst suddenly from the foundations of the temple, and consumed several of the workmen” (NPNFii 2:344). Given to miraculous interpositions, the church historian Socrates Scholasticus (c. 380–c. 450 CE) (EB) improves the story in his (Ecclesiastical History 3.20) adding that after Bishop Cyril of Jerusalem had explicitly warned the Jews of Christ’s prediction that no stone should be left upon another [Matth. 24:2, 15], “the night following, a mighty earthquake tore up the stones of the old foundations of the temple and dispersed them all together with the adjacent edifices. ... Fire came down from heaven and consumed all the builders’ tools: so that the flames were seen preying upon mallets, irons to smooth and polish stones, saws, hatchets, adzes, in short all the various implements the workmen [needed].” Still refusing to recognize the will of God in the matter, a third miracle occurred, and “the next night luminous impressions of a cross appeared imprinted on their garments, which at daybreak they in vain attempted to rub or wash out” (NPNFii 2:89–90).

See also Cassius Dio’s Roman History (69.12.1), Midrash Rabba (Genesis Rabbah LXIV:10), and Julian the Apostate’s epistle “To the Community of the Jews,” in Works (3:177–181).

Thus in Psal. 91.6. the Two Names דֶּבֶר / Deber; and קֶטֶב / Keteb; which wee translate, Pestilence and Destruction, are by them taken for Two Divels; of which, Deber, ha's his hurting time in the Night, & Keteb ha's his hurting time in the Day.⁴² So now; if I have not given you an Exposition, yett I have given you a Curiosity; but I am not without Suspicion, that there may bee more of Exposition in this Curiosity, than wee are well aware of.⁴³

41 It is intriguing that Mather quotes from Paulus Fagius's Latin translation of Targum Onkelos (Deut. 32:24), in Thargum hoc est Paraphrasis (1546), fol. S^{3v}, rather than from Brian Walton's standard Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (1:855). J. W. Etheridge's rendition is no less dramatic: "Their plagues will be evil as the heads of serpents, and the retribution of their works like their venom. As the poison of dragons is the cup of their punishment, and as the heads of the cruel basilisks" (The Targums, sec. LIII, 2:550).

42 Mather has Rashi's commentary in mind, for the great Solomon Jarchi thinks that eponymous demons and devils are intended in Deut. 32:24: "[1] Bloated with hunger, and [2] embattled with demons and [3] slashed by Meriri; and the teeth of animals will I send against them along with the venom of dust-crawlers" [bracketed numerals added]: "Onkelos renders 'Bloated with hunger,' but I have no evidence supportive of this. ... Embattled with demons. Demons battled them, as it is said, 'But the sons of demons soar aloft' [Iyov (Job) 5:7], referring to demons. Slashed by Meriri. Slashed by a demon named Meriri [tractate Pesachim (111a)]" (Metsudah Chumash/Rashi: Devarim 5:400). Thus Rashi renders the phrase וְקֶטֶב מְרִירִי [weqeteb meriryi] as "slashed by [the demon] Meriri." The translators of the KJV (considerably less pneumatically inclined) have "bitter destruction" (KJV). Mather's דֶּבֶר [deber], i. e., "pestilence, plague," and קֶטֶב [qeteb], i. e., "destruction" (Strong's ## 1698, 6986), in Ps. 91:6, are thus personifications of natural forces as demons, an embodiment which is here based on Rashi's gloss (Ps. 91:6): "deber 'PLAGUE' ... qeteb 'SCOURGE' are names of [distinct] demons, one of which [deber 'PLAGUE'] wreaks havoc during the night and one of which [qeteb 'SCOURGE'] wreaks havoc at noon. yasud 'RAVAGES' [i. e.,] yasoded 'destroys'" (רש"י תהלים) [Rashi Tehilim] Rashi's Commentary on Psalms 582). Rashi thus leans on the Babylonian Talmud: "Keteb Merir. There are two Ketebs, one before noon and one after noon; the one before noon is called Ketheb Meriri, and looks like a ladle turning in the jug of kamka. That of the afternoon is called Keteb Yashud Zaharaim ['Destruction that wasteth at noonday']; it looks like a goat's horn, and wings compass it about" (tractate Pessachim 111b).

Q. How should we translate those Words, which we render, They are a Nation void of Counsel? v. 28.

A. Job Ludolfus observes, That the Word which we render, Void, in the Ethiopick Language signifies, Foolish; which makes it probable, that this was the ancient Sense of the Word among the Hebrewes. Dr. Patrick would therefore have this Clause thus rendred; They are a Nation foolish in their Counsel; Their Counsels led them to such Courses as utterly undid them. Thus he would have to be rendred, Jer. 4.9. The Heart of the King is Foolish.⁴⁵

Q. What is meant by, The Latter End, which Moses does wish his People would consider? v. 29.⁴⁶

A. The Mercies laid up, for the Pænitent and Beleeving Jewes, in the Latter Days.

(1675) 1:92 (sep. pag.). In his Wars of the Jews, Josephus Flavius reports that when the upper city of Jerusalem fell to Roman General Titus, in the final sacking of Jerusalem (70 CE), captive males (above seventeen years of age) were sent “to the Egyptian mines” and a “great number into the provinces, as a present to them, that they might be destroyed upon their theatres, by the sword and by the wild beasts; but those that were under seventeen years of age were sold for slaves” (6.9.2). William Whiston, the English translator of Josephus, glosses in a footnote on this event that “several predictions that the Jews, if they became obstinate in their idolatry and wickedness, should be sent again, or sold into Egypt, for their punishment” were thus fulfilled (Deut. 28:68; Jer. 44:7; Hos. 8:13, 9:3, 11:35), in Complete Works (587). See also Maimonides, More Nebuchim 3.37.446 and Guide (3.37.543).

⁴⁵ Patrick (Deuteronomy 625). The German diplomat and orientalist Hiob Ludolfus, aka. Job Leutholf (1624–1704) was the foremost scholar of his time on the Ethiopic and Amharic languages. Numerous works to his credit include a history of Ethiopia, on the Ethiopic and Amharic languages, and on the literature, culture, and religions of this ancient civilization. Perhaps best among them are two firsts: his grammars and dictionaries of the Ethiopic and Amharic languages. Via Patrick (625), Mather refers to Ludolf’s rendition of Deut. 32:28, in Jobi Ludolfi I. C. Lexicon Æthiopico-Latinum (1661), where Ludolf renders the Ethiopic-Latin translation of the Hebrew original as a metaphor for the lack of wisdom or judgment: “Cum res nullum habet saporem” (col. 51) “when the thing is without sense,” “devoid of sense,” “lacking wisdom” (hence “foolish”); significantly, the same passage in the revised (second edition) is rendered “perditi consilio” (col. 53) “degenerate sense,” “devoid of judgment” (hence “stupid”), in Ludolf’s Lexicon Æthiopico-Latinum (1702). Brian Walton’s Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (1653–1657) includes an Ethiopic-Latin translation of the NT, but none of the OT. On Hiob Ludolf, see BBKL (5:317–25).

Then, that Vine of Sodom, that is, the Church of Rome, which is in the Apocalypse, called Sodom, & the Destruction whereof, is there called, A Vintage, & the Religion whereof is here, as well as there, called, The Poison of the Dragon; It shall bee confounded; and the Rock of the Jewes, will bee acknowledged;

This whole Song is a glorious Prophecy. By the same Token, that when our Lord saies, in Luk. 21.24. These are the Dayes of Vengeance, that all things which are written may bee fulfilled; by the, Things written, our Lord means the Things written, in the Song of Moses; which you will there see our Lord all along alluding unto.⁴⁷

Q. What further Sense may be putt on the Word, which we render, Their Latter End?

A. If I don't misremember; A Jew ha's putt me in Mind of reading it so; Their Posterity. q.d. Oh! that they would have a Regard unto the Welfare of their Offspring.⁴⁸

Q. When it is said, Their Vine is the Vine of Sodom; these & the following Words represent their Wickedness, as altogether intolerable. How was it? v. 32.

A. Josephus will tell you: If the Romans had not fallen upon such a wicked People, he thinks, either the Earth would have opened its Mouth, & swallowed them up, or some Flood would have broke forth to have drown'd their City; or Thunder & Lightning from Heaven would have destroy'd it. The Fate of Sodom, he saies, would have befall'n it; πολὺ γὰρ τῶν ταῦτα παθόντων ἦνεγκε γενεὰν ἀθεωτέραν. For they were a more Atheistical Generation, than they who suffered such things. And he saies elsewhere; That the Time when they were destroyed, so abounded with all Manner of Wickedness among the Jewes, ὥς μηδὲν κακίας ἔργον ἀπρακτον καταλιπεῖν. That there was no one Work of Wickedness that was not committed; nor can one imagine any thing so bad, that they did not do; endeavouring publicly as well as privately, to excel one another, both in Impiety towards God, & in Injustice towards their Neighbours.⁴⁹

⁴⁸ Perhaps the Jewish converso Judah Monis (1683–1764), who taught Hebrew at Harvard (1722–60), authored A Grammar of the Hebrew Tongue (1735), and for whom the Mathers were credited for his conversion. See also M. Hoberman, New Israel/New England: Jews and Puritans (2011), ch. 3.

Q. Those Words, I, even I, am He? v. 39.⁵⁰

A. The Author of the old Nitzacon was sensible, That we Christians might hence observe, that there are Two, who are here called, The Father, and the Son. He proceeds therefore to inform his Readers, That there are not Two first Principles of Things. But he might have spared his Pains; for no Christian affirms it.⁵¹ On the other side, Their own Authors have acknowledged more Persons than one, here called, God. Thus Jonathan, in his Paraphrase, plainly supposes another Person in the Godhead, whom he calls, The WORD, when he thus explains this Verse; *When the WORD of the LORD shall Reveal Himself to Redeem His People, He shall say to all People, I am He that have been, and am, and shall be,*⁵² [See Rev. 1.8.] & *by my Word I kill and make alive. I smote the People of Israel, and I will heal them in the End of the Dayes.*⁵³ Thus, he makes these Words a plain Prophecy of the Messiah, & owns Him also to be God. Thus the Jerusalem Targum: *See, that I now am He in my WORD, and there is no God besides me: I am He who kill the Living in this World, & Raise the Dead in the World to come.*⁵⁴

R. Isaac alledges those Words, I kill & I make alive, as a Prophecy of the Resurrection of the Dead, in the Dayes of the Messiah. And as a Confutation also ⁵⁰ Patrick (Deuteronomy 631–32).

⁵¹ Not to be confused with R. Lipmann's book by the same title ספר נצחון [Sefer Nizzachon] Liber Nizzachon, Mather refers to the anonymous polemic ספר נצחון ישן נושן [Sefer Nizzachon Yashan] Liber Nizzachon Vetus, in Johann Christoph Wagenseil's Tela Ignea Satanae 2:1–260. The polemic gloss on Deut. 6:4 (Liber Nizzachon Vetus, sec. 55), in Wagenseil (2:55), rejects any Trinitarian implications of this verse, arguing that “Hear, O Israel! The Lord is our God, the Lord is one” [Deut. 6:4] “definitely proves that Christians are mistaken in their belief: ‘The heretics say in their arrogance: These three divine names refer to the trinity. One may respond that the answer is to be found in an adjoining verse: ‘You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart’ [Deut. 6:5]. Here he [Moses] omitted one of the names, reducing the number to two so that people should not err in saying there are three” (The Nizzachon Vetus Translation, sec. 55, p. 78). On the same topic of the grounds of Trinitarian evidence in the Torah (but on different chapter and verse), Manasseh ben Israel's Conciliator (1633) – like all classic rabbinic commentators – is far from endorsing Deut. 32:39 as proof of the Trinity. Instead, in Question 188, he links it with Psal. 95:3, arguing that “according to Maimonides [Guide 2.6.261] and R. David Kimchi [on Psalms], the ‘gods’ of whom David speaks, are to be understood for the angelic powers, as the word אלהים [Elohim] ‘Gods’ is derived from אל [El], which means ‘power’ or strength, as ואת אילי הארץ (And the mighty of the land [Ezek. 17:13]). It also means governors and judges ... because as the angels move by divine will, they are called gods in the heavens; and the heavens being one degree inferior to angels, are termed lords by David. ‘Praise the Lord of lords’ [Psal. 136:4], because they assist the elemental world by their influence,” in Conciliator (1:300). Significantly, this refutation of the doctrine of the Trinity is absent from both of the two first editions of Manasseh [sic] ben Israel's Conciliator, sive De convenientia locorum S. Scripturae (Amstelodami and Francofurti, 1633), translated by young Dionysius Vossius (1612–1633), scion of the great Dutch scholar Gerardus Vossius (1577–1649).

of a very ancient Opinion, That there are Two Supream Powers; One, the Author of all Good; Another, the Author of all Evil.⁵⁵

Q. That Mode of Swearing, I lift up my Hand to Heaven. What is there in Antiquity relating to it? v. 40.

A. Abraham anciently sware so. [Gen. 14.22.] Compare Exod. 6.8. and, Neh. 9.15. From hence, tis thought by some, the Word, Promittere, is derived; signifying, To Engage by Stretching out the Hand. The Gentiles practised it; as those known Words of Virgil inform us; Suspiciens Cælum, tenditque ad Sydera Dextram.⁵⁶

Q. What is meant by, Revenues on the Enemy? v. 42.

A. Dr. Patrick saies, He can give no Account, how the Word, Paroth, comes to signify, Revenues; tho' it be so translated here. [And in Judg. 5.2.] The Word, Para, from whence it seems derived, signifies, To make Bare. So the Vulgar Latin here understands it; and thence J. Forsterus, ha's given this, as a probable Translation of the Words: Because of the Baring (i. e. making Bare) of the Head by the Enemy. That is, The taking away of the Kingdome and Priesthood from Israel. But Dr. Patrick thinks, There is yett a more simple Sense, to be given of the Words; by supposing only the Particle, Lamed, (as tis often omitted, where it is to be supposed) before Paroth: which is this; From the King to the Slave of the Enemies. Every one knowes, it was the Custome to shave Captives, in a Way of Contempt. Hence Baldness is often threatned unto Israel, when a provoked God; was going to give them up to be Slaves.⁵⁷

56 Patrick (Deuteronomy 633); Vergil's Aeneid (12.196) has Aeneas, and Latinus after him, “uplift his eyes to heaven and outstretch his right hand to the stars” and swear by all the ancient gods, high and low, that the peace treaty between the two men shall be inviolate. The infinitive “promittere” signifies “to promise.”

57 Patrick (634–35) consults Johannes Foster's Dictionarium Hebraicum Novum, non ex Rabbinorum Commentis (1564), pp. 672–73, voce 1264: פָּרַע is the root for the Hebrew noun פָּרֵעָה [par'ah], i. e., “leader, commander” (Strong's # 6546). Yet Patrick stumbles over the infinitive פָּרַע [par'a], i. e., “to lead, act as a leader” (Strong's # 6544), which in the AV (Judg. 5:2) is rendered to “uncover,” “naked,” “avenging,” as well as to “bare.”

Q. Rejoice, O yee Nations, with His People. When is the Time, that we must look for the Accomplishment of this Prædiction? v. 43.⁵⁸

A. The Apostle, [Rom. 15.10.] justifies the Translation of the LXX. Which agrees with ours.

But it is to be observed, That before these Words, the LXX have some other, which are very observable. Rejoice Yee Heavens, together with Him, and lett all the Angels of God worship Him: [then followes, Rejoice yee Gentiles, with His People.] Those Clauses are not in the Hebrew, nor in the Chaldee. And yett the Latter of them, Let all the Angels of God worship Him; are the very Words of the Apostle, [Heb. 1.6.] and seem to refer unto this very Passage in the Song of Moses. Indeed the Margin of our Bibles, does refer us to Psal. XCVII.7.⁵⁹

But there the Words are, a little otherwise; Worship Him, all yee Angels; The Words are; you see, in the Second Person. It is probable, That the LXX, from ancient Tradition among the Jewes, added these Words, in their Translating of this Verse, to declare, unto what Time the Fulfilling of them should principally belong. For, as Dr. Jackson remarks, the XCVIIth *Psal*m, seems to be but a Descant upon this Part of the Song of Moses; from whence the Jewes might learn the Scope of it. The Apostle accordingly would have the Hebrewes, to be sensible, That Moses himself had prædicted the Exaltation of the Messiah, as the *Psal*mist had expounded him.⁶⁰

It is here prædicted, That the Gentiles must become one Body with the Israelites. This began to be fulfilled, upon our Saviours Ascension to the Throne of His Glory in the Heavens; when All the Angels of God worshipped Him.

Hitherto Moses had supposed great Enmity between them. He now breaks out into a Rapture of Joy, to behold them Reconciled, and made one People of God. The LXX thus understanding it, might well præface to their Translation of this Verse Rejoice Yee Heavens together with Him. For, as Procopius Gazæus well glosses it, If there be Joy in Heaven at the Repentence of One Sinner, how much more for the Salvation of the whole World, by Destroying the Divels Tyranny. This | being to be performed by the Advancement of the Son of God into the

58 Mather's "Note Book of Authors" (Deut. 32:46) references "Alleins Remains. p. 29"; i.e., an exposition of Deut. 32:46, in Remaines. ... Being A Collection of Sundry Directions, Sermons, Sacrament-Speeches, and Letters (1674), pp. 29–46, by Joseph Alleine (c. 1634–1668). A graduate of Corpus Christi College, ejected minister (1662), Alleine was imprisoned for preaching without a license (1663–64); he authored the popular classic Alarm to the Unconverted (1671), which is estimated to have sold more than 70,000 copies. See B. W. Kirk, "Alleine, Joseph (bap. 1634, d. 1668)."

Heavens, the next Words might well be added, Lett all the Angels of God worship Him. This as Procopius observes; they had alwayes done, as He is their God, who created them; but now they extol His Humanity exalted at the Right Hand of God.⁶¹

Q. That Clause, It is your Life, what Acknowledgment make the Jewes upon it? v. 47.⁶²

A. Very Christian are the Words of R. Isaac. Here are Two Benefits (he saies,) promised by the Observation of this Law; The Spiritual, in this Word, It is your Life. The Corporal, in the next, Yee shall prolong your Dayes. And he putts the Spiritual first; tho' among all Corporal Blessings, this of long Life be the chief.⁶³

Q. Why is it said unto Moses, He should be gathered unto His People? v. 50.

A. R. Isaac saies, It signifies, that he should be associated unto the Souls of the Just, who are called, His People. For the People of Moses were not buried in Mount Abarim; and therefore, the Lord speaks not of gathering his Body to their Bodies, but of gathering his Soul to their Souls.⁶⁴

⁶⁴ Patrick (641); R. Isaac offers much the same in his Liber Munimen Fidei (cap. 11), in Wagenseil’s Tela Ignea Satanae (1681) 2:122–23. This is also Abarbanel’s interpretation: “But Moses is like them [his people] only with regard to the physical ‘gathering’ [in the wilderness]; spiritually, he will be ‘gathered’ into eternal life and they [Israelites] to reproaches and everlasting abhorrence. Moreover, this is a promise to Moses that, despite being buried in the wilderness, he will be ‘gathered’ spiritually with the Patriarchs in the cave of Machpelah” (JPS Miqra’ot Gedolot: Devarim 5:237).

Q. Upon what account is it said, The Lord rose up from Seir unto them, and shone forth from Mount Paran? v. 2.¹

A. It is hardly worth the while, to recite the Jewish Fancies upon it; whereof one is This; That the Divine Glory first Resided upon Mount Seir, where God propounded His Law to the Children of Esau; but they would not have it, because they found these Words in it, Thou shalt not kill. He went therefore to Paran, and offered it unto the Children of Ishmael; but they refused it also, because they found these Words in it, Thou shalt not steal. So He came to Sinai, & gave it unto the Israelites, who said [Exod. 24.3.] All the Words which the Lord hath said, we will do. Thus the Hierusalem Targum, and Pirke Elieser, & some other Authors, with this Addition, That He offered the Law to all the Nations of the World, but they rejected it, because it is written, Thou shalt have no other Gods but me.²

² Targum Hierosolymitanum (Deut. 33:2), in Walton, Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (4:385): “He [the Lord] arose in His glory upon the mountain of Seir to give the law to the sons of Esau; but after they found that it was written therein, Thou shalt do no murder, they would not receive it. He revealed Himself in His glory on the mountain of Gebala, to give the law to the sons of Ishmael; but when they found that it was written therein, Ye shall not be thieves, they would not receive it” (The Targums 2:673). Much the same appears in פירקי רבי אליעזר [Pirke de Rabbi Elieser]. Capitula R. Elieser (1644), cap. 41, pp. 107–08: “Rabbi Tarphon said, The Holy One, blessed be He, rose and came from Mount Sinai [first ed. ‘rose from Mount Seir’] and was revealed unto the sons of Esau, as it is said, ‘And he said, The Lord came from Sinai, and rose from Seir unto them’ (Deut. 32:2). And ‘Seir’ means only the sons of Esau, as it is said, ‘And Esau dwelt in Mount Seir’ (Gen. 36:8). The Holy One, blessed be He, said to them: Will ye accept for yourselves the Torah? They said to Him: What is written therein? He answered them: It is written therein, ‘Thou shalt do no murder’ (Ex. 20:18). They replied to Him: We are unable to abandon the blessing with which Isaac blessed Esau, for he said to him, ‘By thy sword shalt thou live’ (Gen. 27:40). Then He turned and was revealed to the children of Ishmael, as it is said, ‘He shined forth from Mount Paran’ (Deut. 33:2). ‘Paran’ [the abode of Ishmael] means only the sons of Ishmael, as it is said, ‘And he dwelt in the wilderness of Paran’ (Gen. 21:21). The Holy One, blessed be He, said to them: Will ye accept for yourselves the Torah? They said to Him: What is written therein? He answered them: ‘Thou shalt not steal’ (Ex. 20:15) is written therein. They said to Him: We are not able to abandon the usage which our fathers observed, for they [stole Joseph] and brought Joseph down into Egypt, as it is said, ‘For indeed I was stolen away out of the land of the Hebrews’ (Gen. 40:15; [Gen. 37:27]). Thence He sent messengers to all the nations of the world. He said unto them: Will ye receive for yourselves the Torah? They said to Him: what is written herein? He said to them: ‘Thou shalt have no other gods before me’ (Exod. 20:3). They said to Him: [We are unable to abandon the law of our fathers who served idols.] We have no delight in the Torah, therefore let Him give His Torah to His People, as it is said, ‘The Lord will give strength [Torah] unto his people; the Lord will bless his people with

After all, (& a better Interpretation than that given by Abraham Peritsol, yett not worth insisting on,) the plain Meaning of it, is, That the Cloud, wherein the Lord made His Descent on Sinai, with a vast Host of Angels, extended itself so far, as to cover the Neighbouring Mountains of Seir and Paran. – We may add, That He continued His Presence with them, after they went from Sinai thro' all their Journeyes, in the Wilderness of Seir and Paran, till they came to the Place where now they were.³

Q. Why is Moses called, The King in Jeshurun? v. 5.⁴

peace' (Ps. 29:11) [Babylonia Talmud Zebachim (116a)]. Thence He returned and was revealed unto the children of Israel" (The Chapters of Rabbi Eliezer 318–19).

3 Patrick (645). In his bilingual edition of בבא קמא [Baba Kama] De Legibus Ebraeorum Forensibus Liber Singularis (1637), cap. 4, § 3, pp. 68–70, the great Dutch Hebraist Constantinus l'Empereur ab Oppyck (1591–1648) provides a lengthy annotation on the Mishnah, tractate Baba Kamma (4.3), in parts of which (pp. 70) he dismisses the ecumenical interpretation of the Italian scholar Abraham ben Mordechai Farissol, aka. Peritsol (c. 1451–c. 1525) of Ferrara (EF). Peritsol had argued that "the true Law came out of Sinai to the Israelites, by which the Edomites were so enlightened, that God might be said to rise up to them also: and afterward the Celestial Influence shone out of this Law to the Ishmaelites, who were the better for it." L'Empereur does not identify the specific work of Peritsol, other than that it was a Hebrew polemic in manuscript, which his friend D.D. de Willem was translating into Latin. The manuscript in question is most likely Magen Abraham (Shield of Abraham), a defense of Judaism, composed in 1514. On the debate about the geographical location and proximity of Mts. Seir and Paran, see the annotations of the English orientalist Thomas Hyde (1636–1703), librarian at the Bodleian (EB), on Abraham Peritsol's cosmography Itinera Mundi (1691), p. 73.

4 See Appendix B.

5 Mather paraphrases a passage from Johann Heinrich Reitz (1665–1720), a German Pietist and translator, whose Latin gloss reads: "Rex in Jeshurun audiebat (Deut. 33.5)" (2.) "Is Rex non erat Moses sed Christus, qui venit v. 1 cum myriadibus Sanctitatis, Angelus Jehovae, quique ἄγγελων legem tulit Heb. 2.2, Act. 7.53" (Moses et Aaron seu Civiles & Ecclesiastici Ritus [1679], lib. 1, cap. 1, nota 2, p. 2). Reitz's work is a translation of Moses and Aaron. Civil and Ecclesiastical Rites (1625), by the English Puritan theologian Thomas Godwyn, aka. Goodwin (1600–1680). In his Latin gloss on Moses et Aaron, Reitz identifies "King of Jeshurun" (Deut. 3:5) with Christ, who delivers the Law to Moses. The classical rabbis agree to disagree about the signification of "Jeshurun." Whereas Ibn Ezra points to Moses, who as head of the Israelites was "the equivalent of a king," Gersonides is undecided and suggests that it might refer to Samuel or Rehoboam. Nachmanides (Ramban) insists that it was "The Lord" who "became King over Israel" when the tribes assembled. Rashi, however, argues that "Jeshurun" signifies Israel. See also John Selden's learned discussion in his De Synedriis (1653), lib. 2, cap. 2, sec. 2, pp. 62–65.

6 In the last blessing which Moses bestows on the patriarchs of the twelve tribes (Deut. 33:6–29), Simeon is somehow left out – ostensibly because Jacob had cursed Simeon and Levi for their malicious cruelty against the Shechemites (Gen. 49:5–7; Gen. 34:30). And yet, Deut.

A. You must Remember, how Jacob coupled Simeon and Levi, in a Curse; the Levites had since then unstained their Credit, by their exemplary Zeal against Idolaters; but the Simeonites had not yett recovered a Reputation by any notable and laudable Action: Moses therefore, having no Commission to Recall Jacobs Curse, was lothe to Repete it, lest the poor Tribe, doubly-cursed, should bee discouraged; and thought it best in a pious Policy, in Silence wholly to pass them over.

508. Add; More than Twelve, might not for Mystical Reasons, bee in the Blessing. Josephs two Sons are in; but Simeon, that would have killed his Brother Joseph is left out. The Simeonites were they that fell to Baal-Peor, a little before; & they were almost all of this Tribe that were killed. For the same Reason, there was no Judge of this Tribe, except the Forged Judgess of Judith.⁷

Dan, is after the like Manner omitted, in the Apocalypse; because this Tribe was the first that fell to Idolatry.⁸

In the Midras Tillim, it is said, That Moses omitted Simeon in his Blessing, Quia de ejus peccato, quod perpetravit in Shittim cogitabat. See Num. XXV.14.⁹

33:7, Rashi (Jarchi) glosses that “Simeon [was included] within the blessings of Judah. For Simeon took his portion of the land of Israel within that of Judah: ‘The portion of the Simeonites was part of the territory of the Judites’ (Josh. 19:9). Why didn’t Simeon get a blessing of his own? Because (as it is written in the midrash to Psalm 90) Moses was thinking about what happened at Shittim [Numb. 25]” where the Simeonites ravished the Midianite women (JPS Miqra’ot Gedolot 5:246). In his “Note-Book of Authors” (Deut. 33:8), Mather refers to “Medes Works. B. I. Disc. 36” as a resource; i. e., Joseph Mede, Works (1664), bk. 1, Discourse XXXVI, pp. 264–76, is an explication of the blessings of the oracular Urim and Thummim bestowed upon Levi.

7 Numb. 25:1–9; Deut. 4:3; Both Deborah (Judg. 4:3) and Judith (Judith 8:10–29) are famous for their wisdom and heroism. Ibn Ezra (Deut. 33:6) explains that Simeon was excluded from Moses’ blessings “because of the Baal-Peor incident [Numb. 25], for the ones who worshipped Baal-Peor were Simeonites, as the drastic reduction in their numbers from Num. 1:23 [59,300] to Numb 26:14 [22,200] proves.” Nachmanides (Deut. 33:6), however, begs to differ: Ibn Ezra grounds his argument on the “‘drastic reduction’ in the census count of the Simeonites,” Ramban objects, but the numbers do not add up. Rather, according to a reference he found in Numbers Rabba, “six Israelite families were involved in the Baal-Peor affair, five from Benjamin and just one from Simeon. So in their opinion Benjamin had far outsinced Simeon even in that particular incident – yet Benjamin is certainly included in the blessings.” The explanation for Simeon’s omission may simply be because “the text never enumerates more than 12 tribes [Gen. 49:28].” The problem arises because Jacob listed the names of his twelve sons, including Joseph, as a single tribe; yet Moses, in Deut. 33:17, lists the Josephites as two tribes: Ephraim and Manasseh. Thus “one of the other tribes simply had to be left out. Again, there is not one place that mentions more than 12 tribes, corresponding to the 12 constellations of the zodiac, the 12 months of the year, and the 12 diagonal boundaries called by Sefer Yetzirah ‘the arms of the world.’ . . . Simeon was left out because his tribe was not a large one, and his blessing from their father, Jacob, was not great” (JPS Miqra’ot Gedoloth 5:243–44).

8 Rev. 7:4–8 leaves out the tribe of Dan, ostensibly for their idolatry (Judg. 18:13–31).

9 According to Midrash Tillim (Tehillim) on the Psalms 101, sec. 3, it is said, “Because he [Moses] was angry with him [Simeon] for what he had done at Shittim.” See also John Viccar’s Decapla in Psalmos (1655), p. 286.

However, when they parted the Land, of Canaan, they regarded the Blessings of Jacob and Moses; when they had so done, they cast Lots to see whether God would allow of their Partition; and so Hee did, & so It stood.

Lett it be added, That tho' Simeon be not expressly Named, by Moses Blessing the Tribes, yett he is comprehended in the General Blessing of the Tribes. Nor is any Tribe here excluded any more, than when Twelve Sacrifices were offered for the Twelve Tribes, (Ezr. 6.17.) we may Judge any one Tribe debarr'd the Benefit.

This is the Apprehension of the Jewish Interpreters. *In Benedictione Jude comprehensam fuisse Benedictionem Simeonis, cujus portio intrà portionem Jude cecidit.*¹⁰

Some Copies of the Version, which we call, The Septuagint, call in poor Simeon, and read, *Lett Reuben Live & not Die; and lett Simeon be many in number.*¹¹

A. An Ingenious Person, whose Name is Mr. John Gill, has published a Discourse entituled, *Levi's Urim and Thummim found with CHRIST.*¹³

He observes, That Aaron was Gods Holy One; and He was proved at Massah and strove with at Meribah. But he did not stand in the Temptation, as he should have done.¹⁴

Wherefore a Glorious CHRIST is the Person, whom the Characters here do most Properly, & even Transcendently, belong unto. He is the Holy One of

¹¹ Mather alludes to the Codex Alexandrinus (5th c. CE), one of the three oldest manuscript copies containing the Septuagint (LXX) translation of the Hebrew Scriptures – the two others being the Codex Vaticanus and Codex Sinaiticus. Codex Alexandrinus appears to be the only manuscript that, instead of "καὶ ἐστω πολὺς ἐν ἀριθμῷ" [Textus Receptus] ("and let him be many in number"), inserts Συμεὼν (Simeon): "καὶ Συμεὼν ἐστω πολὺς ἐν ἀριθμῷ" (LXX Deut. 33:6b) "and let Simeon be many in number." See W. Smith's Dictionary of the Bible (1873) 4:2720, note (d). See also S. D. Goldfarb's "Was Simeon not included in Moses' Blessing?" (51–55).

¹² See Appendix B.

¹³ Mather's extract is from John Gill, Levi's Urim and Thummim found with Christ. A Discourse on Deut. xxxiii.8 (1725), by the English Baptist theologian and biblical scholar John Gill (1697–1771), today mostly remembered for his magnificent 9-vol. Exposition of the Old and New Testaments (1746–63) (CBTEL).

¹⁴ Meribah and Massah signify respectively "place of strife, contention" and "place of testing." Significantly, in contrast to Numb. 20:12–13, Targums Onkelos, Jonathan ben Uzziel, and Hierosolymitanum praise Aaron for resisting temptation and thus being faithful and perfect, in Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta 1:861, 4:386) and The Targums (2:553, 674–75). Rashi, Ibn Ezra, and Ramban – all apply the blessing of Levi to Aaron, in JPS Miqra'ot Gedolot (5:246).

GOD. What Lights and Perfections belong to Him? He was also Tempted at Mas-sah, and strove with at the Waters of Meribah.

The Gentleman thus paraphrases upon the Words.

And of Levi [the Tribe of Levi,] he said, Lett thy Thummim & thy Urim [Thy Perfections & thy Lights, O God,] be with thy Holy One, [CHRIST JESUS] whom thou [O Levi, with the rest of the Tribes of Israel] didst tempt at Massah, & strive with at the Waters of Meribah.

The True Urim & Thummim are with our SAVIOUR.¹⁵

Q. The Good Will of Him that dwelt in the Bush; who was, The Dweller in the Bush? v. 16.¹⁶

A. It was the Messiah, thus exhibiting Himself, in a Prælude of His Incarnation.

And here are diverse Remarkables to Indigitate Him. First, The Divine Nature of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is, like a consuming Fire, does take Possession of His Humane Nature, which is like a Bush arrested by that Fire; and yett it is not swallowed up. The Ancients considered this, as the Antitype, of the Bush on Fire, but not consumed. Again; The Messiah appearing in the Bush, is called / שְׁכֵנִי / from, שָׁכַן / Habitavit;¹⁷ A Dweller in it. This is the very Word, σκαηνῶ and σκαηνῶς, use[d] in the New Testament, [Joh. 1.14.] for our Lords Incarnation; Hee Dwelt among us. The Shechinah, so much talk'd of, is, The Deity, or Divine Majesty, coming to Dwell among Men. (See, Gen. 9.27. in Onkelos.¹⁸ And ¹⁵ Mather's extract is a paraphrase of Gill, Levi's Urim (16, 17, 18–19, 20). For much the same, see also Gell's annotations on Deut. 33:8 and Exod. 28:30, in his Exposition of the Old and New Testaments (1810), 2:167; 1:485). More literally understood, Urim and Thummim were precious stones (like those on the breastplate) used by the high priest to attain answers from the oracle of God for the king and Sanhedrin (Mishnah, tractate Yoma 7:5). In later times, this oracular instrument fell into disuse when prophets became the principal purveyors of God's messages. See also Josephus Flavius, Antiquities (3.7.5, 3.8.9); and John Spencer's De Legibus Hebraeorum Ritualibus (1685), lib. 3, diss. 7, cap. 7, fols. 975–78; and his Disertatio de Urim & Thummim (1669), cap. 7, on the mystical application of Urim and Thummim to Christ and their discontinuation as instruments of divination.

¹⁶ In his "Note Book of Authors" (Deut. 33:16), Mather refers to his collection of manuscript sermons "MSS. no. IV. Sermon. 70."

¹⁸ Based on the Latin translation of Targum Onkelos (Deut. 33:16), "cujus majestas habitet in coelis" (Biblia Sacra Polyglotta 1:861), Mather alludes to the interpretation of shekinah as "[He] whose majesty dwells in heaven."

Q. What is there particularly observable in that Clause of the Blessing on Joseph, His Glory is like the Firstling of his Bullock? v. 17.²⁰

A. His Arrival to the Dignity of Primogeniture, & so, a double Portion in the Land of Canaan, is intimated. But it is also to be observed, That he is compared unto the Firstling of HIS Bullock; because there were not more goodly Bullocks any where, than in Bashan, [Amos. 4.1.] which fell to the share of the Children of Menasseh.²¹

Q. What may be the Import of that Passage, in the Blessing of Zebulon, They shall call the People unto the Mountain, etc. v. 19.

A. It is here foretold, that they, in their Navigation, their Traffick, and Commerce, would perswade the Heathen, to Respect unto the Mountain & the Temple of God: And that for to Encourage and Recompense them in so doing, They should suck of the Abundance of the Sea, and have their Affairs by Sea, abundantly smiled upon.²²

Q. What were the more special Treasures Hid in the Sand, promised unto the Zebulonites. v. 19.²³

A. The Talmuds do especially reckon Three of those Treasures.²⁴ First, There was the Purple-fish, a sort of Shel-fish, with the Juice whereof they died their Purple. Next, There were Net-Fish, as we may call them; or, Fish in a great Variety, ¹⁹ The Greek εὐδοκία, from the infinitive εὐδοκέω, variously suggests “good pleasure” and “to be well pleased” (Strong’s # 2106).

²⁰ Silently corrected from Mather’s v. 16.

²¹ Patrick, Deut. 33:16 (Deuteronomy 662–63). Likening Joseph’s blessing to the glory of a “firstling bullock” is hardly to his dishonor, for Samuel Bochart, in his Hieroicoicon (pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 29, cols. 286–90) reminds us that the ancients (notably the Egyptians and Medo-Persian) revered a bullock as an emblem of divine kingship and deity – perhaps most notoriously seen in its anathematization of the Golden [male] Calf (Exod. 32:1–4; Deut. 9:21), in imitation of Apis, the sacred bull of Egypt. See Wilkinson’s Complete Gods and Goddesses (170–72).

²² Samuel Bochart, Hieroicoicon (1692), pars 2, lib. 5, cap. 9, col. 722.

²³ Mather’s muse is Bochart (Hieroicoicon, cols. 722–23), who also furnishes the Latin quotations and their sources.

²⁴ God promised Zebulon three blessings in response to his complaint that his portion of land consisted of nothing but infertile hills, mountains, lakes, and rivers, whereas his brethren received fruitful fields and vineyards. The Almighty comforted him: “They [Zebulon’s brethren] will all require thee for the hilazon [purple-fish], as it says, and the hidden treasures of the sand, which they daily took with Netts for their Diet. Thirdly, There was the /זכוכית/ לבנה /white, or, clear Glass, whereof they made Vessels of all sorts, which were it not for their Brittleness, would have been more precious than Gold. Jonathan mentions This, Et ex Arenâ specula educunt, et vasa vitrea.²⁵ The River Belus, was in the Border of Zebulon; whereof Tacitus ha's this Passage; Belus amnis Judaico mari illabitur, circâ cujus os conlectæ arenâ admixto Nitro, in Vitrum excoquuntur. Modicum id littus, sed egerentibus inexhaustum.²⁶ And Pliny ha's this Passage; Rivus Pagida, sive Belus, vitri fertiles Arenas, parvo littori miscens; Ipse è palude Cendevia à Radicibus Carmeli profluit.²⁷ Glass was first found out, it seems, by certain Merchants kindling a Fire on that Shore, with Nitre, (for Want of other Materials,) cum sparsi per littus epulas pararent.²⁸

Q. We don't count every Allegorical Flourish, that we meet withal, worthy to be thrown into our Heap of Illustrations. Yett sometimes we may light upon a very emphatical one, and such an one perhaps, as the Holy Spirit Himself intended we should profitably think upon, when we read His Oracles. As now; when shall the Church enjoy this Blessing, To suck of the Abundance of the Sea, & of the Treasures hid in the Sand? v. 19.

A. Reading lately a printed Sermon to Mariners, I mett with this Passage in it.

"Christ Himself shall most happily accomplish this Benediction, to the Eternal Purposes of Salvation for His Elect, when the last κέλευσμα shall call up those that groan under the Waters, in the Houses of the Giants, and awake them that sleep in the Dust, to meet their King in the Air, to be forever with the Lord. They indeed are the true Riches of the Deep, and Treasures of the Sand."²⁹ and R. Joseph learnt: 'Hidden' indicates the hilazon; 'treasures' indicates the tunny fish; 'sand' indicates white glass," in Soncino Babylonian Talmud, tractate Megillah (6a).

²⁵ Targum Jonathan ben Uzziel (Deut. 33:19), in Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (4:387), reads, "and from the [grains of] sand make mirrors and vessels of glass" (The Targums 2:678).

“What Pearls may we imagine shall then be found in the Deep, & what Stones in the Sands, to build up, the Great City, the Heavenly Jerusalem!”³⁰

Q. The Jewes do so Read a Passage, in the Blessing of Gad, In a Portion of the Hidden Lawgiver; what is the Meaning of it? v. 21.³¹

A. That is, Moses, the great Scribe, sais the Targum; for, as they suppose the Sepulchre of Moses was in the Lot of Gad.³²

[2856:]

Q. Why is it said of Gad, He provided the First Part for himself? v. 21.

[2852:]

Q. Why was it said of Naphthali, Possess thou the West, and the South? v. 23.

A. I'll give you the Gloss of the Talmuds upon it;

“The Rabbins deliver; The Sea of Tiberias is the Portion of Naphthali; Yea, it takes a full Line for the Netts, on the South-Side of it; As it is said, (Deut. 33.23.) Possess thou the Sea, and the South.”³⁴ So the Jerusalem Writers; “They gave ³⁰ The extract is from The Treasures of the Sea. A Sermon to the Mariners upon Deut. XXXIII. xviii, xix (1683), pp. 26–27, 28, by William Thomson (d. 1699), an obscure clergyman of Leigh-on-Sea (Essex). What also comes to mind are A Token for Mariners (1708), by the Puritan clergyman James Janeway (1636–1674), whose works were widely admired and imitated. Mather's own Religious Marriner (1700) precedes Janeway's own popular homily on the topic by nearly a decade.

³¹ Actually, Deut. 33:20.

³³ See Patrick (Deut. 33:21), Targum Onkelos, in Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (1:863), and The Targums (2:554).

³⁴ Mather's principal source appears to be Samuel Bochart's Hierozaicon (1692), pars 1, lib. 3, cap. 18, cols. 897–98. The passage in quotation marks is from the Babylonian Talmud, tractate Baba Kama (81b).

to Naphthali, a full Line, on the South Coast of the Sea, [That Yee might draw out his Nets,] as it is said, *Possess the Sea, and the South.*³⁵

Q. But this of Naphthali may be a little further spoken to; because there is a geographical Difficulty in it, about which there has been a deal of Puzzle among Interpreters. We know, That Naphthali did possess the North & the East, rather than the West & the South. Josephus will sufficiently inform you, how the Tribe lay, in the upper Galilee, about the Fountains of Jordan?³⁶

A. Bochart therefore thinks, that the Term, South, here, bears Respect unto the Prophecy just before; Dan shall leap from Bashan. That Prophecy was accomplished, when the Danites by a strange Leap, did possess themselves of Laish, a Town about the Fountains, of Jordan, & afterwards called it by the Name of Dan. In regard of these Danites now the Naphthalites were to lye unto the Southward. But then what we read, The West, should be read, The Sea; And it means the Sea of Tiberias. For from the Town of Dan, Southward, even unto that Sea, lay the Portion of Naphthali.³⁷

Q. How is it said of Asher, Thy Shoes shall be Iron & Brass? v. 25.

A. The Arabic renders it, Thy Bolts shall be Iron & Brass.³⁸ Kimchi accordingly expounds it, That their Countrey should be as well fenced as if it had been shutt up in brasen or iron Walls. But the Hebrewes take it in the Sense that Bochart gives, Iron & Brass are under thy Shoe. Sarepta, as Bochart shewes, a Town in 35 Mather has in mind the three Aramaic Targumi: Onkelos, Jonathan ben Uzziel, and Hierosolymitanum – all in Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (1:863, 4:388).

36 Josephus Flavius explains to his learned Greco-Roman audience, "The Naphthalites received the eastern parts, as far as the city of Damascus and the Upper Galilee, unto Mount Libanus, and the Fountains of Jordan, which rise out of that mountain; that is, out of that part of it whose limits belong to the neighboring city of Arce. The Danites' lot included all that part of the valley which respects the sun-setting, and were bounded by Azotus and Dora; as also they had all Jamnia and Gath, from Ekron to that mountain where the tribe of Judah begins" (Antiquities 5.1.22).

37 Bochart, Hieroicoicon (1693), pars 1, lib. 3, cap. 18, cols. 897–98. This geographical difficulty is solved in John Selden's Mare clausum seu (1635), lib. 1, cap. 6, pp. 21–22, where this most learned Anglican of English rabbis argues that the confusion arises because the Chaldee Paraphrasts employ the Hebrew term יָם [yam] i.e., "west" (Deut. 33:23) to designate the Sea of Tiberias, i.e., Genesaret, but also more indiscriminately, "sea, Mediterranean Sea, Red Sea, Dead Sea, and Sea of Galilee" (Strong's # 3220). As Patrick explains, "the Hebrews call great Lakes by the name of Seas: and by this Sea, is not meant the Mediterranean; but the Sea of Galilee, or Tiberias or Genesaret" (670).

38 Patrick (671); the Arabic, or rather, the "Versio Arabica cum Interpretatione Latina" (Deut. 33:25) reads, "Ferrum et aes ferae tuae," and Mather supplies the translation.

Q. How translate you that Passage in the Blessing of Asher, As thy Dayes, so shall thy Strength bee? v. 25.

A. The Original Word is רָחַץ and it may bee translated, Thy Rest, Thy Peace, Thy Quiet. This then may bee the Sense of the Blessing, Quamdiu durabunt Dies tui, duret etiam Quietus status tuus; i. e. Quietam semper agas Vitam.⁴¹

Q. What is meant by, The Fountain of Jacob? v. 28.

A. The Off-Spring of Jacob; the Waters, or People whereof Jacob was the Fountain.

It is to bee observed, Quod semen generationis, in Sacrà Paginâ, quandoque comparetur, cum Aquâ Vivâ; hoc est, ex Fonte, Prosiliente.⁴² Consider here, that Passage in Joh. 4.14. Hence those Words, upon Reuben, in Gen. 49.4. unstable as Water; I read, so Abruptly, Saltus instar Aquarium;⁴³ & I putt upon them this Paraphrase; Reuben, the Priviledges of the Primogeniture, were due indeed unto ³⁹ R. David Kimchi (1160–1235), aka. RaDaK, was a distinguished Hebrew commentator and grammarian of Narbonne (S France). Via Samuel Bochart's Hieroicoicon (1693), pars 2, lib. 6, cap. 16, col. 885, lines, 30–36, Mather paraphrases an extract from Kimchi's gloss on Targum Jonathan ben Uzziel (Deut. 33:25). Kimchi argues that Targum Jonathan's rendition, "The tribe of Asher will be sound [unalloyed] as iron, and their feet strong as brass in walking on the stony rocks" (The Targums 2:680), signifies that "fore ut terra ejus tam munita sit, quam si esset clausa muris abeneis & ferries" ("the gates and land of the same are fortified, and the city walls even with copper and iron"). Thus Bochart believes the ancient city צֶרֶפֶת and צֶרֶפֶת Sarepta (Sidon) (1 Kings 17:9) derived its name from "metalla fundere & conflare," the smelting of metals, or foundry (Hieroicoicon, pars 2, lib. 6, cap. 16, col. 884, lines 44–46); he says as much in his Geographia Sacra seu Phaleg et Canaan (1707), pars 1, lib. 4, cap. 35, col. 303, lines 24–29, that the name of Sarepta, In medio Sarepta nomen habet ab aeris & ferri fusione, cujus ibi magnum fuisse proventum Hebraei colligunt ex benedictione Aser horum locorum incole, Deut. 33:25. Ferrum & aes sub calceo tuo."

⁴² Lat: "This seed of the generation, on the holy page, whenever it is secured with living water, this is from the source springing forward."

thee; but I remember, Turpem illum, et lascivum Aquarum tuarum Saltum, quo factum, ut fontis instar, eo in loco Aquas tuas (Semen) *effuderis quo non oportebat.*⁴⁴ – And indeed, the Word פֶּחֶן there used, is in the Syrian Dialect, of a Lascivious Importance. See the Syriac Version of Eph. 4.19. Well; For this Cause the Jewes are called in Isa. 48.1. Those that are come forth out of the Waters of Judah. Compare also, Isa. 51.1. Thus, in Psal. 68.26. I read it, Bless the Lord, Yee that are of the Fountain of Israel; that is, His Posterity.⁴⁵

Q. That Clause, A People saved by the Lord; Give a Jewish Gloss upon it, but of a Christian Strain? v. 29.

Isaac saies, (in his Chissuk Emuna), That the Christians tell them, their Minds are wholly fixed on a corporal Fælicity; but he shewes our Mistake; for he saies, The Clause here before us imports the Spiritual Blessings of God; He saies, True Fælicity does not consist in Victory over Enemies, & Plenty of Corn, & such like things, which are before spoken of; but in the Salvation of the Soul, of which no nation in the World were secure, but the Jewes; which made Moses to say, *who is like unto thee?*⁴⁶

⁴⁴ Lat.: “There you have poured out that shameful and wanton leap of your waters, by which it is made like a fountain, you have poured out your seed in a place where you ought not.”

Q. On Mount Nebo, and Pisgah? v. 1.¹

A. It is plain, that Nebo and Pisgah, were One Mountain.

And Pisgah was either the Top of the Mountain, or else a Part where Steps were cutt out for to go up into it.

The Word being derived from a Root, that signifies, To Elevate, it may mean, the most Elevated Parts of the Mountain, or the Top of it.

But Eusebius ha's observed, That Aquila all along renders Pisgah by a Word that signifies, cutt-out; And so do the LXX. It is therefore conjectured, that in one Part of Mount Nebo, there were Steps cutt out, so that one might go up, with less of Difficulty; And this Part was peculiarly called, Pisgah.²

Eusebius & Jerom tell us, That a Part of this Ridge of Mountains, which were seen as one went up from Livias to Esbu, or Heshbon, did in their time retain the old Name of Abarim. They tell us also, that the Part particularly called, Nebo, was over against Jericho, not far from Jordan, and Six Miles from Esbu to the West. And they tell us, that as there was a City of Reuben called Nebo, probably from this Mountain, so theirs was a City of the Amorites called, Pisgah: Tho' in the Bible; the Name ha's an Addition, [Josh. XIII.20.] Ashdodh-Pisgah, and it was also among the Cities of Reuben.³

Q. Tis said of Moses, His Natural Force was not abated? v. 7.⁴

A. He had all the Vigour of Youth remaining. Some of the Ancients interpret it; There was not so much as a Wrinkle in his Cheeks; Others of them, He had not lost so much as a Tooth out of his Mouth. Both Onkelos, and the Jerusalem

1 As in Mather's volume on Genesis (BA 1:847), Edward Wells, D. D. (1667–1727), an Anglican clergyman and Rector of Cotesbach, supplies Mather with his hands-on geographical detail from An Historical Geography of the Old Testament (1711), vol. 2, ch. 2, sec. 6, § 9, pp. 153–54 (ODNB), to settle the ambiguity and identity of the two most prominent mountain tops of the Trans-Jordan Plateau, NE of the Dead Sea.

2 Wells (2:153–54). Eusebius Pamphilus, in his Onomasticon (p. 16, lines 24–26; and p. 20, line 7) invokes Aquila of Sinope (fl. 130 CE), the famous Greek proselyte to Judaism and translator of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek, who variously renders Mt. Pisgah and Mt. Nebo as Φασγώ, Ναβαν, and Αβαρείμ (Abarim) (Deut. 32:49) – designations frequently used interchangeably. Mather's reference to the steps cut out of the mountain appears to be based on the Hebrew phrase ראש הפסגה (Deut. 3:27), which the LXX renders κορυφή τοῦ ἐλαττεύμενου or “top of the cut mountain” (CBTEL).

3 Wells (2:154); St. Jerome, Liber de Nominibus Hebraicis [PL 023.0843], voce: Fasga (Pisgah).

4 Simon Patrick (Commentary 687–88) is the source for Mather's extract in the following paragraphs.

Targum, refer it unto the Splendor of his Countenance, which continued unto the Last.⁵

From hence it was, that the Heathen, who were not wholly unacquainted with the Story, imagined, That Moses was troubled to Dy, while he was yett so vigorous. For Trebellius Pollio, in the Life of Claudius, tells us, That the most learned Mathematicians were wont to say, That no Man lived beyond an Hundred & Twenty Years.⁶ For tho' Moses lived an Hundred & five & twenty Years (thus he mistakes,) being Dei, ut Judæorum libri loquuntur, familiaris; yett he complaining, that Iuvenis interiret, he died a Young Man, they say, he was told by an uncertain God, that no Man should ever live longer.⁷

This Mistake arose from their Misinterpretation of those Words, [Gen. 6.3.] Yett his Dayes shall be an hundred & twenty Years. Huetius well observes, That this Incertus Deus was the true God, the Creator of Heaven & Earth; whom our Apostle sais they called, The Unknown God.⁸

Q. The Children of Israel wept for Moses. Is there any Difference between Weeping and Mourning? v. 8.

A. The Jewes have a Tradition, of a Difference between them.

They add, That the Dayes of Weeping did never exceed a Month; but the Dayes of Mourning sometimes lasted a Twelvemonth; as, for their famous R. Judah, who composed the Mischna.⁹

⁵ Targum Onkelos and Targum Hierosolymitanum (Deut. 34:7), in Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (1:865; 4:389): "his eye had not dimmed, neither was the radiance [glory] of his face changed" (The Targums 2:556; 684). See also Bochart's Hieroicozon (pars 1, lib. 2, cap. 45, col. 506, lines 21ff).

⁶ Deut. 34:7: "And Moses was an hundred and twentie yeeres old when he died" (KJV).

⁷ The celebrated French scholar and bishop of Soissons Pierre-Daniel Huet (1630–1721), in his Demonstratio Evangelica ad serenissimum Delphinum (1690), prop. 4, sec. 57, col. 67(a), supplies Patrick (687–688), and thus Mather, with this extract and Latin quote from Trebellius Pollio (fl. late 4th c. CE), one of the six Roman historians of the Augustae Historiae Scriptores. In his biography Divus Claudius (cap. 2, line 4) on Claudius II Gothicus, aka. Roman Emperor Marcus Aurelius Claudius Augustus (c. 214–270 CE), Trebellius Pollio invokes learned astrologers who argue that six scores – and no more – are allotted to the life of man. Not even Moses, the sole "friend of God, as he is called in the books of the Jews," so the magi war-rant, was granted a longer life, for the Hebrew Lawgiver lamented that "he died young [in his prime]," in Life of Claudius (2.4).

⁹ Patrick (Deuteronomy 688) draws on Wilhelm Schickard's משפט המלך [Mishpat Hamel-ech] Jus Regium Hebraeorum (1625), cap. 6, theor. 19, pp. 158–59. The celebrated R. Yehudah HaNasi יהודה הנשיא aka. Judah the Prince (c. 135–217 CE), compiled and redacted the Mishnah (Jewish oral traditions). The year-long mourning period for the dead (Jahrzeit), to which Mather refers, is not mentioned in the Mishnah, but in Soncino Babylonian Talmud, tractate

Q. Can we certainly gather the præcise Time, when Moses died?

A. Yes. If to the Thirty Dayes of Weeping for Moses, we add the Three Dayes, in which the Spies lay hid in the Mountain; and allow three or four Dayes more for their going & coming back; and then add, the Three Dayes they lay by Jordan, before their passing over; they make just a Month and Ten Dayes, from the First Day of the last Month, when we may suppose that Moses died, unto the Day they gott safe over Jordan, which was the Tenth Day of the First Month.

The Midrash Rabba, telling the Story of Hamans casting Lotts, to find the best Time, to do Execution upon the Jewes, tells us, He pitched on the Month Adar, because it had been unlucky unto the Jewes, by the Death of their Master Moses in it. But he did not consider, saies the Midrasch, That as Moses died on the first Day of this Month, so he was born on the same first Day.¹⁰

Kethuboth (103b), where R. Judah is quoted, saying, "For thirty days they mourned both day and night [for Moses], subsequently they mourned in the day-time and studied at night or mourned at night and studied during the day, until a period of twelve months of mourning [had passed]." On HaNasi, see A. Carlebach, R. Judah Ha-Nasi, His Life and Times (1953); and A. Oppenheimer, Rabbi Judah ha-Nasi: Statesman, Reformer, and Redactor of the Mishnah (2017).

¹⁰ According to Esth. (3:7), Haman, King Ahasuerus's vizier, cast lots "in the first moneth (that is, the moneth Nisan) in the twelfth yeere of king Ahasuerus, they cast Pur, that is, the lot, before Haman, from day to day, and from moneth to moneth, to the twelfth moneth, that is the moneth Adar." According to Jewish tradition, Moses was born on the 7th of Adar and died on the same day 120 years later, but the rabbis are not entirely agreed on the exact date. As the Talmud renders it, "Moses died on the seventh of Adar [the twelfth month] and was born on the seventh of Adar" (Sotah 12b). And yet, Midrash Rabbah Esther (VII:11), insists that "on the first day of Adar Moses died and on the first of Adar he was born." The Talmud, tractate Kiddushin (38a), approaches this question in a more calculated fashion: "How do we know that he [Moses] died on the seventh of Adar? For it is written: [i] So Moses the servant of the Lord died there [Deut. 34:5]; [ii] And the children of Israel wept for Moses in the plains of Moab thirty days [Deut. 34:8]; [iii] Moses the servant is dead; now therefore arise, go over [this Jordan]; [iv] Pass through the midst of the camp, and command the people, saying: Prepare you victuals; for within three days ye are to pass over this Jordan [Josh 1:2, 11]; and [v] and the people came up out of Jordan on the tenth day of the first month [Josh. 4:19]; deduct [from the 10th of Nissan] the preceding thirty three days, and thus you learn that Moses died on the seventh of Adar. And how do we know that he was born on the seventh of Adar? – For it is said: And he [Moses] said unto them, I am an hundred and twenty years old this day, I cannot more go out and come in [Deut. 31:2]. Now, 'this day' need not be stated; why then is it stated? It teaches that the Holy One, blessed be He, sits and completes the years of the righteous [exactly] from day to day and month to month, as it is said, the number of thy days I will fulfil [Exod. 23:26]."

Q. A Remark on Moses's Burial? v. 12.¹¹

A. Tis Dr. Lightfoot. Moses is buried by CHRIST; who is to Bury His Ceremonies.¹²

11 In his "Note-Book of Authors and Texts" (Deut. 34), Mather recommends the same primary reference works on Deuteronomy he lists at the end of Numbers (see above).

12 The great Puritan Hebraist and biblical scholar, John Lightfoot (1602–1675), stands out for his many publications on the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures, most famously his Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae (1658), which went through numerous expansions and editions. In his Chronicle of the Times, and the Order of the Texts of the Old Testament ("Deuteronomy," note 9), Lightfoot tries to resolve the question of how Moses could have written about his own death, burial, and loss of his tomb by subsequent generations: "And hee buried him in a valley in the land of Moab, over against Beth-Peor: but no man knoweth of his Sepulchre unto this day" (Deut. 34:6, KJV). Lightfoot's contemporaries – among them Thomas Hobbes (Leviathan [1651], part 3, ch. 33, pp. 200–202), Benedict Spinoza (Tractatus Theologico-Politicus [1670], cap. 8), and Richard Simon (Histoire Critique du Vieux Testament [1678], lib. 1, ch. 5–7) – pointed to this and other passages in the Pentateuch to argue that Moses, at best, wrote only parts of the books that bear his name, and that public scribes and later redactors edited the Torah as time and circumstances arose over the centuries. Far from being defensive about such radical claims, Lightfoot agrees that, in this case at least, the concluding chapter of Deuteronomy was added by someone else. Yet by offering a Christological allegorical interpretation of Moses' death and burial, Lightfoot deflects attention from the underlying issue of authorship and points to the abrogation of the Mosaic ceremonial rites in Christ: "The last Chapter of the Book was written by some other than Moses" Lightfoot avers, "for it relateth his death, and how he was buried by the Lord, that is by Michael, Jude 9. or Christ, who was to bury Moses Ceremonies," The Works of John Lightfoot (1684) 1:39. Mather himself is far from closed-minded on the textual changes to the Holy Scriptures. For instance, in his gloss on John 21:1 (BA, vol. 8), he addresses the issue head-on:

"Q. Who might probably be the writer of the Last Chapter of John? v. 1.

A. It seems plain to [Hugo] Grotius [Annotationes in NT (1641–50), in Opera Omnia Theologica (1679) 2:571] That the Last Words written by John, were those which conclude the foregoing Chapter. Hee thinks, That as the Last Chapter of Deuteronomy, and the Last Chapter of Joshua, were [*] by the Sanedrim added [] unto the Books, after the Death of those who wrote the rest, so the Last Chapter of John, was added unto the Gospel of John, after his Death, {by} the Church of Ephesus. And probably, they made this Addition, that they might give an Account concerning the Oracle of our Lord, about the Death of that Apostle, and correct the mistakes, which had spread among the Christians, about the Sense of that Oracle." See also my discussion in BA (1:131–44).

Appendix A: Cancellations

As discussed in my “Note on the Text and Editorial Principles” (BA 1:204 # 4), the holograph MS reveals literally thousands of cancellations and emendations of one sort or another. Appendix A only records those cancellations and excisions that substantively impact Mather’s commentary. The vast majority of his textual emendations in the holograph MS consists of false starts or light stylistic revisions of phrases. For a complete record, readers should consult the readily accessible microfilm copies or the holograph MS at the Massachusetts Historical Society.

The enumeration on the left margin (below) signifies the location, page, and line references in the edited volume where the cancellation occurs.

Q. The Prohibition of, Taking a Wife to her Sister, to vex her? v. 18.

A. Many Eminent Writers, [*] following the marginal Reading, [one Wife to another,] conceive, That a Plurality of Wives is expressly forbidden by this Law. And so the Karaites interpret it.]

But it is well known, that as Polygamy was indulged before the Law, so it was after it. And Moses himself supposes it, when he provides, that a Man should not prefer a Child he had by a Beloved Wife, before one by her whom he less esteemed, if he were the Eldest Son. We find expressly, That the Hebrew Kings might have Many Wives, tho' not a Multitude. [Deut. XVII.27.] And the best of their Princes, who readd the Divine Law Day & Night, and could not but understand its Meaning, took many Wives without any Reproof. So far from That, we find God giving more Wives to him than he had before. [2. Sam. XII.9.]

The Meaning therefore is, That tho' Two Wives, or more, at a time, were permitted in those days, yett it was not permitted unto any Man, to take Two Sisters, (as Jacob had formerly done,) whether Legitimates or Illegitimates.

There use to be great Jealousies in Emulations between Wives, which between Two Sisters would have been more Intolerable than between Two other Women; who (as Cunæus remarks) not being of the same Consanguinity, might live more quietly together under the same Husband. Besides, no one would afterwards marry either of the Sisters, being Widows, because they were defiled with such an Impious Conjunction, for which the Husband might by the Law have been cutt off.

[621 16.] Mather cancels the following Q. & A. with a strikethrough:

Q. Thou shalt not Avenge, nor bear any Grudge, [or thus, Nor be mindful of Wrong] How do the Hebrewes explain these, & the Difference between them? v. 18.

A. They say, To Avenge, is to Deny a good Turn unto one who formerly denied Him. To be mindful of Wrong, is, to Do a good Turn unto one, who formerly would not do so much for him, but at the doing thereof, to upbraid him with his former Unkindness. They thus illustrate it; when Reuben said unto Simeon, lend me thy Hatchet, he answereth, I will not lend it. Afterward, Simeon upon Occasion saith unto Reuben, lend me thy Hatchet: Reuben saith unto him, I will not lend it, Thou wouldest not lend me thine: This is /נקימה/ Nekima, or, Avengement. Again, Reuben saith unto Simeon, lend me thy Hatchet; he answereth, I will not lend it. Afterward Simeon saith upon Occasion unto Reuben, lend me thy Hatchet; Reuben saith, Lo, I will lend it thee, I will not deal with thee, as thou dealedst with me.
